He wrote a number of iambic poems, sermons, and letters. A volume of his poems was published by Matthew Buxt, 4to., Eton, 1610: the poems occupy only about 73 pp. small 4to., and were probably written on occasion of the church festivals, as they are commemorative of the incidents of the life of Christ, or of the Saints. An Officium, or ritual service, composed by him, and containing three Canones or hymns, is given by Nicolaus Rayanus in his dissertation De Acoluthia Officii Canonici, prefixed to the Acta Sanctorum, Junii, vol. ii. Joannes wrote also Vita S. Dorothei Junioris, given in the Acta Sanctorum, Junii, vol. i. p. 605, &c. Various Sermons for the Church Festivals, and other works of his, are extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. pp. 309, 627, &c., vol. x. pp. 221, 226, vol. xi. p. 79; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 139; Oudin, De Scriptor. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. col. 606; Acta Sanctorum, ii. cc.; Buxt, Carmina Joannis Euchaitensis.)

59. EUGENICUS. This name is sometimes given to Joannes the Deacon and Rhetorician. [See above No. 51.]

60. EUGENICUS (Εὐγενικός) was deacon and nomophylax of the great church at Constantinople, and brother to the celebrated Marcus or Mark Eugenicius, archbishop of Ephesus, one of the leaders of the Greeks at the councils of Ferrara and Florence (A. D. 1438—39). [EUGENICUS, M.] Joannes also attended the council, and embraced the same side as his brother. He attempted to leave Italy during its session, but was brought back. He wrote: 1. An iambic poem of 25 lines, Εἰς εἰκόνα τοῦ μεγάλου Χρυσοστόμου, In imaginem magni Chrysostomi. 2. An iambic tetrastrich, Εἰς παναγύριον, In Panagium. 3. Προόεσσις, Prooemio, i. e. to the Aethiopia of Heliodorus. [HELIODORUS IV., Romance Writer.] These three pieces were published by Bandini (Catalog. Codd. Laur. Medic. vol. iii. col. 322, &c.) Several other works of Joannes Eugenicius are extant in MS., especially his Antirrheticum adversus Synodum Florentinum, quoted by Allatius in his work De Purgatorio. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 653; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Appendix by Wharton and Gery, p. 141.)

61. GALENUS (Γαλῆνός) or PEDIASIMUS (Πεδιάσιμος); also called POTHEUS (Πόθος), and HYPATUS (Α. PRINCEPS) PHILOSOPHORUM (Ἰσχυρὸς τῶν φιλοσόφων). He was Chartophylax, keeper of the records of the province of Justiniana Prima, and of all Bulgaria, under the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the Younger (A. D. 1328—1341). He was a man of varied accomplishments, as his works show, and the eminence which he attained among his countrymen is evinced by his title of "Chief of the Philosophers." He wrote; 1. Ἐξήγησις εἰς τὴν τοῦ Θεοκρίτου Σύργην, Exegesis in Theocriti Syrygem. This was first published by Henry Stephens in his smaller edition of Theocriti aliorumque Poetarum Idyllia, 12mo., Paris, 1579: it is reprinted in Kieseling's edition of Theocritus, 8vo., Leipzig, 1819. 2. Scholia Graeca in Oppiani Halicarnassici De Piscibus. Harles thinks the scholia published by Conrad Rittershusius with his edition of Oppian, 8vo., Leyden, 1597, are those of Joannes Galenus. 3. Πόθος, Desiderium, a short iambic poem in two parts, respectively entitled Περὶ γυναικὸς κακῆς, De Muliere mala, and Περὶ γυναικὸς ἀγαθῆς, De Muliere bona. These verses were first published by Lucas Holstenius in his edition of Demophilii, &c. Sententiae Morales, 12mo., Rome, 1638; and were reprinted by Gale in his Opuscula Mythologica, Ethica, Physica, 8vo., Cambr. 1671; and by Fabricius in his Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 576, &c. vet. It is from the title of these verses that Joannes is thought to derive his surname of Pothus. 4. Περὶ τῶν δώδεκα ἁλῶν τοῦ Ἡρακλέους, De Duodecim Labores Heraculi. This piece was printed by Allatius in his Excerpta Varia Graecorum Sophistarum, 8vo., Rome, 1641. He gave it as the work of an anonymous author; but Fabricius thinks it may be a work of Joannes Galenus, "forte Pediasimi" (Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 54). Joannes' other works are still in MS.: they consist, I. of commentaries and expositions of the Greek poets, as, 5. Allegoria Anagogica, in quatuor primos versus Lib. IV. Iliados. 6. Εἰς τὴν Ἡσίοδου Θεογονίαν ἀλληγορίαι, Interpretatio Allegorica in Hesiodi Theogonia. 7. Τεχνολογία εἰς τὴν τοῦ Ἡσίοδου δοκίμα, Commentarius Grammaticus in Hesiodi Scutum. 8. Allegoria Tantali. 9. He wrote also a work on the science of allegorical interpretation, De triplici Ratione Allegoriae Fabularum Poeticarum, sc. Physica, Ethica, Theologica. II. Philosophical and scientific works. 10. Ἐσπερος in quodam

Aristotelis libros, especially on the Analytica priora. 11. Introductio and Scholía to the works of the Astronomer Cleomedes [ΚΛΕΟΜΕΔΗΣ]. His other scientific works are, 12. Arithmeticonum Quaestionum Expositio. 13. In quaedam Arithmetices loca obscura. 14. Γεωμετρία καὶ σύνοψις περὶ μητρήσεως καὶ μετρίσμου γῆς, Geometria, et Compendium de Mensuratione et Divisione Terrae. 15. De Cubo Duplicando. 16. Opusculum de Septem Planetis. 17. De Symphonis Musicis. III. Miscellaneous. Two other works of Joannes; one, 18, apparently on canon law, De Consanguinitate; and another, 19, possibly an allegorical commentary, De Novem Musis, are also enumerated. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 371; vol. xi. p. 648, &c.; Bandini, Catal. Codd. Laur. Medic. vol. ii. col. 95, 162.)

62. Abbot of the monastery on Mount GANUS. [See No. 101.]

63. OF GAZA, a Greek writer (grammaticus), of whose date nothing is known, except that he lived after the time of the Christian poet Nonnus [NONNUS], who may be placed in or just before the reign of Justinian I. John of Gaza appears to have imitated the style of Nonnus. He wrote: 1. Ἐκφρασις τοῦ κοσμοῦ πίνακος τοῦ ἐν Γάζῃ ἢ ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ, Tabellus Universi Ecphrasis, an iambic poem of 701 lines, published by Janus Rutgersius in his Variae Lectiones, 4to., Leyden, 1618, pp. 98, &c. 2. Περὶ Ἀρχαιολογίας, De Antiquitatibus, extant in MS., and quoted by Du Cange in his notes to Zonaras. (Rutgersius, Var. Lect. l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 610, vol. xi. p. 653.)

64. GEOMETRA, the GEOMETER (Γεωμέτρης), called also PROTHOTHRONUS (Πρωτόθρονος), a Greek writer, of whose date nothing is accurately known. Combéfis, in the Notitia Scriptorum in the first vol. of his Bibliotheca Concionatoria, places him in the ninth or tenth century. Oudin places him in the eleventh century. He is quoted by Macarius Chrysoccephalus [CHRYSOCEPHALUS MACARIUS], whom some critics place in the thirteenth, others in the fourteenth century, in his Catena in Matthaeum. He wrote, 1. Epigramma in S. Crucem, published by Allatius in his Excerpta Varia Graecorum Sophistarum, 8vo., Rome, 1641. 2. Metaphrasis Canticum S. Scripturae, or Odorum (s. Canticorum Ecclesiae Metaphrasis), a paraphrase in iambic verse of nine songs from the O. and N. T.; published by Bandini in his Catal. Codd. Laur. Medic. vol. i. p. 65, &c. 3. Ἕννοιαι εἰς τὴν ὑπερῶσαν Θεοτόκον, Hymni quatuor Elegiaci in S. Virginem, with a short Corollarium or epilogue, in iambic verse. These hymns which, from each distich beginning with the word Χαίρε, are sometimes referred to by the descriptive term Χαιρετισμοί, were published by Fed. Morel, with a Latin version, 8vo., Paris, 1591, and were reprinted in the Corpus Poetarum Graecorum, fol. Geneva, 1614, vol. ii. p. 746; in the Appendix (or Auctarium) Bibliothecae Patrum of Ducaeus, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1624; and in the Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xiv. p. 439, &c., Paris, 1654. In this last work they are followed by a Hymnus Alphabeticus, the authorship of which is uncertain. 4. Ἐπὶ γράμματα τετραστίχη ἡθικὰ ἐν ἡ ἐπεγραφή Παύλου, Paradisus Tetrastrichorum Moralium et Piorum. These poems, ninety-nine in number, are commonly said to have been first published by Fed. Morel, 8vo., Paris, 1595; but Oudin says they were published at Venice, 4to., 1563. They were reprinted with the Hymni in S. Virginem, in the Appendix of Ducaeus, and in the Biblioth. Patrum of

1634. Joannes Geometra wrote several sermons and poems extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. pp. 625, 676, vol. x. p. 130; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Diss. 1. ma. p. 10; Oudin, De Scriptor. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. col. 615.)

65. GLYCER, GLYCRUS, GLYCE, or GLYCAR [GLYCIS.]

66. GRAMMATICUS. [PHILOPONTUS.]

67. HIEROSOLYMITANUS. [See No. 72 to 76.]

68. HYPATUS (s. PRINCEPS) PHILOSOPHORUM. [See No. 61 and No. 78.]

69. JACOBITARUM PATRIARCHA, a Latin version of a letter of Joannes, patriarch of the Egyptian Jacobites, to Pope Eugenius (A. D. 1431 to 1447), in reply to a letter of the Pope to him, is given in the Concilia, vol. xiii. col. 1201, ed. Labbe; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii., Appendix, p. 151.

70. JANOPULUS. [JANOPULUS.]

71. JEJUNATOR. [See No. 27.]

72. OF JERUSALEM (1), was originally a monk; but little is known of his history till A. D. 386, when he was elected to succeed Cyril [CYRILLUS, St. of JERUSALEM] as bishop of Jerusalem. He was then not much more than thirty years of age. (Hieron. Epist. lxxxii. 8). Some speak of him as patriarch, but Jerusalem was not elevated to the dignity of a patriarchate until the following century. Joannes was a man of insignificant personal appearance (Hieron. Lib. contra Joann. c. 10), and Jerome, who was disposed to disparage him, thought him a man of small attainments: he acknowledges, however, that others gave him credit for eloquence, talent, and learning (Hieron. Lib. contra Joann. c. 4); and Theodoret calls him a man worthy of admiration (H. E. v. 35). He was acquainted, at least in some degree, with the Hebrew and Syriac languages, but it is doubtful if he was acquainted with Latin. He is said to have been at one period an Arian, or to have sided with the Arians when they were in the ascendancy under the emperor Valens (Hieron. Lib. contra Joann. c. 4, 8). Jerome hints that there were other reports current to his discredit, but as he does not state what were the charges against him, there is some difficulty in judging whether they had any other origin than the malice of his opponents.

For eight years after his appointment to the bishopric, he was on friendly terms with Jerome, who was then living a monastic life in Bethlehem or its neighbourhood: but towards the close of that period, strife was stirred up by Epiphanius of Constantia (or Salamis) in Cyprus, who came to Palestine to ascertain the truth of a report which had reached him, that the obnoxious sentiments of Origen were gaining ground under the patronage of Joannes [EPIPHANIUS]. The violence with which Epiphanius preached against Origenism, and by implication, against Joannes, provoked at first merely contempt for what Joannes regarded as the revilings of a dotard; and Joannes contented himself with sending his archdeacon to advise him to leave off such preaching (Hieron. Lib. contra Joann. c. 14). The matter, however, produced serious results; for Epiphanius, failing to induce Joannes pointedly to condemn Origenism, roused against him the fierce and intolerant spirit of Jerome and the other solitaries of Bethlehem: and in his ardour proceeded to the irregular step of ordaining Paulinianus, the younger brother of Jerome, as deacon and presbyter. The ordination, however, took place, not in the diocese of Jerusalem, but in the adjacent one of Eleutheropolis. This irregular proceeding either roused Joannes, or served him as a pretext for anger, and he exclaimed against Epiphanius, and resorted to severe measures for quelling the contumacious spirit of the monks of Bethlehem; and even endeavoured to procure the banishment of Jerome. His opponents, however, were not to be daunted; Epiphanius wrote a letter to Joannes (about A. D. 394), which Jerome translated into Latin, affirming that the real cause of the difference was the leaning of Joannes to Origenism, justifying the ordination of Paulinian, and solemnly warning Joannes against that heresy. The letter appears among the Epistolæ of Jerome (No. 60 in the older editions, No. 110 in the edit. of Martianay, No. 51 in the edition of Vallarsi). Joannes did not reply to Epiphanius, but addressed an apologetic letter to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, who, with considerable difficulty, effected a reconciliation between Joannes and Jerome, perhaps about A. D. 400. Rufinus had in this quarrel been the supporter of Joannes, who afterwards requited his services by writing to Pope Anastasius in his behalf, when Rufinus, then in Italy, was accused of heresy. The reply of Anastasius is given in the Concilii (vol. ii. col. 1194, ed. Labbe, vol. iii. col. 943, ed. Mansi).

Whether Joannes really cherished opinions at variance with the orthodoxy of that time, or only exercised toward those who held them a forbearance and liberality which drew suspicion on himself; he was again involved in squabbles with the supporters of orthodox views. He was charged with favouring Pelagius, who was then in Palestine, and who was accused of heresy in the councils of Jerusalem and Diospolis (A. D. 415), but was in the latter council acquitted of the charge, and restored to the communion of the church. The followers of Pelagius are represented as acting with great violence against Jerome. Jerome applied for the support and countenance of Pope Innocent I. (A. D. 402—417), who accordingly wrote to Joannes (Innocentii Epistol. 3, apud Labbe, Concilii, vol. ii. col. 1316; Mansi, Concil. vol. iii. col. 1125), with whom Augustin also remonstrated (Epistola, 252, ed. vet., 179, ed. Caillan, Paris, 1842) on the favour which he showed to Pelagius. Augustin's letter is, however, respectful and courteous, and he has elsewhere recognised Joannes as connected with himself in the unity of the faith (Contra Litt. Petilianii, ii. 117). In the struggle of Joannes of Constantinople, better known as Chrysostom, against his enemies, Joannes of Jerusalem had taken his part, and Chrysostom in his exile (A. D. 404) acknowledged his kindness in a letter still extant (Chrysostom, Epist. 88, Opera, vol. iii. p. 640, ed. Bened. 1ma. p. 771, ed. 2da. Paris, 1838). Joannes died A. D. 416 or 417. (Hieronymus, Epistolæ, 60, 61, 62, ed. Vet. 39, 110, ed. Benedictin. 51, 82, and Liber Contra Joan. Hierosolym. ed. Vallarsi, to which the references in the course of the article have been made; Chrysostom. Augustin. ll. cc.; Socrates, H. E. v. 15; Sozomen. H. E. vii. 14; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xii. par. 100; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 281; Fleury, Histoire Ecclésiastique, vol. iv. p. 634. &c., vol. v. p. 126, 414, &c. 447; Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 386, lxxvi.; 391, xlv.; 392, xlii.—xlvi.; 393, ii.—xxi.; 399, xxxvii.; 402, xxvi.—xxx.; 415, xix.—xxiv.; 416, xxxi. xxxii. xxxv.; Pagi, Critica in Baron. Annos, ann. 416, xxxv.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, Joannes wrote, according to Gennadius (De Viris Illustr. c. 30), Adversus Obrectatores sui Studii Liber, in which he showed that he rather admired the ability than followed the opinion of Origen. Fabricius and Ceillier think, and with apparent reason, that this work, which is lost, was the apologetic letter addressed by Joannes to Theophilus of Alexandria. No other work of Joannes is noticed by the ancients: but in the seventeenth century two huge volumes appeared, entitled, Joannis Nepotii Sylvant, Hierosolym. Episcopi XLIV. Opera omnia quas hactenus incoegmita, reperiri potuerunt: in unum collecta, suoque Auctori et Auctoritati tribus Vindictiarum libris asserta, per A. R. P. Petrum Wastelium, fol. Brussels, 1643. The Vindictias occupied the second volume. The works profess to be translated from the Greek, and are as follows:

1. Liber de Institutione primorum Monachorum, in Lege Veteri exortorum et in Nova peracerrantium, ad Cyrasium Monachum. Interprete Aymerico Patriarcha Antiocheno. This work is mentioned by Trithemius (apud Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. p. 526) as "Volumen insigne de principio et profectu ordinis Carmeliticis," and is ascribed by him to a later Joannes, patriarch of Jerusalem in the eighth century. It is contained in several editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum (in which work indeed it seems to have been first published, vol. ix. Paris, fol. 1589), and in the works of Thomas a Jesu, the Carmelite (vol. i. p. 416, &c. fol. Colon. 1684). Its origin has been repeatedly discussed; and it is generally admitted, except by the Carmelites, to be the production of a Latin writer, and of much later date than our Joannes.
2. In stratagemata Beati Jobi Libri III., a commentary on the first three chapters of the book of Job, often printed in Latin among the works of Origen, but supposed to belong neither to him nor to Joannes.
3. In S. Matthæum, an imperfect commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, usually printed under the title of Opus imperfectum in Matthæum, among the works of Chrysostom, in the Latin or Græco-Latin editions of that father; but supposed to be the work of some Arian or Anomoean, about the end of the sixth, or in the seventh century.
4. Fragmenta ex Commentario ad prima Capitula XI. S. Marci, cited by Thomas Aquinas (Catena Aurea ad Evang.) as a work of Chrysostom.
5. Fragmenta ex Commentario in Lucam, extant under the name of Chrysostom, partly in the editions of his works, partly in the Latin version of a Greek Catena in Lucam published by Corderius, fol. Antwerp, 1628; and partly in the Catena Aurea of Thomas Aquinas.
6. Homiliæ LXIII., almost all of them among those published in the works of Chrysostom. There is no good reason for ascribing any of these works to Joannes; nor are they, in fact, ascribed to him, except by the Carmelites. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 299, vol. x. p. 525, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 281, &c.; Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, vol. iii. p. 87, ed. Paris, 1690.)

73. OF JERUSALEM (2). A synodical letter of Joannes, who was patriarch of Jerusalem early in the sixth century, and his suffragan bishops assembled in a council at Jerusalem A. D. 517 or 518, to Joannes of Constantinople [JOANNES CAPPAFOX I. No. 27], is given in the Concilii (vol. v. col.

74. OF JERUSALEM (3). Three extant pieces relating to the Iconoclastic controversy bear the name of Joannes of Jerusalem, but it is doubtful how far they may be ascribed to the same author. 1. Ἰωάννου εὐλαβεστάτου τοῦ Ἱεροσολυμίτου μοναχοῦ διήγησις, Joannis Hierosolymitani reverendissimi Monachi Narratio, a very brief account of the origin of the Iconoclastic movement, published by Combéfis among the Scriptores post Theophanem, fol. Paris, 1685, and reprinted at Venice A. D. 1729, as part of the series of Byzantine historians; and is also included in the Bonn edition of that series. It is also printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandius, vol. xiii. p. 270. 2. Διάλογος στηλιτευτικὸς γεγόμενος παρὰ πιστῶν καὶ ὁρθοδόξων καὶ πᾶσαν καὶ ῥῆλον ἔχοντων πρὸς ἑλεγχον τῶν ἐναντίων τῆς πίστεως καὶ τῆς διδασκαλίας τῶν ἁγίων καὶ ὁρθοδόξων ἡμῶν πατέρων, Disceptatio invecctiva quas habita est a Fidelibus et Orthodoxis, Studiosisque ac Zelum habentibus ad confutandos adversarios Fidei atque Doctrinae sanctorum orthodoxorumque Patrum nostrorum, first published by Combéfis in the Scriptores post Theophanem as the work of an anonymous writer, and is contained in the Venetian, but not in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine writers. It is also reprinted by Gallandius (ut sup. p. 352) as written by "Joannes Damascenus," or "Joannes Patriarcha Hierosolymitanus," some MSS. giving one name and others giving the other. Gallandius considers that he is called Damascenus, from his birth-place. The author of this Invective is to be distinguished from the more celebrated Joannes Damascenus [DAMASCENUS], his contemporary, to whom perhaps the transcribers of the MSS., in prefixing the name Damascenus, intended to ascribe the work. 3. Ἰωάννου μοναχοῦ καὶ πρεσβυτέρου τοῦ Δαμασκηνοῦ λόγος ἀποδεικνύς περὶ τῶν ἁγίων καὶ σεπτῶν εἰκότων, πρὸς πάντας Χριστιανούς καὶ πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα Κωνσταντῖνον τὸν Καβαλίνον καὶ πρὸς πάντας ἀπειτικούς, Joannis Damasceni Monachi ac Presbyteri Oratio demonstrativa de sacris ac venerandis Imaginibus, ad Christianos omnes, adversariusque Imperatorem Constantinum Cubulinum. The title is given in other MSS. "Ἐπιστολὴ Ἰωάννου Ἱεροσολύμων ἀρχιεπισκόπου, κ. τ. λ., Epistola Joannis Hierosolymitani Archiepiscopi, &c." The work was first printed in the Auctarium Novum of Combéfis, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1648, and was reprinted by Gallandius (ut sup. p. 358, &c.). Fabricius is disposed to identify the authors of Nos. 1 and 3; and treats No. 2 as the work of another and unknown writer; but Gallandius, from internal evidence, endeavours to show that Nos. 2 and 3 are written by one person, but that No. 1. is by a different writer; and this seems to be the preferable opinion. He thinks there is also internal evidence that No. 3 was written in the year 770, and was subsequent to No. 2. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 682; Gallandius, Bibl. Patrum, vol. xiii. Prolegomena, c. 10, 15.)

75. OF JERUSALEM (4), patriarch of Jerusalem, author of a life of Joannes Damascenus, Bios τοῦ ἁγίου πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἰωάννου τοῦ Δαμασκηνοῦ συγγράμματα παρὰ Ἰωάννου πατριάρχου Ἱεροσολύμων, Vita sancti Patris nostri Joannis Damasceni a Joanne Patriarcha Hierosolymitano conscripta. The life is a translation from the Arabic, or at least founded upon an Arabic biography; and was written a considerable time after the death of Damascenus, which occurred about A. D. 756, or perhaps later [DAMASCENUS JOANNES], and after the cessation of the Iconoclastic contest, which may be regarded as having terminated on the death of the emperor Theophilus, A. D. 842. But we have no data for determining how long after these events the author lived. Le Quien identifies him with a Joannes, patriarch of Jerusalem, who was burnt alive by the Saracens in the latter part of the reign (A. D. 963—969) of Nicephorus Phocas, upon suspicion that he had excited that emperor to attack them. (Cedrenus, Compend. p. 661, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 374, ed. Bonn.) The life of Joannes Damascenus was first published at Rome, with the orations of Damascenus, De Sacris Imaginibus, 8vo. Rome, 1553: it was reprinted at Basel with the works of Damascenus A. D. 1575; and in the Acta Sanctorum Maii (A. D. 6, vol. ii. (the Latin version in the body of the work, p. 111, &c., and the original in the Appendix, p. 723, &c.); and in the edition of the works of Damascenus by Le Quien, vol. i. fol. Paris, 1712. The Latin version is given (A. D. vi. Maii) in the Vitas Sanctorum of Lippomani, and the De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis of Surias. (Le Quien, Jo. Damasceni Opera, note at the beginning of the Vita S. Jo. Damasc.; and Oriens Christianus, vol. iii. p. 466; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. pp. 686, 689, vol. x. p. 261; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 29.)

76. OF JERUSALEM (5). There are several works extant in MSS. in different libraries, the authors of which are called Joannes Hierosolymitanus, especially two works apparently by the same writer on the points of controversy between the Greek and Latin churches, 1. Ἰωάννου Πατριάρχου τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων λόγος διαλεκτικὸς μετὰ τινος Λατίνου φιλοσόφου ὃν ἐποίησαντο ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις περὶ τῶν ἀξύμων, Joannis Patriarchae Hierosolymitani Disputatio de Axiomibus, quam is in urbe Hierosolymitana cum philosopho quodam Latino habuit. 2. Joannes Patriarcha Hierosolymitanus, de Spiritu Sancto. Whether the work described as Joannis Patriarchae Hierosolymitani Liber contra Latinos (Catalog. MSSorum Angliae et Hiberniae, vol. ii. pars i. p. 358, No. 9121) is one of the foregoing works or a different one we have no means of ascertaining. The date of the writer is uncertain. Oudin fixes him early in the fifteenth century, when the projects of union between the two churches had revived and inflamed the controversies between them. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. Prima, p. 11; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 656; Oudin, de Scriptor. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. iii. col. 2366.)

77. JOSEPHUS. Theodoret (Dissert. MS. in Prophetas et Editiones, et Quaestio arab. in Ecod. et Quaestio e. in Josuam) mentions a Joannes Josephus (Ἰωάννης Ἰωσήπος) as having revised the Septuagint. Hody thinks it probable that he was the same as Josephus, a Christian [JOSEPHUS, No. 12], and author of a work extant in MS., entitled Ἱστοριογραφικὸν, Hypomnesticon s. Commonitorium, whom Cave (Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 397) places in the year 420. (Hody, de Biblior. Testibus Originibus, iv. 3. § 3; Usher, de Edit. LXX. Interpret. c. vii. p. 78; Hottinger, Dissertationes Theologiae Philologicae Fasciculus, Dia. III. c. lx. 9; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. p. 715; Cave, l. c.)

78. ITALUS (Ἰταλός), a philosopher and heresiarch in the reign of Alexius or Alexius I. Comnenus (A. D. 1081—1118) and his predecessors, derived his name from the country of his birth,

Italy. He was the son of an Italian, who engaged as an auxiliary in an attempt of the Sicilians to withdraw from their subjection to the Byzantine emperor, and took with him his son, then a child, who thus spent his early years, not in the schools, but the camp. When the Byzantine commander, George Maniakes, revolted against Constantine X. [GEOGRAPHUS, Historical, No. 15], A. D. 1042, the father of Italus fled back to Italy with his son, who after a time found his way to Constantinople. He had already made some attainments, especially in logic. At Constantinople he pursued his studies under several teachers, and last under Michael Psellus the younger; with whom, however, he soon quarrelled, not being able, according to Anna Comnena, to enter into the subtleties of his philosophy, and being remarkable for his arrogance and disputatious temper. He is described as having a commanding figure, being moderately tall and broad-chested, with a large head, a prominent forehead, an open nostril, and well-knit limbs. He knew the Greek language well, but spoke it with a foreign accent. He acquired the favour of the emperor Michael Ducas (A. D. 1071—1078) and his brothers; and the emperor, when he was contemplating the recovery of the Byzantine portion of Italy, counting on the attachment of Italus, and expecting to derive advantage from his knowledge of that country, sent him to Dyrrachium; but having detected him in some acts of treachery, he ordered him to be removed. Italus, aware of this, fled to Rome; from whence, by feigning repentance, he obtained the emperor's permission to return to Constantinople, where he fixed himself in the monastery of Pege. On the banishment of Psellus from the capital (A. D. 1077), and his enforced entrance on a monastic life, Italus obtained the dignity of ῥωτορ τῶν φιλοσόφων, or principal teacher of philosophy; and filled that office with great appearance of learning; though he was better skilled in logic and in the Aristotelian philosophy than in other parts of science, and had little acquaintance with grammar and rhetoric. He was passionate, and rude in disputation, not abstaining even from personal violence; but eager to acknowledge his impetuosity, and ask pardon for it, when the fit was over. His school was crowded with pupils, to whom he expounded the writings of Proclus and Plato, Iamblichus, Porphyry, and Aristotle. His turbulence and arrogance of spirit seem to have been infectious; for Anna Comnena declares that many seditious persons (ῥυπαροὶ) arose among his pupils; but their names she could not remember: they were, however, before the accession of Alexis. The disturbances which arose from the teachings of Italus attracted the emperor's attention apparently soon after his accession; and by his order, Italus, after a preliminary examination by Isaac, the sebastocrator, the brother of Alexis, was cited before an ecclesiastical court. Though protected by the patriarch Eustratius, whose favour he had won, he narrowly escaped death from the violence of the mob of Constantinople; and he was forced publicly and bareheaded to retract and anathematize eleven propositions, embodying the obnoxious sentiments which he was charged with holding. Cave places these transactions in A. D. 1084. He was charged with teaching the transmigration of souls, with holding some erroneous opinions about ideas, and with ridiculing the use of images in worship; and he is said to have succeeded in diffusing his heresies among many of the nobles and officers of the palace, to the great grief of the orthodox emperor. Notwithstanding his enforced retraction, he still continued to inculcate his sentiments, until, after a vain attempt by the emperor to restrain him, he was himself sentenced to be anathematized; but as he professed repentance, the anathema was not pronounced publicly, nor in all its extent. He afterwards fully renounced his errors, and made the sincerity of his renunciation manifest. The above account rests on the authority of Anna Comnena (Alexias, v. 8, 9, pp. 143—149, ed. Paris, pp. 115—119, ed. Venice, vol. i. pp. 256—267, ed. Bonn), whose anxiety to exalt the reputation of her father, and her disposition to disparage the people of Western Europe, prevents our relying implicitly on her statements, which, however, Le Beau (Bas Empire, liv. lxxxi. 49) has adopted to their full extent. The anathema pronounced on his opinions is published in the Greek ecclesiastical book Ἱερουργία, Tridion (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissertatio Secunda, p. 38), and from this it is inferred by Du Cange (Nota in Annae Comn. Alexiad.), that his views were not dissimilar to those of the western heretic Abailard. Some works of Italus are extant in MS. 1. Ἐκδόσεις εἰς διδασκαλίαν ἱερουργίας, Expositiones in varias quas varii proposuerunt Quaestiones, Cypri. xciii. a. Responsa ad xciii. Quaestiones philosophicas Miscellaneas. The questions were proposed chiefly by the emperor Michael Ducas and his brother Andronicus. 2. Ἐκδόσεις εἰς τὸ τομικόν, Expositio Topicorum Aristotelis. 3. Περὶ διαλεκτικῆς, De Dialectica. 4. Μέθοδος ἱεροποιῆς ἡδονῆς κατὰ σύνοψιν, Methodus Synopsis Rhetoricae, an art of which Anna Comnena says he was altogether ignorant. 5. Epitome Aristotelis de Interpretatione. 6. Orationes. 7. Synopsis quinque vocum Porphyrii. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. pp. 213, 217, vol. vi. p. 131, vol. xi. pp. 646, 652; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 154; Oudin, Commentar. de Scriptorib. et Scriptis Ecclesiasticis, vol. ii. col. 760; Iambecius, Commentar. de Biblioth. Caesar. ed. Kollar. lib. iii. col. 411, seq. note A.)

79. LAURENTIUS or LYDUS (the LYDIAN), or of PHILADELPHIA, or more fully JOANNES LAURENTIUS of PHILADELPHIA, the LYDIAN (Ἰωάννης Λαυρεντίος Φιλαδέλφειος ὁ Λυδὸς), a Byzantine writer of the sixth century. He was born at Philadelphia, in the ancient Lydia, and the Roman province of Asia, A. D. 490. His parents appear to have been of a respectable family, and of considerable wealth. At the age of twenty-one (A. D. 511) he went to Constantinople, and after deliberation determined to enter the civil service of the government as a "memorialis;" and either while waiting for a suitable vacancy, or in the intervals of his official duties, studied the Aristotelian, and a little of the Platonic, philosophy, under Agapius, the disciple of Proclus. By the favour of his townsman Zoticus, praefect of the praetorium under the emperor Anastasius I., he was appointed a tachygraphus or notarius, in the office of the praefect, in which office his cousin Ammianus had already obtained considerable advancement; and though the praefecture of Zoticus lasted little more than a year, he put Joannes in the way of making 1000 aurei, without any transgression of justice or moderation. Joannes gratefully addressed a poetical panegyric to his patron, which obtained from the latter a reward of an aureus per line. The kindness of some official persons (Joannes calls them "ac actis") to whom Zoticus recommended him, procured for him, without purchase (a most unusual thing) the post of primus chartularius in their office, which he held with several other employments, labouring most assiduously in the fulfilment of his duties. During this period Zoticus, at the suggestion of Joannes' cousin, Ammianus, obtained for him a wife of pre-eminent modesty and considerable wealth. He concluded his official career in the office of matricularius or cornicularius, which was formerly so profitable as to be conferred as the reward of long service in subordinate situations; but the circumstances of the times and the necessities of the state had diminished the emoluments of the office, so that Joannes was by no means satisfied with the pecuniary results of this long-coveted climax of forty years' service. The disappointment of his hopes in this respect was, however, somewhat alleviated by marks of distinction, and flattering testimonials of his literary attainments. The latter part of his life seems to have been wholly devoted to literature; and he received two literary appointments from the emperor Justinian I., one to compose and deliver a panegyric address to the emperor, in the presence of the chief persons of the capital; the other to write a history of the Persian war or campaign, in which the enemy suffered a signal repulse before Dara. The foregoing particulars are gathered from Joannes' own statements (De Magistratibus, iii. 26—30; comp. Hase, de Joanne Lydo ejusque Scriptis Commentarius).

Joannes obtained reputation as a poet (De Magistrat. c. 27, 29), but his poetical compositions are all lost. His encomium on Zoticus and his complimentary address to Justinian are also lost; as well as his history of the Persian war, if ever it was finished, which is not certain. His works, of which many parts are extant, were all written in his old age, and are: 1. Περὶ μνηῶν συγγραφὴ, De Mensibus Liber, of which there are two epitomæ or summaries and a fragment extant. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν τῆς Ῥωμαίων πολιτείας, or Περὶ ἀρχῶν πολιτικῶν, De Magistratibus Reipublicæ Romanæ (a. De Magistratibus Politicis) Libri tres. 3. Περὶ διοικήσεων, De Oestentis, the last written of his works. The work De Mensibus is an historical commentary on the Roman calendar, with an account of its various festivals, their occasion and mode of celebration, derived from a great number of authorities, most of which have perished. Of the two summaries of this curious work, the larger one is by an unknown hand, the shorter one by Maximus Planudes. They were both published by Nicolaus Schow (the shorter one inserted in brackets in the course of the larger), 8vo. Leipzig, 1794, with a fragment, Περὶ σεισμῶν, De Terræ Motibus, of the work De Oestentis. The Epitomæ in a revised text, and with the addition of a Latin version and variorum notes, were published by Roether, 8vo. Leipzig and Darmstadt, 1827. The work De Magistratibus was thought to have perished, with the exception of a few glosses given anonymously in the Glossarium ad Scriptores Medicæ aque Infamæ Græcistis of Du Cange: for an extract, given as if from it, by Lambecius, in his Animadversiones in Codinum (p. 208, ed. Paris), is really from the De Mensibus. But in or about 1785 a MS. (known as the Codex Cascolinus) was discovered by J. B. d'Ansse de Villosion in the suburbs of Constantinople, and obtained by the Le Comte de Choiseul-Gouffier, then French ambassador in that city, containing about nine-tenths of the work De Magistratibus, three-fourths of that De Oestentis, and two leaves, scarcely legible, of the De Mensibus. From this MS. the De Magistratibus was published at the cost of M. de Choiseul-Gouffier, and under the editorial care of Dominic Fusa, with a Commentarius de Joanne Lydo ejusque Scriptis, by Ch. Benet, Hase, Paris, 1811. The fragments of the De Oestentis, and the fragment of the De Mensibus, were published from the same MS., but with some alterations, with a preface and a Latin version and notes, by C. B. Hase, 8vo. Paris, 1823. One of the fragments of the De Oestentis, containing a Greek version by Lydus, of the Ἐπιμνησος Σπορρονομία of P. Nigidius Figulus, had been published by Rutgersius (Lectiones Variæ, lib. iii. p. 246, &c.), and another fragment, as already noticed, by Nic. Schow. All the extant portion of the works of Joannes Lydus, with a text revised by Imman. Bekker (8vo. Bonn, 1837), form one of the volumes of the reprint of the Corpus Scriptorum Historiæ Byzantinæ. Photius mentions the three works, παρματείας, of Lydus; he criticises his style severely, as too stately and elaborate where simplicity was required, and as mean where greater elevation was appropriate. He charges him also with barefaced flattery of the living, and unjust censure on the dead; and intimates that he was a heathen, yet spoke respectfully of Christianity, whether sincerely or not Photius could not determine. (Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 180; Suidas, s. v. Ἰωάννης Φιλαδέλφειος Ἀνδρῆς; Hase, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 155.)

80. LECTOR. [ANAGNOSTES, and above, No. 3.]

81. OF LYDDA, of which city he was bishop A. D. 1194. His only extant work is given in the Miscellanea of Baluze. (Lib. ii. p. 242, or vol. iii. p. 90, ed. Mansi.) It is a Latin letter or Latin version of a letter written by him to Michael, dean of Paris and patriarch elect of Jerusalem. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 253.)

82. LYDUS, the LYDIAN. [See No. 79.]

83. MALULAS or MALALAS. [MALALAS.]

84. MARCUS. A spurious work, Acta of Passio S. Barnabæ in Cypro, professing to be written by Joannes Marcus, or John Mark (Acta xii. 12, 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37, 39), is given with a Latin version in the Acta Sanctorum Junii, vol. ii. p. 431, &c.

85. MARO, so called from the monastery of St. Maro on the Orontes, near Antioch, an eminent ecclesiastic among the Maronites of Syria; and according to some authors, Maronite patriarch of Antioch. He is said to have enjoyed the favour of the emperor Heraclius. He wrote in Syriac Commentarius in Litteras Jacobi, of which many extracts have been published. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 537.)

86. MAUROPUS. [See No. 58.]

91. NESTRUTA. [See No. 28.]

92. OF NICAEA (1). Joannes, archbishop of Nice before the 11th century, wrote Epistola de Natalitate Domini ad Zachariam Catholicum Armeniam, published with a Latin version in the Norum Aeturiarum of Combefis, vol. ii. p. 298. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. p. 258; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissertationes Prima, p. 17.)

93. OF NICANA (2). [See No. 21.]

94. OF NICOMEDIA. Joannes, presbyter of the church of Nicomedia in Bithynia, in the time of Constantine the Great, wrote Μαρτύριον τοῦ ὁσίου Βασιλείου ἐκ νεκροῦ Ἀμασίας, Acta Martyrii S. Basilii Episcopi Amasias, which is given in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, Aprilis, vol. iii.; the Latin version in the body of the work (p. 417), with a preliminary notice, by Henschen, and the Greek original in the Appendix (p. 50). An extract from the Latin version, containing the history of the female saint Glaphyra, had been given previously in the same work. (Januar. vol. i. p. 771.) The Latin version of the Acta Martyrii S. Basilii had been already published by Aloysius Lippomani (Vitas Sanctor. Patrum, vol. vii.) and by Sarinus. (De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis, a. d. 26 Aprilis.) Basilieus was put to death about the close of the reign of Licinius, A. D. 322 or 323; and Joannes, who was then at Nicomedia, professes to have conversed with him in prison. Cave thinks that the Acta have been interpolated apparently by Metaphrastes. (Acta Sanctorum, II. cc.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 185.)

99. PHILOSPORHOM HYPATOS v. MAGISTER. [See Nos. 61 and 78.]

100. PHOCAS (Φοκας), a Cretan monk, son of Matthaens, who became a monk in Patmos. Joannes had served in the army of the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned A. D. 1143—1180) in Asia Minor. He married, and had a son, by whom his work was transcribed; and afterwards became a monk and priest, and visited (A. D. 1185) Syria and Palestine, of which he wrote a short geographical account, entitled Ἐκφοραὶς ἐν συνόψει τῶν ἀπὸ Ἀντιοχείας μέχρις Ἱερουσολύμων πόσεων καὶ χωρῶν Συρίας καὶ Φοινίκης καὶ τῶν ἐντὶ Παλαιστίνης ὁρίων τόπων, Compendiaria Descriptio Castrorum et Urbium (sic in Allat. vers.) ab Urbe Antiochia usque Hierosolymam; necnon Syriae ac Phoeniciae, et in Palestina Sacrorum Locorum. The work was published by Allatius, with a Latin version, in his Σύμμικτα, vol. i. pp. 1—46. The Latin version is also given in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, Maii, vol. ii. ad init. (Allatius, Σύμμικτα, Praefatiuncula; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 662, vol. viii. p. 99.)

101. PHURNES (Φουρνής), a monk of the monastery of Mount Ganus in the reign of the emperor Alexia Comnenus. He was an opponent of the Latin church, and wrote an Ἀπολογία, Defensio, or Διάλεκτις, Disceptatio, a discussion with Peter, archbishop of Milan, in the presence of the emperor. If this is the work which Joannes Vecceus cites and replies to in his De Unione Ecclesiarum Oratio (apud Allatium, Græcia Orthodoxa, vol. i. p. 179, &c.), it appears that the form of a dialogue was merely assumed for convenience sake, and that it was not the record of a real conference. According to Fabricius, Allatius published in his work De Consensu (sc. De Ecclesiis Occidentalis et Orientalis Perpetua Consensione), p. 1153, a work of Joannes, which is described as Epistola de Ritibus immutatis in Sacra Consensione. Other works of Joannes are extant in MS. (Allatius, Græc. Orthodoxos. l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. pp. 648, 650.)

102. PLUSIADENUS. [JOSEPHUS, No. 13.]

103. PROTOSPATHARIUS, a writer of uncertain date, wrote for the use of his son Ἐξηγησις φυσικῇ τῶν ἡμερῶν Ἡσιόδου, a brief commentary on the Opera et Dies of Hesiod. We are not aware that it has been published. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 576.)

104. RAI THUENSIS, or RAI THENUS, i. e. of RAI THUS or RAI THU (τοῦ Ραῖθου), hegumenos or abbot of a monastery at Elim, or the Seventy Springs, on the western coast of the peninsula of Mount Sinai, lived in the sixth century, and was the friend of Joannes, surnamed Climacus. [CLIMACUS.] It was at the desire of Rai thuensis that Climacus wrote the work Κλίμαξ, Scala Paradisi, from which he derives his name, and to which Rai thuensis wrote a Commendatio and Scholía. The Ἐπιστολὴ τοῦ ὁσίου Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἡγουμένου τοῦ Ραῖθου, Litterae Joannis Rai thuensis, addressed to Climacus, requesting him to undertake the work, and the answer of Climacus, are given by Raderna in the original Greek, with a Latin version, in his edition of the works of Climacus, fol. Paris, 1633. This version of the Litterae of Rai thuensis, and a Latin version of his Commendatio and Scholía, are given in various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum; the Litterae in vol. iii. ed. Paris, 1575; the Litterae and Commendatio, vol. v. ed. Paris, 1589 and 1654; the Litterae and Epistola, Commendatio, and Scholía, in vol. vi. pt. ii. ed. Cologne, 1618; and vol. x. ed. Lyon, 1677. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. pp. 523—524; Ittigius, De Bibliothecis Patrum.)

105. RHETOR (Ῥήτωρ), an historian of the earlier Byzantine period, frequently cited by Evagrius. (H. E. i. 16, ii. 12, iii. 10, 28, iv. 5.) As most, if not all, of the particulars for which Evagrius refers to him relate to Antioch, and some of them imply considerable local knowledge, it is probable that Joannes was a resident in that town, if not a native of it. His history, which is not extant, comprised the period from the beginning of the reign of Theodosius II. to the earthquake and fire by which Antioch was in a great degree destroyed, A. D. 526, with an account of which calamities John "mournfully" closed his history. He must have lived, therefore, about that time, or between that and the time of Evagrius, A. D. 593 or 594. [EVAGRIUS, No. 3.] Joannes Rhetor is not to be confounded with Joannes of Epiphaneia [see No. 56], as he has been by Vossius. (Evagrius, II. cc., with the notes of Valesius; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 508.)

106. OF ST. SABA. There is extant in the various European libraries a religious romance, or, as some have regarded it, a history, Ὁ Βίος Βαλαάμ καὶ Ἰωσαφά, Barlaami et Josaphati Vita, as yet unpublished, except in versions, especially in an ancient Latin version, De Barlaam et Josaphat Historia, to which, in the printed editions, the name of Georgius Trapezuntius is often prefixed, but which is much more ancient than the time in which he lived [GEORGIUS, No. 48], and is ascribed by some to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, a writer of the 8th century. The work professes to contain the account of the conversion of Josaphat or Josaphat, son of Abenner, an idolatrous and sensual Indian king, and a persecutor of the Christian monks of India, because they had induced some of his nobles to forsake a luxurious life, and become solitaries. Josaphat, a youth pursuing his studies, was converted by Barlaam, a Christian, with whom he met, and whose various instructions to him are given at considerable length. Suspicion arising from their frequent conferences, Barlaam was compelled to fly, and Josephat had to encounter reproaches from his father, and temptations, by which it was hoped to lead him into sin. He succeeded in converting his principal opponent, and at length his father, on whose death he came to the throne, but soon resigned it, retired to solitude, and lived many years with his old friend Barlaam, whom he succeeded in finding. On the death of Barlaam he buried him, and on his own death was buried near him. The writer professes to have derived his narrative from some pious men of Aethiopia Interior, "quos Indos vocant;" and is himself described in MSS. as ἰωάννης μοναχὸς ἀπὸ τῶν καὶ ἐνδότες μονῆς τοῦ ἀγίου Σάβα, "John the Monk, an honourable and virtuous man of the monastery of St. Saba." It is ascribed by some, especially by Billy, who argues the point at some length, to Joannes Damascenus [DAMASCENUS], who was a monk of St. Saba; but Le Quien did not include it in his edition of the works of that father. Others ascribe it to a Joannes Sinaita or Joannes of Mt. Sinai, others to Joannes Climacus. [CLIMACUS.] The Latin version has been published, however, by other editors among the works of Damascenus, and separately by Billy, 12mo. Antwerp, 1602. There are two more ancient editions, one a small folio in black letter, the other in 4to.: neither of them have any indication of time or place. There are also two ancient editions, one in black letter, printed at Augsburg about A. D. 1470; the other also at Augsburg, perhaps about A. D. 1477. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 144, vol. ix. p. 737; Lambecius, Comment. de Biblioth. Caesarææ, lib. viii. col. 14, &c., ed. Kollar; Panzer, Annal. Typograph. vol. iii. p. 30, No. 67, vol. iv. p. 93, No. 158; Denis, Annal. Typog. Maittaire, Supplement, p. 505, Nos. 4331, 4332, p. 593, Nos. 5194, 5195.)

110. SCYLITZES CUROPALATA. [SCYLITZES.]

111. OF SCYTHOPOLIS, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, apparently of the latter end of the fifth century or the beginning of the sixth. He wrote a work against the followers of Eutyches and Dioscorus, entitled Κατὰ τῶν ἀποσχιστῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Contra desertores Ecclesiæ. It was divided into twelve parts, and was undertaken at the suggestion of a certain prelate, one Julianus, in reply to an anonymous Eutychian writer, who had published a book deceitfully entitled Κατὰ Νεστορίου, Adversus Nestorium, and whom Photius supposed to be Basilus, a presbyter of Cilicia. This Basilus wrote a reply to Joannes in very abusive style, charging him, among other things, with being a Manichean, and with restricting Lent to a period of three weeks, and not abstaining from flesh even in that shortened period.

Certain Παράθεσις, Scholia, to the works of the pseudo Dionysius Areopagita, which Usher has observed to be mingled in the printed editions of Dionysius with the Scholia of St. Maximus, have been ascribed to Joannes of Scythopolis. Anastasius Bibliothecarius in the eighth century made a Latin translation of these mingled scholia, not now extant, in which he professed to distinguish those of Maximus from those of Joannes by the mark of a cross. Fabricius identifies the Scholia of Joannes with the Commentarii in Dionysium Areopagitam cited by Joannes Cyparisiota as by Dionysius of Alexandria. (Phot. Bibl. cod. 95, 107; Usher, Dissert. de Scriptis Dionys. Areop. suppositis, p. 299, subjoined to his Historia Dogmatica de Scripturis, &c. Vernaculis, 4to. Lond. 1689; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 9, vol. x. pp. 707, 710; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 466.)

112. SICULUS, or of SICILY, author of a Greek Chronicon, extending from the creation to the end of the reign of Michael III., the son of Theophilus, or to A. D. 866. It was formerly extant in the library of the Elector Palatine, and was used by Sylburgius, as he says in the preface to his Saraceniaca; it is probably still extant in the Vatican library at Rome. Mongitore mentions one other copy, if not more. It is probable that he is the author cited by Cedrenus in his Compendium (Proem.) as ὁ Σικελιώτης, but this is not clear. A Joannes Siculus, apparently the same, is enumerated among the Christian commentators on Hermodenes. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 471; Voss, de Historicis Græciæ, iv. 21; Mongitore, Bibliotheca Sicula, vol. i. p. 313.)

113. OF SINAI. [CLIMACUS, and No. 106.]

114. SYLVANUS. [See No. 72.]

115. TALALA, or TALADA, otherwise TABENNISIOTA (Ταβεννισιώτης), from the monastery of Tabenna, near Alexandria; or of ALEXANDRIA, from his patriarchal see; or, from the offices which he had previously held, OECONOMUS (οἰκονόμος) and PRESBYTER. This ecclesiastic was sent by the advice of some of the Alexandrians on a mission to the Emperor Zeno (about A. D. 478–480), that in case of a vacancy in the patriarchate of that city, then held by Timotheus Salophaciolus, a defender of the council of Chalcedon, the clergy and laity of Alexandria might be allowed to choose his successor. According to Evagrius (or rather according to Zacharias Rhetor whom Evagrius cites as his authority) Joannes was detected in intrigues to obtain his own appointment in the event of a vacancy: perhaps his connection with Illus [ILLUS], whose friendship, according to Liberatus, he cultivated by costly presents, excited the jealousy and apprehensions of the emperor. However this might be, though Zeno granted to the Alexandrians the liberty which they had requested, he bound Joannes by a solemn oath not to seek the succession for himself. Soon after the return of Joannes, Timotheus Salophaciolus died (A. D. 481), and Joannes was elected to succeed him, but was almost immediately expelled from his see by order of the emperor. The cause of his expulsion is differently stated. Liberatus says that he was expelled mainly through the jealousy of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, to whom on different occasions he had failed in paying due attention. According to Evagrius, who quotes Zacharias as his authority, he was detected in having procured his own election by bribery, and thus breaking the oath which the emperor had constrained him to take. The circumstances of the times make it probable that his connection with Illus, then the object of jealousy and suspicion to Zeno, if not actually in rebellion against him [ILLUS], had much to do with his expulsion, and was perhaps the chief cause of it. Joannes, expelled from Alexandria, first resorted to Illus, then at Antioch; and having through his intervention obtained from the patriarch of Antioch and his suffragans a synodical letter commending him to the Pope (Simplicius), departed to Rome to plead his cause there in person. Simplicius, with the usual papal jealousy of the patriarchs of Constantinople, took the side of Joannes against Acacius and Zeno, the latter of whom replied that Joannes had been expelled for perjury, and for that alone; but neither the exertions of Simplicius nor those of his successor Felix, could obtain the restoration of the banished patriarch. Joannes after a time accepted from Felix the bishopric of Nola in Campania, where he lived many years, and at last died peaceably.

Joannes (whom Theophanes extols for his piety and orthodoxy) wrote a work, Πρὸς Γελασίον τὸν Πάπῃ ἀπολογία, Ad Gelasium Papam Apologia, in which he anathematized Pelagianism, as well as its defenders Pelagius and Celestius, and their successor Julianus. The work which is noticed by Photius is not extant. (Victor Tununensis, Chronicon; Liberatus Diaconus, Breviarium Cassiae Nesterianor. et Eutykianor., capp. 16—18 (apud Galland. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xii. p. 146, &c.); Evagrius, H. E. iii. 12, 13, 15, 18, 20, cum notis Valesii; Theophanes, Chronographia, pp. 110—113, ed. Paris, pp. 88—90, ed. Venice, pp. 199—204, ed. Bonn; Photius, Biblioth. cod. 54, sub fin.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xvi.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 455.)

116. OF THESSALONICA (1). Joannes, archbishop of Thessalonica, was a stout defender of the orthodox faith against the Monothelites of the seventh century. He attended as papal legate the third Constantinopolitan (sixth oecumenical) council (A. D. 680), and in that character subscribed the Acta of the council. (Concilia, vol. vi. col. 1058, ed. Labbe; vol. iii. col. 1425, ed. Hardouin; vol. xi. col. 639, ed. Mansi.) The time of his death is altogether uncertain. He wrote: 1. Εἰς τοὺς μυροφόρους γυναῖκας, ἢ Μυλῆρες φορέσας Unguentia, a discourse or treatise in which his object is to show that there is no contradiction in the several accounts of the resurrection of Christ given by the four Evangelists. This piece appears to have been regarded by some as a work of Chrysostom, and was first published (but from a mutilated and corrupt text) by Savile in his edition of Chrysostom (vol. v. p. 740, fol. Eton. 1610, &c.), though with an expression of doubt as to its genuineness. It was subsequently printed more correctly in the Novum Auctorium of Combéfis (vol. i. fol. Paris, 1648), and by him assigned to the right author. It is given in a mutilated form in Montfaucon's edition of Chrysostom, among the Sparta, vol. viii. p. 159, fol. Paris, 1718, &c., or vol. viii. p. 816 of the 8vo. reprint, Paris, 1839. It is also given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandius, vol. xiii. p. 185, &c. A Latin version is given in the Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xii. Lyon, 1677. 2. Ἀδύρος, Oratio, of which a considerable extract was read by Nicolaus, bishop of Cyzicus at the second Nicene (seventh oecumenical) council, and is printed in the Concilia (vol. vii. col. 853, ed. Labbe, vol. iv. col. 292, ed. Hardouin, vol. xiii. col. 163, ed. Mansi), and by Gallandius in his Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. xiii. p. 196). (Gallandius, l. cc.; Concilia, l. cc.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 597; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. p. 250.)

γήσει τῶν αὐτοῦ θαυμάτων, Hymnus ad Deum et ad gloriosum Demetrium cum particulari narratione miraculorum ejus, is given by Combéfis in the Paris edition of the Byzantine writers, among the Scriptores post Theophanem, p. 814, &c., and is described as the work of Joannes, archbishop of Thessalonica, whom Combéfis apparently confounds with the subject of the preceding article, and erroneously places in the reign of the emperors Justinian I. and Maurice. Combéfis (whom Cave follows) is, however, manifestly in error, for the extract itself refers to the capture of the city "many years before" by "the children of the handmaid, that is, Hagar," "in the reign of Leo." This can hardly be any other capture than that by the Saracens of Tripoli, in the reign of Leo VI. (Sapiens or Philosophus) A. D. 904, and consequently the Joannes of Thessalonica from whom the extract is taken could not have lived earlier than the tenth century, and must therefore be a different person from the author of the preceding article. Gallandius reprints the extract with the works of the preceding (Bibl. Patrum, vol. xiii. p. 195), but intimates in his Prolegomena, c. iv., that it can hardly be by the same author. It is not given in the Bonn reprint of the Byzantine writers. It is probable that Combéfis, by confounding the work of Joannes with an anonymous account of a deliverance of Thessalonica, through the miraculous interposition of Demetrius, when besieged by barbarians, probably Avars, in the reign of the emperor Maurice, was led into error. (Gallandius, l. cc.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 597; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 683, vol. x. pp. 218, 219; Allatius, de Symeonum Scriptis, p. 97.)

124. ZONARAS. [ZONARAS.] [J. C. M.]

JOANNES, jurists. 1. COMES SACRARII, under Theodosius the younger, was one of the nine commissioners appointed by that emperor in A. D. 429 to compile codes of law upon a plan which was subsequently abandoned. He was not, however, afterwards employed in compiling the Theodosian code, of which a great part is still extant. [Diodorus, Vol. I. p. 1018.]

2. Was at the head of the first commission of ten appointed by Justinian in A. D. 528 to compile the Constitutionum Codex. In Const. Haec quas necessario, § 4, and Const. Summa Reipublicae, § 2, he is designated by the title "Vir excellentissimus ex-questore sacri palatii, consulari atque patricius." In the subsequent revision of the code he had no part, though a person of the same name was one of the second commission of five.

3. An advocate in the courts of the praefecti praetoriorum at Constantinople, was one of the commission of sixteen, headed by Tribonian, who were employed by Justinian (A. D. 530—533) to compile the Digest. (Const. Tanta, § 9, Const. Adhuc, § 9.) He is a different person from the Joannes who was at the head of the commission appointed to compile the first Constitutionum Codex; but it appears from Const. Cordi, § 2, that he was one of the commission of five, headed by Tribonian, who drew up the repetita praelatio cunctis, which was published in A. D. 534.

4. ANTIOCHENUS and SCHOLASTICUS, from his native place Antioch, and the profession of advocate, which he once exercised there (ἀπὸ σχολαστικῶν). At a later period of his life he entered into holy orders, and was ordained priest. He was then named Apocrisiarius, agent or chargé d'affaires of the church of Antioch at the imperial court in Constantinople towards the end of the reign of Justinian. In A. D. 565 he was elevated to the vacant patriarchate of Constantinople, and he died on the 31st of August, A. D. 578, in the 12th year of the reign of Justin the younger. (Theophanes, Chronographia, p. 203, fol. Par. 1655, Assemani, Bibl. Jur. Orient. vol. iii. p. 340—343.)

Joannes published a collection of canons in 50 titles. Assemani (vol. i. p. 114) thinks that it was published and prescribed by him as a rule to the bishops of the patriarchate, after he was made patriarch. In the preface to the work, however, he himself assumes no higher rank than presbyter.

This collection is entitled Συναγωγή κανόνων εἰς τὸν τίτλον διηρημένη, and is founded on the basis of a previous collection, which is attributed by some manuscripts to Stephanus Ephesius. It consists chiefly of decrees of early councils, and letters of St. Basil. The Συναγωγή of Joannes (which was one of the earliest compilations of the kind) enjoyed for some centuries great credit in the Oriental church, received from time to time corrections and additions, and was translated into several foreign languages. Assemani (vol. i. p. 60) cites the Syrian translation: Biener (de Collectionibus Canonum, p. 49) treats of the Slavonic translation; and Beveridge (Synodicon, p. 211) mentions an Egyptian collection of Abnalcassabi in 51 titles, resembling that of Joannes. The Συναγωγή of Joannes is printed in Voelli et Justelli Bibliotheca Jur. Canon. vol. ii. p. 499—602.

A collection of 87 chapters, intended as a supplement to the former Συναγωγή, was published (if we may credit the title to the work) by Joannes, after he was in possession of the metropolitan throne, and after the death of Justinian. It was published, therefore, between A. D. 565 and 578. As the former collection contained the rules of purely ecclesiastical origin (κανόνες), the present was intended to comprehend the enactments of the civil law (νόμοι) relating to the affairs of the church, and was compiled from the Novells of Justinian. Joannes makes abridged extracts from Novells 3, 5, 6, 32, 46, 56, 57, 83, 120, 123, 131, usually employing the words of the original text.

These 87 chapters have in several catalogues of manuscripts been wrongly attributed to Balsamo. Some notices of their contents, and some extracts from them, were given by Assemani (Bibl. Jur. Orient. vol. ii. p. 451—459): and Biener has treated of them with his usual sagacity and learning. (Geschichte der Novellen, p. 167—173, p. 584—597.) They were first printed at length by Heimbach in 1840. (Anecdota, vol. ii.)

A Nomocanon (combination of κανόνες and νόμοι) in 50 titles, with a supplement of 21 chapters, was subsequently compiled from the two works of Joannes. This compilation (printed in Voel. et Justell. Bibl. Jur. Canon. vol. ii. p. 603—672) has been wrongly attributed to Joannes himself. The author of it is uncertain, but it was probably composed by Theodoretus, bishop of Cyrhus (now Khoros, in Syria). The 87 chapters of Joannes were much referred to by subsequent compilers, as by Arsenius in his Synopsis Canonum. (Heimbach, Anecdota, vol. ii. in Prolegomenis; Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delin. § 22; Moutreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i. p. 201—211, p. 288; Bücking, Institutiones, vol. i. p. 102, 103.)

5. NOMOPHYLAX. He is commonly called a scholiast on the Basilica, but was rather a jurist, whose Scholia are appended to that work. In the heading of the Scholia taken from Joannes he is called, from his office, Joannes Nomophylax, and sometimes κατ' ἐξοχὴν. Nomophylax alone. In the Scholia (vol. ii. p. 549—648, vol. iii. p. 400, ed. Fabrot.) he appears to cite the text of the Basilica; and Assemani (Bibl. Jur. Orient. vol. ii. p. 415) believes him to have lived about A. D. 1100, under Alexius Comnenus; while Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 42) confounds him with Joannes Antiochenus. In his Scholia appended to the Basilica, he interprets passages in the Digest, the Code, and the Novella. (Schol. Basil. vol. ii. pp. 544, 558, 559, 587, vol. iii. pp. 360, 390, vol. iv. pp. 658, 662.) Constantinus Nicaeus (who, in Basil. vol. iii. p. 208, calls himself a disciple of Stephanus) cites Joannes Nomophylax, with whom he disagrees. (Basil. vol. ii. p. 549.) Joannes is coupled with Dorotheus in Basil. vol. v. p. 410. In Basil. vol. iii. p. 360, and vol. ii. p. 587, we find him citing Athanasius and Theodorus Hermopolita. From these indications, we believe him to have lived not long after the reign of Justinian, and would explain his apparent citations of the Basilica by supposing that his original citations of the Digest were subsequently adapted to the Basilica—a charge which was frequently made, and which has occasioned much chronological difficulty. Many of the jurists, whose fragments appear appended to the Basilica, have, for this reason, been referred to too late an age. Thus, every circumstance tends to show that Constantinus Nicaeus, who cites Joannes, lived before the compilation of the Basilica, if we except his supposed citations of the Basilica, and of the στομυλοειν of Gargis. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 447; Reiz. ad Theophilum, p. 1236; Pohl, ad Suarez. Notit. Basil. p. 138. n. β; Heimbach, de Orig. Basil. p. 87.) [J. T. G.]

JOANNES ALEXANDRINUS, a physician of Alexandria, who may be supposed to have lived in the seventh or eighth century after Christ, and under whose name are extant some commentaries on two works of the Hippocratic Collection. That on the sixth book De Morbis Popularibus is said to have been translated from Greek into Arabic, and from thence into Latin, in which language it is to be found, together with Himein Ibn Iahak (commonly called by his Latinised name, Joannicius), and other authors, in the edition of the collection called Articella, printed at Venice, 1483, fol., and in other editions. His commentary on the De Natura Pueri, which is imperfect, was first published in Greek in the second vol. of Dietz's Schol. in Hippocr. ad Gal. Regim. Prusa. 8vo. 1834. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. pp. 687—88, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

IOCASTE. [EPICASTE and ORDIPUS.]

IOCASTUS (Ἰκάστος), a son of Aeolus, king on the coast of Italy in the district of Rhegium. (Diod. v. 8; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 732; Callim. Frugm. 202, ed. Bentley.) [L. S.]

IODAMEIA (Ἰοδάμεια), a priestess of Athena Itonia, who once, as she entered the sanctuary of the goddess by night, was changed into a block of stone on seeing the head of Medusa, which was worked in the garment of Athena. In commemoration of this event, a fire was every day kindled on the altar of Iodameia by a woman amid the exclamation, "Iodameia lives and demands fire!" (Paus. ix. 34. § 1.) [L. S.]

JOEL (Ἰωήλ), a Byzantine historian, lived at the end of the 12th, and in the beginning of the 13th century, and wrote Χρονολόγιον ἐν συνόψει, being a short narrative of the most memorable events of history, especially Byzantine. The work begins with Adam, and finishes with the death of the emperor Alexie Ducas Murzuphius, and the conquest of Constantinople by the Latins, in 1204. From the lamentations with which he ends his history, one might conclude that he witnessed the capture of the Greek capital. The whole work is of little importance, though the latter part of it is of some value for Byzantine history. The first edition was published by Leo Allatius, with notes and a Latin translation, Paris, 1651, fol., together with Georgius Acropolita. The second edition, in the Venice collection of the Byzantines, and the third by Immanuel Bekker, together with Acropolita and Constantine Manasses, Bonn, 1837, 8vo., are reprints of the Paris edition. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 773; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 281.) [W. P.]

IOLA'US (Ἰόλαος), a son of Iphicles and Automedusa, and consequently a relation of Heracles, whose faithful charioteer and companion he was. [HERACLES.] He is especially celebrated for his attachment to the descendants of the hero, even after his death, for he is said to have come to their assistance from the lower world; for when Eurystheus demanded of the Athenians the surrender of the children of Heracles, who had been kindly received there, Iolaus, who was already dead, begged of the gods of the lower world permission to return to life, to assist the children of his master. The request being granted, he returned to the upper world, slew Eurystheus, and then went to rest again. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 137; Eurip. Heraclides.) After Heracles had instituted the Olympian games, Iolaus won the victory with the horses of his master, and Heracles sent him to Sardinia at the head of his sons whom he had by the daughters of Thespius. He there took from the savage inhabitants the finest portions of their country, civilised them, and was afterwards honoured by them with divine worship. From Sardinia he went to Sicily, and then returned to Heracles shortly before the death of the latter. After the burning of Heracles, when his remains could not be discovered, Iolaus was the first that offered sacrifices to him as a demigod. (Paus. v. 29; Diod. iv. 29, 30, 40.) According to Pausanias (ix. 23), Iolaus died in Sardinia, whereas, according to Pindar (Ok. ix. 149, Pyth. ix. 137; Hygin. Fab. 103; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11, 5. § 2, 6. § 1), he was buried in the tomb of his grandfather, Amphitryon, and was worshipped as a hero. His descendants in Sardinia were called Ἰολαεῖς (Strab. v. p. 225) and Iolaenses, and in the time of Pausanias (x. 17. § 4), a town Iolaia still existed in Sardinia, where Iolaus was worshipped as a hero. [L. S.]

I'OLE (Ἰόλη), the last beloved of Heracles, and a daughter of Eurytus of Oechalia. [HERACLES.] According to some writers, she was a half-sister of Dryope. (Anton. Lib. 32; Ov. Mét. ix. 325, &c.) [L. S.]

IOLLAS or IOLAUS (Ἰόλλας or Ἰόλλας), son of Antipater, and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He was one of the royal youths who, according to the Macedonian custom, held offices about the king's person, and was cup-bearer to Alexander at the period of his last illness. Those writers who adopt the idea of the king having been poisoned, represent Iollas as the person who actually administered the fatal draught, at the banquet given to Alexander by Medius, who, according to this story, was an intimate friend of Iollas, and had been induced by him to take part in the plot. (Arrian, Anab. vii. 27; Plut. Alex. 77; Curt. x. 10. § 14; Justin. xii. 14; Vitruv. viii. 3. § 16.) It is unnecessary to point out the absurdity and inconsistency of this tale. (See Stahr's Aristotelia vol. i. p. 136, &c.; and Blakesley's Life of Aristotle, p. 85, &c.) Plutarch himself tells us expressly that it was never heard of until six years afterwards, when Olympias availed herself of this pretext as an excuse for the cruelties she exercised upon the friends and adherents of Antipater. Iollas was then dead, but she caused his grave to be opened, and desecrated with every mark of indignity. (Plut. Alex. 77; Diod. xix. 11.) The period or occasion of his death is nowhere mentioned: the last we hear of him is in B. C. 322, when he accompanied his sister Nicæa to Asia, where she was married to Perdicaæ. (Arrian, up. Phot. p. 70, a, ed. Bekk.) The story of Hyperides having proposed the voting a reward to Iollas as the murderer of Alexander (Vit. X. Oratt. p. 849), which is in direct contradiction to the statement of Plutarch already cited, is unquestionably a mere invention of later times. (See Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 705.) [E. H. B.]

IOLLAS, IOLAUS, or IOLAS (Ἰόλλας, Ἰόλαος, or Ἰόλας), a writer on materia medica, born in Bithynia, who was probably a contemporary of Heracleides of Tarentum, or a little anterior to him, in the third century B. C., as he is mentioned in company with him by Dioscorides. (De Mat. Med. i. Praef. vol. i. p. 2.) He is mentioned also by Celsus (De Medic. v. 22, p. 93), Pliny (H. N. xx. 73, 76), Galen (De Antid. i. 2, vol. xiv. p. 7), St. Epiphanius (Adv. Haeres. i. l. 3. p. 3), and the scholiast on Nicander (Ther. v. 683), but nothing is known of the events of his life, nor are any of his writings preserved. [W. A. G.]

ION (Ἴων), the fabulous ancestor of the Ionians, is described as a son of Apollo by Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus and wife of Xuthus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3; CREUSA.) The most celebrated story about him is that which forms the subject of the Ion of Euripides. Apollo had visited Creusa in a cave below the Propylæa, and when she gave birth to a son, she exposed him in the same cave. The god, however, had the child conveyed to Delphi, and there had him educated by a priestess. When the boy had grown, and Xuthus and Creusa came to consult the oracle about the means of obtaining an heir, the answer was, that the first human being which Xuthus met on leaving the temple should be his son. Xuthus met Ion, and recognised him as his son; but Creusa, imagining him to be a son of her husband by a former beloved, caused a cup to be presented to the youth, which was filled with the poisonous blood of a dragon. However, her object was discovered, for as Ion, before drinking, poured out a libation to the gods, a pigeon which drank of it died on the spot. Creusa thereupon fled to the altar of the god. Ion dragged her away, and was on the point of killing her, when a priestess interfered, explained the mystery, and showed that Ion was the son of Creusa. Mother and son thus became reconciled, but Xuthus was not let into the secret. The latter, however, was satisfied, for he too received a promise that he should become a father, viz. of Dorus and Achaëa.

The inhabitants of Aegialus, on the northern coast of Peloponnesus, were likewise Ionians, and among them another tradition was current. Xuthus, when expelled from Thessaly, went to Aegialus. After his death Ion was on the point of marching against the Aegialeans, when their king Selinus gave him his daughter Helice in marriage. After the death of Selinus, Ion succeeded to the throne, and thus the Aegialeans received the name of Ionians, and the town of Helice was built in honour of Ion's wife. (Paus. vii. 1. § 2; Apollod. i. 7. § 2.) Other traditions represent Ion as king of Athens between the reigns of Erechtheus and Cecrops; for it is said that his assistance was called in by the Athenians in their war with the Eleusinians, that he conquered Eumolpus, and then became king of Athens. He there became the father of four sons, Geleon, Aegicores, Argades, and Hoples, according to whom he divided the Athenians into four classes, which derived their names from his sons. After his death he was buried at Potamus. (Eurip. Ion, 578; Strab. viii. p. 383; Conon, Narrat. 27; comp. Herod. v. 66.) [L. S.]

ION (Ἴων), of Thessalonica, was an officer of Perseus, king of Macedonia, and commanded, with Timanor, his light-armed troops in the battle in Thessaly, in which the Romans were defeated, B.C. 171. In A.C. 168, after Perseus had been conquered at Pydna, Ion delivered up at Samothrace to Cn. Octavius (the commander of the Roman fleet) the king's younger children, who had been entrusted to his care. (Liv. xlii. 58, xlv. 6.) [E. E.]

ION (Ἴων). 1. Of Chios, was one of the five Athenian tragic poets of the canon, and also a composer of other kinds of poetry; and, moreover, a prose writer, both of history and philosophy. He is mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 645) among the celebrated men of Chios. He was the son of Orthomenes, and was surnamed the son of Xuthus: the latter was probably a nickname given him by the comic poets, in allusion to Xuthus, the father of the mythical Ion. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 830; Suid. Eudoc. Harpocr. s. v.) When very young he went to Athens, where he enjoyed the society of Cimon, of whom he left laudatory notices in some of his works (probably in the ἰσομνήματα), which are quoted by Plutarch. (Cim. 5, 9, 16.) The same writer informs us that Ion severely criticised Pericles (Peric. 5, 28), who is said to have been his rival in love. (Ath. x. p. 436, f.) Ion was familiarly acquainted with Aeschylus, if we may believe an anecdote related by Plutarch (De Profect. in Viti. 8, p. 79), but he did not come forward as a tragedian till after that poet's death. We also learn from Ion himself (in his ἐπιδημιαί, ap. Ath. xiii. p. 603, e.) that he met Sophocles at Chios, when the latter was commander of the expedition against Samos, B.C. 440. His first tragedy was brought out in the 82d Olympiad (A.C. 452); he is mentioned as third in competition with Euripides and Iophon, in Ol. 87, 4 (A.C. 429–428); and he died before A.C. 421, as appears from the Peace of Aristophanes (830), which was brought out in that year. Only one victory of Ion's is mentioned, on which occasion, it is said, having gained the dithyrambic and tragic prizes at the same time, he presented every Athenian with a pitcher of Chian wine. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Lc.; Suid. s. v. Ἀθήναιος; Ath. i. p. 3, f.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1454, 24.) Hence it would seem that he was a man of considerable wealth.

The number of his tragedies is variously stated at 12, 30, and 40. We have the titles and a few fragments of 11, namely, Ἀγαμέμνων, Ἀλκίπαις, Ἀργεῖοι, Μέγα Δράμα, Φρουροί, Φοινὴ καὶ Κωνόε, Φοινὴ δεύτερος, Τεῦκος, Ὀμφάλη, Εὐρυπίδα, and Λαέρτης, of which the Ὀμφάλη was a satyric drama. Longinus (33) describes the style of Ion's tragedies as marked by petty refinements and want of boldness, and he adds an expression which shows the distance which there was, in the opinion of the ancients, between the great tragedians and the best of their rivals, that no one in his senses would compare the value of the Oedipus with that of all the tragedies of Ion taken together. Nevertheless, he was greatly admired, chiefly, it would seem, for a sort of elegant wit. Περιόδοτος δὲ ἐγίνετο, says the scholiast. There are some beautiful passages in the extant fragments of his tragedies. Commentaries were written upon him by Arceilaus, Batton of Sinope, Didymus, Epigenes, and even by Aristarchus. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 31; Ath. x. p. 436, f, xi. p. 468, c, d, xiv. p. 634, c, e.)

Besides his tragedies, we are told by the scholiast on Aristophanes, that Ion also wrote lyric poems, comedies, epigrams, pæans, hymns, scholia, and elegies. Respecting his comedies, a doubt has been raised, on account of the confusion between comedy and tragedy, which is so frequent in the writings of the grammarians; but, in the case of so universal a writer as Ion, the probability seems to be in favour of the scholiast's statement. Of his elegies we have still some remnants in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. i. p. 161.)

His prose works, mentioned by the scholiast on Aristophanes, are one called προσθευτικαί, which some thought spurious; κρίσις, κοσμολογικά, ἰσομνήματα, and some others, which are not specified. The nature of the first of these works is not known. The full title of the κρίσις was Χίον κρίσις: it was an historical work, in the Ionic dialect, and apparently in imitation of Herodotus: it was probably the same as the συγγραφή, which is quoted by Pausanias (vii. 4. § 6.) The κοσμολογικά is probably the same as the philosophical work, entitled τριφυῆς (or τριφυμῶν), which seems to have been a treatise on the constitution of things according to the theory of triads, and which some ancient writers ascribed to Orpheus. The ἰσομνήματα are by some writers identified with the ἐπιδημιαί or ἐκδημητικαί (Pollux, ii. 88.), which contained either an account of his own travels, or of the visits of great men to Chios. (Bentley, Epist. ad Joh. Millium, Chronico Joannis Moleleto subscripta, Oxon. 1691, Venet. 1733; Opusc. pp. 494–510 ed. Lips.; C. Nieberding, De Ionic Chii Vita, Mort.

2. Ion, of Ephesus, a rhapsodist in the time of Socrates, from whom one of Plato's dialogues is named, has been confounded by many writers with Ion of Chios; but Bentley has clearly proved that they are different from the character and circumstances of the rhapsodist as described by Plato. (Epid. ad Mill.; Nitzsch, Proleg. ad Plat. Ion.; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græcæ. p. 180.) [P. S.]

IONICUS (ἰωνικός), a physician of Sardis in Lydia, whose father had also followed the same profession with credit. He studied medicine under Zenon, and was a fellow-pupil of Oribasius and Magnus, in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. Eusebius, who has given a short account of his life (De Vit. Philos. p. 174, ed. Antwerp), says that he was not only well skilled in all the branches of medical science, but that he had also paid attention to rhetoric, logic, and poetry, and enjoyed the highest reputation. [W. A. G.]

IONIDES (ἰωνίδης or ἰωνίδης), a name borne by four nymphs believed to possess healing powers. They had a temple on the river Cytherus in Elia, and derived their name from a mythical Ion, a son of Gargæus, who was believed to have led a colony from Athens to those districts. The story undoubtedly arose from the existence of a mineral spring on the spot where their sanctuary stood. (Paus. vi. 22. § 4; Strab. viii. p. 356.) [L. S.]

IÖPE (ἰώπη), a daughter of Aeolus and wife of Cepheus, from whom the town of Joppa derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) In the legends of Perseus and Andromeda, she is called Cassiopeia. [L. S.]

IOPHON (ἰοφών). The legitimate son of Sophocles, by Nicostrate, was a distinguished tragic poet. He brought out tragedies during the life of his father; and, according to a scholiast, gained a brilliant victory (ἐνίκησε λαμπρῶς). He is said to have contended with his father (Vit. Soph.); and it is recorded that he gained the second place in a contest with Euripides and Ion, in B. C. 428. (Arg. in Eur. Hipp.) He was still flourishing in B. C. 405, the year in which Aristophanes brought out the Frogs. The comic poet speaks of him as the only good tragedian left, but expresses a doubt whether he will sustain his reputation without the help of his father (who had lately died); thus insinuating either that Sophocles had assisted Iophon in the composition of his plays, or that Iophon was bringing out his father's posthumous tragedies as his own. The number of Iophon's tragedies was 50, of which the following are mentioned by Suidas: Ἀχαιεύς, Τυλάφος, Ἀρταύς, Ἰάλου πύρις, Δεκαμένος, Βάσχα, Περσέης: the last two titles evidently belong to one play. To these should perhaps be added a satyric drama entitled Ἀδελφοί. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 280.) Of all his dramas, only a very few lines are preserved. For the celebrated story of his undutiful charge against his father, see SOPHOCLES. Sophocles is said to have been reconciled to Iophon, who placed an inscription on his father's tomb, in which particular mention was made of the composition of the Oedipus at Colonus. (Val. Max. viii. 7. ext. 12.) There is a curious passage of the same grammarian (Cramer, Anecd. vol. iv. p. 315), attributing the composition of the Antigone to Iophon. (Suid. s. v. ἰοφών, Σοφοκλῆς; Aristoph. Ran. 73—78, and schol.; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 975—977; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græcæ. pp. 76—79; Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ. vol. ii. pp. 308, 309.)

2. Of Gnosus, a composer of oracles in hexameter verse, quoted by Pausanias as preserving some of the oracles of Amphiarauus. (i. 34. § 3.) [P. S.]

IOPHOSSA (ἰοφώσσα), a daughter of Aetes, commonly called Chalciope. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1115, 1153; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

IOPS (ἰοψ), a hero who had a sanctuary at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 12. § 4.) [L. S.]

JORNANDES, or JORDA'NES, as he is called, perhaps correctly, in the Codex Ambrosianus, and some other MS. of his works, an historian of more renown than merit, yet of such great importance, that without him our knowledge of the Goths and other barbarians would be very limited. He lived in the time of the emperor Justinian I., or in the sixth century of our era, but we know neither the time of his birth nor that of his death. He was a Goth; his father's name was Alanomuthis, and his grandfather, Peria, had been notarius, or private and state secretary, to Candax, king of the Alani. Jornandes held the same office at the court of the king of the Alani, adopted the Christian religion, took orders, and was made a bishop in Italy. It is said that he was bishop of Ravenna, but this opinion does not rest on sufficient evidence, and is the less credible as his name does not occur in the "Vite Episcoporum Ravennatum" by Agnellus, who lived in the middle of the ninth century.

Jornandes is the author of two historical works written in the Latin language. The first is entitled De Getarum (Gothorum) Origine et Rebus Gestis, in which he relates the history of the Goths from their earliest migrations down to their subjugation by Belisarius in 541; adding, however, some facts which took place after that event, from which we may infer the time when he wrote. Aschbach, the eminent author of the Geschichte der Westgothen, characterises this work as follows: "In many respects this work is very valuable, because the author has derived much information from the old traditions of the Goths, and relates things which we find neither in the Roman nor in the Greek writers. In other respects, however, it deserves very little credit, since it is written without any criticism, abounding in fables, and betraying every where the author's extreme ignorance. He is the principal source of the common belief which confounded the Goths, the Getæ, and the Scythians, being misled by earlier Roman and Greek writers, with whose works he was well acquainted; and he thus ascribes to the Goths whatever the ancients report of the Scythians and Getæ, and places the emigration of the Goths in the remotest time. His accounts of the settlement of the Goths on the Black Sea, and their extensive dominions and great power during the reign of king Hermanric (in the middle of the fourth century), are among the best parts of his work." Jornandes is chiefly to be blamed for his partiality to his countrymen, incorrectness, confusion of events, anachronisms, and want of historical knowledge. According to his own statement (Dedication to Castalius), his book is an extract from the lost history of the Goths, or Getae, as he calls them, in twelve volumes, by the "Senator" (Cassiodorus), to which he added several things which he had read in the Roman and Greek writers, and he also drew up the conclusion and the commencement, as well as many episodes, according to his own knowledge or taste. It would be unjust to charge Jornandes with pure inventions; his fault is credulity and want of judgment; and none of his statements ought to be rejected without a previous careful examination. This remark refers, among other examples, to his account of the second invasion of Gaul by Attila, for which he is the only authority. In spite of so many defects, the history of the Goths by Jornandes is a very interesting work, and whatever may have been said against him by modern historians, they show by the numerous quotations of his name that they owe a great deal of information to him.

The second work of Jornandes is entitled De Regnorum ac Temporum Successione, being a short compendium of the most remarkable events from the creation down to the victory obtained by Narces, in 552, over king Theodatus. It is only valuable for some accounts of several barbarous nations of the north, and the countries which they inhabited.

Editions, nearly all of which comprehend both the works:—Editio princeps, with Paulus Diaconus, by C. Peuting, Augsburg, 1515, fol.; with Procopius, by Beatus Rhenanus, Basel, 1531, fol.; with Cassiodorus, by G. Fourrier, Paris, 1579, fol., 1583, and often, by B. Vulcanius, with Procopius and some minor writers, Leyden, 1597, 8vo.; the same, reprinted in Scriptores Goth. et Longob. Rer., Leyden, 1617, 8vo., and in Hugo Grotius, Hist. Goth. Vand. et Longob., Amsterdam, 1655, 1676, 8vo., by Gruter, in Hist. Aug. Script. Lat. Min., Hanover, 1611, fol.; by Lindenbrog, with Isidorus and Paulus Diaconus, Hamburg, 1611, 4to.; by Garet, with Cassiodorus, Paris, 1679, fol., reprinted Venice, 1729, fol.; the same, revised by Muratori, in vol. i. part i. of his Script. Rer. Ital.: these are the two best editions. There are several others, but we still want a good critical edition. There is a bad French translation by Drouet de Maupertuy, and a better one in Swedish, by J. T. Peringskiöld, Stockholm, 1719, 4to. Swedish scholars, especially Peringskiöld and Eric Benzeliuss, have devoted much time and labour to writing commentaries upon Jornandes, which the reader ought to peruse with no less caution than the original. JOSEPHUS (Ἰωσήφ or Ἰωσηφός). 1. Of ALEXANDRIA, archdeacon of Alexandria, attended the council of Constantinople (reckoned to be the eighth oecumenical council by the Latin church) held by order of the emperor Basil the Macedonian (A. D. 869), as vicarius of the absent patriarch of Alexandria, Michael. A Latin version of a written address presented by Josephus at the council is given in the Concilia. (Vol. viii. col. 1114, ed. Labbe; vol. v. col. 887, ed. Hardouin; vol. xvi. col. 148, ed. Mansi; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 59; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 55, ed. Oxford, 1740—1742.)

2. Of ARIMATEA. There is an ancient tradition that Joseph of Arimatea was sent by the apostle Philip to preach the gospel in Britain; and this tradition was gravely urged at the council of Constance, A. D. 1414, in a dispute between the representatives of the French and English churches for the eminence of their respective establishments. Some writers, for instance Bale, have ascribed to Joseph of Arimatea Epistolae quaedam ad Ecclesias Britannorum; but there is great doubt whether any such writings ever existed, and still greater doubt as to their genuineness. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 59; Cod. Apocryph. Novi Test. Pars iii. p. 506; Ittigius, Biblioth. Patrum Apostol. Dissertat. c. 13.)

6. Of CONSTANTINOPLE, 1. [GENESIUS.]

7. Of CONSTANTINOPLE, 2. Joseph, who previously held the archbishopric of Ephesus, was elected, A. D. 1416, patriarch of Constantinople. Some writers have placed his appointment to the patriarchate A. D. 1424; but the date given above on the authority of Sylvester Sguropulus, or Syropulus (Hist. Concil. Florent. ix. 16), is, we believe, more correct. The emperor Joannes Palaeologus II. was extremely anxious, for political reasons, to promote the union of the Greek and Latin churches: the patriarch did not oppose this, but contended for holding the council at Constantinople; but after a time the emperor prevailed on him to alter his determination, and to send legates to the council of Basel, A. D. 1434. (Acta Concil. Basil. Sessio xix.) The heads of the Greek church were, however, drawn over by the pope to embrace his part in the dispute with the council of Basel, and determined to attend the rival council of Ferrara, A. D. 1438, afterwards transferred to Florence. The patriarch Joseph attended this council; and though he vainly attempted, by various devices, to avoid recognising the precedence of the pope, he showed himself a warm supporter of the proposed union, urging upon his companions and attendants the necessity of conciliating the Latins. Towards the close of the council he fell ill, and during his illness was induced to subscribe the dogmas of the Latin church in the points in dispute, partly, according to Sguropulus, by the bad faith of Basarion, who having, at Joseph's request, read to him the judgments of the fathers on these points, made various omissions and alterations, to suit his purpose. Joseph, however, appears to have made up his mind to yield, and probably only required an excuse: he bitterly rebuked some Greek prelates, who showed less pliability than himself. He died at Florence before the conclusion of the council, June 10. A. D. 1439. Joseph wrote Epistola ad Concilium Basilienae and Bulla plumbosa missa Concilio Basiliensi, given in a Latin version in the Concilia. His Ἐρώτην, Sententia, delivered at the Council of Florence, and his Ἐκτεννα γράμμη, Extrema Sententia, written the night of his death, are also given in Greek and Latin in the Concilia. (Vols. xii. col. 545, 571, xiii. col. 482, 494, ed. Labbe; vols. viii. col. 1189, 1215, ix. 393, 405, ed. Hardouin; vols. xxix. 97, 126, xxxi. 994, 1008, ed. Mansi.) And one or two of his speeches are given by Sguropulus. (Concilia, vol. cit.; Sguropulus, Historia Concil. Florentinae, par. iiii; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Appendix, p. 118; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 479.)

10. GORIONIDES, or JOSEPH BEN GORION, or JOSIPPON. The Jewish historian, Flavius Jose-

pass, mentions among his contemporaries and countrymen another Josephus or Joseph, whom he distinguishes (De Bell. Jud. ii. 20, sive 25) as idus Impluvius, the son of Gorion. In the middle ages there appeared a history of the Jews (Historia Judaica), written in Hebrew, in an easy and even elegant style, professedly by Joseph Ben Gorion, a priest, or, as the name is Latinized, Josephus Gorionides. The work, which in the main coincides with the Jewish Antiquities and with the Jewish War of Flavius Josephus, was regarded by the Jews of the middle ages with great favour, and was supposed by many to have been written by the celebrated Flavius Josephus. But the general conclusion of Christian critics of modern times is, that the Historia Judaica is not written either by Flavius Josephus or by the Joseph Ben Gorion, his contemporary, but is a forgery, compiled chiefly from a Latin version of the works of Flavius Josephus by a later writer, probably a French Jew of Brittany or Touraine, after the sixth century, as appears by his applying names to places and nations which were not in use till then. As the history is in Hebrew, a further account of it would be out of place in this work.

11. HYMNODGRAPHUS, a Greek ecclesiastic, acrophylax, or keeper of the sacred vessels under Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, wrote Mariæ, apparently a hymn or service in honour of the Virgin, of which a Latin version, with notes, was published by Ippolito Maracci, Rome, 8vo. 1662. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 60.)

12. HYPMONESTICI AUCTOR, sometimes called JOSEPHUS CHRISTIANUS, has been conjectured by Vossius to be the Joseph of Tiberias who, having been converted from Judaism to Christianity, was raised by Constantine the Great to the rank of comes, and was the friend and host of Epiphanius (comp. Epiphani. Adv. Hæres. xxx. 4—12); but Cave, who was at one time disposed to coincide with Vossius, has shown that there are good reasons, derived from the work itself, for placing the author of the Hypomnesticon early in the fifth century, about A. D. 420, long after the friend of Epiphanius, who was already an aged man in the middle of the fourth century. The work Ἰωσήπου βιβλίον Ὑπομνηστικόν, Josephi Hypomnesticon seu Libellus Memorialis or Commemoratorium, is devoted chiefly to the removal of such doubts or difficulties as might occur to less instructed Christians in reading the Scriptures, and is usually divided into five books, and 167 chapters. Chapter 136 is an extract from Hippolytus of Thebes [HIPPOLYTUS, No. 3], interpolated, as Cave supposes, by a later hand. This extract inclined Fabricius, who was not disposed to regard it as an interpolation, to place the writer in the eleventh century; and it was probably the same reason which induced Gallandius to assign to the work the date A. D. 1000. But the editor of the last and posthumous volume of the Bibliotheca of Gallandius supports the conclusion of Cave as to the earlier existence of the writer, whom, however, he identifies with Joseph of Tiberias. The materials of the work are chiefly taken from Flavius Josephus, who is once or twice cited by name; and Cave suspects that the work was originally anonymous, and that the name of Josephus indicated, not the author's name, but the source from which he borrowed his statements; but that being mistaken for the author's name, he received the designation of Christianus, by way of distinction from Flavius Josephus. The Hypomnesticon was first published by Fabricius, with a Latin version and notes, as an appendix to the Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti, vol. ii. 8vo. Hamb. 1723, and was reprinted in the second edition of that work (8vo. Hamb. 1741), and by Gallandius in the volume above mentioned (the 14th) of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Venice, 1781. Oudin regards the Hypomnesticon as an interpolated Greek version of portions of the Hebrew work of the Pseudo Joseph Ben Gorion [No. 10]. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 397; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 60, vol. viii. p. 347, vol. xi. p. 51; and Cod. Pseud. Vet. Test. vol. ii.; Galland. Bibl. Patrum, vol. xiv.; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. vol. ii. col. 1058, &c.)

13. Of METHONE. A defence of the Florentine council A. D. 1439, and of the union there negotiated between the Greek and Latin churches, in reply to Marcus Eugenius of Ephesus (ΕΥΓΕΝΙΟΥΣ), is extant, under the name of Joseph, bishop of Methone (Modon), in the Peloponnesus. It is entitled Ἀπολογία εἰς τὸ γραμματίον κυροῦ Μάρκου τοῦ Ἐδγενικοῦ μητροπολίτου Ἐφέσου, Responsio ad Libellum Domini Marci Eugenici Metropolitæ Ephesi, and is given, with a Latin version by Jo. Matt. Caryophilus, in the Concilia (vol. xiii. col. 677, &c., ed. Labbe, and vol. ix. col. 549, &c., ed. Hardouin). Of this Joseph of Methone, Sguropulus relates that he represented himself to the patriarch Joseph of Constantinople [No. 7], when the latter touched at Methone, on his voyage to Italy to attend the council, as favourable to the opinions of the Greek church. If so, his subsequent change was countenanced by the example of the patriarch himself, and of the leading prelates who attended the council. There is also extant another defence of the Florentine council, entitled Ἰωάννου τοῦ Πρωτοερέως τοῦ Πλουσιανίδου Διάλεξις περὶ τῆς διαφορᾶς τῆς οὐσίας μέσον Γραικῶν καὶ Λατίνων ἔτι τε καὶ περὶ τῆς ἱερᾶς καὶ ἁγίας συνόδου τῆς ἐν Ἀλεξανδρίᾳ γενουμένης, Joannis Archiepiscopi Plusiadeni Disceptatio de Differentiis inter Græcos et Latinos et de Sacrosancta Synodo Florentina. Allatius and Fabricius identify the two writers, and suppose that Joannes Plusiadenus changed his name to Josephus on becoming bishop of Methone. Allatius founds his supposition on the fact, that a MS. of the Responsio ad Marcum Ephesium, in the Ambrosian library at Milan, bears in its title the name of Joannes Plusiadenus; to which it may be added that there are or were extant in modern Greek, according to the statement of Allatius, some MS. Conciones in dies Quadragesimalis Jejunii, by Joseph of Methone, in the title of which he is surnamed Plusiadenus. Cave denies the identity of the two, because Sguropulus has called Joseph of Methone a Latin (ὁ Ῥωμανὸς ἐπισκοπός), but this probably only refers to his support of the opinions of the Latin church. Oudin translates the expression "a Romanorum auctoritate derivans." The Disceptatio de Differentiis, &c., was published by Allatius in his Græcica Orthodoxa, vol. i. p. 583, &c., 4to. Rome, 1652. The author of the Disceptatio refers to a defence of the Quingue Capitula Concilii Florentini, which he had previously written, and which is not known to have been published; but Oudin suspects it is the Apologia pro quingue Capitulis Concilii Florentini, commonly ascribed to Georgius Scholarina, or Gennadius, of Constantinople. [GENNADIUS, No. 2.] We may here add, that this Apologia has been printed not only in Latin, as stated in the article referred to, but also in Greek (Rome, 1577), and in modern Greek, with a Latin version (Rome, 4to. 1628). Nicolaus Comnenus cites a work of Joannes Plusiadenus, Antirrheticum Secundum contra Marcum Ephesium. (Allatius, Græc. Orthod. l. c., and Epilog. ad Vol. I.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii., Appendix, by Wharton, pp. 151, 167; Fabric. Biblioth. Græc., vol. v. p. 60, vol. xi. p. 458; Oudin, Commentar. de Scriptur. Ecdæ. vol. iii. col. 2422.)

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS (Φλάβιος Ἰώσηπος), the Jewish historian, son of Matthias, is celebrated not only as a writer, but also as a warrior and a statesman. He is himself our main authority for the events of his life, a circumstance obviously not without its drawbacks, especially as he is by no means averse to self-laudation. He was born at Jerusalem in A. D. 37, the first year of Caligula's reign, and the fourth after our Lord's ascension. His advantages of birth were very considerable, for on his mother's side he was descended from the Asmonean princes, while from his father he inherited the priestly office, and belonged to the first of the 24 courses. (Comp. 1 Chron. 24.) For these facts he appeals (Vit. 1) to public records, and intimates that there were detractors who endeavoured to disparage his claims of high descent. (Comp. Phot. Bibl. pp. 167, 168.) He enjoyed, as we may well suppose, an excellent education, and exhibited great proofs of diligence and talent in his boyhood, inasmuch that, even in his fourteenth year, he was resorted to by chief priests and other eminent men who wished for information on recondite questions of the Jewish law. Nor was his attention confined to such studies; for St. Jerome (the most learned perhaps of the fathers), referring especially to his treatise against Apion, expresses astonishment at the extent of his acquaintance with Greek literature. (Hieron. ad Magn. Oral. Epist. 83.) At the age of 16 he set himself to examine the merits and pretensions of the chief Jewish sects, with the view of making a selection from among them; and if in this there was much self-confidence, there was also, at this time of his life at least, no little earnestness in his struggle to grasp the truth, for we find him spending three years in the desert, under the teaching of one Banus, and following his example of rigorous asceticism. At the end of this period he returned to Jerusalem, and adhered to the sect of the Pharisees, whom he speaks of as closely resembling the Stoics. (Ant. xiii. 5. § 9, xviii. 2, Bell. Jud. ii. 8, Vit. 2.) When he was 26 years old he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judæa, had sent thither as prisoners on some trivial charge. After a narrow escape from death by shipwreck, he was picked up by a vessel of Cyrene, and safely landed at Puteoli; and being introduced to Poppæa by an actor named Aliturus, he not only effected the release of his friends, but received great presents from the empress. (Vit. 3.) By some it has been thought that the shipwreck alluded to was the same of which we have an account in Acts xxvii., that Josephus and St. Paul were therefore fellow-passengers during part of the voyage, and travelled from Puteoli to Rome in company, and that the apostle was himself one of the persons on whose behalf Josephus undertook the journey. (Ottius, Spicileg. ex Josepho, pp. 336—338; Bp. Gray's Connection of Sacred and Classical Literature, vol. i. p. 357, &c.) Such a notion, however, rests on no grounds but pure fancy, and the points of difference between the two events are too numerous to admit of mention, and too obvious to require it. The hypothesis, moreover, clearly involves the question of the religium of Josephus, which will be considered below. On his return to Jerusalem he found the mass of his countrymen eagerly bent on a revolt from Rome, from which he used his best endeavours to dissuade them; but failing in this, he professed, with the other leading men, to enter into the popular designa. After the retreat of CÆTIUS GALLUS from Jerusalem, Josephus was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and was sent to manage affairs in Galilee, having instructions from the Sanhedrim to persuade the seditious in that province to lay down their arms, and to entrust them to the keeping of the Jewish rulers. (Vit. 4—7, Bell. Jud. ii. 20. § 4.) It would carry us beyond our limits to enter into the details of his government in Galilee, which he appears, however, to have conducted throughout with consummate prudence and ability. From the Romans until the arrival of Vespasian, he did not experience much annoyance; and such efforts as they made against him he easily repelled: meanwhile, he took care to discipline the Galileans, and to fortify their principal towns. (Vit. 4, &c., 24, 43, Bell. Jud. ii. 20, iii. 4, 6.) His chief troubles and dangers, from which, on more than one occasion, he narrowly escaped with life, arose from the envy and machinations of his enemies among his own countrymen, and in particular of John of Gischala, who was supported by a strong and unscrupulous party in the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. But Josephus had won by his administration the warm affections of the Galileans; and this, combined with his own presence of mind and ability in counter-plotting, enabled him to baffle effectually the attempts of his opponents. (Vit. 13—56, Bell. Jud. ii. 20, 21.) The appearance of Vespasian and his army in Galilee spread terror far and wide, so that all but a few deserted the camp of Josephus at Garis; and he, having no hope of the success of the war, withdrew to Tiberias, to be as far as he could from the reach of danger. (Bell. Jud. iii. 6, Vit. 74.) Thence he sent letters to the Sanhedrim, giving an account of the state of things, and impressing on them the necessity of either capitulating or supplying him with forces sufficient to make head against the Romans. He had no hope himself that anything could be done against the power of Rome, but something like a sense of honour seems to have restrained him from abandoning, without a struggle, the national cause; and accordingly, when Vespasian advanced on Iotapata (the most strongly fortified of the Galilean cities), Josephus threw himself into it, inspired the inhabitants with courage, animated and directed their counsels, and defended the place for 47 days with no less ability than valour. Iotapata, however, was at length taken, its fall being precipitated by the treachery of a deserter; and Josephus, having escaped the general massacre, concealed himself, with 40 others, in a cave. His place of refuge being betrayed to the Romans by a woman, Vespasian sent several messengers and among the rest Nicanor, a friend of Josephus, to induce him to surrender on a promise of safety. His fanatical companions strove to persuade him that suicide was the only honourable course; and continuing deaf to his arguments, were preparing to slay him, when he proposed that they should rather put one another to death than fall each by his own hand. The lots were cast successively until Josephus and one other were left the sole survivors; fortunately, or providentially, as he himself suggests, although a third explanation may possibly occur to his readers. Having then persuaded his remaining companion to abstain from the sin of throwing away his life, he quitted his place of refuge, and was brought before Vespasian. Many of the Romans called aloud for his death, but he was spared through the intercession of Titus, and Vespasian desired him to be strictly guarded, as he intended to send him to Nero. Josephus then, having requested to speak with the Roman general in the presence of a few only of his friends, solemnly announced to his captor that he was not to regard him in the light of a mere prisoner, but as God's messenger to him, to predict that the empire should one day be his and his son's; and he professed to derive his prophecy from the sacred books of the Jews. According to Josephus's own account, the suspicion of artifice, which Vespasian not unnaturally felt at first, was removed on his finding, from the prisoners, that Josephus had predicted the exact duration of the siege of Iotapata and his own capture; whereupon he loaded the prophet of his greatness with valuable presents, though he did not release him immediately from his bonds. Clearly the prophecy, like that of the weird sisters to Macbeth, was one which had a tendency to fulfil itself. (Vit. 74, 75, Bell. Jud. iii. 7, § 3, vi. 5, § 4; comp. Suet. Vesp. 4, 5; Tac. Hist. v. 13; Zonar. Ann. vi. 18, xi. 16; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 8; Suid. a. v. Ἰωσήφους; comp. Haggai, ii. 7; Suet. Tit. 1.)

When Vespasian was declared emperor, at Caesarea, according to Josephus (Bell. Jud. iv. 10), but according to Tacitus and Suetonius, at Alexandria (Tac. Hist. ii. 79, 80; Suet. Vesp. 7), he released Josephus from his confinement of nearly three years (A. D. 70), his chain being cut from him, at the suggestion of Titus, as a sign that he had been unjustly bound (Bell. Jud. iv. 10, § 7); and his reputation as a prophet was, of course, greatly raised. He was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and was suspected as a traitor both by Jews and Romans. From the anger of the latter he was saved by Titus, through whose favour also he was able to preserve the lives of his brother and of many others after the capture of the city. Having been presented with a grant of land in Judaea, he accompanied Titus to Rome, and received the freedom of the city from Vespasian, who assigned him, as a residence, a house formerly occupied by himself, and treated him honourably to the end of his reign. The same favour was extended to him by Titus and Domitian as well, the latter of whom made his lands in Judaea free from tribute. He mentions also that he received much kindness from Domitia, the wife of Domitian. (Vit. 75, 76; Phot. Bibl. p. 170.) The name of Flavius he assumed as a dependent of the Flavian family. His time at Rome appears to have been employed mainly in literary pursuits, and in the composition of his works. The date of his death cannot be fixed with accuracy; but we know that he survived Agrippa II. (Vit. 65), who died in A. D. 97. Josephus was thrice married. His first wife, whom he took at Vespasian's desire, was a captive; his marriage with her, therefore, since he was a priest, was contrary to the Jewish law, according to his own statement (Ant. iii. 12, § 2); and his language (Vit. 75) may imply that, when he was released from his bonds, and had accompanied Vespasian to Alexandria, he divorced her. At Alexandria he took a second wife, whom he also divorced, from dislike to her character, after she had borne him three sons, one of whom, Hyrcanus, was still alive when he wrote his life. His third wife was a Jewess of Cyprus, of noble family, by whom he had two sons, viz. Justus and Simonides, surnamed Agrippa. (Vit. 76.)

With respect to the character of Josephus, we have already noticed his tendency to glorify his own deeds and qualities, so that he is himself by no means free from the vanity which he charges upon Apion. (Vit. passim, Bell. Jud. iii. 7, §§ 3, 16, 8, § 8, c. Apion. ii. 12.) Nay, the weakness in question colours even some of those convictions of his, which might otherwise wear a purely religious aspect—such as his recognition of a particular Providence, and his belief in the conveyance of divine intimations by dreams. (Bell. Jud. iii. 8, §§ 3, 7, Vit. 15, 42.) Again, to say nothing of the court he paid to the notorious Agrippa II., his profane flattery of the Flavian family, "so gross (to use the words of Fuller) that it seems not limned with a pencil, but daubed with a trowel" (see Dr. C. Wordsworth's Discourses on Public Education, Disc. xx.), is another obvious and repulsive feature in Josephus. His early visit to Rome, and introduction to the sweets of court favour, must have brought more home to him the lesson he might have learnt at all events from the example of Herod the Great and others—that adherence to the Roman cause was the path to worldly distinction. And the awe, with which the greatness and power of Rome inspired him, lay always like a spell upon his mind, and stifled his patriotism. He felt pride indeed in the antiquity of his nation and in its ancient glories, as is clear from what are commonly called his books against Apion: his operations at Iotapata were vigorous, and he braved danger fearlessly, though even this must be qualified by his own confession, that when he saw no chance of finally repulsing the enemy, he formed a design of escaping, with some of the chief men, from the city (Bell. Jud. iii. 7, §§ 15, &c.): nor, lastly, do we find in him any want of sympathy with his country's misfortunes: in describing the miserable fate of Jerusalem, he is free from that tone of revolting coldness (to give it the mildest name) which shocks us so much in Xenophon's account of the downfall of Athens. (Hell. ii. 2, §§ 3, &c.) But the fault of Josephus was, that (as patriots never do) he despaired of his country. From the very beginning he appears to have looked on the national cause as hopeless, and to have cherished the intention of making peace with Rome whenever he could. Thus he told some of the chief men of Tiberias that he was well aware of the invincibility of the Romans, though he thought it safer to dissemble his conviction; and he advised them to do the same, and to wait for a convenient season—ῥεπουσιν καὶ πάλιν (Vit. 35; comp. Bell. Jud. iii. 5); and we find him again, in his attack on Justus, the historian (Vit. 65), earnestly defending himself from the charge of having in any way caused the war with Rome. Had this feeling originated in a religious conviction that the Jewish nation had forfeited God's favour, the case, of course, would have been different; but such a spirit of living practical faith we do not discover in Josephus. Holding in the main the abstract doctrines of a Pharisee, but with the principles and temper of an Herodian, he strove to accommodate his religion to heathen tastes and prejudices; and this, by actual omissions (Ottius, Prætermissa a Josepho, appended to his Spicilegium), no less than by a rationalistic system of modification. Thus he speaks of Moses and his law in a tone which might be adopted by any disbeliever in his divine legation. (Proem. ad Ant. § 4, c. Apion. ii. 15.) He says that Abraham went into Egypt (Gen. xii.), intending to adopt the Egyptian views of religion, should he find them better than his own. (Ant. i. 8. § 1.) He speaks doubtfully of the preservation of Jonah by the whale. (Ant. ix. 10. § 2.) He intimates a doubt of there having been any miracle in the passage of the Red Sea (ἐπεὶ κατὰ βούλησιν Θεοῦ, ἐπεὶ κατ' αὐτόματον), and compares it with the passage of Alexander the Great along the shore of the sea of Pamphylia. (Ant. ii. 16. § 5; comp. Arr. Anab. i. 26; Strab. xiv. p. 666.) He interprets Exod. xxii. 28, as if it conveyed a command to respect the idols of the heathen. (Ant. iv. 8. § 10, c. Apion. ii. 33.) Daniel's interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image he details as far as the triumph of the fourth kingdom; but there he stops, evidently afraid of offending the Romans. (Ant. x. 10. § 4.) These instances may suffice: for a fuller statement see Brinch, Æsam. Hist. Fl. Joseph., appended to Havercamp's edition, vol. ii. p. 300, &c. After all this, it will not seem uncharitable if we ascribe to a latitudinarian indifference, as much at least as to an enlightened and humane moderation, the opposition of Josephus to persecution in the name of religion, and his maintenance of the principle that men should be left, without compulsion, to serve God according to their conscience. (Vit. 23, 31.)

The way in which Josephus seems to have been actually affected towards Christianity is just what we might expect antecedently from a person of such a character. We have no room to enter fully into the question of the genuineness of the famous passage (Ant. xviii. 3. § 3) first quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11, Dem. Evon. iii. 5), wherein Christ is spoken of as something more than man—ἐπεὶ ἄνθρωπος ἀνθρώπων λέγετο χρὴς (for we must not, with Heinichen, insist too much on the alleged classical usage of ἐπεὶ)—and testimony is borne to his miracles, to the truth and wide reception of his doctrines, to his Messiahship—ὁ Χριστὸς οὗτος ἦν, and to his death and resurrection, in accordance with the prophecies. For a detailed discussion of the question we must refer the reader to the treatise of Daubuz, and to Arnoldus's collection of letters on the subject, appended to Havercamp's edition of Josephus (vol. ii. p. 189, &c.), also to Harle's Fabricius (vol. v. p. 18, note bb), and especially to Heinichen's Excursus on Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 11, and the authors on both sides of the controversy, of whom he there gives a full list. The external evidence for the passage is very strong; but the testimony which it bears in favour of Christianity is so decisive, that some have concluded from it that Josephus must have been himself a believer, an Ebionite Christian at least, according to the opinion of Whiston (Disert. i.), while others have adduced the fact that he was not a Christian as a proof that the passage is spurious. The former opinion appears to be contradicted by positive testimony (see Orig. Comm. ad Matt. ap. Haverc. ad init., c. Cels. p. 35), and has no support from the works of Josephus beyond this one place itself. He speaks, indeed, in high terms of John the Baptist (one of whose disciples Hudson supposes Banus to have been), but there is nothing in his language to show that he had any correct notion of his true character as the predicted forerunner of our Lord (Ant. xviii. 5. § 2). His condemnation also of the murder of St. James, the first bishop of Jerusalem (Ant. xx. 9. § 1), is no more than might have been and was expressed (as he himself tells us) by all the most moderate men among the Jews; and the statement, quoted as from him by Origen (l. c.) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23), that the destruction of Jerusalem was a punishment from God for this murder, is not to be found in any of our present copies of his works. As to his having been an Ebionite, this conjecture would imply a warmer zeal for the Jewish law than he seems to have felt, though it would be somewhat more plausible (since the Ebionites and Essenes had much in common; see Burton's Bampton Lect. vi. notes 81—83), were there any good grounds for the assertion of Daubuz that, as Josephus was disposed in his youth to the tenets of the Essenes (to whom he thinks Banus belonged), so he returned to those opinions after the ruin of his country, when nothing more was to be got by being a Pharisee, and was an Essene when he wrote his Antiquities. We may conclude then that Josephus was no believer in Christ; but this need not, of itself, be any barrier to our reception of the disputed passage; since it is quite conceivable that, with his character and temptations, he might well admit the divine legation of Jesus, without fully realising all that such an admission required, without, in fact, the consistency and courage to be a Christian. A man of the world, with little or no earnestness, he might think it the moderate and philosophical, certainly the safe course, to sit loose to religion altogether; and the term indifference may describe his state of mind even more appropriately than perplexity, such as Gamaliel's. (Acts. v. 34, &c.) To this we may add, as not impossible, the view of Daubuz, Boehmert, and others, that there were Christians even at the court of Domitian who at that time (A. D. 93) were persons of influence—Flavius Clemens, for instance, and Flavia Domitilla, to say nothing of the doubtful case of Epaphroditus, and that Josephus therefore had an obvious motive for speaking with reverence of the author of Christianity. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 17, 18; comp. St. Paul, Philip. iv. 22.) Nor are the above remarks less applicable in the main, even if we entirely or partially reject the passage; for Christianity must have attracted the attention of Josephus, and so there would be much significance either in his silence on the subject or in his faltering testimony. Our own opinion is, that he was not likely to commit himself by language so decisive; nor at the same time do we look upon the passage as altogether spurious. It would rather appear (according to the view of Vilvoison, Routh, and Heinichen) that the strongest expressions and phrases have been interpolated into it, perhaps by Eusebius, who, there is reason to fear, was quite capable of the fraud, perhaps by some earlier Christian, not necessarily with a dishonest purpose, but in the way of marginal annotation. (Villoison, Anecd. Græc. ii. pp. 69–71; Routh, Rel. Sac. iv. p. 389; Heinschen, Excurs. ad Euseb. i. 11.)

The writings of Josephus have always been considered, and with justice, as indispensable for the theological student. For the determination of various readings, both in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament and in the Septuagint version, they are by no means without their value, though they have been herein certainly over-rated by Whiston. But their chief use consists in such points as their testimony to the striking fulfilment of our Saviour's prophecies, their confirmation of the canon, facts, and statements of Scripture, and the obvious collateral aid which they supply for its elucidation. (See Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 20, &c.; Gray's Connection of Sacred and Classical Literature, vol. i. p. 310, &c.)

The character of a faithful historian is claimed by Josephus for himself, and has been pretty generally acknowledged, though, from what has been already said of his anxiety to conciliate his heathen readers, it cannot be admitted without some drawbacks. (c. Ap. i. § 9, Proœm. ad Ant., Proœm. ad Bell. Jud.; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 16, &c.) On this subject see Brinch, Exam. Hist. Jos., to the instances adduced by whom we may add our author's omission of the promises to Eve, and Abraham, and Jacob, of the delivering Seed, and his adoption, with some variations, of the story about ΑΡΙΣΤΕΑΣ and the seventy-two translators of the Old Testament. (Ant. i. l. 13, 19, xii. 2; Gen. iii. 15, xxii. 18, xxviii. 14.)

His chronology, differing as it does in many points from that of the Septuagint, as well as from that of the Hebrew text, is too wide a subject to be discussed here. The reader is referred for satisfaction on the point to Vossius, Chron. Sac.; Brinch, Exam. Chron. Jos.; Hale's New Analysis of Chronology; Stackhouse's Hist. of the Bible, ch. 3; L'Estrange, Disc. ii., prefixed to his transl. of Josephus; Spanheim, Chron. Jos.

The language of Josephus is remarkably pure, though we meet occasionally with unclassical, or at least unusual, expressions and constructions, in some of which instances, however, the readings are doubtful. On his style in general, and on the different character it bears in different portions of his works, the reader will find some sensible remarks in the treatise of Daubuz above referred to (b. ii. §§ 3, &c.). It is characterised by considerable clearness in what may be called the dry μέρη, such as narrative and discussion; the speeches which he introduces have much spirit and vigour; and there is a graphic liveliness, an ένέργεια, in his descriptions, which carries our feelings along with it, and fully justifies the title of the Greek Lives, applied to him by St. Jerome. (Phot. Bibl. p. 33; Hieron. ad Euseb. de Cust. Virg. Ep. xviii.; Chrys. in Ep. ad Rom. Hom. xxv.)

1. The History of the Jewish War (περί τοῦ ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου ἢ ἰουδαϊκῆς ἱστορίας περί ἐλπίστων), in seven books. Josephus tells us that he wrote it first in his own language, and then translated it into Greek, for the information of European readers (Proœm. ad Bell. Jud. § 1).

The Hebrew copy is no longer extant. The Greek was published about A. D. 75, under the patronage and with the especial recommendation of Titus. Agrippa II. also, in no fewer than sixty-two letters to Josephus, bore testimony to the care and fidelity displayed in it. It was admitted into the Palatine library, and its author was honoured with a statue at Rome. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in B. C. 170, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus's own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome. (Jos. Vit. 65; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 9; Hieron. Catal. Script. Eccl. 13; Ittigius, Prolegomena; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 4; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 239, ed. Westermann.)

2. The Jewish Antiquities (ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία), in twenty books, completed about A. D. 93, and addressed to ΕΡΑΦΡΟΔΙΤΗΣ. The title as well as the number of books may have been suggested by the Πρωταίη ἀρχαιολογία of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The work extends from the creation of the world to A. D. 66, the 12th year of Nero, in which the Jews were goaded to rebellion by Gessius Florus. It embraces therefore, but more in detail, much of the matter of the first and part of the second book of the Jewish war. Both these histories are said to have been translated into Hebrew, of which version, however, there are no traces, though some have erroneously identified it with the work of the Pseudo-Josephus Gorionides. [See above, JOSEPHUS, No. 10.]

3. His own life, in one book. This is an appendage to the Archæologia, and is addressed to the same Epaphroditus. It cannot, however, have been written earlier than A. D. 97, since Agrippa II. is mentioned in it as no longer living (§ 65).

4. A treatise on the antiquity of the Jews, or κατὰ Ἀρχαίως, in two books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as impugned the antiquity of the Jewish nation, on the ground of the silence of Greek writers respecting it. The title, "against ΑΡΙΩΝ," is rather a misnomer, and is applicable only to a portion of the second book (§§ 1–13). The treatise exhibits considerable learning, and we have already seen how St. Jerome speaks of it. The Greek text is deficient from § 5 to § 9 of book ii. [APOLLONIUS of Alabanda, No. 3.]

5. Εἰς Μακκαβαίους, ἢ περί αυτοκράτορος Λογισμοῦ, in one book. Its genuineness has been called in question by many (see Cave, Hist. Lit. Script. Eccl. p. 22), but it is referred to as a work of Josephus by Eusebius, St. Jerome, Philostorgius, and others. (See Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 7; Ittigius, Prolegom.) Certainly, however, it does not read like one of his. It is an extremely declamatory account of the martyrdom of Eleazar (an aged priest), and of seven youths and their mother, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes; and this is prefaced by a discussion on the supremacy which reason possesses de jure over pleasure and pain. Its title has reference to the zeal for God's law displayed by the sufferers in the spirit of the Maccabees. There is a paraphrase of it by Erasmus; and in some Greek copies of the Bible it was inserted as the fourth book of the Maccabees (Fabr. l. c.).

6. The treatise περί τοῦ παντός was certainly not written by Josephus. For an account of it see Photius, Bibl. xlvi.; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 8; Ittigius, Proleg. ad fin.

St. Jerome (Præf. ad Lib. XI. Comm. ad Esaiam) speaks of a work of one Josephus on Daniel's vision of the seventy weeks; but whether he is referring to the subject of the present article is doubtful.

At the end of his Archæologia, Josephus mentions his intention of writing a work in four books on the Jewish notions of God and his essence, and on the rationale of the Mosaic laws. It is uncertain whether he ever accomplished this. At any rate, it has not come down to us. He promises also in the same place a life of himself (which has been noticed above), and a revision of his history of the Jewish war. (See Whiston's note, Ant. ad fin.; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 9.)

Josephus first appeared in print in a Latin translation, with no notice of the place or date of publication: the edition seems to have contained only a portion of the Antiquities. These, with the seven books of the Jewish war, were again printed by Schüssler, Augsb. 1470, in Latin; and there were many editions in the same language of the whole works, and of portions of them, before the editio princeps of the Greek text appeared at Basel, 1544, edited by Arlenius. Another edition of the works, in Greek and Latin, was published by De la Keviere, Aur. Allob. 1591, and reprinted at Geneva in 1611, and again, very badly, in 1635. The edition of Ittigius was printed by Weidmann, Leipzig, 1691, with Aristæa's history of the Septuagint annexed to it. The treatise on the Maccabees was edited, with a Latin translation, by Combéfis, in his Auctorium Bibl. Patr., Paris, 1672, and by Lloyd, Oxford, 1690. The invaluable but posthumous edition by Hudson of the whole works, in Greek and Latin, came out at Oxford in 1720. The Latin version was new; the text was founded on a most careful and extensive collation of MSS., and the edition was further enriched by notes and indices. Havercamp's edition, Amst. 1726, is more convenient for the reader than creditable to the editor. That of Oberthür, in 3 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1782—1785, contains only the Greek text, most carefully edited, and the edition remains unfortunately incomplete. Another was edited by Richter, Leipzig, 1826, as part of a Bibliotheca Patrum; and one by Dindorf has recently appeared at Paris, 1845.

There have been numerous translations of Josephus into different languages. The principal English versions are those of Lodge, Lond. 1602?; one from the French of D'Andilly, Oxford, 1676, reprinted at London 1683; that of L'Estrange, Lond. 1702; and that of Whiston, Lond. 1737. The two last-mentioned versions have been frequently reprinted in various shapes. [E. E.]

JOSEPHUS, TENEDIUS. Though this name occurs in the modern catalogues of Græco-Roman jurists, the existence of such a jurist may well be doubted. He is mentioned by Ant. Augustinus (in the commencement of his Constitutionum Græcarum Collectio, 8vo. Herdæ, 1567) as a person to whom had been attributed the authorship of a Πρόχειρον Βασιλικῶν κατὰ στοιχείων, "Prochiron incerti, ordine literarum, sive Josephi Tenedii." By this title, Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 8), P. Pithou (Observ. ad Codicem, fol., Par., 1687, p. 43), and François Payen (Prodromus Justinianus, p. 539), understand Augustinus to designate the Synopsis Basilicorum Major; and accordingly P. Pithou and F. Payen make Josephus Tenedius the author of that work. This alphabetic Synopsis appears to have been first compiled about A. D. 969, and to have undergone considerable alterations in successive editions, which are extant in manuscript in various libraries. (Zachariæ, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delin. § 39.) A wretchedly mutilated edition, with a Latin translation (fol. Basil. 1575), was published by Leunclavius, who departs from the alphabetic order of the original, in an ill-considered attempt to re-arrange the materials it contains, according to the order of the Basilica. C. Labbeus afterwards published Emendationes et Observationes ad Synopsin Basilicorum, 8vo. Paris, 1606.

The work which Ant. Augustinus really referred to, as probably composed by Josephus of Tenedos, was the Τὸ μυστὸν κατὰ στοιχείων (as it is called by Harmenopolus, § 49) or Synopsis Minor Basilicorum, which some have attributed to Docimus or Docimius [DOCIMUS]. It is from this work that the extracts are borrowed, which Augustinus, in his Paratitla on the Greek Constitutions, speaks of as taken from Tenedius.

What reason the very learned Augustinus may have had for attributing to Josephus Tenedius the authorship of the Synopsis Minor is now altogether unknown. Josephus Tenedius is inserted in the index of authors (p. 65) contained in the Glossarium ad Scriptores Medios et Infimæ Græcilitatis of Ducange, where he is classed among anonymous Greek authors. (Zachariæ, Al. Paral. p. 63; Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, pp. 450, 451.) [J. T. G.]

IOTAPE (Ἰωτάπη). 1. A daughter of Artavasdes, king of Media, was married to Alexander, the son of Antony, the triumvir, after the Armenian campaign in B. C. 34. Antony gave to Artavasdes the part of Armenia which he had conquered. [ARTAVASDES, p. 370, b.] After the battle of Actium Iotape was restored to her father by Octavianus. (Dion Cass. xlix. 40, 44, l. 16.)

2. Wife of Antiochus IV., King of Commagene, [ANTIOCHUS, p. 194.] In the annexed coin she is called ΒΑΣΙΛΙΣΣΑ ΙΩΤΑΠΗ ΦΙΛΑΔΕΛΦΟΣ. From the latter epithet we may infer that she was the sister as well as wife of Antiochus, of which we find few examples among the Greek kings of Syria, though the practice was very common among those of Egypt. Iotape had a daughter of the same name, who was married to Alexander of the race of Herod. The reverse of the coin is the one which we commonly find on the coins of the kings of Commagene. [See vol. I. p. 194, b.] (Eckhel, vol. iii. pp. 257, 258.)

COIN OF IOTAPE.

IOTAPIANUS. We are told by Zosimus that a rebellion having broken out in Syria, in consequence of the intolerable oppression of Pribus, who had been appointed governor of the East by his brother, the emperor Philip, the purple was assumed by a certain Iotapianus, who claimed as scent from Alexander, but that the insurrection was speedily suppressed. Victor assigns these events, or at least the death of the pretender, to the reign of Decius. [PACATIANUS.] (Zosim. i. 21; Victor, de Cæs. 29.) [W. R.]

JOVIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, Roman emperor (A. D. 363—364), was the son of the Comes Varronianus, one of the most distinguished generals of his time, who had retired from public life when the accession of his son took place. Jovianus was primus ordinis domesticorum, or captain of the lifeguards of the emperor Julian, and accompanied him on his unhappy campaign against the Persians. Julian having been slain on the field of battle, on the 26th of June, A. D. 363, and the election of another emperor being urgent, on account of the danger in which the Roman army was placed, the choice of the leaders fell first upon their veteran brother Sallustius Secundus, who, however, declined the honour, and proposed Jovian. The merits of his father more than his own induced the Roman generals to follow the advice of their colleague, and Jovian was proclaimed emperor on the day after the death of Julian. He immediately professed himself to be a Christian. The principal and most difficult task of the new emperor was to lead his army back into the old Roman territories. No sooner had he begun his retreat, than Sapor, the Persian king, who had been informed of the death of Julian, made a general attack upon the Romans. Jovian won the day, continued his retreat under constant attacks, and at last reached the Tigris, but was unable with all his efforts to cross that broad, deep, and rapid river in presence of the Persian army. In this extremity he listened to the propositions of Sapor, who was afraid to rouse the despair of the Romans. After four days' negotiations he purchased the safety of his army by giving up to the Persian king the five provinces, or rather districts, beyond the Tigris, which Galerius had united to the Roman empire in A. D. 297, viz. Arzanene, Moxoene, Zahdicene, Rehimene and Corduene, as well as Nisibis and several other fortresses in Mesopotamia. Great blame has been thrown upon Jovian for having made such a disgraceful peace; but the circumstances in which he was placed rendered it necessary, and he was, moreover, anxious to secure his crown, and establish his authority in the western provinces. He had no sooner crossed the Tigris than he despatched officers to the West, investing his father-in-law Lucillianus with the supreme command in Italy, and Malarius with that in Gaul. On the western banks of the Tigris he was joined by Procopius with the troops stationed in Mesopotamia, and being now out of danger, he devoted some time to administrative and legislative business. His chief measure was the celebrated edict, by which he placed the Christian religion on a legal basis, and thus put an end to the persecutions to which the Christians had been exposed during the short reign of Julian. The heathens were, however, equally protected, and no superiority was allowed to the one over the other. The different sectaries assailed him with petitions to help them against each other, but he declined interfering, and referred them to the decision of a general council; and the Arians showing themselves most troublesome, he gave them to understand that impartiality was the first duty of an emperor. His friend Athanasius was restored to his see at Alexandria.

After having abandoned Nisibis to the Persians, he marched through Edessa, Antioch, Tarsus, and Tyana in Cappadocia, where he learnt that Malarius having declined the command of Gaul, Lucillianus had hastened thither from Italy, and had been slain in a riot by the soldiers, but that the army had been restored to obedience by Jovinus. From Tyana Jovian pursued his march to Constantinople, in spite of an unusually severe winter. On the 1st of January, 364, he celebrated at Ancyra his promotion to the consulship, taking as colleague his infant son Varronianus, whom he called nobilissimus on the occasion. Having arrived at Dadastana, a small town in Galatia, on the borders of Bithynia, he indulged in a hearty supper and copious libations of wine, and endeavoured to obtain sound repose in an apartment which had lately been whitewashed, by ordering burning charcoals to be placed in the damp room. On the following morning (17th of February, 364) he was found dead in his bed. His death is ascribed to various causes—to intemperance, the coal-gas, and the poison of an assassin. It is possible, though not probable, that he died a violent death, to which Ammianus Marcellinus (xxv. 10) seems to allude when he compares his death with that of Aemilianus Scipio. (Amm. Marc. xxv. 5—10; Eutrop. x. 17, 18; Zosim. iii. p. 190, &c., ed. Paris; Zonar. vol. ii. pp. 28, 29, ed. Paris; Oros. vii. 31; Sozomen. vi. 3; Philostorg. viii. 5; Agathias, iv. p. 135, &c., ed. Paris; Theodoretus dwells upon the history of Jovian in several orations, especially Or. 5 and 7, and bestows all the praise on him which we might expect from a panegyrist; De la Bléterie, Histoire de Jovien, Amsterdam, 1740, the best work on the subject.) [W. P.]

JOVIUS, a bold and faithless intriguer, was Praefectus Praetorio of Illyricum, under the emperor Honorius, and was promoted to that office by Stilicho, who made use of him in his negotiations with Alaric. In A. D. 408, Jovius was appointed Patricius and Praefectus Praetorio of Italy, in consequence of the fall of the eunuch Olympius, who held the office of prime minister of Honorius. Through his intrigues, Jovius soon became sole master of the administration of the empire, and made great changes among its principal officers. When Rome was besieged by Alaric in A. D. 409, Honorius charged Jovius with arranging a peace. He accordingly went to Rimini for that purpose, and there had an interview with Alaric, with whom he was on friendly terms. Jovius proposed to Heraclius to settle the differences by appointing Alaric commander-in-chief of the Roman armies, and informed Alaric of this step, with which the Gothic king was of course quite satisfied. Honorius, however, declined conferring that important office upon the already too powerful Alaric, and wrote a letter to that effect to Jovius, who had the imprudence to read it aloud in presence of Alaric and his chiefs. Alaric had never demanded the supreme command of the Roman armies, but the refusal of the emperor was quite sufficient to rouse his anger, and the differences between him and Honorius now assumed a still more dangerous character. Jovius consequently returned to Ravenna, where he continued to exercise his important functions, though he lost much of his former influence. No sooner had Alaric induced Attalus to assume the purple, than the treachery of Jovius became manifest. Honorius having despatched him, Valens, the quaestor Potamius, and the notarius Julian to Rimini to effect an arrangement with Attalus, Jovius proposed to Attalus to divide the western empire with Honorius; but the usurper having declined the proposition, Jovius suddenly abandoned the emperor, and made common cause with Attalus. After the unhappy issue of the rebellion of Attalus, Jovius fearlessly returned to Honorius, and had the impudence to assert that he had only joined the rebel for the purpose of causing his certain ruin. He escaped punishment. It is very doubtful whether this Jovius is the same with the quaestor Jovius mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus (xvi. 8.), in the year 361. (Zosim. v. p. 363, &c. ed. Paris; Olympiodor. apud Photium, p. 180, &c.) [W. P.]

IOXUS (Ἰόφος), a son of Melanippus, and grandson of Theseus and Perigune, is said to have led a colony into Caria, in conjunction with Ornytus. (Plut. Thea. 8) [L. S.]

IPHIANASSA (Ἰφιδάσσα), the name of four mythical personages: the first was a daughter of Proetus by Anteia or Sthenoboea [PROETRUS]; the second a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and one of the three maidens among whom Achilles was to be allowed to choose (Hom. Il. ix. 145, 287); the third was the wife of Endymion (Apollod. i. 7. § 6), and the fourth one of the Nereides. (Lucian, Dial. Deor. 14.) [L. S.]

IPHIAS (Ἰφίας), i. e. a daughter of Iphis, a name applied to Evadne, the wife of Capaneus. (Ov. Ep. ex Pont. iii. 1, 111; Eurip. Suppl. 985, &c.) Iphias is also the name of a priestess mentioned in the story about the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 312) [L. S.]

IPHICIANUS (Ἰφικιανός), a physician, who is mentioned four times by Galen, and whose name is in each passage spelt differently, viz. Ἰφικιανός (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Offic. Med." i. 3, vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 654), Ἐφικιανός (De Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 58), Φικιανός (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." i. 29, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 575), and Φικιανός (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." iii. 34, vol. xvi. p. 484.) The form of the name here adopted is considered by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. p. 571, xiii. p. 302, ed. vet.) to be the most correct, but M. Littre, in his edition of Hippocrates (vol. i. p. 113), seems to prefer Phocianus. He was a pupil of Quintus, and one of the tutors of Galen, about the middle of the second century after Christ. He was a follower of the Stoic philosophy, and commented on part or the whole of the works of Hippocrates. [W. A. G.]

IPHICLES or IPHICLUS (Ἰφικλῆς, Ἰφικλέως). 1. A son of Amphitryon and Alcmena of Thebes, was one night younger than his half-brother Hercules, who strangled the snakes which had been sent by Hera or by Amphitryon, and at which Iphicles was frightened. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 8.) He was first married to Automedusa, the daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Iolaus, and afterwards to the youngest daughter of Creon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 11.) He accompanied Hercules on several expeditions, and is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2.) According to Apollodorus (ii. 7. § 3), he fell in battle against the sons of Hippocoon, but according to Pausanias (viii. 14. § 6), he was wounded in the battle against the Molionides, and being carried to Pheneus, he was nursed by Buphagus and Promme, but died there, and was honoured with a heroum.

2. A son of Thestius by Laophonte or Deidameia, and, according to others, by Eurythemis or Leucippe. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 8. § 3, 9. § 16; Apollon. Rhod. i. 201; Orph. Arg. 158; Val. Flacc. i. 370; Hygin. Fab. 14.)

3. A son of Phylacus, and grandson of Deion and Clymene, or, according to others, a son of Cephalus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. He was married to Diomedea or Astyoche, and was the father of Podarces and Protesilaus. (Hom. Il. ii. 705, xiii. 698; Apollod. i. 9. § 12; Paus. iv. 36. § 2; x. 29. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 103.) He was, like the two other Iphicles, one of the Argonauts, and possessed large herds of oxen, which he gave to Melampus, who had given him a favourable prophecy respecting his progeny. (Hom. Il. ii. 705, Od. xi. 289, &c.) He was also celebrated for his swiftness in racing, by which he won the prize at the funeral games of Pelias, but in those of Amynceus he was conquered by Nestor. (Paus. v. 17. § 4, 36. § 2. x. 29. § 2; Hom. Il. xiii. 636.) [L. S.]

IPHI'CRATES (Ἰφικράτης), the famous Athenian general, was the son of a shoemaker, whose name seems to have been Timotheus. He first brought himself into notice by gallantly boarding a ship of the enemy (perhaps at the battle of Cnidus, B. C. 394) and bringing off the captain to his own trireme. It was from this exploit, if we may believe Justin, that the Athenians gave him the command of the forces which they sent to the aid of the Boeotians after the battle of Coroneia, when he was only 25 years old. (Arist. Rhet. i. 7. § 32, 9. § 31, ii. 23. § 8; Plut. Apoph. p. 41. ed. Tauchn.; Just. vi. 5; Oros. iii. 1; see Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. Chabr. Timoth. i. § 7. Berol. 1845.) In B. C. 393 we find him general of a force of mercenaries in the Athenian service at Corinth; and in this capacity he took part in the battle of Lechaem, wherein the Lacedaemonian commander, Praxitias, having been admitted within the long walls of Corinth, defeated the Corinthian, Boeotian, Argive, and Athenian troops. (Dem. Phil. i. p. 46; Schol. ad Arist. Plat. 173; Diod. xiv. 86, 91; Polyæn. i. 9; Plat. Menez. p. 245; Xen. Hell. iv. 4. §§ 6-12; Andoc. de Pace, p. 25; Harpocr. and Said. s. v. Ἐφικράτης.) The system now adopted by the belligerent parties of mutual annoyance, by inroads on each other's territories, seems to have directed the attention of Iphicrates to an important improvement in military tactics — the formation of a body of targeteers (τεταραστὰς) possessing, to a certain extent, the advantages of heavy and light-armed forces. This he effected by substituting a small target for the heavy shield, adopting a longer sword and spear, and replacing the old coat of mail by a linen corslet, while he also made his soldiers wear light shoes called afterwards, from his name, ἰφικρατῖδες. Having thus increased the efficiency of "the hands of the army," to use his own metaphor (Plut. Pelop. 2), he invaded with these troops the territory of Phlius, and slew so many of the Phliasians, that they were obliged to call in the aid of a Lacedaemonian garrison, which ever before they had carefully avoided; and he ravaged, too, the lands of Arcadia with impunity, as the Arcadian heavy-armed forces were afraid to face the targeteers. (Xen. Hell. iv. 4. §§ 14-17; Diod. xiv 91, xv. 44; Polyæn. iii. 9; Corn. Nep. Iph. 1; Suid. s. v. Ἰφικράτης; Strab. viii. p. 389.) In the spring of 392 Iphicrates with his peltasts formed part of the garrison of the fortress Peiræum, in the Corinthian territory, whence he was summoned to the defence of Corinth, against which Agesilaus had made a feint of marching. But the real object of the Spartan king was Peiræum, and, when it was weakened by the withdrawal of Iphicrates, he advanced and took it. Meanwhile Iphicrates reached Corinth; and here it was that, sallying forth with his targeteers, he defeated and nearly destroyed the Lacedæmonian Mora, which was on its way back to Lechaëum, after having escorted for some distance homewards the Amyclæans of the army of Agesilaus, returning to Laconia for the celebration of the Hyacinthian festival. This exploit of Iphicrates became very celebrated throughout Greece, and had more importance assigned to it than we should be inclined at first to imagine possible, as is clear from the grief it caused in the camp of Agesilaus, from the caution with which he marched home through the Peloponnesus, and from the suspension of the Theban negotiations for terms with Sparta. Thirlwall supposes that it may have also prevented the peace between Lacedæmon and Athens, which ANDOCIDES with others had been commissioned to conclude. Iphicrates, encouraged by his success, recovered Sidus and Crommyon, which Praxitas had taken, as well as Oenôe, where Agesilaus had placed a garrison. Soon after he retired, or was dismissed from the command, in consequence, it seems, of the jealousy of the Argives; for he had shown a desire to reduce the Corinthian territory under the power of Athens, and had put to death some Corinthians of the Argive party. He was succeeded by CHABRIAS. (Xen. Hell. iv. 5, 8. § 34; Diod. xiv. 91, 92; Plut. Ages. 22; Dem. Phil. i. p. 46; c. Aristoc. p. 686; Paus. iii. 10; Nep. Iph. 2; Andoc. de Pace.) In B. C. 389 he was sent to the Hellespont to counteract the operations of ANAXIMAS, who was defeated by him and slain in the following year. In spite of his victory, however, Iphicrates was not able to prevail against ANTALCIDAS. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. §§ 34, &c.; Polyæn. iii. 9.)

On the peace of 387 Iphicrates did not return to Athens; but we do not know whether he acted on a command of the state or on his own judgment in aiding Seuthes, king of the Odrysæ, to recover his kingdom, from which he had been expelled, possibly by Cotys (see Rehdantz, ii. § 4; Senec. Eccl. Cont. vi. 5.). Be that as it will, we find him not long after in alliance with the latter prince, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and perhaps enabled him to build the town of Δῶρις in Thrace (Dem. c. Arist. p. 663; Anaxand. ap. Athén. iv. p. 131; Nep. Iph. 2, 3; Isæus, de Harpocr. Menel. § 7; Polyæn. iii. 9; Suid. and Harpocr. s. v. Δῶρις.) When the Athenians, in B. C. 377, recalled Chabrias from the service of Acoris, king of Egypt, on the remonstrance of Pharnabazus, they also sent Iphicrates with 20,000 Greek mercenaries to aid the satrap in reducing Egypt to obedience. Several years, however, wasted by the Persians in preparation, elapsed before the alien troops set forth from Acô (Acre). They met with some success at first, till a dispute arose between Iphicrates and Pharnabazus, the former of whom was anxious to attack Memphis, while the over-cautious satrap would not consent, and (much time having been lost) when the season of the Nile's inundation came on, he drew off his army. Iphicrates, remembering the fate of CONON, and fearing for his personal safety, fled to Athens, and was denounced to the Athenians by Pharnabazus as having caused the failure of the expedition. The people promised to punish him as he deserved; but the next year (B. C. 373) they appointed him to command against Mnasiippus in Coryra, in conjunction with CALLISTRATUS and Chabrias, with the former of whom he also joined in prosecuting TIMOTHEUS, the superseded general. In getting ready the fleet necessary for this service, Iphicrates exhibited great and probably not over-scrupulous activity; and the Athenians allowed him (perhaps through the influence of Callistratus) to make use of all the ships round the coast, even the Paralus and Salaminiæ, on a promise from him that he would send back a great number in return for them. The state of affairs in the West left him no time to lose, and his crews were in a very imperfect state of training; but he remedied this by making the whole voyage an exercise of naval tactics. On his way he landed in Cephallenia (where he received full assurance of the death of Mnasiippus), and having brought over the island to the Athenians, he sailed on to Coryra. Defeating here the force which Dionysius I. of Syracuse had sent to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, he carried on the war with vigour till the peace of 371 put an end to operations and recalled him to Athens. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2, 3; Diod. xv. 29, 41—43, 47, xvi. 57; Nep. Iph. 2; Dem. c. Tim. pp. 1187, 1188.) In B. C. 369, when the Peloponnesus was invaded by Epaminondas, Iphicrates was appointed to the command of the forces voted by Athens for the aid of Sparta; but he did not effect, perhaps he did not wish to effect, any thing against the Thebans, who made their way back in safety through an unguarded pass of the Isthmus. (See Vol. II. p. 22, b; Rehdantz, iv. § 6.) About B. C. 367, he was sent against Amphipolis, apparently, however, to observe rather than to act, so small was the force committed to him. At this period it was that he listened to the entreaties of EUVRYDICE, the widow of Amyntas II. (who had adopted Iphicrates as his son), and drove out from Macedonia the pretender Pausanias. But, notwithstanding this favour, Ptolemy of Alorus, the regent of Macedon, and the reputed paramour of Eurydice, supported Amphipolis against Iphicrates, who, with the aid of the adventurer CHARIDEMUS, continued the war for three years, at the end of which time the Amphipolitians agreed to surrender, and gave hostages for the fulfilment of their promise; immediately after which Iphicrates was superseded by Timotheus. (Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 31, 32; Nep. Iph. 3; Dem. c. Arist. p. 669; Suid. s. v. Κάρπυος.)

The connection of Iphicrates with Cotys may perhaps have led to the decree which deprived him of the command in those parts; and, if any alarm was felt by the Athenians on this score, the result proved that it was not unfounded, for we find him soon after aiding his father-in-law in his war with Athens for the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus. This seems, indeed, to have been the ground of the ὑπαφ' ἑνίας which Timotheus pledged himself in the strongest way to bring against him, though he afterwards abandoned it, and even gave his daughter in marriage to Menestheus, the son of Iphicrates by the daughter of Cotys. Rehdantz (vi. § 7) supposes the word ἐξέλας to be used with reference to the threatened prosecution in a wide sense and with pretty nearly the meaning of προδοσία; but it may have been adopted to imply that Iphicrates had made himself in fact an alien, and had no longer any claim to the privileges of Athenian citizenship. Iphicrates, however, would not go so far as to assist Cotys in taking the towns which were actually in the possession of the Athenians; and feeling that his refusal made his residence in his father-in-law's dominions no longer safe, while, from his previous conduct, a return to Athens would be equally dangerous, he withdrew to Antissa first, and thence to the city (Ἀπύς) which he had himself built. (Dem. c. Tim. p. 1204, c. Arist. pp. 663, 664, 673, &c.; Nep. Iph. 3.) After the death of Chabrias, Iphicrates, Timotheus, and Menestheus were joined with Chares as commanders in the Social War, and were prosecuted by their unscrupulous colleague, either because they had refused to risk an engagement (for which he was anxious) in a storm, or because he wished to screen himself from the consequences of his own rashness in actually engaging [CHARES]. The prosecution was conducted by Aristophanes, the Aeginian. Iphicrates and his son were brought to trial first, and appear to have endeavoured to shift the danger from Timotheus by taking all the responsibility on themselves. According to the author of the lives of the Ten Orators (Lys. ad fin.), the speech in which Iphicrates defended himself was written for him by Lysias; but the soldierlike boldness of the oration, as described by Dionysius (de Lys. p. 480), and exemplified in the extract given by Aristotle (Rhet. ii. 23, § 7), seems to show that the accused was probably himself the author of it. He does not seem, however, to have trusted entirely either to his eloquence or to the justice of his cause, for we hear that he introduced into the court a body of partisans armed with daggers, and that he himself took care that the judges should see his sword during the trial. He and Menestheus were acquitted: Timotheus was arraigned afterwards, probably in the following year (B.C. 354), and condemned to a heavy fine. From the period of his trial Iphicrates seems to have lived quietly at Athens. The exact date of his death is not known, but Demosthenes (c. Meid. p. 534) speaks of him as no longer alive at that time (B.C. 348). (Diod. xvi. 21; Nep. Iph. 3, Tim. 3; Deinarch. c. Philocl. p. 110; Polyæn. iii. 9; Arist. Rhet. iii. 10, § 7; Quint. v. 10, § 12; Senec. Exc. Cat. vi. 5; Isocr. repr. Anst. § 137; Rehdantz, vii. § 7.)

Iphicrates has been commended for his combined prudence and energy as a general. The worst words, he said, that a commander could utter were, "I should not have expected it," — οὐκ ἄν προσεδόκησα. (Plut. Apoph. Iph. 2; Dem. Proem. p. 1457; Polyæn. iii. 9.) Like Chabrias and Chares, he was fond of residing abroad (Theopomp. op. Ath. xii. p. 532, b), and we have seen that he did not allow considerations of patriotism to stand in the way of his advancement by a foreign service and alliance. Yet we do not find the Athenians depriving him of the almost unprecedented honours with which they had loaded him, and of which one Harmodius (a descendant, it seems, of the murderer of Hipparchus) had endeavoured to strip him by a prosecution. We do not know at what period this case was tried; but it was probably in B.C. 371, after the return of Iphicrates from the Ionian Sea. (Dem. c. Arist. p. 663—665; Plut. Apoph. Iph. 5; Arist. Rhet. ii. 23, §§ 6, 8; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Lys. ad fin.; Rehdantz, vi. § 2.) If the Athenians had a strong sense of his value, he appears on his part to have presumed upon it not a little. He had also, however, in all probability, a strong party in Athens (for his friendly connection with Lysias see above), and the circumstances of the times would always throw considerable power into the hands of a leader of mercenary troops. [E. E.]

IPHICRATES (Ἰπικράτης), a son of the above, was one of the ambassadors sent from Greece to Dareius Codomannus. With his colleagues he fell into the hands of Parmenion, at Damascus, after the battle of Issus (B.C. 333). Alexander treated him honourably, from a wish to conciliate the Athenians as well as from respect to his father's memory: and on his death (which was a natural one) he sent his bones to his relatives at Athens. (Arr. Anab. ii. 15; Curt. iii. 10.) [E. E.]

IPHICRATES, statuary. [AMPHICRATES.]

IPHIDAMAS (Ἰφιδάμας). 1. A son of Boeotia, whom Heracles ordered to be put to death together with his father. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1396.) Apollodorus (ii. 5, § 11) calls him Amphidamas.

2. A Trojan hero, a son of Antenor and Theano, the daughter of Cisseus. He was a brother of Coon, together with whom he was slain by Agamemnon in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. xi. 221, &c.; Paus. iv. 36, § 2.)

3. A son of Aleus (Orph. Arg. 146), but he is commonly called Amphidamas. [L. S.]

IPHIGENEIA (Ἰφίγεια), according to the most common tradition, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (Hygin. Fab. 98), but, according to others, a daughter of Theseus and Helena, and brought up by Clytemnestra only as a foster-child. (Anton. Lib. 27; Tzet. ad Lycop. 183.) Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove of Artemis, or had boasted that the goddess herself could not hit better, or, according to another story, in the year in which Iphigeneia was born, he had vowed to sacrifice the most beautiful thing which that year might produce, but had afterwards neglected to fulfil his vow. Either of these circumstances is said to have been the cause of the calm which detained the Greek fleet in the port of Aulis, when the Greeks wanted to sail against Troy. The seer Calchas, or, according to others, the Delphic oracle, declared that the sacrifice of Iphigeneia was the only means of propitiating Artemis. Agamemnon at first resisted the command, but the entreaties of Menelaus at length prevailed upon him to give way, and he consented to Iphigeneia being fetched by Odysseus and Diomedes, under the pretext that she was to be married to Achilles. When Iphigeneia had arrived, and was on the point of being sacrificed, Artemis carried her in a cloud to Tauris, where she was made to serve the goddess as her priestess, while a stag, or, according to others, a she-bear, a bull, or an old woman, was substituted in her place and sacrificed. (Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 10—30, 783, Iphig. Aul. 1540, &c.; Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Trilog. p. 408, &c.; Suid. s. v. Ἰφιδέης.) According to Dictys Cretensis (i. 19, &c.), Iphigeneia was saved in a peal of thunder by the voice of Artemis and the interference of Achilles, who had been gained over by Clytemnestra, and sent Iphigeneia to Scythia. Tzetzes (l.c.) even states that Achilles was actually married to her, and became by her the father of Pyrrhus.

While Iphigeneia was serving Artemis as priestess in Tauris, her brother Orestes, on the advice of an oracle, formed the plan of fetching the image of Artemis in Tauris, which was believed once to have fallen from heaven, and of carrying it to Attica. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 79, &c.) When Orestes, accompanied by Pylades, arrived in Tauris, he was, according to the custom of the country, to be sacrificed in the temple of the goddess. But Iphigeneia recognised her brother, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess. Some say that Thoas, king of Tauris, was previously murdered by the fugitives. (Hygin. Fab. 121; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116.) In the meantime Electra, another sister of Orestes, had heard that he had been sacrificed in Tauris by the priestess of Artemis, and, in order to ascertain the truth of the report, she travelled to Delphi, where she met Iphigeneia, and was informed that she had murdered Orestes. Electra therefore resolved on putting Iphigeneia's eyes out, but was prevented by the interference of Orestes, and a scene of recognition took place. All now returned to Mycenae; but Iphigeneia carried the statue of Artemis to the Attic town of Brauron near Marathon. She there died as priestess of the goddess. As a daughter of Theseus she was connected with the heroic families of Attica, and after her death the veils and most costly garments which had been worn by women who had died in childbirth were offered up to her. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 1464; Diod. iv. 44, &c.; Paus. i. 33.) Pausanias (i. 43), however, speaks of her tomb and heroum at Megara, whereas other traditions stated that Iphigeneia had not died at all, but had been changed by Artemis into Hecate, or that she was endowed by the goddess with immortality and eternal youth, and under the name of Oreilochia she became the wife of Achilles in the island of Lemce. (Anton. Lib. 27.) The Lacedaemonians, on the other hand, maintained that the carved image of Artemis, which Iphigeneia and Orestes had carried away from Tauris, existed at Sparta, and was worshipped there in Limnaeon under the name of Artemis Orthia. (Paus. iii. 16.) The worship of this goddess in Attica and Lacedaemon is of great importance. At Sparta her image was said to have been found in a bush, and to have thrown the beholders into a state of madness; and once, as at the celebration of her festival, a quarrel arose which ended in bloodshed, an oracle commanded that in future human sacrifices should be offered to her. Lycurgus, however, is said to have abolished these sacrifices, and to have introduced in their stead the scourging of youths. (Paus. iii. 16. § 6; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Diamastigosis.) That in Attica, also, human sacrifices were offered to her, at least in early times, may be inferred from the fact of its being customary to shed some human blood in the worship instituted there in honour of Orestes. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 1446, &c.)

Now, as regards the explanation of the myths of Iphigeneia, we are informed by Pausanias (ii. 35. § 2) that Artemis had a temple at Hermione, under the surname of Iphigeneia; and the same author (vii. 26) and Herodotus (iv. 103) tell us, that the Taurians considered the goddess to whom they offered sacrifices, to be Iphigeneia, the daughter of Agamemnon. From these and other circumstances, it has been inferred that Iphigeneia was originally not only a priestess of Artemis, or a heroine, but an attribute of Artemis, or Artemis herself. For further explanations, see Kanne, Mythol. p. 115, &c.; Müller, Dor. ii. 9. § 6; Schwenk, Etym. Mythol. Andeut. p. 218; G. Meyer, De Diana Taurica Dissert. Berlin, 1835. [L. S.]

IPHIMEDeia or IPHI'MEDE (Ἰφίμεδεια, Ἰφίμεδν), a daughter of Triops, and the wife of Aloeus. Being in love with Poseidon, she often walked to the sea, and collected its waters in her lap, whence she became, by Poseidon, the mother of the Alonadae, Otus and Ephialtes. When Iphimedeia and her daughter, Pancratia, celebrated the orgies of Dionysus on Mount Drius, they were carried off by Thracian pirates to Naxos or Strongyle; but both were delivered by the Alonadae. The tomb of Iphimedeia and her sons was shown at Anthedon. She was worshipped as a heroine at Mylasia in Caria, and was represented by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Hom. Od. xi. 304; Apollod. i. 7. § 4; Diod. v. 50; Hygin. Fab. 28; Paus. ix. 22. § 5, x. 28. in fin.; Pind. Pyth. vii. 89.) [L. S.]

IPHIMEDON (Ἰφίμεδων), a son of Eurytheus, who fell in the battle against the Heraclidae. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

IPHINOE (Ἰφινόη). 1. A daughter of Proetus and Sthenoboea. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2.)

2. The wife of Metion, and mother of Daedalus. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 468.)

3. A daughter of Nisus, and the wife of Megareus. (Paus. i. 59, in fin.)

4. A daughter of Alcathous, who died a virgin. The women of Megara previous to their marriage offered to her a funeral sacrifice, and dedicated a lock of hair to her. (Paus. i. 43. § 4.)

5. One of the Lemnian women who received the Argonauts on their arrival in Lemnos. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 702; Val. Flacc. ii. 162, 327.) [L. S.]

IPHION (Ἰφίων) of Corinth, a painter, who is only known by two epigrams, which are ascribed, on doubtful grounds, to Simonides. (Anth. Pal. ix. 757, xiii. 17; Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 142, No. 85, 86.) [P. S.]

IPHIS (Ἰφίς). 1. A son of Alector, and a descendant of Megapenthes, the son of Proetus. He was king of Argos, and from him were descended Eteoclus and Evadne, the wife of Capaneus. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4, x. 10. § 2; Apollod. iii. 7. § 1; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vi. 46.) He advised Polynices to induce Amphiarus to take part in the expedition against Thebes, by giving the famous necklace to Eriphyle. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 2.) As he lost his two children, he left his kingdom to Sthenelus, the son of Capaneus. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4; Eurip. Suppl. 1034, &c.)

2. A son of Sthenelus, and brother of Eurytheus, was one of the Argonauts who fell in the battle with Aeetes. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 223; Val. Flacc. i. 441; Diod. iv. 48, with Wesseling's note.)

3. [ANAXARETE.] [L. S.]

IPHIS (Ἰφίς). 1. One of the daughters of Theopius, by whom Heracles became the father of Celenastanor. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

2. The beloved of Patroclus, of the island of Scyros. (Hom. Il. ix. 667; Philostr. Her. 10.)

3. A daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Phœstus in Crete. She was brought up as a boy, because, previous to her birth, her father had ordered the child to be killed, if it should be a girl. When Iphis had grown up, and was to be betrothed to Ianthé, the difficulty thus arising was removed by the favour of Isis, who had before advised the mother to treat Iphis as a boy, and now metamorphosed her into a youth. (Ōv. Met. ix. 665, &c.) [L. S.]

IPHITUS (Ἰφίτες). 1. A son of Eurytus of Oechalia, is mentioned among the Argonauts, but was killed by Heracles. (Hom. Od. xxi. 14, &c.; Apollod. ii. 6. § 1; Paus. iii. 15. § 2; Apollon. Rhod. i. 86.)

2. A son of Naubolus, and father of Schedius, Epistrophus, and Eurynome, in Phocis, was likewise one of the Argonauts. (Hom. Il. ii. 518, xvii. 306; Paus. x. 4. § 1; Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Apollon. Rhod. i. 207; Orph. Arg. 144.)

3. A son of Haemon, Praxinides, or Iphitus. At the command of the Delphic oracle, he restored the Olympian games, and instituted the cessation of all war during their celebration. (Paus. v. 4. § 5.) Another Iphitus, who is otherwise unknown, is mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 5. § 1). [L. S.]

IPHTHIME (Ἰφθυμή). 1. One of the Nereides, and the mother of the Satyra. (Noun. Dionys. xiv. 114.)

2. A daughter of Icarus, and sister of Penelope. Athena assumed the appearance of Iphthime, when she appeared to the unfortunate mother of Telemachus. (Hom. Od. iv. 797.) [L. S.]

IRENÆUS (Ἐιρηναῖος). 1. St., bishop of Lyon, in Gaul, during the latter part of the second century after Christ, seems to have been a native of Smyrna, or of some neighbouring place in Asia Minor. The time of his birth is not known exactly, but Dodwell is certainly wrong in placing it so early as A. D. 97; it was probably between A. D. 120 and A. D. 140. In his early youth he heard Polycarp, for whom he felt throughout life the greatest reverence. The occasion of his going from Asia to Gaul is uncertain; the common account is that he accompanied Pothinus on his mission to Gaul, which resulted in the formation of the churches at Lyon and Vienne. He became a presbyter to Pothinus, on whose martyrdom, in A. D. 177, Irenæus succeeded to the bishopric of the church at Lyon. His government was signalised by Christian devotedness and zeal, and he made many converts from heathenism. He was most active in opposing the Gnostics, and especially the Valentinians. He also took part in the controversy respecting the time of keeping Easter, and wrote a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, rebuking the arrogance with which he anathematised the Asiatic churches. Irenæus seems to have lived till about the end of the second century. The silence of all the early writers, such as Tertullian, Eusebius, Augustin, and Theodoret, sufficiently refutes the claim to the honours of martyrdom, which later writers set up in his behalf. But he eminently deserves the far higher honour attached to sincere piety and the zealous, but not arrogant discharge of his episcopal duties. He was possessed of considerable learning, but was very deficient in sound judgment respecting the value of those traditions, which, as they came from men who lived in the age next to the apostles, he eagerly received and recorded. On the subject of the Millennium, for example, his writings contain the most puerile absurdities.

The chief work of Irenæus, and the only one now extant, is entitled Adversus Hæreses, or De Refutatione et Eversione falsæ Scientiæ, Libri V., the object of which is to refute the Gnostics. The original Greek is lost, with the exception of some fragments preserved by Epiphanius and other writers on heresies; but the work exists in a barbarous, but ancient Latin version, which Dodwell supposes to have been composed towards the end of the 4th century. Irenæus also wrote a discourse against the Gentiles, περὶ ἐπισημύης; a work on the preaching of the apostles, addressed to his brother Marcianus; a book of tracts on various questions, διαλέκτων διαφόρων; and several letters respecting the ecclesiastical controversies of his day, among which were two to Florianus, a friend of his, who had become a convert to Gnosticism; one to Blastus on schism, and the synodic epistle above referred to, from the Gallic churches to Victor, bishop of Rome, respecting Easter. Of these works only a few fragments remain.

The editio princeps of Irenæus is that of Erasmus, Basel, 1526, 8vo., containing the Latin version of the five books against heretics, reprinted at Basel, 1534, 1548, 1554, and 1560, fol.; at Paris, 1545, 1563, and 1567, 8vo.; re-edited, with various readings, by Jo. Jac. Grynaeus, Basel, 1571: the first edition, containing the fragments, besides the Latin version, was that of Nicolas Galsinus, Paris, 1570, fol.; next comes the edition of Ft. Feuardentinus, Cologne, 1596, 1625, and best, 1639; but the best edition of all is that of Grabe, Oxon. 1702, fol., which was re-edited by the Benedictine Massuet, Paris, 1710, fol.: this Benedictine edition was reprinted in two volumes folio, at Venice, 1734. The chief separate edition of the fragments is that of Pfaff, Hag. Com. 1715, 8vo. (Bæsch. H. E. v. 15, 20, 24, 26; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 33; Dodwell, Dissertationes in Irenæum; Cave, Hist. Litt. sub ann. 167; Lardner's Credibility; the Ecclesiastical Histories of Tillemont, Fleury, Jortin, Mosheim, and Schröckh; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 75.)

2. Bishop of Tyre, but previously a count of the empire, was the representative of the emperor Theodosius at the council of Ephesus, where he took part with the Nestorians, A. D. 431. Immediately after the council, he hastened to Constantinople, in order to counteract the influence of the representatives of the party of Cyril on the emperor's mind. In this he succeeded for the time; but, after long vacillation, Theodosius at last declared himself against the Nestorians, and banished Irenæus from his court, about A. D. 435. Irenæus betook himself to his friends, the Oriental bishops, by whom he was made bishop of Tyre, A. D. 444. In an imperial decree against the Nestorians, which still exists, it is ordered that Irenæus should be deposed from his bishopric, and deprived of his clerical character. The sentence was carried into effect in A. D. 448. In his retirement, Irenæus wrote a history of the Nestorian struggle, under the title of Tragoedia seu Commentarii de Rebus in Synodo Ephesina ac in Oriente gestis. The original Greek is lost entirely, but we have an old Latin translation of parts of it, published by Christian Lupus, Louvain, 1682; for, though Lupus entitled his book Variarum Patrum Epistolæ ad Curiam Ephesinam pertinentes, there can be no doubt that all the passages in it are remains of the work of Irene. (Mansi, Sacr. Concil. Nov. Collect. vol. v. pp. 417, 731; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. vol. xiv.; Cave, Hist. Litt. sub ann. 444.)

3. An Alexandrian grammarian, known also by the Latin name of Minucius Pacatus, was the pupil of Heliodorus Metricus. His works, which were chiefly on the Alexandrian and Attic dialects, were held in high esteem, and are often quoted: a list of them is given by Suidas. He probably lived about the time of Augustus.* (Suid. s. v. Εἰρηναῖος and Πάατος; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 170, 171.)

4. Referendarius, the author of three amatory epigrams in the Greek Anthology, from a comparison of which with the epigrams of Agathias and Paul the Silentiary, Jacobs concludes that the author lived under Justinian. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 19; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 231, vol. xiii. p. 905.) [P. S.]

IRENE (Εἰρήνη), empress of Constantinople (A. D. 797–802), one of the most extraordinary women in Byzantine history, was born at Athens about A. D. 752. She was so much distinguished by beauty and genius, that she attracted the attention of Leo, the son and afterwards successor of the emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, who married her in 769, the nuptials being celebrated with great splendour at Constantinople. She had been educated in the worship of images, and was compelled by her husband to adopt the purer form of religion which he professed. Leo was extremely kind towards her and her family both before and after his accession in 775; but having discovered that she still adored images, he banished her from his palace. Leo IV. died shortly afterwards (780), and Irene administered the government for her minor son, Constantine VI. The principal events of her reign are related in the life of Constantine VI.: we therefore confine ourselves to such occurrences as are in closer connection with her personal history. In 786 she assembled a council at Constantinople for the purpose of re-establishing the worship of images throughout the whole empire; and the assembled bishops having been driven out by the riotous garrison of the capital, she found a pretext for removing the troops; and during their absence she assembled another council in 787, at Nicaeum, where the adorers of images obtained a complete victory. The attempts of Constantine to emancipate himself from his mother's control are intimately connected with the religious troubles: they ended with the assassination of the young emperor by a band hired by Irene and her favourite, the general Stauracius. Irene succeeded her son on the throne (797), and had some difficulty in maintaining her independence against the influence of Stauracius and another favourite, Aetius, who, in their turn, were jealous of each other, and would have caused great dissensions at the court, and perhaps a civil war, but for the timely death of Stauracius (800). About this time Irene renewed the intercourse between the Byzantine court and that of Aix-la-Chapelle; and, if we can trust the Greek writers, she sent ambassadors to Charlemagne in order to negotiate a marriage between him and herself, and to unite the western and the eastern empires; and, according to the same sources, the plan first originated with the Frankish king. The whole scheme is said to have been rendered abortive by Aetius. The western writers do not even allude to this match, though Eginhard would certainly have mentioned it had Charlemagne actually entertained such designs. The scheme must therefore have been concocted at Constantinople, and kept there as a secret, which was only divulged after the death of the parties. From the accession of Charlemagne, the Greek emperors were no longer styled "father" and "lord" by the Frankish and German kings and emperors; but down to a late period the successors of Constantine refused the title of Βασιλεὺς to the Roman emperors in Germany. Irene continued to govern the empire with great prudence and energy, but she never succeeded entirely in throwing oblivion over the horrible crime she had committed against her son; and she who trusted nobody was at last ensnared by a man who deserved her keenest suspicions, for the despicable vices of hypocrisy, avarice, and ingratitude. We speak of the great treasurer, Nicephorus, who suddenly kindled a rebellion, and was proclaimed emperor before the empress had recovered from her surprise and indignation. Irene proposed to share the throne with him; and Nicephorus having apparently acceded to her proposals, she received him with confidence in her palace, but was suddenly arrested and banished to the island of Lesbos (802). Deprived, through the base avarice of the usurper, of all means of subsistence, this haughty princess was compelled to gain her livelihood by spinning; and she died of grief in the following year, at the age of about fifty. Forgetful of her bloody crime, and only remembering her protection of images, the Greeks have placed her among their saints, and celebrate her memory on the 15th of August, the supposed day of her death. (Cedren. p. 473, &c.; Theophan. p. 399, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 120, &c.; Glycas, p. 285, in the Paris editions; Vincent Mignet, Histoire de l'Impératrice Irène, Amsterdam, 1762, is a very good book. The character of Irene is best drawn by Gibbon, and by Schlosser in Geschichte der bildstürmenden Kaiser des Ost-Römischen Reiches, Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1812.) [W. P.]

IRIS (Ἴρις), a daughter of Thaumás (whence she is called Thaumantias, Virg. Aen. ix. 5) and Electra, and sister of the Harpies. (Hes. Theog. 266, 780; Apollod. i. 2. § 6; Plat. Theat. p. 155. d; Plut. de Plac. Philos. iii. 5.) In the Homeric poems she appears as the minister of the Olympian gods, who carries messages from Ida to Olympus, from gods to gods, and from gods to men. (Il. xv. 144, xxiv. 78, 95, ii. 787, xviii. 168, Hymn. in Apoll. Del. 102, &c.) In accordance with these functions of Iris, her name is commonly derived from εἶρω εἶρω; so that Iris would mean "the speaker or messenger:" but it is not impossible that it may be connected with εἶρω, "I join," whence εἰρήνη; so that Iris, the goddess of the rainbow, would be the joiner or conciliator, or the messenger of heaven, who restores peace in nature. In the Homeric poems, it is true, Iris does not appear as the goddess of the rainbow, but the rainbow itself is called

Iris (Il. xi. 27, xvii. 547): and this brilliant phenomenon in the skies, which vanishes as quickly as it appears, was regarded as the swift minister of the gods. Her genealogy too supports the opinion that Iris was originally the personification of the rainbow. In the earlier poets, and even in Theocritus (xvii. 134) and Virgil (Aen. v. 610) Iris appears as a virgin goddess; but according to later writers, she was married to Zephyrus, and became by him the mother of Eros. (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 391, 555; Plut. Amat. 20.) With regard to her functions, which we have above briefly described, we may further observe, that the Odyssey never mentions Iris, but only Hermes as the messenger of the gods: in the Iliad, on the other hand, she appears most frequently, and on the most different occasions. She is principally engaged in the service of Zeus, but also in that of Hera, and even serves Achilles in calling the winds to his assistance. (Il. xxiii. 198.) She further performs her services not only when commanded, but she sometimes advises and assists of her own accord (iii. 122, xv. 201, xviii. 197, xxiv. 74, &c.). In later poets she appears on the whole in the same capacity as in the Iliad, but she occurs gradually more and more exclusively in the service of Hera, both in the later Greek and Latin poets. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 232; Virg. Aen. v. 606; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 288, 432; Ov. Met. xiv. 830, &c.) Some poets describe Iris actually as the rainbow itself, but Servius (ad Aen. v. 610) states that the rainbow is only the road on which Iris travels, and which therefore appears whenever the goddess wants it, and vanishes when it is no longer needed: and it would seem that this latter notion was the more prevalent one in antiquity. Respecting the worship of Iris very few traces have come down to us, and we only know that the Delians offered to her on the island of Hecate cakes made of wheat and honey and dried figs. (Athen. xiv. p. 645; comp. Müller, Aegia. p. 170.) No statues of Iris have been preserved, but we find her frequently represented on vases and in bas-reliefs, either standing and dressed in a long and wide tunic, over which hangs a light upper garment, with wings attached to her shoulders, and carrying the herald's staff in her left hand; or she appears flying with wings attached to her shoulders and sandals, with the staff and a pitcher in her hands. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderbuch, i. p. 93. tab. 12, 2, 3; Böttiger, Vasengemälde, ii. pp. 68, 86, &c.) [L. S.]

IRUS (Ἴρος). 1. A son of Actor, and father of Eurydamas and Eurytion. He propitiated Peleus for the murder of his brother; but during the chase of the Calydonian boar, Peleus unintentionally killed Eurytion, the son of Irus. Peleus endeavoured to soothe him by offering him his flocks; but Irus would not accept them, and at the command of an oracle, Peleus allowed them to run wherever they pleased. A wolf devoured the sheep, but was thereupon changed into a stone, which was shown in later times on the frontier between Locris and Phocis. (Anton. Lib. 38; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 175; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 71.)

2. The well-known beggar of Ithaca, who was celebrated for his voracity. His real name was Arnaeus, but he was called Irus because he was employed by the suitors of Penelope as the messenger; for Irus, according to the lexicographers, signifies a messenger. (Hom. Od. xviii. 5, &c., 239.) [L. S.]

ISAACUS I. COMNENUS (Ἰσαάκος ὁ Κομνηνός), emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 1057—1059), and the first of the Comneni who ascended the imperial throne, was one of the most virtuous emperors of the East. [See the genealogical table of the Comneni, Vol. I. p. 820.] He was the elder son of Manuel Comnenus, praefectus totius orientis in the reign of Basil II., whom he lost while still a boy, and was educated, together with his younger brother John, under the care of Basil. Their learning, talents, and moral principles, as much as the merits of their late father, recommended them to the favour of the emperor, and at an early age they were both entrusted with important civil and military functions. Isaac became so distinguished, that, supported by the illustrious name of his family, he succeeded in obtaining the hand of Catharina, or Aicatharina, the daughter of Samuel, or perhaps John Wladialaus, king of the Bulgarians, a lady who, at the time when Isaac made her acquaintance, was a captive at the Byzantine court. During the stormy reigns of the eight immediate successors of Basil II. (Constantine IX., Romanus III., Michael IV., Michael V., Zoe, Constantine X., Theodora, and Michael VI.), who successively occupied the throne during the short period of 22 years, the position of Isaac was often dangerous; but he conducted himself with so much prudence, and enjoyed so much of the general esteem, that he not only escaped the many dangers by which he was surrounded, but was considered by the people a worthy successor of their worthless master, Michael VI. The conduct of this emperor was so revolting, that shortly after his accession in 1056, the principal nobles and functionaries, supported by the clergy and a large majority of the nation, resolved to depose him. They offered the crown to the old Catacalon, a distinguished general who was the leader of the conspiracy, but he declined the proposition on the ground of his age and obscure birth, and pointed out Isaac Comnenus as a fit candidate for their choice. Isaac was proclaimed emperor (August 1057) without his knowledge, and was with some difficulty induced to accept the crown. Michael sustained a severe defeat at a place called Hadea, and, despairing of success, proposed to Isaac to share with him the imperial power, an offer which the peaceful prince would have accepted but for the interference of Catacalon, who strongly opposed any amicable arrangement, on the ground of the well-known faithlessness of Michael. The latter was soon after compelled to resign, and assume the monastic habit. In his struggle with Michael, Isaac was cordially assisted by his excellent brother John. He rewarded the leaders of the conspiracy with great liberality, but in a manner that showed his good sense, for he sent most of them into the provinces, and conferred such honours and offices upon them as entailed only a moderate degree of power and influence. He divided the important functions of the curiales between Catacalon and his brother John. The treasury being exhausted, he introduced a system of great economy into all the branches of the administration, showing, by his own example, how his subjects ought to act under such circumstances. In levying new taxes, however, he called upon the clergy also to contribute their share, but they refused to comply with his orders; and the patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius, had the impudence to say to the emperor: "I have given you the crown, and I know how to take it from you again." Banishment was the reward for this insubordination, and death prevented the priest from taking vengeance by kindling a rebellion. In several cases Isaac acted rather haughtily, and he sometimes found difficulty in reconciling through his wisdom, those whom he had wounded through his pride. In 1059 he marched against the Hungarians, who had crossed the Danube, and compelled them to sue for peace. This was the only occasion during his reign where he could show that he was the best tactician among the Greeks. The empire recovered visibly under his administration from so many calamities, and great was the grief of the people when, after his return from the Hungarian campaign, he was suddenly attacked by a violent fever, which brought him to the verge of the tomb. Feeling his death approaching, he called for his brother and offered him the crown, but John having declined it, he appointed Constantine Ducas, a renowned general, his future successor. Isaac, however, recovered from his illness, but, to the utmost grief and astonishment of his brother and the people, resigned the crown into the hands of Constantine Ducas, and retired to a convent (December, 1059). His wife and daughter followed his example, and took the veil. Isaac survived his abdication about two years, living in the strictest performance of the duties of a monk, and devoting his leisure hours to learned occupations. The emperor Constantine XI. often visited him in his cell, and consulted him on important affairs; and among the people he was in the odour of sanctity. His death probably took place in 1061. He left no male issue. Homer was the favourite author of Isaac, who wrote Scholia to the Iliad, which are extant in several libraries, but are still unpublished. There are also extant in manuscript Περὶ τῶν κατὰ Λαοφύλων ὑπὸ τοῦ Οὐρῶν, and Χαρακτηρισματα, being characteristics of the leaders of the Greeks and Trojans mentioned in the Iliad. His other works are lost. (Cedren. p. 797, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 265, &c.; Scylitzes, p. 807, &c.; Glycas, p. 322, &c.; Joel, p. 184, &c. in the Paris editions; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 558.) [W. P.]

ISAACUS II., ANGELLUS (Ἰσαάκιος ὁ Ἀγγελός), emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 1185—1195), was the eldest son of Andronicus Angelus, and was born in the middle half of the 12th century. Belonging to one of the great Byzantine families and descended, through his grandmother Theodora, from the imperial family of the Comneni, he held several offices of importance in the reign of the emperor Manuel Comnenus; but his name remained obscure, and the emperor Andronicus Comnenus, the exterminator of the Greek nobility, despised to kill such a harmless being, although he put his father Andronicus Angelus to death. The weak-minded Isaac became, nevertheless, the cause of the deposition and miserable end of Andronicus Comnenus. In the summer of 1185 the emperor retired for a short time to one of his country seats in Asia, appointing one Hagiochristophorites his lieutenant in Constantinople during his absence. This officer gave orders to put Isaac to death, because his name began with an I; and there was a silly belief among the people that Andronicus would be ruined by somebody whose name began with an I. Isaac was fortunately apprized of the bloody design of the emperor's lieutenant, but had barely time to escape from his palace, and to avail himself of the sanctuary of the church of St. Sophia. A dense crowd soon filled the church: Isaac implored their assistance; and the numerous enemies of Andronicus, exerting themselves to kindle a revolt in favour of any one persecuted by that cruel emperor, the fickle people of Constantinople suddenly took up arms, killed the officers despatched by Hagiochristophorites to put Isaac to death, and proclaimed the latter emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 1185). Andronicus hastened to his capital, but it was too late: he was seized by the mob, and, by order, or at least with the consent of Isaac, perished in the miserable manner which is related in his life. [ANDRONICUS I.]

No sooner was Isaac firmly established on the throne than he began a life which Gibbon thus describes:—"He slept on the throne, and was awakened only by the sound of pleasure: his vacant hours were amused by comedians and buffoons; and even to these buffoons the emperor was an object of contempt: his feasts and buildings exceeded the examples of royal luxury, the number of his eunuchs and domestics amounted to twenty thousand, and the daily sum of four thousand pounds of silver would swell to four millions sterling the annual expense of his household and table. His poverty was relieved by oppression, and the public discontent was inflamed by equal abuses in the collection and the application of the revenue." Shortly after his accession Isaac was involved in a dreadful war with the Bulgarians, which arose under the following circumstances:—After the conquest by Basil II. of the powerful Bulgarian kingdom, which extended over the greater part of the Thracian peninsula, the Bulgarians continued to live under the sway of the Byzantine emperors, till Peter and Asan, two brothers, who were descended from the ancient kings of Bulgaria, took up arms in order to deliver their country from the insupportable oppression and rapacity of Isaac. They were successful—they penetrated as far as Thessalonica—they defeated and made prisoner Isaac Sebastocrator, the Greek generalissimo, in a pitched battle; and at last Asan was acknowledged as king of Bulgaria Nigra, or that country which is still called Bulgaria. In this war the Bulgarians were assisted by the Blachi or Moro-Vlachi, the descendants of ancient Roman colonists in the mountainous parts of Thessaly and Macedonia, who were likewise driven to despair by the rapacious emperor, and who finally left their homes and emigrated into the countries beyond the Danube (Dacia), where, mixed with Slavonian tribes, they continued to live, and still live, as Wallachians. However, some of them remained in their native mountains in Thessaly and Macedonia: they were the ancestors of the present Kutzo-Wallachians. In a second war with the Bulgarians, the Greek arms obtained a decisive victory (1193); but Isaac was, nevertheless, obliged to recognise the successor of Asan, Joannicus or Joannes. Isaac was more successful against William II., the Good, who was compelled, in 1187, to give up the conquests which he had made two years previously in Epeirus, Thessaly, and Macedonia. In 1189 the emperor Frederic I. of Germany appeared on the northern frontier of the Byzantine empire, with an army of 150,000 men, on his way to the Holy Land. In spite of the menaces of Isaac, the emperor quietly advanced, took up his winter-quarters at Adrianople, and crossed the Bosphorus, declining both to help the Bulgarians against the Greeks, and the Greeks against the Bulgarians.

Isaac was so terrified by the emperor's march through his dominions, and the success of the other crusaders in Syria and Palestine, that he sent an ambassador to Saladin offering him his alliance against the Latins, which, however, Saladin declined, because Isaac demanded the restitution of the holy sepulchre. Besides Bulgaria, Isaac lost the island of Cyprus, where Alexis Comnenus had made himself independent, but was deprived of his conquest by Richard Coeur de Lion of England (1191), who in 1192 ceded it to king Guido of Jerusalem; and Cyprus was never again united to the Byzantine empire. Isaac, continuing to make himself despised and hated by the Greeks, a rebellion broke out at Constantinople while he was hunting in the mountains of Thrace; and Alexis, the younger brother of Isaac, was raised to the throne. On this news, Isaac fled without daring to implore the assistance of any one. Arrived at Stagira in Macedonia, he was arrested and brought before Alexis, who ordered his eyes to be put out, and confined him in a prison (1195). [ALEXIS III.] Alexis, the son of Isaac, fortunately escaped, fled to Italy, and succeeded in rousing the Latin princes to a war against Alexis III., which resulted in the capture of Constantinople in 1203, and the restoration of the blind Isaac, who reigned, together with his son [ALEXIS IV.], till the following year, 1204, when Alexis IV. was dethroned and killed by Alexis Ducas Murzuphlus [ALEXIS V.], who usurped the throne, and kept it during two months, when he, in his turn, was deposed by the Latins. Murzuphlus spared the life of Isaac, who, however, did not long survive the melancholy fate of his youthful and spirited son. (Nicetas, Isaacus Angelus; Isaacus et Alexis filius; the Latin authorities quoted under Alexis III., IV., V.) [W. P.] ISAACUS, literary. 1. Of ANTIOCH. [See No. 5.]

2. ARGYRUS. [ARGYRUS.]

3. Of ARMENIA, catholicus or patriarch of Armenia Magna, lived in the middle of the twelfth century, and wrote Orationes Ineectives II. adversus Armenos, published in Greek and Latin, and with notes in Combefisius, Auchuar. Nov. Bibl. vol. ii. p. 317, &c., and by Galland. Bibl. Patr. vol. xiv. p. 411, &c. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 227; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 123, &c.)

4. Of NINIVEH. [See No. 6.]

5. Surnamed SYRUS, because he was a native of Syria, was first monk and afterwards priest at Antioch, and died about A. D. 456. He wrote in Syriac, and perhaps also in Greek, different works and treatises on theological matters, several of them to oppose the writers of the Nestorians and Eutychians. His principal work is De Contentu Mundi, de Operatione Corporali et sui Abiectione Liber, published in the second edition of the Orthodoxographi, Basel, 1569; in the Bibl. Patr. Colon. vol. vi.; in the B. P. Paris, vol. v.; in the B. P. Novissima Lugdun. vol. xi.; and in Galland. Bibl. Patr. vol. xii. In all these collections it is printed in Greek, with a Latin translation, but the Greek text also seems to be a translation from the Syriac. It is very doubtful whether this work was written by Isaac, the subject of this notice, or by another Isaac, the subject of the following article. Neither Trithemius nor Gennadius (De Script. Ecclæ.) attribute the work to our Isaac. There is more reason to believe that he wrote "De Cogitationibus," the Greek text of which, with a Latin translation, was published by Petrus Possinus, in his Ascetica. Several other productions of Isaac are extant in MS. in the library of the Vatican and in other libraries. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 434—435; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 214, &c.)

6. Surnamed SYRUS, lived in the middle of the sixth century, and was bishop of Niniveh, but abdicated and retired to a convent, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot. After having lived several years in that convent he went to Italy and died near Spoleto. It is probable that he is the author of the work De Contentu Mundi, which is mentioned in the preceding article. He also wrote 87 Sermones Ascetici, which some attribute to the preceding Isaac, and which are extant in MS. in Greek, in the imperial library at Vienna. Some Homilies of this Isaac are extant in MS. in the Bodleian and other libraries. It is probable that Isaac wrote originally in Syriac. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 519—520; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 215, &c.)

7. TZETZES. [TZETZES.] [W. P.]

ISAEUS (Ἰσαῖος). I. One of the ten Attic orators, whose orations were contained in the Alexandrian canon. The time of his birth and death is unknown, but all accounts agree in the statement that he flourished (ἡμαρτα) during the period between the Peloponnesian war and the accession of Philip of Macedonia, so that he lived between B. C. 420 and 348. (Dionys. Isaeus, 1; Plat. Vit. X. Orat. p. 839; Anonym. γένος Ἰσαίων.) He was a son of Diagoras, and was born at Chalcis or, as some say, at Athens, probably only because he came to Athens at an early age, and spent the greater part of his life there. He was instructed in oratory by Lysias and Isocrates (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 263; Dionys. Plut. II. cc.) He was afterwards engaged in writing judicial orations for others, and established a rhetorical school at Athens, in which Demosthenes is said to have been his pupil. Suidas states that Isaeus instructed him gratis, whereas Plutarch relates that he received 10,000 drachmas (comp. Plut. de Glor. Ath. p. 350, c.; Phot. l. c.); and it is further said that Isaeus composed for Demosthenes the speeches against his guardians, or at least assisted him in the composition. All particulars about his life are unknown, and were so even in the time of Dionysius, since Hermippus, who had written an account of the disciples of Isocrates, did not mention Isaeus at all.

In antiquity there were sixty-four orations which bore the name of Isaeus, but fifty only were recognised as genuine by the ancient critics. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. l. c.) Of these only eleven have come down to us; but we possess fragments and the titles of 56 speeches ascribed to him. The eleven extant are all on subjects connected with disputed inheritances; and Isaeus appears to have been particularly well acquainted with the law relating to inheritance. (Περὶ κληρονομ.) Ten of these orations had been known ever since the revival of letters, and were printed in the collections of Greek orators; but the eleventh, Περὶ τοῦ Μενεκλέους κληρονομ. was first published in 1785, from a Florentine MS., by Th. Thyrsitt, London, 1785, 8vo.; and afterwards in the Götting. Biblioth. für alte Lit. und Kunst for 1788, part iii., and by J. C. Orelli, Zürich, 1814, 8vo. In 1815 A. Mai discovered the greater half of the oration of Isaeus, Περὶ τοῦ Κλεωνόμου κληρονομ. which he published at Milan, 1815, fol., and reprinted in his Classic. Auctor. e Cod. Vatican. vol. iv. p. 280, &c. (Rome, 1831.) Isæus also wrote on rhetorical subjects, such as a work entitled Ἰδία τέχνη, which, however, is lost. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 839; Dionys. Epist. ad Ammon. i. 2.) Although his orations were placed fifth in the Alexandrian canon, still we do not hear of any of the grammarians having written commentaries upon them, except Didymus of Alexandria. (Harpocrat. s. v. γαμήλια, πανδασία.) But we still possess the criticism upon Isæus written by Dionysius of Halicarnassus; and by a comparison of the orations still extant with the opinions of Dionysius, we come to the following conclusion. The oratory of Isæus resembles in many points that of his teacher, Lysias: the style of both is pure, clear, and concise; but while Lysias is at the same time simple and graceful, Isæus evidently strives to attain a higher degree of polish and refinement, without, however, in the least injuring the powerful and impressive character of his oratory. The same spirit is visible in the manner in which he handles his subjects, especially in their skillful division, and in the artful manner in which he interweaves his arguments with various parts of the exposition, whereby his orations become like a painting in which light and shade are distributed with a distinct view to produce certain effects. It was mainly owing to this mode of management that he was envied and censured by his contemporaries, as if he had tried to deceive and misguide his hearers. He was one of the first who turned their attention to a scientific cultivation of political oratory; but excellence in this department of the art was not attained till the time of Demosthenes.

The orations of Isæus are contained in the collections of the Greek orators, published by Aldus, Stephens, Miniati, Reiske, Duca, Bekker, and Baier and Sauppe. A separate edition, with Reiske's and Taylor's notes, appeared at Leipzig, 1773, 8vo., and another by G. H. Schäfer, Leipzig, 1822, 8vo. The best separate edition is that by G. F. Schömann, with critical notes and a good commentary, Greifswald, 1831, 8vo. There is an English translation of the orations of Isæus, by Sir William Jones (London, 1794, 4to.), with prefatory discourse, notes critical and historical, and a commentary. (Comp. Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 51, and Beilage, v. p. 293, &c.; J. A. Liebmann, De Isæi Vita et Scriptis, Halle, 1831, 4to.)

2. A sophist and rhetorician, was a native of Aesymia. In his youth he gave himself up to sensual pleasures and debauchery; but after attaining the age of manhood, he changed his mode of life, and became a person of very respectable and sober habits. He must have lived for some time at Rome in the life of Pliny the younger, who speaks of him (Epist. ii. 3; comp. Juvenal, iii. 74, with the Scholiast) in terms of the highest praise. He seems to have enjoyed a very great reputation as a declaimer, and to have been particularly strong in extempore speaking. None of his productions have come down to us. Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i. 20) has dedicated a whole chapter to his biography, but relates only some anecdotes of him, and adds a few remarks on the character of his orations. (Comp. Anonym. Isagoræ yévos, p. 261, in Westermann's Falsum Script. Græci Minor.) [L. S.]

ISA'GORAS (Ἰσαγόρας), an Athenian, son of Timæder. Herodotus says that his family was one of note: of its remote origin he professes himself ignorant, but adds that his kinsmen sacrificed to Carian Zeus. When Cleomenes I. of Sparta came to Athens, in B. C. 510, to drive out Hippias, he formed a connection of friendship and hospitality with Isagoras, who was suspected of conniving at an intrigue between his wife and the Spartan king. Not long after this we find Isagoras, the leader of the oligarchical party at Athens, in opposition to Cleisthenes, and, when he found the latter too strong for him, he applied to Cleomenes for aid. The attempt made by the Spartans in consequence to establish oligarchy at Athens was defeated; and when Cleomenes, eager for revenge, again invaded Attica, with the view of placing the chief power in the hands of Isagoras, his enterprise again came to nothing, through the defection of the Corinthians and Demaratus. (Herod. v. 66, 70—72, 74, 75; Plut. de Herod. Malign. 23; Paus. iii. 4, vi. 8.) [CLEISTHENES; CLEOMENES; DEMARATUS.] [E. E.]

ISANDER (Ἰσάνδρος), a son of Bellerophon, killed by Ares in the fight with the Solymi. (Hom. Il. vi. 197; Strab. xii. p. 573, xiii. p. 630.) [L. S.]

ISAU'RICUS, a surname of P. Servilius Vatia, father and son. [VATIA.]

ISCANUS, JOSEPHUS, the author of a Latin poem on the Trojan war, in six books, in hexameter metre. This poem has sometimes been ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, for which reason it is mentioned here, but its author was a native of England, and lived in the twelfth century of our era. It is printed at the end of the edition of Dictys Cretensis, published at Amsterdam, in 1702.

ISCHA'GORAS (Ἰσχαγόρας), commanded the reinforcements sent by Sparta in the ninth year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 423, to join Brasidas in Chalcidice. Perdicas, as the price of his new treaty with Athens, prevented, by means of his influence in Thessaly, the passage of the troops. Ischagoras himself, with some others, made their way to Brasidas, but how long he staid is doubtful; in B. C. 421 we find him sent again from Sparta to the same district, to urge Clearidas to give up Amphipolis, according to the treaty, into the hands of the Athenians. (Thuc. iv. 133, v. 21.) [A. H. C.]

ISCHANDER (Ἰσχανδρος), an obscure Athenian tragic poet, in whose plays Aeschines is said to have acted. (AESCHINES, p. 37, a; Vit. Aesch.; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἰσχανδρος; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. p. 284.) [P. S.]

ISCHENUS (Ἰσχερος), also called Taraxippus, from the horses becoming shy on his tomb, is said to have allowed himself to be sacrificed for the purpose of averting a plague, for which reason sacrifices were offered to him at the Olympian games. (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 43; TARAXIPPUS.) [L. S.]

ISCHOLA'US or ISCHOLAS (Ἰσχόλαος, Ἰσχόλας), a Spartan, who, when the Peloponnesus was invaded by the Thebans and their allies in B. C. 369, was stationed at the village of Ium or Oium, in the district of Sciritia, with a body of νεοπαγεῖς and about 400 Tegean exiles. By occupying the pass of the Sciritia, he might, according to Xenophon, have succeeded in repelling the Arcadians, by whom the invasion was made in that quarter: but he chose rather to make his stand in the village, where he was surrounded and slain, with almost all his men. Diodorus, who lauds his valour somewhat rhetorically, and compares him with Leonidas at Thermopylae, tells us that, when he saw that the number of the Arcadians rendered resistance hopeless, he desisted to leave his post, but sent away the young soldiers of his force to Sparta to serve her in her impending danger, while he himself and the older men remained behind, and died fighting bravely. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5. §§ 24—26; Diod. xv. 64; comp. Plut. Pelop. 24, Ages. 31.) This is probably the same Ischolaus who is mentioned by Polyænus (ii. 22). [E. E.]

ISCHOMACHUS (Ἰσχομάχος), an Athenian, whose fortune, according to Lyaias, was supposed during his life to amount to more than seventy talents (above 17,000*l.*), but on his death he was found to have left less than twenty, i. e. under 5,000*l.* (Lys. pro Arist. Bon. p. 156.) It appears, however, that he squandered his money on flatterers and parasites. (Heracl. Pont. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 537, c.) The union of meanness and prodigality is so common as to furnish no reason against supposing this Ischomachus to have been the same person whose stingy and grasping character we find attacked by Cratinus (ap. Athen. i. p. 8, a.). We can, however, hardly identify him with the Ischomachus whom Xenophon introduces (Oecon. 6, &c.) as holding a most edifying conversation with his newly-married wife on the subject of domestic economy, of which he is represented as a bright example. Whether either of these was the Ischomachus whose daughter was married to the notorious CALLIAS, is again a doubtful point. (Andoc. De Myst. p. 16.) The Ischomachus mentioned in the Hymeneus of Araros (ap. Athen. p. 237, a.) was perhaps, says Meineke (Fragm. Com. Græc. vol. ii. p. 176), a grandson of the man who is satirised by Cratinus. But the name was possibly used by Araros as the representative of a class, and in that case is no other than the mean feeder of parasites in the older poet. [E. E.]

ISCHYS (Ἰσχυς), a son of Elatus, and the beloved of Coronis at the time when she was with child (Asclepius) by Apollo. The god wishing to punish her faithlessness, caused Artemis to kill her, together with Ischys. [CORONIS.] [L. S.]

I'ŒAS (Ἰσέας), tyrant of Ceryneia in Achaia, at the period of the first rise of the Achaean league. Alarmed at the rapid progress of the confederacy—the four cities of Dyme, Patrae, Tritaea, and Pharae, which formed the original league, having been already joined by Aegium and Bura—he judged it prudent to provide for his personal safety by voluntarily abdicating the sovereign power, whereupon Ceryneia immediately joined the Achæans. (Polyb. ii. 41.) [E. H. B.]

ISIDO'RUS (Ἰσιδωρος). 1. Of AEGAE, an epigrammatic poet, five of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 473; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 177.) Nothing further is known of him; but, from the style of his epigrams, Brunck conjectured that he was not a very late writer, and that he might perhaps be considered as a contemporary of Antiphilus, who flourished about the time of Nero. (Brunck, Lectio. p. 228; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 905.)

2. A son of BARILIDES, the Gnostic heretic, wrote a work, περὶ προφητειῶν ψυχῆς, which only exists in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 495.)

3. Of CHARAX, a geographical writer, whose τῆς Παρθίας περιήγησις is quoted by Athenæus (iii. p. 93, d.), and whose ἑρταβουλὴ Παρθικῶν (probably a part of the above work) are printed among the works of the minor geographers in the collections of Höschel (1600), Hudson (1703), and Miller (Supplément aux dernières éditions des petits Géographes, Paris, 1839; comp. Letronne, Fragmens des Poèmes Géogr. de Scymnus, Paris, 1840.) That his geographical work embraced not only Parthia, but probably the whole of the then known world, may be inferred from several quotations from Isidorus in Pliny. (H. N. ii. 108, a. 112; iv. 4. s. 5; 22, s. 37; v. 6, et alibi.) He seems to have lived under the early Roman emperors. A passage in his ερταβουλὴ, in which he refers to the flight of Tiridates (p. 4; comp. Tac. Annal. vi. 44), seems to fix his time in or after the reign of Tiberius. He is quoted, however, by Lucian (Macrod. 15), in a way which seems at first sight to imply that he lived in the time of Ptolemy I., that is, before the existence of the Parthian empire which he describes. There is no occasion, however, to assume another Isidore of Charax; we would rather assume either that the Artaxerxes of whom Lucian speaks was one of the Arsacidae, or that the words ἐπὶ τῶν παρτέπων are not to be taken literally, or that here, as in many other instances, Lucian's incidental chronology is worth nothing. (Dodwell, Dissert. de Isidoro Characeno; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 612—614.)

4. A CYNIC philosopher, who had the courage to utter a sarcasm against Nero in public. (Sueton. Ner. 39.)

5. Of GAZA, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, the friend of Proclus and Marius, whom he succeeded as chief of the school. He again retired, however, into private life. His wife, according to Suidas (s. v. Ἰστωρία), was Hypatia, herself also celebrated in the history of philosophy; but it seems doubtful whether Suidas has not committed an anachronism in this statement. (Wernsdorf, Dissert. iv. de Hypatia, philosopha Alexandrina; HYPATIA.) His mother, Theodote, was also one of a family of philosophers, being the sister of Aegyptus, the friend of Hermeias. (Suid. s. v. Ἐγυπίας.) The life of Isidorus, by Damascius, is quoted by Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 242; see also Suid. s. v. Ἰσιδωρος, Ἰσιδώρος, Μάριος, Ζαπάρσιος.

6. Of PELUSIUM, a Christian exegetical writer, at the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. He was a native of Alexandria (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 228, p. 247. s. 3, ed. Bekker), but he spent his life in a monastery near Pelusium, of which he was the abbot, and where he practised the most severe asceticism. He was a great admirer of Chrysostom, in defending whom he vehemently attacked the patriarchs Theophilus and Cyril of Alexandria. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 232, p. 291, a. 42—b. 3.) He died about a. c. 450. A book which he wrote against the Gentiles is lost, but a large number of his letters are still extant. They are almost all expositions of Scripture, and are valuable for the piety and learning which they display. They amount to the number of 2013, and it is not improbable that these are only a part of his letters, written for the benefit of some particular monastery. On the other hand, many of them are believed to be spurious. They are divided into five books, of which the first three were printed, with the Latin translation and notes of J. de Billy, at Paris, 1585, fol.; reprinted, with the addition of the fourth book, by Conrad Rittershausen, Heidelberg, 1605, fol.; the fifth book was first published from a MS. in the Vatican, by the Jesuit Andreas Schott, Antwerp, 1623, 8vo.; reprinted with Latin version and notes, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1629, fol.; finally, these editions were combined into a complete one, Paris, 1638, fol. (Schröckh, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, vol. xvii. pp. 520—529; Hermann, Dissert. de Isidoro Pseuodota, ejusque epistolis, Götting. 1737, 4to.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. pp. 480—494.)

7. Of PERGAMUS, a rhetorician, of whom nothing more is known than the mention of him by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 34), and a single quotation from him by Rutilius Lupus. (De Fig. Sent. et Eloc. ii. 16.)

8. SCHOLASTICUS, of the town of Bolbotine, in the Delta of Egypt, the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 474; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. ii. p. 179; vol. xii. p. 905.)

9. Metropolitan of THESSALONICA, about A. D. 1401, was the author of four homilies on the Virgin Mary, published in Latin, with notes, by Hippolytus Maraccius, Rome, 1651, 8vo.; and of other homilies, commentaries, and epistles, which exist in MS. in various libraries. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 498.) [P. S.]

ISIDORUS. We read of three Spanish ecclesiastics who bore this name, and who must be carefully distinguished from each other—Isidorus, bishop of Cordova (Cordubensis), who is said to have flourished about the end of the fourth century, but whose very existence has been called in question by Nicolas Antonio in the Bibliotheca Hispana vetus; Isidorus, bishop of Sevilla (Hispalensis), who flourished at the beginning of the seventh century; and, finally, Isidorus, bishop of Badajoz (Paccensis), who flourished in the middle of the eighth century. Of these by far the most remarkable was ISIDORUS HISPALENSIS, whose merits are but imperfectly acknowledged when he is pronounced to have been the most eloquent speaker, the most profound scholar, and the most able prelate of the barbarous age and country to which he belonged. Descended from an honourable Gothic stock, his father, Severianus, was governor, and his elder brother, Fulgentius, bishop of Cartagena, while another brother, Leander, also his senior, presided over the see of Sevilla. In the palace of the latter Isidorus passed his youth devoted to study and to religious exercises, labouring at the same time with seal and success in the conversion of the Arian Visigoths. Upon the death of Leander, in A. D. 600 or 601, he succeeded to his episcopal charge. One of his first acts was to establish a college for the education of youth; soon after he repaired to Rome for the purpose of holding personal communication with the great Gregory, in 616 (or 617), he presided at the second council of Sevilla, and in December, A. D. 633, at the great council of Toledo, manifesting at all times the most eager anxiety for the extension of the orthodox faith, and for the maintenance of order and strict discipline among the clergy. He died in the church of St. Vincentius on the 4th of April, A. D. 636. The esteem in which he was held by his contemporaries and immediate successors is sufficiently attested by the tribute to his memory in the Acts of the eighth council of Toledo, held fourteen years after his death: "Nostrī seculi doctor egregius, ecclesiæ Catholicæ novissimum decus, præcedentibus ætate postremus, doctrinæ comparatione non infimus, et, quod majus est, in sæculorum fine doctissimus atque cum reverentia nominandus, ISIDORUS."

His numerous works display an extent of knowledge which, although at once superficial and inaccurate, must have caused them to be regarded as absolutely marvellous at the period when they were given to the world, exhibiting as they do a certain degree of familiarity with almost every branch of learning known even by name in those times. The fruits of this unremitting industry are even in the present day not altogether destitute of value, since considerable portions of the facts are derived from sources no longer accessible, although it may be doubted whether the ancient authorities were consulted directly or only through the medium of previous compilations drawn up during the fifth and sixth centuries. In giving a catalogue of the works of Isidorus, without attempting any regular or formal classification, which is scarcely practicable, we shall endeavour to rank those together which approach most nearly in the nature of their subjects, assigning the first place to the most important of all, namely,—

1. Originum a Etymologiarum Libri XX. An Encyclopædia of Arts and Sciences belonging to the same class with the medley of Martianus Capella [CAPPELLA], but far superior to it both in matter and manner. From this book we can form a very distinct idea of the state of mental culture at the epoch of its publication, when the study of the ancient authors was almost entirely superseded by meagre abridgments and confused condensations, and it is of high importance in so far as the history of education and literature during the middle ages is concerned, since it was one of the very few manuals by means of which some acquaintance with the Greek and Roman classics was kept alive during six hundred years. Prefixed is a correspondence between Isidorus and his pupil Braulio, bishop of Saragossa, to whom we are indebted for a "Prænotatio librorum Isidori," and who, together with another pupil, Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, revised the production now before us. The first book treats of grammar, with four chapters at the end, upon the nature, advantages, and different species of history; the second, of rhetoric and dialectics; the third, of the four great departments of mathematical science, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy; the fourth, of medicine; the fifth, of law, to which is subjoined a dissertation on the different measures of time, together with a short chronicle, extending from the creation of the world to the reign of Heraclius; the sixth, of the canon of Scripture, of libraries, of books in general, book-binding, and writing materials, and of the determination of Easter, concluding with an explanation of sundry sacred words and technicalities; the seventh, of God, of angels, and of the various orders of holy men from patriarchs, prophets, and apostles down to monks; the eighth, of the Jews and their sects, of the Christian church and its heresies, of the gods, soothsayers, priests, and magicians of the pagans; the ninth of languages, of the names of nations, of various political combinations, of the titles of magistrates and military authorities; and of the various grades of relationship; the tenth, of topics purely etymological, expounding the derivation of a number of words arranged in alphabetical order; the eleventh, of man and of monsters; the twelfth, of domestic animals, and of beasts, birds, insects, reptiles, and fishes in general; the thirteenth and fourteenth, of geography, mathematical, physical, and political, including atmospheric phenomena; the fifteenth, of the origin of the principal states and kingdoms in the world, of edifices both public and private, of land-surveying and of roads; the sixteenth, of the constitution of soils, of mineralogy, of weights and measures; the seventeenth, of agriculture; the eighteenth of war, and of games and sports of every description; the nineteenth, of ships and their equipments, of architecture, of clothing and the textile fabrics; the twentieth, of food, of domestic utensils and furniture, of carriages, of harness, and of rustic implements.

The earliest edition of the Origines which bears a date is that published at Vienna by Gintherus Zainer of Reutlingen, fol. 1472, but there are three editions in Gothic characters without date and without name of place or printer, all of which are supposed by bibliographers to be older than the first mentioned. One, if not two, of these is believed to have proceeded from the press of Ulric Zell at Cologne, another from that of Mantelin at Straasbourg, while, in addition to the above, at least six editions more belong to the fifteenth century, a sure evidence of the popularity of the work. The most accurate is that which forms the third volume of the "Corpus Grammaticorum Veterum" of Lindemann, Lips. 4to. 1833. The second book was printed separately by Pithou in his "Antiqui Rhetores Latini." Paris, 4to. 1599, p. 356.

The two following works belong to grammar: II. De Differentiis s. De Proprietate Verborum, in two parts, of which the first is less purely grammatical than the remainder, since it treats chiefly of the precise meaning of various theological terms, many of which involve abstruse questions of doctrine. The second part is borrowed in great measure from Agroetius and other old writers upon the same subject. This treatise does not appear to have been ever printed in a separate form, but will be found in editions of the collected works.

III. Liber Glossarum Latinarum, a collection from various glossaries circulated under the name of Isidorus. It was published along with the Græco-Latin glosses of Philoxenus and others, by Vulcanius, Lug. Bat. fol. 1600, and appears in its best form at the end of the third edition of the Lexicon Philologicum of Martinus, which was published under the superintendence of Grævius, Traj. ad Rhen. 1698.

IV. De Rerum Natura, s. De Mundo, addressed to king Sisebutus. It contains in forty-seven short chapters discussions on sundry questions connected with astronomy, meteorology and physical geography; such as the career of the sun and of the moon, eclipses, falling stars, clouds, rain, winds, prognostics of the weather, earthquakes, the ocean, the Nile, mount Aetna, and the great divisions of the earth. It will be found in the collected works.

The four following works belong to history:—
V. Chronicon. Chronological tables from the creation of the world to the fifth year of the emperor Heraclius, that is, A. D. 627. It was edited with much care by Garcia de Loaisa, Taurin. 4to. 1593, whose text has been followed by Roncalli in his

Vell. Lat. Script. Chron. p. ii. p. 419, and in the Madrid edition of the collected works.

VI. Historia Gothorum, a short account of the Goths from their first collisions with the Romans in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus down to the death of Sisebutus.

VII. Historia Vandalorum, from the time of their entrance into Spain under Gunderic until their final destruction upon the fall of Gelimer, embracing a period of one hundred and twenty-three years and seven months, which is comprehended within the limits of a single folio page.

VIII. Historia Suevorum, equally brief, from their entrance into Spain under Hermeric until their final destruction, one hundred and twenty-six years afterwards. These three tracts will be found in their best form in the edition of the Chronicon by Garcia de Loaisa named above, in the compilations of Labbé and Florez, and in the Madrid edition of the collected works.

The following works belong to poetry:—

IX. Poemata. Among the collected works we find a sacred song in trochaic tetrameters cat., entitled Lamentum Poenitentiae pro Indulgentia Proctorum, and in the Acta Sanctorum under the fifth of February, two hymns in praise of St. Agatha. Some assign to Isidorus an astronomical poem in heroic verse more commonly ascribed to Fulgentius, the fragments of which are included in the collection of Pithou published at Paris in 1590.

The rest of the works of Isidorus are all of a theological character. Two belong to Sacred Biography.

X. De Vita et Obitu Sanctorum qui Deo pleuerunt. Short sketches of sixty-five holy men belonging to the Old Testament history, and of twenty-two under the new dispensation, from Adam to the Maccabæan brothers, from Zacharias to Titus.

XI. De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis Liber, or simply, De Viris Illustribus, or, as the title sometimes appears at greater length, Isidori Additio ad Libros S. Hieronymi et Gennadii de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, a continuation of the biographical sketches of eminent divines by Hieronymus [HIERONYMUS; GENNADIUS], upon the same plan, commencing in the older editions with Osius, bishop of Cordova, and ending with Maximes, bishop of Saragossa, including thirty-three individuals; but in the Madrid editions of the collected works we find several new lives prefixed, from a MS. not before collated, reaching from Sixtus, bishop of Rome, down to Marcellinus.

The two following works belong to formal theology:—

XII. De Officiis Ecclesiasticis Libri II., with a prefatory epistle addressed to Fulgentius. The first book, which bears the separate title De Origine Officiorum, is devoted to the rites, ceremonies, liturgies, and festivals of the church, with an examination of the authority upon which each is founded, whether Scripture, apostolical tradition, or uninterrupted and invariable practice; the second book, with the title De Origine Ministeriorum, treats in like manner of the different orders among the clergy, and of those persons among the laity, who were more immediately connected with them, such as holy maidens, widows, catechumens, and the like. This piece is of the greatest importance to those who employ themselves in investigating the ritual of the Romish Church. It was published in the Monumenta S. Patrum Orthodoxographia of Gryneus, Colon. fol. 1568, in the Sylogus Script. de Catholice Ecclesie Officiis of Melchior Hittorpin, Rom. fol. 1591, and in the Sylogus Scriptorum de Officiis Ecclesiasticis, Paris, fol. 1610.

XIII. Regula Monachorum, a code of rules in twenty-one sections for the government of the Coenobium Honorianum, founded by Isidorus himself. It is remarkable only from displaying a more gentle spirit than such statute-books usually exhibit. It is included in the Codes Regularum of Holstenius, Rom. 4to. 1661, p. ii. p. 198.

The four following works belong to exegetical theology:—

XIV. Liber Præciorum, or Præcemia in Libros Veteris ac Novi Testamenti, a succinct outline of the contents of each of the books which form the canon of Scripture.

XV. Commentaria in Vetus Testamentum, or, Questiones et Mysticorum Expositiones Sacramentorum in Vetus Testamentum. An exposition of the mystical, typical, and allegorical signification of the principal events recorded in the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Kings, Chronicles, Esdra, and the Maccabees, selected from the writings of various fathers, of whom Origen, Victorinus, Ambrosius, Hieronymus, Cassianus, Augustinus, Fulgentius, and Gregory are specially named in the preface, the object of Isidorus being to render the researches of these wise and learned men accessible to a greater number of readers by presenting them in a compressed and familiar form. Published separately, Haguenaw (Haguenau), 4to. 1529.

XVI. Allegorice quædam Sacre Scripturas. Short allegorical interpretations of many passages in the Old and New Testaments. The spirit of this piece is the same as that of the preceding, but the results are enunciated much more briefly.

XVII. Expositio in Canticum Canticorum Solomonis. The same principles are here applied to prove that Solomon's Song is a shadowing forth of the union of Christ with his church.

In the ten following works we have a mixture of dogmatical, speculative, sentimental, and practical theology, combined so intimately that not one of them can be said to belong to any single department exclusively.

XVIII. Serulentiarum, s. De summo Bono Libri III. A voluminous collection of short essays and dogmatic rules on a great multiplicity of themes connected with speculative, practical, and ritual theology, forming a sort of Manual of Divinity, suited to the wants and taste of that epoch, and possessing the same encyclopædic character in this particular branch of knowledge which the Origines exhibit in relation to a wider field. The whole is little more than a compilation from Augustin and Gregory. Published separately, Lovan. 4to. 1486, Lips. 4to. 1493, Paris, 4to. 1519, 12mo. 1538, Taurin. 4to. 1593, with the notes of Garcia de Loaisa.

XIX. De Nativitate Domini, Passione et Resurrectione, Regno atque Judicio, addressed to his sister, St. Florentia, in sixty-one chapters, with an Epilogue embodying a mass of prophetic passages from the Old Testament which indicate the career and divinity of our Lord.

XX. De Vocatione Gentium, addressed also to St. Florentia, in twenty-six chapters, with a recapitulation pointing out how the prophets had clearly foretold the abrogation of the ceremonial law and the free admission of the Gentiles to all the benefits of the New Covenant.

The two last-named tracts are sometimes conjoined under the title Contra Nequitiam Judæorum, or, Contra Judæos Libri II.; or, De Fide Catholica ac Vetere et Novo Testamento, or, finally, Testimonium de Christo et Ecclesia Liler. They were printed separately, Venet. 4to. 1483, Haguen. 4to. 1529. There is a very curious old German or Frankish translation of a portion of these pieces, apparently as old as the eighth century. This has been carefully published by Holmann Isidori de Nativitate Domini, &c., Carolarub. 8vo., 1836.

XXI. Synonymorum, s. Soliloquiorum Libri II. Not, as the former title might lead us to expect, a grammatical disquisition, but a series of sacred meditations and moral precepts. At the commencement we find the lamentations of an imaginary individual, the representative as it were of awakened sinner, who deplores his lost state amid the vice and misery of this wicked world, and is upon the point of abandoning himself to despair, when Ratio, or Reason, comes forward to comfort him, and in the dialogue which follows proves that he may still hope for pardon, teaches him how he may best avoid the snares of evil, and how he can most fittingly repent of sin so as at length to become pure and holy, and to be able to look forward with confidence to eternal happiness in heaven. The colloquial form is gradually abandoned, and the moral precepts are arranged regularly under different heads, as De Castitate, De Oratione, De Parsimonia, De Humilitate, and the like. The term synonyma seems to be derived from the circumstance that the same ideas are repeated again and again under different shapes and in different words. Published separately, Antv. 4to., 1488.

XXII. De Contemptu Mundi Libellus. A sort of continuation of the foregoing, since here also we have a dialogue between an imaginary personage and Ratio, in which the latter descants upon a succession of religious and moral themes. Published separately, Venet. 8vo., 1523.

XXIII. De Conflictu Vitiæ et Virtutis, erroneously ascribed by some to Leo I., by others to Augustin, by others to Ambrose. It bears a strong resemblance in its contents to the foregoing.

XXIV. Echortatio ad Poenitentiam cum Consolatione ad Animam de Salute desperantem, in which the mercy of God is placed in opposition to the overwhelming dread of future punishment. It is a mere repetition of certain portions of the Synonyma.

XXV. Norma Vivendi, a collection of apophthegms culled from the four works last mentioned.

XXVI. Oratio de Flandis semper Peccatis ad Correctionem Vilas.

XXVII. Oratio contra Invidias Diaboli.

It only remains to notice, in the last place,—

XXVIII. Epistolæ. A considerable number of letters, referring chiefly to questions of doctrine or discipline. Thus there is one addressed to Lulfred, bishop of Cordova, Quodnam Episcopi et ceterorum sit Officium in Ecclesia; another to Massanus, bishop of Merida, Qui sunt reparandi post Lapsum vel qui non; a fragment, belonging perhaps to the last, Quare sit institutum post septem Annos in pristinum Statum Poenitentes redire, and several others, the authenticity of which is very questionable.

It will be seen from the above list, and much more clearly from a perusal of the different productions themselves, that Isidorus not only abridged others, but not unfrequently epitomised himself, and presented the same matter repeatedly with slight modification. The style throughout presents a sad picture of the decay of the Latin language, and even in the Origines, where he appears to make great exertions to copy closely the phraseology of pure models, we meet with a constant recurrence of miserable barbarisms.

The Editio Princeps of the collected works was printed by Michael Sonnius, under the inspection of Margarinus de la Bigne, Paris, fol. 1580, which was followed by the more accurate and complete edition which issued from the royal press at Madrid, fol., 2 vols., 1599, resting chiefly on the MS. of Alvarus Gomez, and enriched with the notes of J. B. Perez, and of the editor, J. Grial. Besides these, editions appeared at Paris, fol., 1601, by Jac. du Breul, at Cologne, fol., 1617, which is a reprint of the preceding, and a second Madrid edition in 1778; but by far the most complete and most useful of all is that of F. Arevali, Rom., 7 vols. 4to., 1797—1803.

ISIDORUS, one of the professors of law to whom the constitutio Omniem, de Conceptione Digestorum was addressed by Justinian in A. D. 533. It is generally supposed that Isidorus was a professor at Berytus, not Constantinople, but there is no express authority for this belief. (Ritter, ad Heinseii Hist. Jur. Rom. § 336.) By Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 41), Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 345), and Hoffmann (Hist. Jur. ii. 2, p. 556) Isidorus is stated to have been one of the jurists employed by Justinian in compiling the Digest, but there is no warrant for this assertion in Const. Tanta, § 9, where the names of the commissioners appointed by Justinian for that purpose are enumerated.

In the "Collectio Constitutionum Graecarum," edited by Ant. Augustinus (8vo. Herdae, 1567, fol. 6, A.) is an extract from Mattheus Blastares, which, as it differs considerably from the text of Blastares given by Beveridge (Synodicon, vol. ii. in Praef. Syntagmatis), we here transcribe:

The work of Isidorus here mentioned was probably a Greek abridgment of the Code, with commentary. Fragments of it are to be found in Schol. Basil. vol. vi. p. 211, 212, 213, 230—234, 251—253. The abridgment seems to have been admitted into the text of the Basilica, while the commentary is appended by way of scholium. (Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i. p. 142.) This is probably the work referred to by the scholiast on Basil. vol. v. p. 356, under the name of τοῦ

Ἰσίδωρου Ἰσίδωρος, for the scholium on that passage relates to cod. 3. tit. 41. In Schol. Basil. vol. vi. p. 219, Isidorus cites a Constitution of Leo. This citation has by some been supposed to point to a Novel of Leo the Philosopher, and accordingly the date of Isidorus has been thrown forward; but Reiz has justly observed (ad Theoph. p. 1237) that Isidorus is referring to a Constitution of Leo the Thracian of A. D. 459, inserted in cod. 8. tit. 54. a. 30.

From Schol. Basil. vol. ii. p. 558, and Schol. Basil. vol. iii. p. 53, Isidorus is proved to have written a commentary on the Digest; and several extracts from this commentary are appended to the Basilica. (Schol. Basil. vol. ii. p. 555, 556, 558, &c. ed. Fabrot., vol. ii. p. 384, 396, 398, 399, 433, ed. Heimbach.) No credit is to be given to Nic. Comnenus Papadopoli, who (Proenot. Myting. p. 403) speaks of an Isidorus antecessor and logotheta dromi, and mentions his Scholia on the Novella of Alexius Comnena. (Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 40.) [J. T. G.]

ISIDORUS, artists. 1. A sculptor, of uncertain time and country, known by his statue of Hercules at Parium, on the Propontia. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 16.) This is according to the common text of Pliny, which is, however, almost certainly corrupt. See HUGGESS, p. 368, b.

Some years ago the base of a statue, inscribed with the name of Isidorus, was dug up in the forum at Cumae. (Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 79.)

2, 3. Of Miletus, the elder and younger, were eminent architects in the reign of Justinian. The elder of them was associated with Anthemius of Tralles, in the rebuilding of the great church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, before A. D. 537. The younger Isidorus rebuilt the dome of St. Sophia, after it had been destroyed by an earthquake, A. D. 554, and made some additions to the interior of the church. (Procop. i. l. 1; Agathias, v. 9; Malalas, p. 81; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 194, n. 4; Kugler, Kunstgeschichte, p. 360, &c.) [P. S.]

ISIGONUS (Ἰσιγόνοϛ), a Greek writer, who, according to Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Nicola), was a native of Nicæa, and, according to Cyrillus (adv. Julian. 3) of Cithium, though it is not improbable that in the latter passage ὁ Κιτιεύς may be only a false reading for ὁ Νικαεύς. The time at which he lived is uncertain, though Gellius (ix. 4) calls him an ancient writer of no small authority. Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 1021) calls him an historian, but the only work he is known to have written bore the title Ἀνιστοα, whence he is regarded as one of the class of writers called παραδοξογράφοι. (Tzet. Chil. vii. 144.) The fact that Pliny (H. N. vii. 2) and Sotion used the work seems to show that Isigonus lived previous to the beginning of the Christian era. The work of Isigonus is lost, and the few fragments of it which have come down to us are collected in Westermann's Παραδοξογράφοι, pp. 162, 163. [L. S.]

ISIGONUS, a Greek statuary, was one of the artists who represented the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls, about A. C. 239. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 24.) [P. S.]

ISIS (Ἰσις), one of the principal Egyptian divinities. The ideas entertained about her and her worship underwent the greatest changes and modifications in antiquity. She is described as the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus. As Osiris, the god of the Nile, taught the people the use of the plough, so Isis invented the cultivation of wheat and barley, which were carried about in the processions at her festival. (Diod. i. 14, 27, v. 69, &c.) She was the goddess of the earth, which the Egyptians called their mother (Diod. i. 12; Serr. ad Aen. viii. 696; Isid. Orig. viii. 11), whence she and Osiris were the only divinities that were worshipped by all the Egyptians. (Herod. ii. 42.) Being married to Osiris, Isis is the land fertilised by the Nile. (Plut. de Is. et Osir. 32.) This simple and primitive notion of the Egyptians was modified at an early period through the influence of the East, with which Egypt came into contact, and at a later time through the influence of the Greeks. Thus Osiris and Isis came gradually to be considered as divinities of the sun and the moon; and while some of the Greeks fabled that the worship of Isis had been introduced into Egypt by Ogyges and his wife Thebe (Schol. ad Aristid. Symb. iii. 128), the Egyptian priests described the principal religious institutions of Greece as derived from Egypt; and after the time of Herodotus, this belief became firmly established in Greece. Hence Isis was identified with Demeter, and Osiris with Dionysus, and the sufferings of Isis were accordingly modified to harmonise with the myths of the unfortunate Demeter. Diodorus, Plutarch, and others, treat the stories about Isis according to the principles of Euhemerus, and represent her, as well as Osiris, as rulers of Egypt: but in these, as well as the mystical accounts of other writers, the original character of Isis may yet be discerned. We cannot enter here into an examination of the development which the worship of Isis underwent in Egypt in the course of centuries, but must confine ourselves to some remarks respecting her worship in Greece, at Rome, and other European parts of the ancient world. Her worship in all parts of Greece is amply attested by express statements of ancient writers and numerous inscriptions. Under the names of Pelagia (the ruler of the sea) and Aegyptia, she had two sanctuaries on the road to Acrocorinthus (Paus. ii. 4. § 7), and others at Megara (i. 41. § 4), Philus (ii. 13. § 7), Tithorea in Phocis (x. 32. § 9), Methana and Troezen (ii. 32. § 6, 34. § 1), Hermione (ii. 34. § 10), and Andros (see the hymn to Isis, lately discovered there, in the Class. Mus. vol. i. p. 34, &c.). In the western parts of Europe this worship of Isis became likewise established, and many places in Sicily, Italy, and Gaul, are known to have been the seats of it. According to Appuleius (Met. xi. p. 262), it was introduced at Rome in the time of Sulla: at a later time her statue was removed from the capitol by a decree of the senate (Tertull. ad Nation. i. 10, Apolog. 6; Arnob. adv. Gent. ii. 73); but the populace and the consuls Piso and Gabinus, in B.C. 58, resisted the decree. A further decree of B.C. 53 forbade the private worship of Isis, and ordered the chapels dedicated to her to be destroyed. Subsequently, when the worship was restored, her sanctuaries were to be found only outside the pomerium. (Dion Cass. xl. 47.) This interference on the part of the government was thought necessary on account of the licentious orgies with which the festivals of the goddess were celebrated. In B.C. 50, the consul, L. Aemilius Paulus himself, was the first to begin the destruction of her temples, as no one else ventured to do so. (Val. Max. i. 3. § 3.) But these decrees do not appear to have quite succeeded in destroying the worship of Isis, for in A.C. 47 a new decree was issued to destroy the temple of Isis and Serapis. By a mistake, the adjoining temple of Bellona was likewise pulled down, and in it were found pots filled with human flesh. (Dion Cass. xlii. 26.) As it had thus become evident that the people were extremely partial to the worship of those foreign divinities, the triumvirs in A.C. 43 courted the popular favour by building a new temple of Isis and Serapis in the third region, and sanctioning their worship. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 15.) It would appear that after this attempts were made to erect sanctuaries of Isis in the city itself, for Augustus forbade her worship in the city, while outside of it there seem to have been several temples, which were subjected to government inspection. (Dion Cass. liii. 2; comp. liv. 6.) The interference of the government was afterwards repeatedly required (Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Tib. 36; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 3. § 4; Hegeaipp. ii. 4); but from the time of Vespasian the worship of Isis and Serapis became firmly established, and remained in a flourishing condition until the general introduction of Christianity. The most important temple of Isis at Rome stood in the Campus Martius, whence she was called Isis Campensis. (Juven. vi. 329; Appul. Met. xi. p. 259.) An Isium Metellinum is mentioned by Trebellius Pollio (Trig. Tyr. 25); and other temples and chapels of Isis occur in many Latin inscriptions. The priests and servants of the goddess wore linen garments (δδδαι), whence she herself is called linigera. (Ov. Ep. ex Pont. i. 1, 51, Amor. ii. 2, 25; comp. Tac. Hist. iii. 74; Martial, xii. 29, 19; Juven. vi. 533.) Those initiated in her mysteries wore in the public processions masks representing the heads of dogs. (Appian, B. C. iv. 47; Suet. Domit. 1.) As a specimen of the manner in which the festival of Isis was celebrated in Greece, the reader may be referred to that of Tithorea, which is described by Pausanias (x. 32), and the naval sacrifice offered to her at Corinth, as described by Appuleius in his Golden Ass. Isis was frequently represented in works of art (Tibull. i. 3, 27; Juven. xii. 28); and in those still extant she usually appears in figure and countenance resembling Hera: she wears a long tunic, and her upper garment is fastened on her breast by a knot: her head is crowned with a lotus flower, and her right hand holds the sistrum. Her son Horus is often represented with her as a fine naked boy, holding the fore-finger on his mouth, with a lotus flower on his head, and a cornucopia in his left hand.

It should be remarked that Tacitus (Germ. 9) speaks of the worship of Isis among the ancient Germans, but he there applies the name Isis only on account of the analogy existing between the German divinity and the Isis of his own countrymen; and the German goddess whom he had in view was probably no other than Hertha. (Comp. c. 39.)

ISMARUS (Ἰσμαρος), a son of Eumolpus, is said to have fled with his father from Aethiopia to Thrace, and from thence to Eleusis. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 4.) There is one other personage of the same name. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; ASTACUS.) [L. S.]

ISMENE (Ἰσμήνη). 1. A daughter of Asopus and Metope, and wife of Argus, by whom she became the mother of Iasus and Io. (Apollod. ii. 1 § 3.)

2. A daughter of Oedipus by Jocaste, or, according to others, by Eurygeneia. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 8; Paus. ix. 5. § 5; Soph. Antig. 1, &c., Oed. Col. 321; Eurip. Phoen. 56.) [L. S.]

ISMENIAS (Ἰσμενίας), a Theban, of the party adverse to Rome and friendly to Macedonia. When he was chosen Boeotarch, a considerable number of the opposite faction were driven into exile, and condemned to death by him in their absence. These men met, at Larissa in Thessaly, the Roman commissioners, who were sent into Greece in B.C. 171, preparatory to the war with Perseus; and on being upbraided with the alliance which Boeotia had made with the Macedonians, they threw the whole blame on Ismenias. Shortly after they appeared before the commissioners at Chalcis; and here Ismenias also presented himself, and proposed that the Boeotian nation should collectively submit to Rome. This proposal, however, did not at all suit Q. Marcius and his colleagues, whose object was to divide the Boeotian towns, and dissolve their confederacy. They therefore treated Ismenias with great contumely; and his enemies being thereby emboldened to attack him, he narrowly escaped death by taking refuge at the Roman tribunal. Meanwhile, the Roman party entirely prevailed at Thebes, and sent an embassy to the Romans at Chalcis, to surrender their city, and to recal the exiles. Ismenias was thrown into prison, and, after some time, was put to death, or (as we may perhaps understand the words of Polybius) committed suicide. (Liv. xlii. 38, 43, 44; Polyb. xvii. 1, 2.) [E. E.]

ISMENIAS (Ἰσμενίας), a painter of Chalcis, who painted the pedigree of the Athenian orator Lycurgus on a tablet, which was deposited in the Erechtheum. (Pseud. Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 843, c.) [P. S.]

ISME'NIUS (Ἰσμενίος). 1. A son of Apollo and Melia, who is said to have given his name to the Boeotian river which was before called Ladon or Cadmus. (Hesych. s. v.; Paus. ix. 10. § 5.)

2. A surname of Apollo at Thebes, who had a temple on the river Ismenus. (Paus. ii. 10. § 4, ix. 27. § 4, ix. 10. §§ 2, 5.) The sanctuary of the god, at which the Daphnephoria was celebrated, bore the name of Ismenium, and was situated outside the city. [L. S.]

ISME'NIUS (Ἰσμενίος), a son of Asopus and Metope, from whom the Boeotian river Ladon was believed to have derived its name of Ismenus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.) The little brooks Dirce and Strophie, in the neighbourhood of Thebes, are therefore called daughters of Ismenus. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 77; comp. Eurip. Bacch. 519; Diod. iv. 72.) According to other traditions, Ismenus was a son of Amphion and Niobe, who when struck by the arrow of Apollo leaped into a river near Thebes, which was called Ismenus, after him. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Plut. de Fluv. 2.) [L. S.]

ISO'CRATES (Ἰσοκράτης). 1. A celebrated Attic orator and rhetorician, was the son of Theodorus, and born at Athens in B.C. 436. Theodorus was a man of considerable wealth, and had a manufacture of flutes or musical instruments, for which the son was often ridiculed by the comic poets of the time; but the father made good use of his property, in procuring for the young Isocrates the best education that could be obtained: the most celebrated sophists are mentioned among his teachers, such as Tisias, Gorgias, Prodicus, and also Socrates and Theramenes. (Dionys. Isocrat. 1; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 836; Suidas, s. v. Ἰσοκράτης; Anonym. Bios Ἰσοκράτ., in Westermann's Bioyphoi, p. 253; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 260.) Isocrates was naturally timid, and of a weakly constitution, for which reasons he abstained from taking any direct part in the political affairs of his country, and resolved to contribute towards the development of eloquence by teaching and writing, and thus to guide others in the path for which his own constitution unfitted him. According to some accounts, he devoted himself to the teaching of rhetoric for the purpose of ameliorating his circumstances, since he had lost his paternal inheritance in the war against the Lacedaemonians. (Plut. L. c. p. 837; Phot. Bibl. Cod. L. c. 176; Isocrat. de Perseu. § 172.) He first established a school of rhetoric in the island of Chios, but his success does not appear to have been very great, for he is said to have had only nine pupils there. He is stated, however, to have exerted himself in another direction, and to have regulated the political constitution of Chios, after the model of that of Athens. After this he returned to Athens, and there opened a school of rhetoric. He met with the greatest applause, and the number of his pupils soon increased to 100, every one of whom paid him 1000 drachmae. In addition to this, he made a large income by writing orations; thus Plutarch (L. c. p. 838) relates that Nicocles, king of Cyprus, gave Isocrates twenty talents for the oration πρὸς Νικοκλέα. In this manner he gradually acquired a considerable property, and he was several times called upon to undertake the expensive trierarchy; this happened first in B.C. 355, but being ill, he excused himself through his son Aphareus. In 352 he was called upon again, and in order to silence the calumnies of his enemies, he performed it in the most splendid manner. The oration περὶ ἀντιδόσεως πρὸς Ἀσιόμαχον refers to that event, though it was written after it. In his earlier years Isocrates lived in the company of Athenian hetaerae (Plut. L. c. p. 839; Athen. xiii. p. 592), but at a later period he married Plathaea, the widow of the sophist Hippis, whose youngest son, Aphareus, he adopted. Isocrates has the great merit of being the first who clearly saw the great value and objects of oratory, in its practical application to public life and the affairs of the state. At the same time, he endeavoured to base public oratory upon sound moral principles, and thus to rescue it from the influence of the sophists, who used and abused it for any and every purpose; for Isocrates, although educated by the most eminent sophists, was the avowed enemy of all sophistry. He was, however, not altogether free from their influence; and what is most conspicuous in his political discourses is the absence of all practical knowledge of real political life, so that his fine theories, though they were unquestionably well meant, bear a strong resemblance to the visions of an enthusiast. The influence which he exercised on his country by his oratory must have been limited, since his exertions were confined to his school, but through his school he had the greatest possible influence upon the development of public oratory; for the most eminent statesmen, philosophers, orators, and historians of the time, were trained in it, and afterwards developed each in his particular way the principles they had imbibed in his school. No ancient rhetorician had so many disciples that afterwards shed lustre on their country as Isocrates. If we set aside the question as to whether the political views he entertained were practicable or wise, it must be owned that he was a sincere lover of his native land, and that the greatness and glory of Athens were the great objects for which he was labouring; and hence, when the battle of Chaeroneia had destroyed the last hopes of freedom and independence, Isocrates made away with himself, unable to survive the downfall of his country, B.C. 338. (Plut. p. 837; Dionys. Photus, l. c.; Philostr. Vit. Soph. i. 17.)

The Alexandrian critics assigned to Isocrates the fourth place in the canon of Greek orators, and the great esteem in which his orations were held by the ancient grammarians is attested by the numerous commentaries that were written upon them by Philonicus, Hieronymus of Rhodes, Cleochares, Didymus, and others. Hermippus even treated in a separate work on the pupils of Isocrates; but all these works are lost, with the exception of the criticism by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The language of Isocrates is the purest and most refined Attic dialect, and thus forms a great contrast with the natural simplicity of Lysias, as well as with the sublime power of Demosthenes. His artificial style is more elegant than graceful, and more ostentatious than pleasing; the carefully-rounded periods, the frequent application of figurative expressions, are features which remind us of the sophists; and although his sentences flow very melodiously, yet they become wearisome and monotonous by the perpetual occurrence of the same over-refined periods, which are not relieved by being interspersed with shorter and easier sentences. In saying this, we must remember that Isocrates wrote his orations to be read, and not with a view to their recitation before the public. The immense care he bestowed upon the composition of his orations, and the time he spent in working them out and polishing them, may be inferred from the statement, that he was engaged for a period of ten, and according to others, of fifteen years, upon his Panegyric oration. (Quintil. x. 4 § 4.) It is owing to this very care and labour that in the arrangement and treatment of his subject, Isocrates is far superior to Lysias and other orators of the time, and that the number of orations he wrote is comparatively small.

There were in antiquity sixty orations which went by the name of Isocrates, but Caecilius, a rhetorician of the time of Augustus, recognised only twenty-eight of them as genuine (Plut. l. c. p. 838; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 260), and of these only twenty-one have come down to us. Eight of them were written for judicial purposes in civil cases, and intended to serve as models for this species of oratory; all the others are political discourses or show speeches, intended to be read by a large public: they are particularly characterised by the ethical element on which his political views are based. Besides these entire orations, we have the titles and fragments of twenty-seven other orations, which are referred to under the name of Isocrates. There also exist under his name ten letters, which were written to friends on political questions of the time; one of them, however (the tenth), is in all probability spurious. A scientific manual of rhetoric (ἐλχρη ῥητορικῆ) which Isocrates wrote is lost, with the exception of a few fragments, so that we are unable to form any definite idea of his merits in this respect.

The orations of Isocrates are printed in the various collections of the Greek orators. The first separate edition is that of Demetrius Chalcondylas (Milan, 1493, fol.), which was followed by numerous others, which, however, are mainly based upon the edition of Aldus (e.g. those published at Haguenau, 1533, 8vo.; Venice, 1542, 1544, 1549, 8vo.; Basel, 1546, 1550, 1555, 1561, 8vo.). A better edition is that of H. Wolf (Basel, 1553, 8vo.), and with Wolf's notes and emendations, Basel, 1570, fol., the text of which was often reprinted. Some improvements were made in the edition of H. Stephens (1593, fol., reprinted in 1604, 1642, 1651, 8vo., in London 1615, 8vo., and at Cambridge 1686, 8vo.). The edition of A. Auger (Paris, 1782, 3 vols. 8vo.) is not what it might have been, considering the MSS. he had at his disposal. The best modern editions are those of W. Lange (Halle, 1803, 8vo.), Ad. Coraes (Paris, 1807, 2 vols. 8vo.), G. S. Dobson (London, 1828, 2 vols. 8vo., with a Latin transl., copious notes and scholia), and Baiter and Sauppe (Zürich, 1839, 2 vols. 12mo.). There are also many good editions of separate orations and of select orations, for which the reader must be referred to bibliographical works (Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. vol. ii. p. 615, &c.). A useful Index Graecitatis was published by Th. Mitchell, Oxford, 1827, 8vo. (Comp. Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Bereds. §§ 48, 49, and Beilage iv. pp. 288—293; Leloup, Commentatio de Isocrate, Bonn, 1823, 8vo.; J. G. Pfund, de Isocratis Vita et Scriptis, Berlin, 1833,

2. Of Apollonia, a disciple of Isocrates of Athens (No. 1), with whom he has often been confounded. He appears, however, to have enjoyed a considerable reputation as an orator, for he is mentioned among those who competed with other orators for the prize which Artemisia of Caria proposed in the literary contest which she instituted in honour of her husband Mausolus, in B.C. 352. Suidas mentions the titles of five of his orations, but none of them have come down to us. (Epist. Socrat. xxviii. pp. 65, 67; Suid. s. v. Ἰσοκράτης; Eudoc. p. 247; Spalding, ad Quintil. ii. 15. § 4.) Some critics believe that he was the author of the τέχνη ῥητορικῆ, which was mentioned above among the works of his master and namesake. (Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Beredsamk. § 50, notes 3 and 4, § 68, note 15.) [L. S.]

ISODAETES (Ἰσοδαίτης), from δαίω, i.e. the god who distributes his gifts equally to all, occurs as a surname of Dionysus Zagreus. (Plut. de Ex. ap. Delph. 9.) [L. S.]

ISO'DETES (Ἰσοδέρης), from δέω, the god who binds all equally, is used as a surname of Pluto, to express his impartiality (Hesych. s. v.), and of Apollo. (Bekker, Anecdol. p. 267.) [L. S.]

ISSA (Ἰσσα), a daughter of Macareus in Lesbos, and the beloved of Apollo, from whom the Lesbian town of Issa is said to have received its name. (Ov. Met. vi. 124; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 220; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Strab. i. p. 60.) [L. S.]

ISSORIA (Ἰσσορία), a surname of the Laccanian Artemis, derived from Mount Isorion, on which she had a sanctuary. (Paus. iii. 14. § 2, 25. § 3; Hesych. and Steph. Byz. s. v.; Plut. Ages. 32; Polyæn. ii. 14.) [L. S.]

I'STHMIUS (Ἰσθμῖος), i.e. the god worshipped on the Isthmus (of Corinth), a surname of Poseidon, in honour of whom the Isthmian games were celebrated. (Paus. ii. 9. § 6.) [L. S.]

ISTER or ISTRUS (Ἰστρος). 1. A Greek historian, who is sometimes called a native of Cyrene, sometimes of Macedonia, and sometimes of Paphos, in the island of Cyprus. (Suid. s. v. Ἰστρος.) These contradictory statements are reconciled by Siebelis, in the work cited below, by the supposition that Ister was born at Cyrene, that thence he proceeded with Callimachus to Alexandria, and afterwards lived for some time at Paphos, which was subject to the kings of Egypt. (Comp. Plut. Quaest. Graec. 43, who calls him an Alexandrian.) Ister is said to have been at first a slave of Callimachus, and afterwards his friend, and this circumstance determines the age of Istrus, who accordingly lived in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, i. e. between about a. c. 250 and 220. Polemon, who was either his contemporary or lived very shortly after him, wrote against Ister.

Ister was the author of a considerable number of works, all of which are lost, with the exception of some fragments. The most important among them was, 1. an Atthis (Ἀτθίς), of which the sixteenth book is mentioned by Harpocration (s. v. τραγεῳδός; comp. s. v. ἐπευγυῖν.) This work is often referred to under different titles, such as Ἀττική (Athen. iii. p. 74, xiii. p. 557; Plut. Thea. 33) τὰ τῆς συναγωγῆς, Ἀττικὴ συναγωγή, συναγωγή, Ἀτακτα, and others. 2. Ἀπὸ Ἰστροῦ ἐπιφανείαι, in which he treated of a variety of religious rites. (Plut. de Mus. 14; Harpocrat. s. v. φαρμακός; Phot. Lex. s. v. Τριτταν.) 3. Πτολεμαῖς. Some consider this work on the Egyptian town of Ptolemais to have been in verse, but nothing certain can be said about it. (Athen. x. p. 478.) 4. Ἀφυγκτῶν ἐνοικίαι, or the colonies of the Egyptians. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 322; Constantin. Porphyr. de Them. i. p. 13.) 5. Ἀργολικὰ, or a history of Argos. (Athen. xiv. p. 650; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρία.) 6. Ἡλυσιὰ. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Φύσιον; Schol. in Platon. p. 380, ed. Bekker; and Pind. Ol. vi. 55, vii. 146.) 7. Συναγωγή τῶν κρητικῶν θυσιῶν. (Euseb. Præp. Evang. iv. 16; Porphyr. de Abstin. ii. 56.) 8. Περὶ Βυθίττος δόλων. (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. p. 447.) 9. Μελοποιολ. (Suid. s. v. φῶνις; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 967; Anonym. Vit. Sophocl.) 10. Ἱστορήματα or commentaries. (Plut. Quaest. Graec. 43.) 11. Ἀττικὰ λέξεις. (Eustath. ad Odys. p. 1627; Suid. s. v. ἑμνόν; Phavorin. s. v. ἀρνεῖς; Hesych. s. v. ἀμᾶλλαι; Schol. Venet. ad Iliad. κ. 439.)

2. A Greek grammarian of Calatia, on the Euxine, is mentioned only by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Κάλαις), as the author of a beautiful work, περὶ τραγῳδίας, and it is not impossible that the anonymous author of the life of Sophocles may refer to him, and not to the author of the Atthis. The fragments of the works of the latter are collected by Siebelis, Fragm. Phanodemi, Democ., Clüodemi, et Istri, Lips. 1812, 8vo., and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragmenta Histor. Graec. p. 418, &c. [L. S.]

ISTOM A'CHUS (Ἰστωμάχος), the author of a work entitled Ἱπποκράτους ἀρεταί, that is, the school of Hippocrates, in which he stated that Hippocrates was born Ol. 80. 1. (Soranus, Vit. Hippocr.) [L. S.]

ITALICUS, one of the two kings of the Suevians who in a. d. 70 joined the party of Vespasian and fought against the Vitellians at Bedriacum in Cisalpine Gaul. (Tac. Hist. iii. 5, 21.) He was probably a son of the Italicus mentioned by the same historian (Ann. xi. 16) a. d. 47, who was invited to the chieftaincy of the Cheruscani, and afterwards for his tyranny and intemperance expelled by them. In most editions of Tacitus the name is Italus, and, whether this or Italicus be the true reading, his Teutonic appellation is probably superseded by an agnomen derived from his education at Rome while detained there as an hostage. [FLAVIUS, p. 174.] [W. R. D.]

ITALICUS SILIUS. [SILIUS.]

ITALUS (Ἰταλός), an ancient king of the Pelasgians, Sicilians, or Oenotrians, from whom Italy was believed to have derived its name. (Thuc. vi. 2; Dionys. i. 35.) Hyginus (Fab. 127) calls him a son of Telegonus by Penelope. By Electra, the daughter of Latinius, he is said to have become the father of Remus, the founder of Rome, and by Lucania, the father of the heroine Rome, to whom is likewise ascribed the foundation of Rome. (Dionys. i. 72; Plut. Romul. 2; comp. Serv. ad Aes. i. 6, viii. 328; Aristot. Polit. vii. 10.) [L. S.]

ITHACUS (Ἰθάκος), a son of Pterelaus, a hero from whom Ithaca was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Od. xvii. 207; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 307, 1815; Hesych. s. v.) Odysseus, king of Ithaca, is sometimes simply called Ithacus, or the Ithacan. (Ov. Ep. ex Pont. i. 3, 33; Virg. Aen. ii. 104.) [L. S.]

ITHAMITRES. [Αἰταντες.]

ITHOMATAS (Ἰθωματῆς), a surname of Zeus derived from the Messenian hill of Ithome, where the god had a sanctuary, and where an annual festival, the Ithomaea, was celebrated in his honour. (Paus. iv. 33, § 2, &c.) [L. S.]

ITHOMÉ (Ἰθόμη), a nymph from whom the Messenian hill of Ithome derived its name. According to a Messenian tradition, Ithome and Neda, from whom a small river of the country derived its name, were said to have nursed Zeus, and to have bathed the infant god in the well Clepsydra. (Paus. iv. 33, § 2.) [L. S.]

ITO'NIA, ITO'NIAS, or ITO'NIS (Ἰτωνία, Ἰτωνίς, or Ἰτωνίς), a surname of Athena, derived from the town of Iton, in the south of Phthiotia. (Paus. i. 13, § 2; Plut. Pyrrh. 26; Polyb. iv. 25; Strab. ix. p. 435; Steph. Byz. s. v.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 551, ad Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 75.) The goddess there had a celebrated sanctuary and festivals, and is hence also called incola Itoni. (Cantall. Epithal. P. et Th. 228.) From Iton her worship spread into Boeotia and the country about lake Copais, where the Parnocotia was celebrated, in the neighbourhood of a temple and grove of Athena. (Paus. ix. 34, § 1; iii. 9, in fin.; Plut. Amul. Narr. 4.) According to another tradition, Athena received the surname of Itonia from Itonna, a king or priest. (Paus. ix. 34, § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 721.) [L. S.]

ITO'NUS (Ἰτωνός). 1. A son of Amphictyon, and husband of the nymph Melanippe, by whom he became the father of Boeotus and Chromia. (Paus. ix. i. § 1, 34, § 1, v. 1, § 2.)

2. A son of Boeotus, and father of Hippalcimus, Electryon, Archilochus, and Alegenor. (Diod. iv. 67.) [L. S.]

ITU'RIOUS, a client of Julia Silana [SILANA], whom, with a fellow-client [CALVISIUS, p. 386], she employed to accuse the empress Agrippina of majestas, a. d. 56, and who, on the failure of their charge, was banished with his patroness. After Agrippina's murder, Iturius was recalled from exile by Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, 21, 22, xiv. 12.) [W. B. D.]

ITVS. [TERREVS.]

JUBA I. (106as), king of Numidia, was son of Hiempsal, who was re-established on the throne by Pompey. [HIEMPSAL, No. 2.] (Dion Cass. xli. 41; Suet. Caes. 71.) We hear little of him during his father's lifetime, but Cicero incidentally mentions him in one of his orations as early as a. c. 63 (De Leg. Agror. Or. ii. 22), and in the following year we find him at Rome, whither he had probably been sent by his father, to support their cause against a Numidian named Masintha, on which occasion a violent altercation took place between him and Caesar, then praetor. (Suet. Caes. 71.) On the death of Hiempsal, Juba succeeded to all the power and privileges enjoyed by his father, whose authority appears to have extended not only over all Numidia but over many of the Gaetulan tribes of the interior (Hirt. B. Afr. 56), a circumstance which probably gave rise to the absurd exaggeration of Lucan, who represents him (iv. 670) as ruling over the whole of Africa, from the pillars of Hercules to the temple of Ammon. On the breaking out of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Juba espoused the cause of the latter, a course to which he was impelled both by his hereditary attachment to Pompey himself, confirmed probably by the disputes with Caesar already adverted to, and by personal enmity to Curio, who in the year of his tribuneship (a. c. 50) had proposed a law for reducing the kingdom of Juba to the condition of a Roman province. Hence, when Curio landed in Africa (a. c. 49) with an army of only two legions, the king was prompted by private revenge, as well as general policy, to hasten to the support of P. Attius Varus, the Pompeian general in Africa. Before, however, Juba could arrive to his succour, Varus had suffered a considerable defeat, and with difficulty maintained his ground under the walls of Utica. On the first news of the king's approach, at the head of a numerous army, Curio retreated to a strong position on the sea-coast, called the Castra Cornelia, but in order to draw him away from thence, Juba caused a report to be spread that he himself had retired into the interior, and had only detached a small force under Saburra to the relief of Utica. Curio fell easily into the snare, attacked the advanced guard of the Numidians at the river Bagradas, and drove it before him; nor did he discover his mistake until his little army was entirely surrounded and overwhelmed by the countless swarms of the Numidian cavalry. Curio himself fell in the action, with almost all his infantry: a few cohorts of cavalry, which had made their escape to the camp near Utica, and surrendered to Varus at discretion, were put to the sword in cold blood by Juba, in spite of the opposition of the Roman general. (Caes. B. C. ii. 23—44; Dion Cass. xli. 41, 42; Appian, B. C. ii. 44—46; Lucan, iv. 581—824; Liv. Epit. cx.; Oros. vi. 15; Flor. iv. 2.) For these services, Juba was rewarded by the senate of the Pompeian party with the title of king, and other honours; while Caesar and the senate at Rome proclaimed him a public enemy. (Dion Cass. xli. 42; Lucan, v. 56.) He continued in undisturbed possession of his kingdom until the beginning of the year a. c. 46, when Caesar in person landed in Africa, where Scipio, Cato, and the remaining leaders of the Pompeian party, were now assembled. Juba was advancing in person, at the head of a large army, to the support of Scipio, when he received intelligence that his own dominions had been invaded from another quarter by Bocchus, king of Mauritania, and the Roman general P. Sittius, who had obtained considerable successes, and even made themselves masters of the important city of Cirta. Hereupon he returned with his army, to oppose this new enemy, contenting himself with sending thirty elephants to the assistance of Scipio. Of his operations against Sittius we know nothing, but it was not long before the urgent request of the Roman commander recalled him to his support; and leaving his general Saburra to make head against Bocchus and Sittius, he himself joined Scipio in his camp near Uzita, with three legions of regular infantry, 800 well-armed cavalry, and thirty elephants, besides a countless swarm of light-armed infantry and Numidian horse. Yet he did not, after all, render any very important services to the cause of his allies. A combat of cavalry took place soon after his arrival, in which, notwithstanding their superior numbers, the Numidians were defeated, and Juba himself, as well as Labienus, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. Meanwhile he gave the greatest offence to the Romans with whom he was associated, by his haughty and arrogant bearing towards their officers, and even towards Scipio himself. The Gaetulians also quitted his standard in great numbers, being attracted to Caesar by his relationship to Marius, whose name still exercised a powerful influence over them. In the final action at Thapsus, the elephants, on which both Scipio and Juba in great measure relied, having been once put to flight, the Numidians offered but little resistance, and their camp fell into the hands of the enemy almost without a struggle. Juba himself fled from the field of battle to the strong city of Zama, where he had deposited his wives and children, as well as his treasures and military stores, and in which he had prepared all things for a desperate defence; but the inhabitants, having already received tidings of Caesar's victory, shut the gates against him. He now wandered about for some time, until at length, having learnt that his lieutenant Saburra had been utterly defeated by P. Sittius, and that Cato had perished by his own hand at Utica, he abandoned all hopes of safety, and put an end to his own life, having previously, it is said, dispatched the Roman general Petreius, who had been the companion of his flight. (Hirt. B. Afr. 25, 48, 52, 55—57, 66, 74, 80—86, 91—94; Dion Cass. xlii. 56—58, xliii. 2—9; Appian, B. C. ii. 95—97, 100; Plut. Caes. 52, 53; Liv. Epit. cxiii. cxiv.; Oros. vi. 16; Flor. iv. 2; Eutrop. vi. 23; Suet. Caes. 35.) There is nothing in any of the accounts transmitted to us of Juba which would lead us to rank him above the

JUBA II. (†168), king of Mauritania, son of the preceding. He was a mere child at the time of his father's death (B. C. 46), after which event he was carried a prisoner to Rome by Caesar, and compelled to grace the conqueror's triumph. (Appian, B. C. ii. 101; Plut. Caes. 55.) In other respects he appears to have been well treated. He was brought up in Italy, where he received an excellent education, and applied himself with such diligence to study, that he turned out one of the most learned men of his day. As he rose to manhood he obtained a high place in the favour of Octavian, whom he accompanied in his expedition to the East; nor did he fail to reap the fruits of this favour, in the general settlement of the affairs of the empire, after the death of Antony (B. C. 30). On that occasion Octavian restored his young friend to the possession of his paternal kingdom of Numidia, at the same time that he gave him in marriage Cleopatra, otherwise called Selene, the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. (Dion Cass. li. 15; Plut. Ant. 87; Strab. xvii. p. 828.) At a subsequent period (B. C. 25) Augustus gave him the two provinces of Mauritania (afterwards called Tingitana and Caesariensis), which had formed the kingdoms of Bocchus and Bogud, in exchange for Numidia, which was reduced to a Roman province. Some of the Gaetulian tribes were at the same time subjected to his sway; and almost the only event of his long reign that we find recorded is an insurrection of these tribes, which assumed so formidable an aspect, that Juba was unable to repress it by his own efforts; and even the Roman general Cornelius Cosus, whom he called in to his assistance, did not succeed in reducing them until after a long protracted struggle, by which he earned the honorary appellation of Gaetulicus. (Dion Cass. liii. 26, iv. 28; comp. Strab. xvii. pp. 828, 831.) The exact period of his death is nowhere mentioned, but Strabo more than once speaks of him as lately dead (xvii. pp. 828, 829, 840) at the time that he himself was writing; and this statement, coupled with the evidence of one of his coins, which bears the date of the 48th year of his reign, renders it probable that we may assign his death to A. D. 18 or 19 at latest. (See Eckhel, vol. iv. p. 157; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 203.)

The tranquil reign of Juba appears to have afforded but few materials for history; but it is evident that his kingdom rose to a pitch of power and prosperity under his rule far exceeding what it had before attained, and he endeavoured to introduce as far as possible the elements of Greek and Roman civilisation among his barbarian subjects. Among other things, he converted a town called Iol into a handsome city, with an excellent port, to which he gave the name of Caesarea, and which continued from thenceforth the capital of Mauritania. (Strab. xvii. p. 831; Eutrop. vii. 10.) So great was the reverence entertained for him by his own subjects, that they even paid him divine honours after his death (Lactant. de Fals. Relig. i.

11; Minucius Felix, 23), nor are there wanting proofs of the consideration which he enjoyed during his lifetime in foreign countries also. Thus we find him obtaining the honorary title of duumvir of the wealthy city of Gades (Avienus, de Ora Marit. v. 275), and apparently at New Carthage also (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri. vol. xxviii. p. 104); and Pausanias mentions a statue erected to his memory at Athens itself. (Pana. i. 17. § 2.) But it is to his literary works that Juba is indebted for his chief reputation. He appears to have retained on the throne the habits of study which he had acquired in early life; and in the number and variety of his writings he might vie with many professed grammarians. His works are continually cited by Pliny (H. N. v. viii. x. xii. xiii. &c. passim), who regards his authority with the utmost deference. Plutarch (Sert. 9) calls him ὁ πρῶτος ἱστορικώτατος βασιλεὺς, Athenaeus (iii. p. 83, b.) ὁ πρῶτος πολυμαθέστατος, and Arrianus (de Ora Marit. v. 279) has described him as

He appears indeed to have laboured in almost every branch of literature; some of his works being purely grammatical or antiquarian, while others comprise a wide field of history, geography, natural history, and the fine arts. The most important among those of which the names have been transmitted to us are the following:—1. A history of Africa (Λιβυκά, Plut. Parallel. Minor. 23; περὶ Λιβύης συγγράμματα. Athen. iii. p. 83, b.), in which he had made use of the Punic authorities accessible to him, a circumstance which must have rendered it especially valuable. It is evident, however, from some of the passages cited from it, that he had mixed these up with fables of Greek origin. (Plut. Sert. 9.) It is probably from this work that most of the information quoted from his authority concerning the natural history of lions, elephants, &c. is derived, though the title of the book is not mentioned (Plin. H. N. viii. 4, 5, 13, &c.; Aelian, Hist. Anim. vii. 23, ix. 58; Plut. de Solert. Anim. p. 972, a.; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. ii. 13, p. 62, ed. Olear.), and it was doubtless here also that he gave that account of the origin of the Nile, derived, as we are expressly told, from Punic sources, which is cited by Pliny and other authors. (Plin. v. 10; Amm. Marc. xxii. 15; Solin. 35.) It may indeed be regarded as Pliny's chief authority for the geographical account of Africa contained in the fifth book of his Natural History. The third book of this work is quoted by Plutarch (Parallel. L. c.).

2. Περὶ Ἀστρονομίας, in two books, in which he followed the authority of Beronius. (Tatian, Orat. adv. Græc. 58; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 329.)

3. A history of Arabia, which he addressed to C. Caesar (the grandson of Augustus) when that prince was about to proceed on his expedition to the East, B. C. 1. It appears to have contained a general description of the country, and all that was then known concerning its geography, natural productions, &c. It is cited by Pliny as the most trustworthy account of those regions which was known to him (H. N. vi. 26, 28, 30, xii. 31.).

4. Πομπαικὴ ἱστορία, cited repeatedly by Stephanus of Byzantium (a. vv. Ἀσποργύρες, Ἄρτια, &c.). Numerous statements quoted by Plutarch, from Juba, without mentioning any particular work, but relating to the early history and antiquities of Rome, are evidently derived from this treatise. (Plut. Romal. 14, 15, 17, Nem. 7, 13, Quæst. Rom. p. 269, 278, 282, 285; see also Athen. iii. p. 98, b. vi. p. 229, c.) From some of these passages, it appears that Juba displayed the same tendency as many Greek writers to assign a Greek origin to all the Roman institutions. This work is styled in one passage Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ῥωμαϊστία), but it is evident, from the mention of Numantia, as well as that of events which occurred in the second Punic war, and even as late as the time of Sulla (Plut. Comp. Marc. et Pelop. 1, Sulla, 16), that it did not relate exclusively to the early periods of Rome, and was probably a general history.

5. Ὅμοιότητες, apparently a comparison between the manners and customs of the Romans and those of the Greeks, or of synonymous terms in the two languages. (Athenae. iv. p. 170, e.)

6. Θεωρητικὴ ἰστορία. (Athen. iv. p. 175, d.; Phot. Bibl. p. 104, b. ed. Bekker; Hesych. s. v. κλαρέα.) This seems to have been a general treatise on all matters connected with the stage, of which the fourth book related to musical instruments in particular. It was a voluminous work, as the seventeenth book is mentioned by Photius (l.c.). The statements cited by Athenæus (iv. p. 177, a. 182, a. 183, e. xiv. p. 660) are evidently taken from this work.

7. Περὶ γραμμάτων, or περὶ ζωγράφων. (Phot. Bibl. p. 103, a.; Harpocrat. s. v. Παρθένος and Πολύγνωτος.) It is not clear whether these two titles indicate the same work or not; but it seems probable that it was a general history of painting, including the lives of the most eminent painters. The eighth book is cited by Harpocration (s. v. Παρθένος).

8, 9. Two little treatises of a botanical or medical nature; the one concerning the plant Euphorbia, which grew on Mount Atlas, where Juba was the first to discover it, and to which he attributed many valuable medical qualities (Plin. H. N. v. 1, xxv. 38); the other, περὶ ὀπώδ, concerning the juice of the poppy, or opium, is cited by Galen. (Opp. vol. ii. p. 297.)

10. Περὶ φθόρων λεξέων, a grammatical work, of which the second book is cited by Photius in his Lexicon, and by Suidas (s. v. Σκουερύσαι).

Lastly, an epigram by Juba upon a bad actor, of the name of Leonteus, is preserved to us by Athenæus (viii. p. 343). It is not calculated to give us a high opinion of the poetical powers of the royal grammarian.

His exalted station did not preserve Juba from the censure of his rivals among men of letters, and we learn from Suidas (s. v. Ἰόβας) that his contemporary Didymus, the celebrated grammarian, attacked him in many of his writings. Besides the passages above cited, many others will be found scattered through the works of the later Greek and Latin authors, and the lexicographers, in which the writings of Juba are quoted, but mostly without any indication of the particular work referred to. An elaborate account of his life and writings, by the Abbé Sevin, will be found in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. iv. p. 457, &c. (See also Voessing, de Historicis Graecis, p. 219, ed. Westermann; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 201, 551; Wernsdorff, Excursus I. ad Asconium, in the fifth vol. of his Poetae Latini Minores, part iii. p. 1418.)

Juba is supposed to have left two children by his wife Cleopatra, of whom his son Ptolemy succeeded him upon the throne, while his daughter Drusilla married Antonius Felix, governor of Judæa. There is, however, much reason to doubt whether the latter statement is correct. [DRUSILLA.] According to Josephus (Ant. xvii. 13. § 4), he was married a second time after the death of Cleopatra to Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and widow of Alexander, the son of Herod the Great, but it seems probable that this is a mistake. (See Bayle, Dictionn. Historique, vol. vii. p. 90, 8vo. edit.) The statement with which Josephus follows it, that Glaphyra survived her husband, and returned after his death to the court of her father, is certainly erroneous, for Archelaus died in A. D. 17, when Juba was still living. A coin of Juba, having his head on one side and that of his wife Cleopatra on the other, is given under CLEOPATRA [Vol. I. p. 802]. [E. H. B.]

JUBELLIIUS TAUREA. [TAUREA.]

JUDACILIUS, a native of Asculum in Picenum, was one of the chief generals of the allies in the Social War, B. C. 90. He first commanded in Apulia where he was very successful: Canusium and Venusia, with many other towns, opened their gates to him, and some which refused to obey him he took by storm; the Roman nobles who were made prisoners he put to death, and the common people and slaves he enrolled among his troops. In conjunction with T. Afranius (also called Lafernius) and P. Ventidius, Judacilius defeated Cn. Pompeius Strabo; but when the latter had in his turn gained a victory over Afranius and laid siege to Picenum, Judacilius, anxious to save his native town, cut his way through the enemy's lines, and threw himself into the city with eight cohorts. Finding, however, that it could not possibly hold out much longer, and resolved not to survive its fall, he first put to death all his enemies, and then erected a funeral pyre within the precincts of the chief temple in the city, where he banquetted with his friends, and, after taking poison, he laid himself down on the pile, and commanded his friends to set it on fire. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 42, 47, 48; Oro. v. 18.)

JUDAS (Ἰούδας), a Greek historian and theologian, who seems to have lived about the time of Alexander Severus, and wrote a chronological work (Χρονολογία) from the earliest times down to the tenth year of the emperor Alexander Severus, and dissertations on the Septuagint, but both works are lost. (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 7; Niceph. iv. 34; Hieronym. Catal. Script. Illustr. 52.) [L. S.]

JUDEX, T. VETTIUS, a name occurring on coins, a specimen of which is given below, but it is impossible to determine who this person is. Some modern writers have maintained that, in all those passages in which mention is made of the L. Vettius who gave information respecting the conspiracy of Catiline, with the surname Judex, that we ought to read Judex; but this opinion hardly needs refutation, as it is clear that he was called Indes from giving information (indiciū) respecting the conspiracy. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. ii. 24,—Vettius ille, ille noster indes.) It would appear, from the obverse of the coin, that this T. Vettius Juxed had an agnomen Sabinus. (Eckhel, v. p. 336.)

JUGA or JUGA'LIS, that is, the goddess of marriage, occurs as a surname of Juno, in the same sense as the Greek ἑυγία. She had a temple under this name in the forum at Rome, below the capitol, and the street which there took its commencement was called vicus Jugarius. (August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 8, 11, vi. 9; Festus, p. 104, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

JUGURTHA (Ἰουγούρθας or Ἰουγούρθας), king of Numidia, was a grandson of Masinissa, being a son of his youngest son, Mastanabal; but on account of his illegitimate birth, his mother being only a concubine, he was neglected by his grandfather, and remained in a private situation so long as Masinissa lived. But when Micipsa succeeded to the throne (B.C. 149), he adopted his nephew, and caused him to be brought up with his own sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself both by his abilities and his skill in all bodily exercises, and rose to so much favour and popularity with the Numidians, that he began to excite the jealousy of Micipsa, who became apprehensive lest he should eventually supplant his two sons. In order to remove him to a distance, and not without a hope that he might perish in the war, Micipsa sent him, in A.C. 134, with an auxiliary force, to assist Scipio against Numantia: but this only proved to the young man a fresh occasion of distinction: by his zeal, courage, and ability, he gained the favour not only of his commander, but of all the leading nobles in the Roman camp, by many of whom he was secretly stimulated to nourish ambitious schemes for acquiring the sole sovereignty of Numidia; and notwithstanding the contrary advice of Scipio, these counsels seem to have sunk deep into the mind of Jugurtha. On his return he was received with every demonstration of honour by Micipsa; nor did he allow his ambitious projects to break forth during the lifetime of the old man. Micipsa, on his death-bed, though but too clearly foreseeing what would happen, commended the two young princes to the care of Jugurtha: but at the very first interview which took place between them after his decease (A.C. 118), their dissensions broke out with the utmost fierceness. Shortly after, Jugurtha found an opportunity to surprise and assassinate Hiempsal in his lodging at Thir-mida [HIEMPSAL]; whereupon Adherbal and his partisans rushed to arms, but were defeated in battle by Jugurtha; and Adherbal himself fled for refuge to the Roman province, from whence he hastened to Rome, to lay his cause before the senate. Jugurtha had now the opportunity, for the first time, of putting to the test that which he had learnt in the camp before Numantia, of the venality and corruption of the Roman nobility: he sent ambassadors to Rome to counteract by a lavish distribution of bribes the effect of the just complaints of Adherbal; and by these means succeeded in averting the indignation of the senate. A decree was, however, passed for the division of the kingdom of Numidia between the two competitors, and a committee of senators sent to enforce its execution; but as soon as these arrived in Africa, Jugurtha succeeded in gaining them over by the same unscrupulous methods, and obtained in the partition of the kingdom the western division, adjacent to Mauritania, by far the larger and richer portion of the two (B.C. 117). But this advantage was far from contenting him; and notwithstanding the obvious danger of disturbing an arrangement so formally established by the Roman government, he directed all his efforts to the acquisition of the whole. For this purpose, he continually harassed the frontiers of the neighbouring kingdom by predatory incursions, in hopes of inducing Adherbal to repress these petty assaults by arms, and of thus obtaining an excuse for representing him as the aggressor. But this plan being frustrated by the patience and steadiness with which Adherbal adhered to a pacific and defensive system, Jugurtha at length threw aside all restraint, and invaded his territories with a large army. Adherbal was defeated in the first conflict, his camp taken, and he himself with difficulty made his escape to the strong fortress of Cirta. Here he was closely blockaded by Jugurtha; but before the latter could make himself master of the town, an embassy arrived from Rome to interpose, and compel both parties to desist from hostilities. Jugurtha, however, succeeded in putting off the deputies with fair words; and as soon as they had quitted Africa, pressed the siege more vigorously than before. A second deputation from Rome arrived soon after, at the head of which was M. Aemilius Scaurus, a man of the highest dignity; but though Jugurtha obeyed their summons, and presented himself before them, accompanied only by a few horsemen, he did not raise the siege of Cirta; and the ambassadors, after many fruitless threats, were obliged to quit Africa without accomplishing the object of their mission. Hereupon the garrison of Cirta surrendered, on a promise of their lives being spared: but these conditions were shamefully violated by Jugurtha, who immediately put to death Adherbal and all his followers, A.C. 112.

Indignation was now loud at Rome against the Numidian king: yet so powerful was the influence of those whose favour he had gained by his largesses, that he would probably have prevailed upon the senate to overlook all his misdeeds, had not one of the tribunes, C. Memmius, by bringing the matter before the people, compelled the senators to assume a more lofty tone. War was accordingly declared against him, and one of the consuls, L. Calpurnius Bestia, landed in Africa with a large army, and immediately proceeded to invade Numidia. But Jugurtha, having failed in averting the war by his customary arts, next tried their effect upon the general sent against him. The avarice of Bestia rendered him easily accessible to these designs; and by means of large sums of money given to him and M. Scaurus, who acted as his principal lieutenant, Jugurtha purchased from them a favourable peace, on condition only of a pretended submission, together with the surrender of 30 elephants and a small sum of money, B. C. 111. As soon as the tidings of this disgraceful transaction reached Rome, the indignation excited was so great, that on the proposition of C. Memmius, it was agreed to send the prætor, L. Cassius, a man of the highest integrity, to Numidia, in order to prevail on the king to repair in person to Rome, the popular party hoping to be able to convict the leaders of the nobility by means of his evidence. The safe-conduct granted him by the state was religiously observed: but the scheme failed of its effect, for as soon as Jugurtha was brought forward in the assembly of the people to make his statement, one of the tribunes who had been previously gained over by the friends of Scæurus and Bestia, forbade him to speak. The king, nevertheless, remained at Rome for some time longer, engaged in secret intrigues, which would probably have been ultimately crowned with success, had he not in the mean time ventured on the nefarious act of the assassination of Massiva, whose counter influence he regarded with apprehension. [MASSIVA.] It was impossible to overlook so daring a crime, perpetrated under the very eyes of the senate. Bomilcar, by whose agency it had been accomplished, was brought to trial, and Jugurtha himself ordered to quit Italy without delay. It was on this occasion that he is said, when leaving Rome, to have uttered the memorable words: "Urberem venalem, et matrem perituram, si emptorem invenerit."

War was now inevitable; but the incapacity of Sp. Postumius Albinus, who arrived to conduct it (A. C. 110), and still more that of his brother Aulus, whom he left to command in his absence, when called away to hold the comitia at Rome, proved as favourable to Jugurtha as the corruption of their predecessors. Spurius allowed his wily adversary to protract the war by pretended negotiations and affected delays, until the season for action was nearly past; and Aulus, having penetrated into the heart of Numidia, to attack a city named Suthul, suffered himself to be surprised in his camp: great part of his army was cut to pieces, and the rest only escaped a similar fate by the ignominy of passing under the yoke. But Jugurtha had little reason to rejoice in this success, great as it might at first appear, for the disgrace at once roused all the spirit of the Roman people: the treaty concluded by Aulus was instantly annulled, great exertions made to raise troops, to provide arms and other stores, and one of the consuls for the new year (A. C. 109), Q. Cæcilius Metellus, hastened to Numidia to retrieve the honour of the Roman arms. As soon as Jugurtha found that the new commander was at once an able general, and a man of the strictest integrity, he began to despair of success, and made overtures in earnest for submission. These were apparently entertained by Metellus, while he sought in fact to gain over the adherents of the king, and induce them to betray him to the Romans, at the same time that he continued to advance into the enemy's territories. Jugurtha, in his turn, detecting his designs, attacked him suddenly on his march with a numerous force; but was, after a severe struggle, repulsed, and his army totally routed. It is unnecessary to follow in detail the remaining operations of the war. Metellus ravaged the greater part of the country, but failed in taking the important town of Zama, before he withdrew into winter quarters. But he had produced such an effect upon the Numidian king, that Jugurtha was induced, in the course of the ensuing winter, to make offers of unqualified submission, and even actually surrendered all his elephants, with a number of arms and horses, and a large sum of money, to the Roman general; but when called upon to place himself personally in the power of Metellus, his courage failed him, he broke off the negotiation, and once more had recourse to arms. Not long afterwards he detected a conspiracy formed against his life by Bomilcar (one of his most trusted friends, but who had been secretly gained over by Metellus [BOMILCAR]), together with a Numidian named Nabdalsa: the conspirators were put to death; but from this moment the suspicions of Jugurtha knew no bounds; his most faithful adherents were either sacrificed to his fears or obliged to seek safety in flight, and he wandered from place to place in a state of unceasing alarm and inquietude. The ensuing campaign (A. C. 108) was not productive of such decisive results as might have been expected. Jugurtha avoided any general action, and eluded the pursuit of Metellus by the rapidity of his movements: even when driven from Thala, a stronghold which he had deemed inaccessible from its position in the midst of arid deserts, he only retired among the Gaetulians, and quickly succeeded in raising among those wild tribes a fresh army, with which he once more penetrated into the heart of Numidia. A still more important accession was that of Bocchus, king of Mauritania, who was now prevailed upon to raise an army, and advance to the support of Jugurtha. Metellus, however, who had now relaxed his own efforts, from disgust at hearing that C. Marius had been appointed to succeed him in the command, remained on the defensive, while he sought to amuse the Moorish king by negotiations.

The arrival of Marius (A. C. 107) infused fresh vigour into the Roman arms: he quickly reduced in succession almost all the strongholds that still remained to Jugurtha, in some of which the king had deposited his principal treasures: and the latter seeing himself thus deprived step by step of all his dominions, at length determined on a desperate attempt to retrieve his fortunes by one grand effort. He with difficulty prevailed on the wavering Bocchus, by the most extensive promises in case of success, to co-operate with him in this enterprise; and the two kings, with their united forces, attacked Marius on his march, when he was about to retire into winter quarters; but though the Roman general was taken by surprise for a moment, his consummate skill and the discipline of his troops proved again triumphant, the Numidians were repulsed, and their army, as usual with them in case of a defeat, dispersed in all directions. Jugurtha himself, after displaying the greatest courage in the action, cut his way almost alone through a body of Roman cavalry, and escaped from the field of battle. He quickly again assembled a body of Numidian horse around him; but his only hope of continuing the war now rested on Bocchus. The latter was for some time uncertain what course to adopt, but was at length gained over by Sulla, the quaestor of Marius, to the Roman cause, and joined in a plan for seizing the person of the Numidian king. Jugurtha fell into the snare: he was induced, under pretence of a conference, to repair with only a few followers to meet Bocchus, when he was instantly surrounded, his attendants cut to pieces, and he himself made prisoner, and delivered in chains to Sulla, by whom he was conveyed directly to the camp of Marius. This occurred early in the year 106. He remained in captivity till the return of Marius to Rome, when, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror (Jan. 1, A.C. 104), he was thrown into a dungeon, and there starved to death. His two sons, who were, together with himself, led in chains before the car of Marius, were afterwards allowed to spend their lives in captivity at Venusia.

There is no doubt that Jugurtha occupies a more prominent place in history than he would otherwise deserve, in consequence of the war against him having been made the subject, by Sallust, of one of the most beautiful historical works that has been preserved to us from antiquity. From that work the above narrative is almost wholly taken, the other authorities now extant adding scarcely any thing to our information, except the circumstances of the death of Jugurtha, which are given in detail by Plutarch. Of his personal character it is unnecessary to say much, the picture of him, preserved by Sallust, though drawn by one of his enemies, has all the appearance of a true portrait. It is that of a genuine barbarian chief—bold, reckless, faithless, and sanguinary—daring and fertile of resource in action, but fickle and wavering in policy, and incapable of that steadiness of purpose which can alone command success. The peculiar character of Numidian warfare, and the disasters of the generals first employed against him, appear to have excited in the minds of the Romans themselves an exaggerated idea of the abilities and resources of their adversary, which the subsequent events of the war, as related by Sallust, hardly seem to justify. (Sall. Jugurtha; Liv. Epit. lxvii. lxiv—lxvii; Plut. Mar. 7—10, Sull. 3, 6; Appian, Hisp. 89, Numid. 2—4; Diod. Exc. xxxv. pp. 605, 607, 630; Dion Cass. Fragm. 167—169; Vell. Pat. ii. 11, 12; Oroz. v. 15; Eutrop. iv. 26, 27; Flor. iii. 2.) [E. H. B.]

JULIA. 1. A daughter of C. Julius Caesar [CAESAR, No. 14] and Marcia, and aunt of Caesar the dictator. She married C. Marius the elder, by whom she had one son, C. Marius, slain at Praeneste in B.C. 82. Julia died B.C. 68, and her nephew, C. Julius Caesar, pronounced her funeral oration, in which he traced her descent through the Marcii to Ancus, the fourth king of Rome, and through the Julii to Anchises and Venus. At the funeral of Julia were exhibited, for the first time since Sulla's dictatorship in B.C. 81, the statues and inscriptive titles of the elder Marius. (Plut. Mar. 6, Caes. 1, 5; Suet. Caes. 6.)

2. A daughter of L. Julius Caesar [CAESAR, No. 9] and Fulvia. She married M. Antonius Creticus [ANTONIUS, No. 9], and, after his death, P. Lentulus Sura, who was executed B.C. 63, as an accomplice of Catiline. By Antonius she had three sons, Marcus, afterwards the triumvir, Caius, and Lucius. Plutarch (Ant. 2) represents Julia as an exemplary matron, and Cicero (in Cat. iv. 6) styles her "femina lectissima." But neither in her husbands nor her children was Julia fortunate. Antonius lived a prodigal, and died inglorious; and Lentulus, by his bad example, corrupted his step-sons. Her sons, especially Marcus, who was not her favourite (Cic. Phil. ii. 24), involved her in the troubles of the civil wars. While he was besieging Dec. Brutus in Mutina, A.C. 43, Julia exerted her own and her family's influence in Rome to prevent his being outlawed by the senate (App. B.C. iii. 51), and after the triumvirate was formed, she rescued her brother, L. Julius Caesar [CAESAR, No. 11], from her son, and interceded with him for many rich and high-born women whose wealth exposed them to proscription. (App. B.C. iii. 32.) In the Perusine war, A.C. 41, Julia fled from Rome, although Augustus had uniformly treated her with kindness, and now upbraided her distrust of him, to Sext. Pompey in Sicily, by whom she was sent with a distinguished escort and convoy of triremes to M. Antony in Greece. (App. B.C. v. 52, 63.) At Athens Julia forwarded a reconciliation of the triumvirs, and returned with her son to Italy in A.C. 39, and was probably present at their meeting with Sext. Pompey at Misenum. (Plut. Ant. 19; Dion Cass. xlviii. 8, xlviii. 16; Cic. Phil. ii. 6, 8; Schol. Bob. in Vat. p. 321, Orelli.)

3. The elder of the two sisters of Caesar the dictator, married, but in what order is uncertain, L. Pinarius, of a very ancient patrician family (Liv. i. 7), and Q. Pedius, by each of whom she had at least one son. (App. B.C. iii. 22, 23; Suet. Caes. 83.) It is doubtful whether it was the elder or the younger of the dictator's sisters who gave her evidence against P. Clodius [CLODIUS, No. 40], when impeached for impiety in B.C. 61. (Suet. Caes. 74; Schol. Bob. in Clod. p. 337, Orelli.)

4. The younger sister of Caesar the dictator, was the wife of M. Atius Balbus [BALBUS ATTIUS], by whom she had Atia, the mother of Augustus [ATIA]. Julia died in B.C. 52—51, when her grandson, Augustus, was in his twelfth year (Suet. Aug. 8; Quint. xii. 6), and he pronounced her funeral oration. Nicolaus of Damascus (c. 3), indeed, places her decease three years earlier, in her grandson's ninth year, and, as a contemporary, his evidence might be preferable, were there not apparent in his narrative a wish to exalt the genius of Augustus by abating from his age at the time he pronounced the oration. (See Weichert, de Imp. Caes. Aug. Script. i. p. 11, Grimes, 1835.)

5. Daughter of Caesar the dictator, by Cornelia [CORNELIA, 2], and his only child in marriage (Tac. Ann. iii. 6). She was born A.C. 83—82, and was betrothed to Servilius Caepio [CAEPIO, No. 14], but married Cn. Pompey, B.C. 59. This family-alliance of its two great chiefs was regarded as the firmest bond of the so-called first triumvirate, and was accordingly viewed with much alarm by the oligarchal party in Rome, especially by Cicero and Cato (Cic. ad Att. ii. 17, viii. 3; Plut. Caes. 14, Pomp. 48, Cat. Min. 31; App. B.C. ii. 14; Suet. Caes. 50; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 9; Gell. iv. 10. § 5; comp. August. Civ. Dot. iii. 13). The personal charms of Julia were remarkable; her talents and virtues equalled her beauty; and although policy prompted her union, and she was twenty-three years younger than her husband, she possessed in Pompey a devoted husband, to whom she was, in return, devotedly attached. (Plut. Pomp. 48, 53.) It was not the least fortunate circumstance in Julia's life that she died before a breach between her husband and father had become inevitable. (Vell. Pat. ii. 44, 47; Flor. iv. 2. § 13; Plut. Pomp. 53; Lucan, i. 113.) At the election of aediles in A.C. 55, Pompey was surrounded by a tumultuous mob, and his gown was sprinkled with blood of the rioters. The slave who carried to his house on the Carinae the stained toga was seen by Julia, who, imagining that her husband was slain, fell into premature labour (Val. Max. iv. 6. § 4; Plut. Pomp. 53), and her constitution received an irreparable shock. In the September of the next year, B. C. 54, she died in childbed, and her infant—a son, according to some writers (Vell. ii. 47; Suet. Caes. 26; comp. Lucan. v. 474, ix. 1049), a daughter, according to others (Plut. Pomp. 53; Dion Cass. xxxix. 64).—survived her only a few days (Id. xl. 44). Pompey wished her ashes to repose in his favourite Alban villa, but the Roman people, who loved Julia, determined they should rest in the field of Mars. For permission a special decree of the senate was necessary, and L. Domitius Ahenobarbus [AHENOBARBUS, No. 7], one of the consuls of B. C. 54, impelled by his hatred to Pompey and Caesar, procured an interdict from the tribunes. But the popular will prevailed, and, after listening to a funeral oration in the forum, the people placed her urn in the Campus Martius. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 64; comp. xlviii. 53.) It was remarked, as a singular omen, that on the day Augustus entered the city as Caesar's adoptive son, the monument of Julia was struck by lightning (Suet. Octav. 95; comp. Caes. 84). Caesar was in Britain, according to Seneca (Cons. ad Marc. 14), when he received the tidings of Julia's death. (Comp. Cic. ad Quint. fr. iii. 1, ad Att. iv. 17.) He vowed games to her manes, which he exhibited in B. C. 46. (Dion Cass. xliii. 23; Suet. Caes. 26; Plut. Caes. 55.)

6. Daughter of Augustus by Scribonia [SCRIBONIA], and his only child. She was born in B. C. 39, and was but a few days old when her mother was divorced. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 34.) Julia was educated with great strictness. The manners of the imperial court were extremely simple, and the accomplishments of her rank and station were diversified by the labours of the loom and the needle. (Suet. Aug. 73.) A daily register was kept of her studies and occupations; her words, actions, and associates were jealously watched; and her father gravely reproached L. Vinicius, a youth of unexceptionable birth and character, for addressing Julia at Baiae (Suet. Aug. 63, 64). She married, B. C. 25, M. Marcellus, her first cousin, the son of Octavia (Dion Cass. liii. 27), and, after his death, B. C. 23, without issue, M. Vipsanius Agrippa [AGRIFFA, M. VIPSANIUS] (Dion Cass. liii. 30, liv. 6; Plut. Ant. 87; Suet. Aug. 63), by whom she had three sons, C. and L. Caesar, and Agrippa Postumus, and two daughters, Julia and Agrippina. She accompanied Agrippa to Asia Minor in B. C. 17, and narrowly escaped drowning in the Scamander. (Nic. Dam. p. 225, ed. Coray; Joseph. Antiq. xvi. 2. § 2.) After Agrippa's death in B. C. 12, Augustus meditated taking a husband for his daughter from the equestrian order, and C. Proculeius was at the time thought likely to have been preferred by him. (Tac. Ann. iv. 39, 40; Suet. Aug. 63; Plin. N. H. vii. 45; Dion Cass. liv. 3; Hor. Carm. ii. 2, 5.) According, indeed, to one account (Suet. L. c.; Dion Cass. xlviii. 54, li. 15; Suet. L. c.), he had actually betrothed her to a son of M. Antony, and to Cotiso, a king of the Getae [COTISO]; but his choice at length fell on Tiberius Nero, who was afterwards Caesar. (Vell. ii. 96; Suet. Tib. 7; Dion Cass. liv. 31.) Their union, however, was neither happy nor lasting. After the death of their infant son at Aquileia, Tiberius, partly in disgust at Julia's levities (Suet. Tib. 8), went, in B. C. 6, into voluntary exile, and before he returned to Italy, Augustus had somewhat tardily discovered the misconduct of his daughter. With some allowance for the malignity of her step-mother Livia, for the corruptions of the age and the court, and for the prejudices of writers either favourable to Tiberius, or who wrote after her disgrace, the vices of Julia admit of little doubt, and her indiscretion probably exceeded her vices. Her frank and lively temperament broke through the politic decorum of the palace, her ready wit disdained prudence, and created enemies; the forum and the rostra were the scenes of her nocturnal orgies; and, if we may judge by their names, her companions were taken indifferently from the highest and the lowest orders in Rome. (Vell. i. 100; Dion Cass. lv. 10; Suet. Aug. 19, 64; Macrob. Sat. i. 11, vi. 5.) Her father's indignation on discovering what all Rome knew, was unbounded; he threatened her with death, he condemned her to exile, and imprudently revealed to the senate the full extent of his domestic shame. To all solicitations for her recall—which towards the end of his reign were frequent, for the people loved Julia, and dreaded Livia and Tiberius—he replied with the hope that the petitioners themselves might have similar daughters and wives. He called her a disease in his flesh; repeatedly wished himself childless; and when Phoebe, one of Julia's freedwomen, slew herself to avoid the punishment liberally inflicted on the partners of her mistress's revels, he exclaimed, "Would I had been Phoebe's father!" (Dion Cass. lv. 10; Suet. Aug. 65.) If, however, Pliny's assertion is credible, that Julia had engaged in a conspiracy against her father's life, his anger is intelligible (Plin. H. N. vii. 45), and, at a later period of his reign, she seems to have been an object of interest to the disaffected. (Suet. Aug. 19.) Julia was first banished to Pandataria, an island on the coast of Campania. Her mother Scribonia shared her exile, but this was the only alleviation of her sufferings: wine, all the delicacies, and most of the comforts of life, were denied her, and no one, of whatever condition, was permitted to approach her place of seclusion without special licence from Augustus himself. At the end of five years she was removed to Rhegium, where her privations were somewhat relaxed, but she was never suffered to quit the bounds of the city. Even the testament of Augustus showed the inflexibility of his anger. He bequeathed her no legacy, and forbade her ashes to repose in his mausoleum. On the accession of Tiberius her exile was enforced with new rigour. Her former allowance was diminished and often withheld; her just claims on her father's personal estate were disregarded; she was kept in close and solitary confinement in one house; and in A. D. 14, consumption, hastened if not caused by grief and want of necessities, terminated, in the 54th year of her age, the life of the guilty, but equally unfortunate, daughter of the master of the Roman world. (Suet. Tib. 50; Tac. Ann. i. 53.) Macrobius (Sat. vi. 5) has preserved several specimens of Julia's conversational wit, and has sketched her intellectual character with less prejudice than usually marks the accounts of her.

There are only Greek coins of Julia extant, with the exception of denarii, struck by the moneyers of Augustus, bearing on the obverse a bare head of Augustus, and on the reverse a garlanded head of Julia, having the heads of C. and L. Caesar on either side. The annexed is a Greek coin, having on the obverse the head of Julia, and on the reverse that of Pallas.

COIN OF JULIA, DAUGHTER OF AUGUSTUS.

7. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of L. Aemilius Paullus, by whom she had M. Aemilius Lepidus (Dion Cass. lix. 11; Suet. Calig. 24) and Aemilia, first wife of the emperor Claudius. (Suet. Claud. 26.) Less celebrated than her mother, Julia inherited her vices and misfortunes. For adulterous intercourse with D. Silanus (Tac. Ann. iii. 24), she was banished by her grandfather Augustus to the little island Tremura, on the coast of Apulia, A. D. 9, where she survived twenty years, dependent on the ostentatious bounty of the empress Livia. A child, born after her disgrace, was, by order of Augustus, exposed as spurious. Julia died in A. D. 28, and was buried in her place of exile, since, like her mother's, her ashes were interdicted the mausoleum of Augustus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 71; Suet. Aug. 64, 65, 101; Schol. in Juv. Sat. vi. 158.) It was probably this Julia whom Ovid celebrated as Corinna in his elegies and other erotic poems.

8. The youngest child of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born in A. D. 18. (Tac. Ann. ii. 54.) She married M. Vinicius in 33. (Id. 16, vi. 15; Dion Cass. lviii. 21.) Her brother Caligula, who was believed to have had an incestuous intercourse with her, banished her in A. D. 37. (Dion Cass. lix. 3; Suet. Cal. 24, 29.) She was recalled by Claudius. (Dion Cass. lx. 4; Suet. Cal. 59.) He afterwards put her to death at Messalina's instigation, who envied the beauty, dreaded the influence, and resented the haughtiness of Julia. (Dion Cass. lx. 8; Suet. Claud. 29; Zonar. xi. 8; Sen. de Mort. Claud.) The charge brought against her was adultery, and Seneca, the philosopher, was banished to Corsica as the partner of her guilt (Dion Cass. l.c.). She is sometimes called Livilla, and Livia (Suet. Cal. 7, Oudendorp's note ad loc.). Josephus (Antiq. xix. 4 § 3) makes Julia to have married M. Minucianus.

9. Daughter of Drusus [DRUSUS CAESAR, No. 16] and Livia, the sister of Germanicus. She married, A. D. 20, her first cousin, Nero, son of Germanicus and Agrippina (Tac. Ann. iii. 29; Dion Cass. lviii. 21), and was one of the many spies with whom her mother and Sejanus surrounded that unhappy prince. (Tac. Ann. iv. 60.) After Nero's death Julia married Rubellius Plandus, by whom she had a son, Rubellius Plantus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 27, 45, xvi. 10; Juv. Sat. vii. 40.) [BLANDUS.] As Plandus was merely the grandson of a Roman eque of Tibur, the marriage was considered degrading to Julia. She too, like the preceding, incurred the hatred of Messalina, and, at her instigation, was put to death by Claudius, A. D. 59. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43; Dion Cass. lx. 18; Suet. Claud. 29; Sen. de Mort. Claud.)

10. A daughter of Titus, the son of Vespasian, by Furnilla. She married Flavius Sabinus, a nephew of the emperor Vespasian. Julia died of abortion, caused by her uncle Domitian, with whom she lived in criminal intercourse. She was interred in the temple of the Flavian Gens, and Domitian's ashes were subsequently placed with hers by their common nurse, Phyllis. (Suet. Dom. 17, 22; Dion Cass. lxvii. 3; Plin. Ep. iv. 11. § 6; Juv. Sat. ii. 52; Philost. Vit. Apoll. Tyran. vii. 3.)

Several coins of Julia are extant: she is represented on the obverse of the one annexed with the legend IVLIA AVGVSTA TITI AVGVSTI P.; the reverse represents Venus leaning on a column, with the legend VENVS AVGVST. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF JULIA, DAUGHTER OF TITUS.

JULIA DOMNA [DOMNA JULIA].

JULIA DRUSILLA [DRUSILLA, No. 3].

JULIA PROCILLA [PROCILLA JULIA].

JULIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, the members of which attained the highest dignities of the state in the earliest times of the republic. It was without doubt of Alban origin, and it is mentioned as one of the leading Alban houses, which Tullus Hostilius removed to Rome upon the destruction of Alba Longa, and enrolled among the Roman patres (Dionys. iii. 29; Tac. Ann. xi. 24; in Liv. i. 30, the reading should probably be Tullius, and not Julius.) The Julii also existed at an early period at Bovillae, as we learn from a very ancient inscription on an altar in the theatre of that town, which speaks of their offering sacrifices according to Alban rites—lege Albana (Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. vol. i. note 1240, vol. ii. note 421), and their connection with Bovillae is also implied by the chapel (sacrum) which the emperor Tiberius dedicated to the Gens Julia in the town, and in which he placed the statue of Augustus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 41.) It is not impossible that some of the Julii may have settled at Bovillae after the fall of Alba.

As it became the fashion in the later times of the republic to claim a divine origin for the most distinguished of the Roman gentes, it was contended that Iulus, the mythical ancestor of the race, was the same as Ascanius, the son of Venus and Anchises, and that he was the founder of Alba Longa. In order to prove the identity of Ascanius and Iulus, recourse was had to etymology, some specimens of which the reader curious in such matters will find in Servius (ad Virg. Aen. i. 267: comp. Liv. i. 3). The dictator Caesar frequently alluded to the divine origin of his race, as, for instance, in the funeral oration which he pronounced when quaestor over his aunt Julia (Suet. Caes. 6), and in giving "Venus Genetrix" as the word to his soldiers at the battles of Pharsalus and Munda, and subsequent writers and poets were ready enough to fall in with a belief which flattered the pride and exalted the origin of the imperial family.

Though it would seem that the Julii first came to Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, the name occurs in Roman legend as early as the time of Romulus. It was Proculus Julius who was said to have informed the sorrowing Roman people, after the strange departure of Romulus from the world, that their king had descended from heaven and appeared to him, bidding him tell the people to honour him in future as a god, under the name of Quirinus. (Liv. i. 16; Ov. Fast. ii. 499, &c.) Some modern critics have inferred from this, that a few of the Julii might have settled in Rome in the reign of the first king; but considering the entirely fabulous nature of the tale, and the circumstance that the celebrity of the Julia Gens in later times would easily lead to its connection with the earliest times of Roman story, no historical argument can be drawn from the mere name occurring in this legend.

The family names of this gens in the time of the republic are CAESAR, IULUS, MENTO, and LIBO, of which the first three were undoubtedly patrician; but the only two families which obtained any celebrity are those of Iulus and Caesar, the former in the first and the latter in the last century of the republic. On coins the only names which we find are CAESAR and BURSIO, the latter of which does not occur in ancient writers.

In the times of the empire we find an immense number of persons of the name of Julius; but it must not be supposed that they were connected by descent in any way with the Julia Gens; for, in consequence of the imperial family belonging to this gens, it became the name of their numerous freedmen, and may have been assumed by many other persons out of vanity and ostentation. An alphabetical list of the principal persons of the name, with their cognomina, is given below. [JULIUS.] (On the Julia Gens in general, see Klausen, Aeneas und die Penaten, vol. ii. p. 1059, &c.; Drumann's Rom., vol. iii. p. 114, &c.)

JULIANUS, historical. 1. A Roman general, who distinguished himself in the war against the Dacians in the reign of the emperor Domitian. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 10.)

2. A distinguished Roman of the time of the emperor Commodus, who at first highly esteemed him, and appointed him praefectus praetorio, but afterwards treated him most disgracefully, and at last ordered him to be put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 14; Lamprid. Commod. 7, 11.) [L. S.]

JULIANUS (Ἰουλιανός), literary. 1. A Chaldaean, surnamed Theurgus, i. e. the magician, lived in the time of the emperor M. Aurelius, whose army he is said to have saved from destruction by a shower of rain, which he called down by his magic power. Suidas (s. v.) attributes to him also several works, viz. Θεουργικά, τελεστικά, and a collection of oracles in hexameter verse. His pursuits show that he was a New Platonist, and it would seem that he enjoyed a great reputation, since Porphyry wrote upon him a work in four books, which is lost. A. Mai has discovered in Vatican MSS. three fragments relating to astrological subjects (Novae Script. Class. Collect. ii. p. 675), and attributed to one Julianus of Laodicea, whom Mai considered to be the same as Julianus the Magician.

2. Surnamed the Egyptian, because he was for a time governor of Egypt. The Greek Anthology contains seventy-one epigrams which bear his name, and in which the author appears as an imitator of earlier poems of the same kind. They are mostly of a descriptive character, and refer to works of art. Julianus probably lived in the reign of Justinian, for among his epigrams there are two upon Hypatius, the nephew of the emperor Anastasius, who was put to death A. D. 532, by the command of Justinian. Another epigram is written upon Joannes, the grandson of Hypatius. (Brunck, Anth. ii. 493; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. iii. 195; comp. xiii. p. 906.)

3. Of Caesarea in Cappadocia, was a contemporary of Aedesius, and a disciple of Maximus of Ephesus. He was one of the sophists of the time, and taught rhetoric at Athens, where he enjoyed a great reputation, and attracted youths from all parts of the world, who were anxious to hear him and receive his instruction. It is not known whether Julianus wrote any works or not. (Eunap. Vit. Soph. p. 68, &c. ed. Boisson., and Wyttenbach's notes, Ibid. p. 250, &c.)

4. A Greek grammarian, who, according to Photius (Bibl. cod. 150), wrote a dictionary to the ten Attic orators, entitled Λεξικὸν τῶν κατὰ τοὺς δέκα ῥητόρων λέξεων κατὰ στοιχείων; but this, like other similar works, is entirely lost. Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 245) considers its author to be the same as the Julianus to whom Phrynichus dedicates the fourth book of his work. [L. S.]

JULIANUS, ANTONIUS, a friend and contemporary of A. Gellius, who speaks of him as a public teacher of oratory, and praises him for his eloquence as well as for his knowledge of early literature. He appears to have also devoted himself to grammatical studies, the fruits of which he collected in his Commentarii, which, however, are lost. (Gell. iv. 1, ix. 15, xv. 1, xviii. 5, xix. 9, xx. 9.) [L. S.]

JULIANUS, M. AQUILLIUS, was consul in A. D. 38, the second year of the reign of Domitian. (Dion Cass. lix. 9; Frontin. de Aequed. 13. [L. S.] JULIANUS DIDIUS. [Didius.]

COIN OF DIDIVS JULIANUS.

JULIANUS, surnamed ECLANENSIS for the sake of distinction, is conspicuous in the ecclesiastical history of the fifth century as one of the ablest supporters of Pelagius. His father, Memorius or Memor, who is believed to have presided over the see of Capua, was connected by close friendship with St. Augustine and Paulinus of Nola, the latter of whom celebrated the nuptials of the son with Ia, daughter of Aemilius, bishop of Beneventum, in a poem breathing the warmest affection towards the different members of the family. Julianus early in life devoted himself to the duties of the priesthood, and after passing through the subordinate grades of reader, deacon, and probably presbyter also, was ordained to the episcopal charge of Eclanum in Apulia, by Innocentius, about A. D. 416. No suspicion seems to have attached to his orthodoxy until he refused to sign the Tractoria or public denunciation of Coelestius and Pelagius, forwarded by Zosimus in 418 to the authorities of the Christian church throughout the world. This act of contumacy, in which he was supported by many prelates of Southern Italy and Sicily, was soon followed by the banishment of himself and his adherents in terms of the imperial edict. Quitting his native country, he repaired to Constantinople, but being driven from thence, took refuge in Cilicia with Theodorus of Mopsuestia, with whom he remained for several years. In 428 we find him again at Constantinople, patronised by Nestorius, who addressed two letters to pope Coelestinus on behalf of the exile. But in 429 Marius Mercator arrived, and by the charges contained in the Commenolium [MARIUS MERCATOR], presented to Theodosius, procured the expulsion of the heretics from the capital of the East. Having been formally condemned by the great council of Ephesus, in 431, Julianus appears to have lived in obscurity until 439, when he made a last desperate effort to recover his station and privileges; but the attempt having been frustrated by the firmness of Sixtus III., his name from this time forward disappears entirely from history, if we except the statement of Gennadius, who records that he died under Valentinian, and therefore not later than A. D. 455, having previously swelled the number of his followers by distributing his whole fortune among the poor, to alleviate their sufferings during a famine.

No work of Julianus undoubtedly genuine has been transmitted to us entire, and his merits as an author are known only from mutilated fragments contained in the writings of his theological opponents. We find traces of the following:—

1. Epistola ad Zosimum, composed probably in 418, quoted by Marius Mercator in the sixth and ninth chapters of his Subnotationes [MARIUS MERCATOR]. The different passages are collected and arranged by Garnier (Diss. V. ad Mar. Mercat. vol. i. p. 333). 2. Epistola communis ei cum plurimis Pelagianis episcopis quam Thessalonicam miserunt. Such is the title given by St. Augustine to the epistle which he undertook to refute, in four books, addressed to pope Bonifacius. The fragments will be found placed in order in Garnier's edition of Mercator. See above. 3. Libri IV., ad Turbantium episcopum, adversus librum primum Augustini de Concupiscentia, written about 419. Considerable fragments, of the first book especially, are included in the second book of Augustine, De Nuptiis, in his Libri VI. contra Julianum, and in his Opus Imperfectum. (Garnier, App. ad Diss. VI. de Scriptis pro Haeresi Pelagiana, p. 388, and Diss. VI. p. 349.) 4. Libri de Constantio Bono contra Perfidiam Manichaei, written, according to Garnier, after the expulsion of Julianus from his bishopric. A few fragments have been preserved by Beda. (See Garnier, as above.) 5. Libri VIII. ad Florum Episcopum adversus secundum librum Augustini de Nuptiis et Concupiscentia, written, according to Garnier, in Cilicia, and published about 426. The first five books, or perhaps six, are given entire in the Opus imperfectum of Augustine. (Garnier, Mercatoris Op. vol. i. p. 34.) 6. Libri de Amore, sive Commentarius in Cantica Canticoorum, mentioned by Beda alone, who remarks that it was divided into two books, the first being devoted to a dissertation on Love, the second embracing the commentary. For the fragments and various speculations concerning the history of this piece, see Garnier, Append. ad Diss. VI. vol. i. p. 388.

The Epistola ad Demetriadem, which really belongs to Pelagius [PELAGIUS], and the Libellus Fidei, published from a Verona MS. by Garnier. 8vo. Par. 1668, have been erroneously ascribed to Julianus.

(Gennad. de Vir. Illust. 45. Every thing that can be ascertained with regard to Julianus or his productions will be found in the dissertations attached to Garnier's edition of Marius Mercator, and in the annotations upon those works of St. Augustine directed specially against this heretic. See also Voss. Hist. Pelag. i. 6; Schönemann, Bibl. Patr. Lat. vol. ii. § 18, where much information is exhibited in a condensed form.) [W.R.]

JULIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed APOSTATA, "the Apostate," Roman emperor, A.D. 361—363, was born at Constantinople on the 17th of November, A. D. 331 (332?). He was the son of Julius Constantius by his second wife, Basilina, the grandson of Constantius Chlorus by his second wife, Theodora, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. [See the Genealogical Table, Vol. I. pp. 831, 832.]

Julian and his elder brother, Flavius Julius Gallus, who was the son of Julius Constantius by his first wife, Galla, were the only members of the imperial family whose lives were spared by Constantius II., the son of Constantine the Great, when, upon his accession, he ordered the massacre of all the male descendants of Constantine Chlorus and his second wife, Theodora. Both Gallus and Julian were of too tender an age to be dangerous to Constantius, who accordingly spared their lives, but had them educated in strict confinement at different places in Ionia and Bithynia, and afterwards in the castle of Macellum near Caesarea; and we know from Julian's own statement in his epistle to the senate and people of Athens, that, although they were treated with all the honours due to their birth, they felt most unhappy in their royal prison, being surrounded by spies who were to report the least of their words and actions to a jealous and bloodthirsty tyrant. However, they received a careful and learned education, and were brought up in the principles of the Christian religion: their teachers were Nicetas Luco, a grammarian, and Eccebolus, a rhetorician, who acted under the superintendence of the eunuch Mandonius, probably a pagan in secret, and of Eusebius, an Arian, afterwards bishop of Nicomedia. Gallus was the first who was released from his slavery by being appointed Caesar in A. D. 351, and governor of the East, and it was through his mediation that Julian obtained more liberty. The conduct of Gallus in his government, and his execution by Constantius in A. D. 354, are detailed elsewhere. [CONSTANTIUS II., p. 848.] Julian was now in great danger, and the emperor would probably have sacrificed him to his jealousy but for the circumstance that he had no male issue himself, and that Julian was consequently the only other surviving male of the imperial family. Constantius was satisfied with removing Julian from Asia to Italy, and kept him for some time in close confinement at Milan, where he lived surrounded by spies, and in constant fear of sharing the fate of his brother. Owing to the mediation of the empress Eusebia, an excellent woman, who loved Julian with the tenderness of a sister, the young prince obtained an interview with Constantius, and having succeeded in calming the emperor's suspicions, was allowed to lead a private life at Athens (A. D. 355). Athens was then the centre of Greek learning, and there Julian spent a short but delightful period in intercourse with the most celebrated philosophers, scholars, and artists of the time, and in the society of a company of young men who were devoted to the pursuit of knowledge, and among whom was Gregory Nazianzen, who became afterwards so celebrated as a Christian orator. Among those learned men Julian was not the least in renown, and he attracted universal attention both by his talents and his knowledge. The study of Greek literature and philosophy was his principal and favourite pursuit. He had been brought up by Greeks and among Greeks, and his predilection for whatever was Greek was of course very natural; but he did not neglect Latin literature, and we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus (xvi. 5), that he had a fair knowledge of the Latin language, which was then still spoken at the court of Constantinople. While Julian lived in happy retirement at Athens, the emperor was bent down by the weight of public affairs, and the empire being exposed to the invasions of the Persians in the east, and of the Germans and Sarmatians in the west and the north, he followed the advice of Eusebia, in opposition to his eunuchs, in conferring the rank of Caesar upon Julian, who was accordingly recalled from Athens and summoned to Milan, where Constantius was residing. Julian obeyed reluctantly: the Greek Minerva had more charms for him than the Roman Jupiter, and he was too well acquainted with the mythology of his ancestors not to know that even the embraces of Jupiter are sometimes fatal. On the 6th of November, A. D. 355, Julian was solemnly proclaimed Caesar, and received, as a guarantee of the emperor's sincerity, the hand of his sister Helena, who was the youngest child of Constantine the Great. At the same time he was invested with the government of the provinces beyond the Alps, but some time elapsed before he set out for Gaul, where he was to reside, and during this time he began to accustom himself to behave with that composure and artificial dignity which suited a person of his exalted station, but which corresponded so little with his taste and habits. When he first entered upon public life he was timid and clumsy, and he used afterwards to laugh at his own awkwardness on those occasions. The internal peace of Gaul was still suffering from the consequences of the revolt of Sylvanus, and her frontiers were assailed by the Germans, who had crossed the Rhine, burnt Straßburg, Trèves, Cologne, and many other flourishing cities, and made devastating inroads into the midland provinces of Gaul. Accustomed to the quiet occupations of a scholar, Julian seemed little fitted for the command in the field, but he found an experienced lieutenant in the person of the veteran general Sallustius, and the wisdom he had learned in the schools of Greece was not merely theoretical philosophy, but virtue: temperate to the extreme, he despised the luxuries of a Roman court, and his food and bed were not better than those of a common soldier. In his administration he was just and forbearing; and never discouraged by adversity nor inflated by success, he showed himself worthy to reign over others, because he could reign over himself.

in Dauphiné), he set out in the spring of 356 to drive the barbarians back over the Rhine. In this campaign he fought against the Alemanni, the invaders of Southern Gaul. He made their first acquaintance near Rheims, and paid dearly for it: they fell unexpectedly upon his rear, and two legions were cut to pieces. But as he nevertheless advanced towards the Rhine, it seems that the principal disadvantage of his defeat was only a loss of men. In the following spring (357) he intended to cross the Rhine, and to penetrate into the country of the Alemanni; and he would have executed his plan but for the strange conduct of the Roman general Barbatio, who was on his march from Italy with an army of 25,000, or perhaps 30,000 men, in order to effect his junction with Julian. A sufficient number of boats was collected at Basel for the purpose of throwing a bridge over the Rhine, and provisions were kept there for supporting his troops, but Barbatio remained inactive on the left bank, and proved his treacherous designs by burning both the ships and the provisions. In consequence of this, Julian was compelled to adopt the defensive, and the Alemanni, headed by their king Chnodomarius, crossed the Rhine, and took up a position near Straßburg (August, A. D. 357). Their army was 35,000 strong: Julian had only 13,000 veterans; but he did not decline the engagement, and, after a terrible conflict, he gained a decisive victory, which was chiefly owing to the personal valour of the young prince. Six thousand of the barbarians remained on the field, perhaps as many were slain in their flight or drowned in the Rhine, and their king Chnodomarius was made prisoner. The loss of the Romans in this memorable battle is stated by Ammianus Marcellinus to have been only 243 privates and four officers; but this is not credible. Chnodomarius was well treated by Julian, who sent him to the court of Constantius. [CHNODOMARIUS.]

Immediately after this victory Julian invaded the territory of the Alemanni on the right bank of the Rhine, but more for the purpose of exhibiting his power than of making any permanent conquests, for he advanced only a few miles, and then returned and led his troops against the Franks, who had conquered the tract between the Scheldt, the Maas, and the Lower Rhine. Some of the Frankish tribes he drove back into Germany, and others he allowed to remain in Gaul, on condition of their submitting to the Roman authority. Upon this he invaded Germany a second time, in 358, and a third time in 359, in order to make the Alemanni desist from all further attempts upon Gaul, and he not only succeeded, but returned with 20,000 Romans, whom the Alemanni had taken, and whom he compelled them to give up.

The peace of Gaul being now established, Julian exerted himself to rebuild the cities that had been ruined on the frontiers of Germany: among those rebuilt and fortified by him were Bingen, Andernach, Bonn, and Neuss, and, without doubt, Cologne also, as this city had been likewise laid in ashes by the Germans. As the constant inroads of the barbarians had interrupted all agricultural pursuits in those districts, there was a great scarcity of corn, but Julian procured an abundant supply by sending six hundred barges to England, which came back with a sufficient quantity for both grinding and sowing. The minimum of the quantity of corn thus exported from England has been calculated at 120,000 quarters, and it has been justly observed that the state of agriculture in this country must have been in an advanced condition, since so much corn could be exported nearly altogether at the same time. Julian bestowed the same care upon the other provinces of Gaul, and the country evidently recovered under his administration, although the power with which he was invested was by no means extensive enough to check the system of rapacity and oppression which characterises the government of the later Roman emperors. His usual residence was Paris: he caused the large island in the Seine, which is now called l'île de la Cité, and whereupon stood ancient Paris or Lutetia, to be surrounded by a stone wall and towers, and he built the Thermae Juliani, a palace with baths, the extensive remains of which, "les thermes de Julien," are still visible in the Rue de la Harpe, between the palace of Cluny and the School of Medicine.

While Julian became more and more popular in the provinces entrusted to his administration, and his fame was spreading all over the empire, Constantius once more gave way to the suggestions of jealousy and distrust, and believed that Julian aimed at popularity in order to gain for himself the supreme authority. It happened that in A. D. 360 the eastern provinces were again threatened by the Persians. Constantius commanded Julian to send to the frontiers of Persia four of his best legions and a number of picked soldiers from his other troops, apparently that he might be able to apprehend him, which it was impossible to do while he was surrounded by so many thousands of devoted warriors. This order surprised Julian in April 360: to obey it was to expose Gaul to new inroads of the Germans, and Britain to the ravages of the Scots and Picts, whose incursions had assumed such a dangerous character that Julian had just despatched Lupicinus to defend the island; but to disobey the order was open revolt. His soldiers also were unwilling to march into Asia; but Julian, notwithstanding the dangers that awaited him, resolved to obey, and endeavoured to persuade his troops to submit quietly to the will of their master. His endeavours were in vain. In the night large bodies of soldiers surprised the palace of Julian, and proclaimed him emperor. He had hid himself in his apartments; but they soon discovered him, dragged him, though respectfully, before the assembled troops, and compelled him to accept the crown. Upon this he despatched Pentadius and Eutherius with a conciliatory message to Constantius, in which, however, he positively demanded to be acknowledged as Augustus, and to be invested with the supreme authority in those provinces over which he had ruled as Caesar, viz. Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The conditions of Julian were haughtily declined; and after a considerable time had elapsed in fruitless negotiations, which Julian employed in making two more expeditions beyond the Rhine against the Franks and the Alemanni, he at last resolved to wage open war, and to march upon Constantinople. His army was numerous and well disciplined, and the frontier along the Rhine in an excellent state of defence: his troops, who had refused leaving Gaul without him, now joyfully left it with him. Meanwhile, Constantius likewise collected a strong army, and gave directions for the defence of his capital from Antioch, from whence he had superintended the Persian war. Informed of his plans, Julian resolved to thwart them by quickness and energy. At Basel on the Rhine he divided his army into two corps: one, commanded by Novitia, was to march through Rhaetia and Noricum; the other, under the orders of Jovius and Jovinus, was to cross the Alps and march through the north-eastern corner of Italy: both divisions were to unite at Sirmium, a town on the Sava, now Save. Julian, at the head of a small but chosen body of 3000 veterans, plunged into the wildernesses of the Marican, now Black Forest; and for some time the rival of Constantius seemed to be lost in those dark glens whence issue the sources of the Danube. But when Novitia, Jovius and Jovinus arrived at Sirmium, they beheld, to their joy and astonishment, the active Julian with his band, who had descended the Danube and had already defeated the extreme outposts of Lucilian, the lieutenant of Constantius in those regions.

From Sirmium Julian moved upon Constantinople: the officers of Constantius fled before him, but the inhabitants received him with acclamations of joy; and at Athens, Rome, and other important cities, he was either publicly or privately acknowledged as emperor, having previously sent explanatory letters to the authorities of those distant places. Informed of the unexpected appearance of Julian on the Danube, Constantius set out from Syria to defend his capital; and a terrible civil war threatened to desolate Italy and the East, when Constantius suddenly died at Mopsocrene in Cilicia, on the third of November, A. D. 361, leaving the whole empire to the undisputed possession of Julian. On the 11th of December following, Julian made his triumphal entrance into Constantinople. Shortly afterwards the mortal remains of Constantius arrived in the Golden Horn, and were buried by Julian in the church of the Holy Apostles with great solemnity and magnificence.

While Julian thus gave a Christian burial to the body of his rival, he had long ceased to be a Christian himself. According to Julian's own statement (Epist. ii.), he was a Christian up to his twentieth year; and the manner in which he praises his tutor, Mardonius, seems to imply that Mardonius and the philosopher Maximus first caused him to love the religion of the ancient Greeks, without, however, precisely estranging him from the Christian religion, which seems to have been the effect of his study of the ancient Greek philosophers. The vile hypocrisy of the base and cruel Constantius, the conviction of Julian that Constantine the Great had at first protected, and afterwards embraced, Christianity from mere political motives, the persecuting spirit manifested equally by the Orthodox and Arians against one another,—had also a great share in the conversion of Julian. During ten years he dissembled his apostasy, which was, however, known to many of his friends, and early suspected by his own brother Gallus: and it was not till he had succeeded to the throne that he publicly avowed himself a pagan. Our space does not allow us to enter into the details of his apostasy, and we must refer the reader to the sources cited below. His apostasy was no sooner known than the Christians feared a cruel persecution, and the heathens hoped that paganism would be forced upon all who were not heathens; but they were both disappointed by an edict of Julian, in which he proclaimed a perfect toleration of all parties. He was not, however, impartial in his conduct towards the Christians, since he preferred pagans as his civil and military officers, forbade the Christians to teach rhetoric and grammar in the schools, and, in order to annoy them, allowed the Jews to rebuild their great temple at Jerusalem*, and compelled the followers of Jesus to pay money towards the erection of pagan temples, and, in some instances, to assist in building them. Had Julian lived longer he would have seen that his apostasy was not followed by those effects, either religious or political, which he flattered himself would take place: he would have learnt that paganism, as he understood it, was not the religion of the great mass of pagans, and that paganism, as it actually existed, was a rotten institution, destitute of all religious and moral discipline; and he would have witnessed that, however divided the Christians were, there was something better and healthier in Christianity than futile subjects for subtle controversies.

Soon after his accession Julian set out for Antioch, where he remained some time busy in organising a powerful army for the invasion, and perhaps subjugation, of Persia. The people of Antioch received him coolly: they were Christians, but also the most frivolous and luxurious people in the East, and they despised the straightforward and somewhat rustic manners of an emperor who had formed his character among stern Celts and Germans. At Antioch Julian made the acquaintance of the orator Libanius; but the latter was unable to reconcile the emperor to the sort of life which prevailed in that splendid city. He therefore withdrew to Tarsus in Cilicia, where he took up his winter-quarters. In the following spring (March, 363) he set out for Persia. The different corps of his army met at Hierapolis, where they passed the Euphrates on a bridge of boats, and thence moved to Carrhæ, now Harran, a town in Mesopotamia about fifty miles E. N. E. from Hierapolis. Julian's plan was to march upon Ctesiphon, but in order to deceive the Persian king, Sapor, he despatched Procopius and Sebastianus with 30,000 men against Nisibis (east of Carrhæ), while he himself wheeled suddenly round to the south, following the course of the Euphrates on its left or Mesopotamian side. Procopius and Sebastianus were to join Arsaces Tiranus, king of Armenia, and Julian expected to effect a junction with their united forces in the environs of Ctesiphon; but the treachery of Arsaces prevented the accomplishment of his plan, as is mentioned below [Compare Vol. I. p. 363, b.]. While Julian marched along the Euphrates in a south-eastern direction, he was accompanied by a fleet of 1100 ships, fifty of which were well-armed galleys, and the rest barges, carrying a vast supply of provisions and military stores. At Circesium, situated on the confluence of the Chaboras, now the Khabur, with the Euphrates, he arrived at the Persian frontier, which ran along the lower part of the Chaboras, and he entered the Persian territory on the 7th of April, 363, at the head of an army of 65,000 veterans. The bridge of the Chaboras was broken down behind them by his orders, to convince the soldiers that a retreat was no plan of their master. From Circesium he continued marching along the Euphrates till he came to that narrow neck of land which separates the Euphrates from the Tigris in the latitude of Ctesiphon. This portion of the route lies partly through a dreary desert, where the Romans experienced some trifling losses from the light Persian horse, who hovered round them, and occasionally picked up stragglers or assailed the rear or the van. Previous to crossing the neck of land, Julian besieged, stormed, and burned Perisabor, a large town on the Euphrates; and while crossing that tract, he was delayed some time under the walls of Maogamalcha, which he likewise took after a short siege and razed to the ground. Julian now accomplished a most difficult and extraordinary task: he conveyed his whole fleet across the above-mentioned neck of land, by an ancient canal called Nahar-Malcha, which, however, he was obliged to deepen before he could trust his ships in such a passage; and, as the canal joined the Tigris below Ctesiphon, he looked for and found an old cut, dug by Trajan, from Colche to a place somewhat above Ctesiphon, which, however, he was likewise compelled to make deeper and broader, so that at last his fleet run safely out into the Tigris. The canal of Nahar-Malcha is now called the canal of Saklawyeh, or Isa; it joins the Tigris a little below Baghdád, and it still affords a communication between the two rivers. Through a very skilful manoeuvre, he brought over his army on the left bank of the Tigris,—a passage not only extremely difficult on account of the rapid current of the Tigris, but rendered still more so through the stout resistance of a Persian army, which, however, was routed and pursued to the walls of Ctesiphon. The city would have been entered by the Romans together with the fugitive Persians, but for the death of their leader, Victor. Julian was now looking out for the arrival of Procopius and Sebastianus, and the main army of the Armenian king, Arsaces or Tiranus. He was sadly disappointed: his lieutenants did not arrive, and Tiranus arranged for a body of his Armenians to desert which had joined the Romans previously, and which now secretly withdrew from the Roman camp at Ctesiphon. Julian nevertheless began the siege of that vast city, which was defended by the flower of the Persian troops, king Sapor, with the main body of his army, not having yet arrived from the interior of Persia. Unable to take the city, and desirous of dispersing the king's army, Julian imprudently followed the advice of a Persian nobleman of great distinction, who appeared in the Roman camp under the pretext of being persecuted by Sapor, and who recommended the emperor to set out in search of the Persian king. In doing so, Julian would have been compelled to abandon his fleet on the Tigris to the attacks of a hostile and infuriated populace: this he avoided by setting fire to his ships,—the best thing he could have done, if his march into the interior of Persia had been dictated by absolute necessity; but as he was not obliged to leave the city, even success would not have compensated for the loss of 1200 ships. In proportion as the Romans advanced eastward, the country became more and more barren, and Sapor remained invisible. The treachery of the Persian noble was discovered after his secret flight, and Julian was obliged to retreat.

He took the direction of the province of Corduene. The Persians now appeared: swarms of light horse were seen hovering round the army; larger bodies followed, and ere long Sapor, with his main army, came in sight, and harassed fearfully the rear of the Romans. Still the Romans remained victorious in many a bloody engagement, especially at Maranga; but it was in the month of June, and the oppressive heat, and the want of water and provisions had a pernicious effect upon the troops. On the 26th of June the Roman rear was suddenly assailed by the Persians, and Julian, who commanded the van, hastened to the relief of the rear without his cuirass, the heat making a heavy armour almost insupportable. The Persians were repulsed, and fled in confusion. Julian was pursuing them with the utmost bravery, when in the middle of the mêlée he was shot by an arrow, that pierced through his liver. He fell from his horse mortally wounded, and was conveyed to his tent. Feeling his death approaching, he took leave of his friends with touching words, but certainly not with that fine and elegant speech with which Ammianus Marcellinus (xxv. 3) makes him bid farewell to the world.

Jovian was chosen emperor in his stead, on the field of battle. [JOVIANUS.]

We cannot enter into a long description of Julian's character. His talents, his principles, and his deeds, were alike extraordinary. His pride was to be called by others and by himself a philosopher, yet many facts prove that he was very superstitious. Most Christian writers abused and calumniated him because he abandoned Christianity: if they had pitied him they would have acted more in accordance with that sublime precept of our religion, which teaches us to forgive our enemies. It must ever be recollected that the bigotry, the hypocrisy, and the uncharitableness, of the majority of the Christians of Julian's time, were some of the principal causes that led to his apostasy. In reading the ancient authorities, the student ought to bear in mind that the heathen writers extol Julian far too high, and that the Christians debase him far too low.

Julian was great as an emperor, unique as a man, and remarkable as an author. He wrote an immense number of works, consisting of orations on various subjects, historical treatises, satires, and letters: most of the latter were intended for public circulation. All these works are very elaborately composed, so much so as to afford a fatiguing and monotonous reading to those who peruse them merely for their merits as specimens of Greek literature; but they are at the same time very important sources for the history and the opinions of the age on religion and philosophy. Julian also tried to write poetry, but he was no poet: he lacks imagination, and his artificial manner of embellishing prose shows that he had no poetical vein. He was a man of reflection and thought, but possessed no creative genius. His style is remarkably pure for his time, and shows that he had not only studied the classical Greek historians and philosophers, but had so far identified himself with his models, that there is scarcely a page in his works where we do not meet with either reminiscences from the classical writers, or visible efforts to express his ideas in the same way as they did. With this painful imitation of his classical models he often unites the exaggerated and over-elaborate style of his contemporaries, and we trace in his writings the influence of the Platonists no less than that of Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, and so many other writers of the golden age. There is, however, one circumstance which reconciles the reader to many of the author's defects: Julian did not merely write for writing's sake, as so many of his contemporaries did, but he shows that he had his subjects really at heart, and that in literature as well as in business his extraordinary activity arose from the wants of a powerful mind, which desired to improve itself and the world. In this respect Julian excites our sympathy much more, for instance, than the rhetorician Libanius.

The following are the editions of the entire works of Julian:—Juliani Imperatoris Opera quae extant, with a Latin translation by P. Martinus and C. Cantoclarus, and the author's life by Martinus, Paris, 1583, 8vo.: Juliani Opera, quae quidem reperiri potuerunt, omnia, Paris, 1630, 4to., by Petavius, with notes and a Latin translation. A better edition than either of the two preceding is:—Juliani Imperatoris Opera, quae supersunt omnia, Leipzig, 1696, fol., by Ezechiel Spanheim, who perused an excellent codex, which enabled him to publish a much purer text than Petavius, and he added the notes of Petavius and his translation, which he corrected, as well as an excellent commentary of his own. This edition contains 63 letters of Julian. Spanheim further added to it S. Cyrilli, Alexandrini Archiepiscopi, contra impium Julianum Libri Decem, which is the more valuable as Cyrillus was one of the most able adversaries of Julian, as is mentioned below. The following is a list of Julian's works, with the principal separate editions of each:—

I. Letters. The first collection, published by Aldus, Venice, 1499, 4to., contains only 48 letters; Spanheim published 63 in his edition of the works of Julian; others were found in later times, four of which are printed in Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec.; the last and best edition is by L. H. Heyler, Mainz, 1828, 8vo.; it contains 83 letters, with a Latin translation and a commentary of the editor. There are besides some fragments of lost letters. Among the letters of Julian, there is also one which was written to him by his brother Gallus, in A. D. 353, who advises him to remain faithful to the Christian religion. The authenticity of several letters is contested. They treat on various subjects, and are of great importance for the history of the time. One, which was addressed to the senate and people of Athens, and in which the author explains the motives of his having taken up arms against the emperor Constantine, is an interesting and most important historical document.

II. Orations. 1. Ἐγκύκλιος πρὸς τὸν αὐτοκράτορα Κωνσταντίνον, with a Latin translation by Petavius, Paris, 1614, 8vo.: an encomium of the emperor Constantine, in which Julian is not consistent with his usual feelings of contempt and hatred towards that emperor. In general Julian speaks very badly of the whole imperial family, and even Constantine the Great does not escape his severe censure. Wytténbach, in the work quoted below, has written some excellent observations on this work. 2. Περὶ τῶν αὐτοκράτορος Πράξεων, ἢ περὶ Βασιλέων, two orations on the deeds and the reign of the emperor Constantine, which are of great importance for the knowledge of the time: in the complete editions. Julian wrote these orations in Gaul, and betrays in many a passage his preference of paganism.

ism to Christianity, as well as his enthusiastic love of the new Platonic philosophy. 3. Εὐσεβίας τῆς βασιλίδος Ἐγκώμιον, an encomium on the empress Eusebia, the patroness of Julian: ed. Petav. Paris, 1614, 8vo. 4. Εἰς τὸν βασιλέα Ἡλίου, an oration on the worship of the sun, addressed to Sallustius, his old military councillor and friend, first in Gaul and afterwards in Germany: ed. by Theodorus Marcellus, Paris, 1583, 8vo.; by Vincentius Marinerius, Madrid, 1625, 8vo. 5. Εἰς τὴν μητέρα τῶν Θεῶν, an oration on the mother of gods (Cybele): Julian visited the temple of Cybele at Pessinus, and restored her worship. 6. Εἰς τοὺς ἀκαδεύτους Κόναν; and 7. Πρὸς Ἡρόκλητον Κυνικόν, περὶ τοῦ πᾶς Κυνιστεύειν, καὶ εἰ πρίναι τῷ Κυρί μύθους πρᾶττειν, two orations on true and false Cynicism, the latter addressed to the Cynic Hecleus. 8. Ἐπὶ τῇ ἐξόδῳ τοῦ διαδοταίου Σαλλουστίου παραμυθητικός, a letter to the aforesaid Sallustius, in which he consoles himself and his friends on the recall of Sallustius, by the emperor Constantius, from Gaul to the East. 9. A letter, or more correctly dissertation, addressed to his former tutor, the philosopher Themistius, on the difficulty the author thinks he would experience in showing himself so perfect an emperor as Themistius expected.

III. Other Works. 1. Καίσαρες ἢ Σομπόσιον, the "Caesars or the Banquet," a satirical composition, which Gibbon justly calls one of the most agreeable and instructive productions of ancient wit. Julian describes the Roman emperors approaching one after the other to take their seat round a table placed in the heavens; and as they come up, their faults, vices, and crimes, are censured with a sort of bitter mirth by old Silenus, whereupon each Caesar defends himself as well as he can, that is, as well as Julian allows him to do; but in this Julian shows much partiality, especially towards Constantine the Great and other members of the imperial family. Alexander the Great also appears. He and other great heroes at last acknowledge that a royal philosopher is greater than a royal hero, and the piece finishes with a great deal of praise bestowed upon Julian by himself. There are many editions and translations of this remarkable production. Of these, the most important are the text with a Latin translation by C. Cantoclarus, Paris, 1577, 8vo., the Editio Princeps; the same, Ibid. 1583, 8vo.; the same, corrected by Frederic Sylburg, in the third volume of his Romanae Historiae Scriptores Minores, and separately, Frankfort, 1590, fol.; by Petrus Cunaeus, with an elegant Latin translation, Leyden, 1612, 12mo., 1632, 12mo.; the same with the notes of Cellarius, Leipzig, 1693, 8vo., 1735, 8vo. The best editions are by J. M. Heusinger, Gotha, 1736, 8vo., 1741, 8vo., and by Harless, the editor of Fabricius, Bibl. Graeca, Erlangen, 1785, 8vo. An English translation of the Caesars, the Misopogon, and several other productions of Julian, is contained in "Select Works of the Emperor Julian, and some Pieces of the Sophist Libanius, &c., with Notes from Petav. La Bléterie, Gibbon, &c., and a translation of La Bléterie's Vie de Jorien, by John Duncombe," London, 1784, 8vo. Several French, German, Italian, and Dutch translations are mentioned by Fabricius.

2. Ἀντιωχικός ἢ Μισοπάγων, "the Antiochian, or the Enemy of the Beard," a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of the inhabitants of Antioch, with occasional ironical confessions of the author's own faults, who was induced to write this amusing piece during his stay at Antioch, as mentioned above. Julian chose the title Μισοπάγων because the inhabitants of Antioch, being accustomed to shave themselves, ridiculed Julian, who allowed his beard to grow, in the ancient fashion. Editions: by Petrus Martinus, Paris, 1567, 8vo., 1583, 8vo.; by H. I. Lasius, together with the Caesars, and a German translation of both, Greifswald, 1770, 8vo.; there are also English, French, and German translations of the Misopogon. The following English translations of some of the minor productions of Julian are worthy of mention: "Julian's Letter to the Bostreni," translated by the Earl of Shaftesbury, in his "Characteristics," London, 1733, 12mo.; two Orations of the Emperor Julian, viz. to the Sun, and to the Mother of the Gods, with notes, &c. London, 1793, 8vo. The English literature is rich in works on Julian.

IV. Poems. Three epigrams of little importance, in the "Anthologia Graeca," and a fourth, discovered by Boissonade, in the "Analecta," and in Heyler's edition of Julian's Letters.

V. Lost Works. The most important is, Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν, a refutation of the Christian religion, in seven books, according to Hieronymus, although Cyrill only speaks of three. These three books were directed against the dogmatical part of the Christian religion, as contained in the Gospels; and it is against this part of the work that Cyrill wrote his famous work Ἐπὶ τῆς τῶν Χριστιανῶν εὐαγγελίου Σηρηκίας, πρὸς τὰ τοῦ ἱν δόλους Ἰουλιανοῦ, which is separately printed in Spanheim's edition of the works of Julian. All the copies of Julian's work which could be found were destroyed by order of the emperor Theodosius II., and the whole would have been lost for ever but for Cyrill, who gives extracts from the three first books in his refutation of Julian. But these extracts are far from giving an adequate idea of the work. Cyrill confesses that he had not ventured to copy several of the weightiest arguments of the author. The Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν was likewise refuted by Apollinaris, whose Λόγος ὅπερ ἀληθείας κατὰ Ἰουλιανῶν, however, is lost, as are the refutations of Photius and Philippos of Sida. The marquis d'Argens, a chamberlain to Frederic the Great, king of Prussia, translated the extracts made by Cyrill, and tried to complete them, according to some, at the suggestion of his master. The title of the translation is, "Défense du Paganisme par l'Empereur Julien, en Grec et en Français," &c. &c., Berlin, 1764, 8vo.; lb. (Geneva), 1768, 8vo.; lb. 1769, 2 vols. 8vo. The marquis was any thing but a Christian, and his opinions on Julian and Paganism were attacked by G. F. Meier in his "Beurtheilung der Betrachtungen des Marquis d'Argens über Julian," Halle, 1764, 8vo.; by W. Crichton, "Betrachtungen über den Abfall Julian's," and by others. Other lost works of Julian are: Περὶ τῶν τριῶν σχημάτων; Περὶ τοῦ πόθεν τὰ κακὰ κατὰ τοὺς ἀκαδεύτους; Τὰ καλούμενα Κρόνια; Memoirs on his Campaigns in Germany; his Journal, in which he used to write down the events of every day; and others, especially many letters.

Julian composed his works in the following chronological order:—The Encomia on Constantius; the Encomium on the Empress Eusebia, not before A. D. 336; the Letter to Sallustius, in A. D. 360; the Letter to the Senate and the People of Athens, in A. D. 360; the Letter to Themistius, and the Oration on Helius, in 361; the Kaigrapes, in the winter of 361—362, or perhaps in the following year; most of his extant Letters during the same period; one of his Orations on false Cynicism, and that on the Mother of Gods, as well as a Letter on the restoration of ancient Hellenism, of which a fragment is extant, in 362; the Misopogon in the beginning of 363; and the Karā Xpocτιανῶν, finished during his expedition against the Persians, in the summer of 363.

(The works of Julian; Amm. Marc. v. 8—xxv. 5; most of the Orations and Epistles of Libanius, especially, Oratio Parentalis; Ad Antiochenos de Imperiali Ira; De Nece Juliani ulciscenda; Socrates, H. E. lib. iii.; Zonar. lib. xiii.; Zosim. lib. iii.; Eutrop. x. 14, &c.; Themist. Orat. iv.; Gregor. Nazianz. Orat. iii. iv. x. xxi.; Sozomen. lib. v. vi.; Mamertinus in Panegyric. Vet. (Mamertinus was Comes Largitionum to Julian, whom he accompanied in Gaul, and on his memorable expedition down the Danube); Aurel. Vict. Constantinus in fin.; Moses Chorenensis, lib. iii.; Theophanes, pp. 29—44, ed. Paris; Fabric. Bibl. Græca, vol. vi. p. 719, &c. COIN OF FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS JULIANUS.

JULIANUS, the Græco-Roman JURIST. A Latin Epitome of the Novella of Justinian is extant under this name. In one MS. the work is attributed to Joannes, a citizen of Constantinople; in some, no author is named; but in several the translation and abridgment are ascribed to Julianus, a professor (antecessor) at Constantinople. It is remarkable that no jurist of the name is recorded among the compilers employed by Justinian, and no professor of the name occurs in the inscription of the Const. Omnem addressed by Justinian in A. D. 533 to the professors of law at Constantinople and Berytus. Among the extracts from contemporaries of Justinian, which were originally appended to the text of the Basilica, there is not one that bears the name of Julianus. In Basil. 16. tit. 1. a. 6. § 2 (vol. ii. p. 180, ed. Heimbach), a Julianus is named as putting a question to Stephanus, one of the eminent jurists of Justinian's time, and hence it has been supposed that the author of the Epitome of the Novella was a disciple of Stephanus. That a Julianus, however, attained such legal celebrity in the reign of Justinian as to be complimented with the phrase "The luminary of the law," may be inferred from the epigram* of his contemporary Theaetetus Scholasticus preserved in the Anthologia Græca (vol. iii. p. 216, ed. Jacobs), among other epigrams addressed to the statues of eminent men:—

Τούτων Ἰουλιανόν, νομικὸν φῶς, εἶρον βόσκει
Ῥώμῃ καὶ Βερὸν, "Πάντα φῶσι δύνανται."

Hunc videntes Julianum, splendidum juri decus,
Roma Berytusque, Nil non, inquit, natura quit.

To this same Julianus is attributed the authorship of three epigrams in the same collection (vol. iii. p. 230) headed Ἰουλιανὸς Ἀντικλήροπος. Alciatus (Parerg. ii. 46) calls Julianus patricius and ex-consul, but without sufficient authority; and Huber Goltzius, in his preface to the edition of the Epitome of the Novella, which was published at Bruges in 1565, thinks it likely that the author of the Epitome was identical with the consul Julianus, to whom Priscian dedicates his grammar.

That the author of the Epitome was a professor is shown by various forms of expression occurring in that work which are known to have been usual among the professors of the Lower Empire; as, for example, the word didicimus, at the beginning of the 67th constitution of the Epitome. It is also clear, from internal evidence, that the author was a resident in Constantinople, which in c. 216 and 358 he calls hæc civitas, although in neither case does the Novell of Justinian which he is abstracting contain a parallel expression.

The collection of Novells translated and abridged by Julianus is referred by Fréherus, in his Chronologia prefixed to the Jus Græco-Romanum, to the year A. D. 570, and this date has been followed by the majority of legal historians; but there is every reason to believe that the Epitome was completed during the life of Justinian, in A. D. 556. In it Justinian is uniformly called noster imperator, while preceding emperors, as Leo and Justinus, are called Divus Leo and Divus Justinus. In the abstracts of Novells 117 and 134 there is no allusion to the subsequent legislation of Justinian, which again permitted divortium bona gratia. In the original collection, also, no Novell of later date than the year A. D. 556 is abstracted.

The original collection consists of 124, or at most 125, constitutions. These again are divided into chapters, which, in the editions subsequent to A. D. 1561, are doubly numbered, one numbering running through the work from the commencement, and another beginning anew with each constitution. The 125 constitutions make 564 chapters. This will explain the different modes of citation. Thus const. 1 consists of four chapters, and const. 2 of five chapters. The fourth chapter of const. 2 might be cited as c. 9, or as const. 2, c. 4. Again, the 8th constitution, the whole of which makes one chapter (the 48th), may be cited as const. 8, or as c. 44. All that follows the 125th constitution is

* In this epigram, by Ῥώμῃ we are probably to understand Constantinople, which was New Rome. Perhaps Ἰουλιανόν is to be pronounced as a trisyllable, Youlyānon. In the epigram prefixed to the Digest in the Florentine manuscript, we find the name Τριβωνιανός admitted into an hexameter line:—

Βίβλος Ἰουστινιανὸς ὡς τεχνήσασθαι γένοιτο

the manuscripts and printed editions consists of additions forming an appendix to the original collection.

The order of the Epitome is very different from that of the 168 Novella in the ordinary modern editions of the Corpus Juris. Of those 168 Novella, seven are constitutions of Justin II. and Tiberius, four are edicts of praefecti praetorio, and several are constitutions of Justinian subsequent to A. D. 556. Of the 168 Novella, Novella 114, 121, 138, 143, and 150, are abstracted in the appendix to the Epitome found in some manuscripts, and 19, 21, 33, 36, 37, 50, 116, 122, 132, 133, 135, 137, 139—149, 151—158, are altogether wanting in Julianus.

Tables exhibiting the correspondence of the Novella in the Corpus Juris with the corresponding abstracts in Julianus may be found in Biener, Geschichte der Novellen, pp. 538-9; Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. iv. p. 187; Böcking, Institutionen, pp. 73—75. The first thirty-nine constitutions in the Epitome are arranged very irregularly, but the arrangement from const. 40 to const. 111 is chronological, and agrees pretty closely with that of the Novella in the Corpus Juris from Nov. 44 to Nov. 120.

Julianus translated from the original Greek, and he had before him the Latin text of those Novella which were originally published in Latin. He leaves out the inscriptions, verbose prooemia, and epilogues, but gives the subscriptions (containing the date at the end). The substance of the enacting part is given without much abridgment, and the Latin style of the author is tolerably clear and pure.

It may seem strange that a professor living in a country where Greek was the vernacular language, at a time when others were translating into Greek the monuments of Roman legislation, should employ himself in composing a Latin Epitome of the Greek Novella. It may be that his work was composed for the benefit of the Italians, who by the conquest of the Ostrogoths in A. D. 554 had been reduced under the dominion of Justinian, or for those western students who frequented the law schools of Constantinople and Berytus. There are passages in the work (e. g., c. 15. c. 29—32) which show that it was intended for those who were not Greeks.

Among the cultivators of Roman law in the school of Bologna, this Epitome was called Novella, Novellae, Liber Novellarum. It was probably known early in the eleventh century, before the discovery by Irenaeus of another ancient translation of the Novella, containing 134 constitutions in an unbridged form. The glossators were wholly unacquainted with the original Greek Novella. The Epitome was perhaps at first regarded as the authentic work, containing the latest legislation of Justinian. Zachariae, indeed, states (Anecdota, p. 202, citing Perts, Monumenta, vol. iii.), that Julianus is quoted as the author of it in the Capitula Ingelheimensis as early as A. D. 826, and Julianus, apostate and monk, is named by Huguccio in the twelfth century (in an unpublished Summa Decretorum) as the author of the Novella; but the greater number of the glossators, though they diligently studied the Epitome (Ritter, ad Heinzeccii Hist. Jur. Civ. vol. i. § 403), appear to have known nothing of Julianus. After the Latin translation of 134 Novella was found, it seems at first to have shared the name of Novella with the work of Ju-lianus, and its authenticity was for a time doubted by Irenaeus, even after it had received the name of authenticum, recognising its authenticity, and distinguishing it from the Epitome of Julianus. (Savigny, Geschichte des Röm. Rechts im Mittelalter, vol. ii. pp. 453—466, iv. p. 484.) The Authenticum, or Versio Vulgata, was now taught in the schools, while the Epitome or Novella, though permitted to be read as a subsidiary source of instruction, so rapidly fell into disuse, that neither Fulgosius nor Caccialupi ever saw a copy of it. It is commonly believed that the Epitome of Julian was re-discovered by the monk Ambrosius Traversarius, in A. D. 1433, in the library of Victorinus at Mantua. The main authority for this statement is Suarez, in his Notit. Basil. § 21; but there is reason to doubt the story, which is not confirmed by an extant letter of Ambrosius (Ambrosii Traversarii Cumelundenensis Epistolae, vol. i. p. 419, Florent. 1759), giving an account of the books that he found in the library at Mantua. He mentions a work Joannis Consulis de Variis Quaestionibus, but by this he can scarcely mean the Epitome, for it seems to have been a Greek book. A very elaborate and valuable literary history of the Epitome was drawn up by Haubold, and inserted in the fourth volume of Savigny's Zeitschrift. As an appendix to this paper, Professor Hänel of Leipzig has given in the eighth volume of the Zeitschrift an accurate enumeration of the known existing manuscripts. Though the printed editions of the Epitome are numerous, they are scarce, and the new edition which Hänel is understood to be preparing will be an acceptable boon to students of Roman law.

The following are the principal printed editions, for the full titles of which the reader is referred to the above-mentioned paper of Haubold. Transcripts of preceding editions of the Epitome have from time to time been inserted in editions of the Volumen—that is to say, the last volume into which the Corpus Juris Civilis was formerly usually divided, containing the Authenticum or Versio Vulgata of the Novella, the last three of the twelve books of the Code, the Libri Fendorum, &c.

1. The first printed edition was published in 8vo., without name or year, at Lyons in 1512, at the end of a collection of the Laws of the Lombards. The editor was Nic. Boherius. The work, which is imperfectly given, is divided into nine collationes. This division, found in several manuscripts, was probably made about the time of Irenaeus, to correspond with the first nine books of the Code. The Authenticum was similarly divided into nine collationes.

2. The Epitome was next printed at the end of the Authenticum, apud Sennetonios fratres, Lugd. 1550. In this edition the Epitome, as in many manuscripts, is divided into two parts or books, and, through a misunderstanding of a manuscript inscription, the authorship of the work is attributed to an anonymous citizen of Constance.

3. An independent edition of the Epitome is inserted in the very rare edition of the Volumen, apud Ludovicum Pesnot, 8vo. Lugd. 1558.

4. Next comes the edition of Lud. Miraeus (Le Mire, whose name appears in the preface), fol. Lugduni. 1561. In this edition Julianus is named as the author, "Imp. Justiniani Constitutiones, interprete Juliano." There is a reprint, with a preface by Goltzius, 4to. Brugis, 1565.

5. The edition of Ant. Augustinus, 8vo. Herdae, 1567, at the end of Augustini Constitutionum Graecarum Codicis Collectio. This edition is reprinted, with additions, in Augustini Opera, vol. ii. pp. 255—406, fol. Lucae, 1766.

6. Imp. Justiniani Novellas Constitutiones, per Julianum, antecessorem Constantinopolitanum, de Graeco translatae. Ex Bibliotheca Petri Pithoei, fol. Basil. 1576.

7. Petri et Francisci Pithoei Ictorum Observationes ad Codicem et Novellas Justiniani Imperatoris per Julianum translatae, cura Francisci Desmarêts, fol. Paris, 1689.

The last-mentioned editions, 6 and 7, are the best known and the most complete. They contain two short works, called the Dictatum pro Consiliariis and the Collectio de Tutoribus. These had been previously printed in Pithou's first edition of the Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum (entitled Fragmenta quaedam Papiniani, &c. 4to. Paris, 1573). In several manuscripts they are attributed to Julianus; but Biener, in his Historia Authenticarum Codici Insertarum, 4to. Lips. 1807, has adduced strong arguments to show that Julianus was not the author of them. Their Latinity is far less pure than that of the Epitome. It is not unlikely, however, that these works, as well as the ancient scholia upon the Epitome of Julianus, were written in Grecian Italy during the lifetime of Justinian, who in the Dictatum is twice styled princeps noster, and in the scholia (ed. Miraei, p. 177) imperator noster. (Savigny, Geschichte, &c., vol. ii. pp. 195—197; Biener, in Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. v. pp. 338—357.)

A German translation of the Epitome, by D. Justin Goble, was published anonymously, fol. Frank. 1566.

Zachariae (Anecdota, p. 202, &c.) endeavours to identify Julianus with the author of a much shorter Greek Epitome of the Novella, who is cited in the sources of Graeco-Roman law as Anonymus. Anonymus, like Julianus, seems to have been a professor at Constantinople. Anonymus cites the Novells of Justinian in an order which does not very considerably differ from that of Julianus. Anonymus seems to have been skilled in Latin as well as Greek, and was perhaps the author of an ancient Latin version of the Greek fragments of Modestinus which occur in the Digest. Further, there is strong reason to identify the anonymous with Enantiophanes; and Enantiophanes, like Julianus, was a disciple of Stephanus. [ENANTIOPHANES.] When Italy, after the invasion of the Lombards in A. D. 568, was rent from the Roman empire, Julianus may have turned to writing in Greek. Mortreuil (Histoire de Droit Byzantin, vol. i. pp. 293—306), who agrees with Zachariae in these conjectures, thinks that Julianus was probably not an authorised expositor of the law, and that none but jurists specially authorised could, without a breach of rule, be cited by name. The conjecture that Julianus and Anonymus were identical is controverted by G. E. Heimbach, in Richter's Kritische Jahrbücher for 1839, p. 970.

(Winckler, Opuscula, vol. i. p. 418; Biener, Geschichte der Novellen, pp. 70—84.) [J. T. G.]

JULIANUS (Ἰουλιανός), a PHYSICIAN of Alexandria, a contemporary of Galen, in the second century after Christ. (Gal. Adv. Julian. c. 1. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 248.) He was a pupil of Apollonius of Cyprus (Gal. De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 54), and belonged to the sect of the Methodici, and was said to have composed forty-eight books against the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates (Adv. Julian. l. c.). The second of these was directed against the second Aphorism of the first section, and is confuted in a short essay written by Galen with excessive and unjustifiable rudeness and asperity. None of his writings (which were numerous) are still extant. From Galen's mentioning that it was more than twenty years since he had met Julianus at Alexandria (De Meth. Med. p. 53), and that he was then still alive, it will appear that Julianus was living as late as about the year 180 after Christ. (See Littré's Hippocrates, vol. i. pp. 103, 114.) [W. A. G.]

JULIANUS, SALVIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, who flourished under Hadrian and the Antonines. Of his private history little is known, and different opinions have been held as to the place of his birth. Many of his biographers (as Rivalinus, Val. Forsterus, Panciroli, Rutilius, Bertrandus, Guil. Grotius) make him a native of Milan (Insuper Mediolanensis), while the majority of more modern writers say that he was born at Hadrumetum, a Phoenician colony on the coast of Africa. These opposite opinions are both grounded on a passage of Spartianus (Did. Julian. c. 1), where it is asserted that the paternal grandfather of the emperor who ascended the throne after Pertinax came from Mediolanum, and the maternal grandfather from Hadrumetum. It is well ascertained that Salvius Julianus the jurist was a maternal ancestor of the emperor Didius Julianus, and it is probable that, according to the express testimony of Spartianus (l. c.), the jurist was the great-grandfather (proavus) of the emperor, not, as Politianus asserts (Epist. ad Jac. Modestum), the uncle, nor, as Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Misc. x. 20) would make him, the grandfather. Eutropius (viii. 9) hesitates. "Salvius Julianus," says he, "nepos vel, secundum Lampridium, pronepos Salvii Juliani, qui sub Hadriano perpetuum composuit edictum." Zimmern (R. R. G. vol. i. § 91) agrees with Paulus Diaconus. Many mistakes have been committed, from the confusion of the jurist with others of the same name and family. For example, Arelus Victor, if his text be not interpolated (De Caes. 19), confounds the jurist with the emperor, who, like his ancestor, was distinguished on account of his legal acquirements. And this mistake of Aurelius Victor misled the celebrated Hugo Grotius (Florum Spatio, p. 78, ed. Amst. 1643). It is therefore historically important to establish correctly the genealogy of the family.

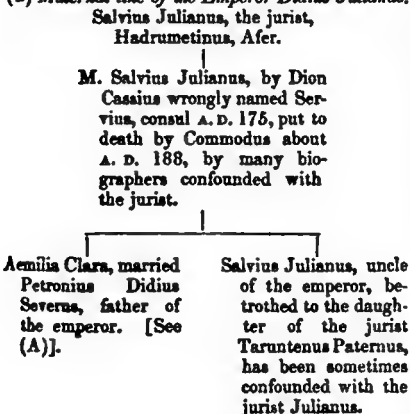

This investigation was undertaken by Cassanbon (ad Spartiani Did. Julian. 1, in Historiae Augustae Scriptores), and was subsequently pursued, with the aid of two inscriptions, by Reinesius (Var. Lert. iii. 2, p. 344; Gruter. Insc. p. xviii. 2, 10, p. 459), who was followed by Christ. ad. Ruperti (Animad. in Enchirid. Pomponii, p. 473, inserted in the useful collection of Uhlus, entitled Opuscula ad Historiam Juris pertinentia, p. 215). The labours of former inquirers were reviewed by Heineccius, whose elaborate researches have explored every source of information concerning the jurist Julianus. We subjoin tables of the genealogy of the family, so far as may be useful to illustrate the relationships of persons with whom the jurist has been confounded. These tables are constructed according to the view which, upon comparison of authorities, appears to us by far the most probable:—

(A) Paternal line of the Emperor Didius Julianus.

It appears from Spartianus, that the emperor had a brother, Numius Albinus, and from an inscription in Gruter (Insacr. p. 459, 2), it has been thought that Numius Albinus was the son of a Vibia Salvia Vibia. Hence Reinesius conjectures that the Vibia of the inscription and the Aemilia Clara of Spartianus are the same person, while Heineccius supposes that Numius Albinus was called the brother of the emperor, though he had neither the same father nor the same mother, as being the son by a former husband of a former wife of the emperor's father. According to Heineccius, one Numius and Vibia were the parents of Numius Albinus; then, after the death of Numius the father, Petronius Didius and Vibia were the parents of Didius Proculus; then, after the death of Vibia, Petronius Didius and Aemilia Clara were the parents of the emperor.

Julianus was born about the year A. D. 100, after Trajan had become emperor. This is inferred from the date of his labours on the Edict, which, according to Eusebius, were undertaken about A. D. 132, when he was probably praetor. At this period the leges annales were strictly observed, and the regular age for the praetorship was about thirty. (Plin. Ep. vii. 30; Dion. Cass. lii. p. 479.) He is the first jurist named in the Florentine Index to the Digest, though there are fragments in that work from nine jurists of earlier date, and, though he was not the last of the Sabinians, he is the last jurist named by his contemporary Pomponius in the fragment De Origine Juris (Dig. i. tit. 2. a. 2). That he flourished under Antoninus Pius, and survived that emperor, may be collected from several passages in the Digest. (Dig. 4. tit. 2. a. 18; Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 6.) In Dig. 37. tit. 14. a. 17, the Divi Fratres, Antoninus Marcus and Lucius Verus, call him their friend, a designation ordinarily given by the emperors to living members of their council. By many it has been supposed that he lived to a great age, from a misunderstanding of Dig. 40. tit. 5. a. 19. In that passage, the person who speaks of having attained his 78th year, and of being desirous to gain information, though he had one foot in the grave, is not Julianus, but the client who seeks his opinion.

In Dig. 40. tit. 2. a. 5, he speaks of Javolenus as his praetor. It was usual to manumit slaves before praetors and consuls, when they held their levees. Whether the magistrate could manumit his own slaves at his own levee was doubted. Julianus says that he remembered Javolenus having done so in Africa and Syria, that he followed his praetor's example in his own praetorship and consulship, and recommended other praetors who consulted him to act in the same manner. It thus appears that he was consul, and Spartianus says that he was praefectus urbi, and twice consul, but his name does not appear in the Fasti among the consules ordinarii. He was in Egypt when Serapias, the Alexandrian woman who produced five children at a birth, was in Rome. (Dig. 46. tit. 3. a. 46.) Panciroli and others, from supposing the jurist to be referred to in passages of the Digest (e.g. Dig. 48. tit. 3. a. 12) which probably relate to other Salvii, have conferred upon him various provincial governments. The time of his death is uncertain, but it appears that he was buried in the Via Lavicana, for Spartianus (Julian. c. ult.) says that the body of the emperor was deposited in the monument of his procurator.

It was under Hadrian that he chiefly signalled himself. That emperor was accustomed, when he presided at trials, to have the advice and assistance not only of his friends and officers of state, but of jurists approved by the senate. Among the most eminent of this legal council were Juvencius Celsus, Salvius Julianus, and Neratius Priscus. (Spart. Hadr.) By the order of Hadrian, he collected and arranged the clauses which the praetors were accustomed to insert in their annual edict, and appears to have condensed his materials, and to have omitted antiquated provisions. The exact nature and extent of this reformation of the Edict is one of the most obscure and disputed questions in the history of the Roman law. Some legal historians look upon it as a most important change, and suppose that the power of departing from the Edict by additions or modified clauses was now taken away from the magistrates. Other writers, especially Hugo, seem disposed to reduce the dimensions of the change within the narrowest compass. The direct testimony of ancient writers upon this subject is scanty. In Const. Ad blocker, § 18, and Const. Tanta, § 18, is contained the most detailed information we possess. From these parallel passages, it appears that in the body of the reformed Edict, and in the decree of the senate which accompanied it, there was an enactment, that any case not provided for might be ruled ex præ by the emperor and his magistrates. In Const. Tanta, § 18, Julianus is styled by Justinian Legum et Edicti perpetui subtilissimus Conditor, whence it may perhaps be inferred that Julianus not only arranged the Edict, but collected the Constitutions of emperors, which are often designated by the word Leges. He introduced a new clause of his own into the Edict (Dig. 37. tit. 8. a. 3). Paeanius, a contemporary of Justinian, in his Metaphrasis of Eutropius (viii. 9, Paeanius, H. 15), says that the new Edict was called the Edict of Hadrian, or, in Latin, the Edictum Perpetuum. The Edictum of Hadrian, mentioned in Cod. x. tit. 39. a. 7, was probably a special proclamation of that emperor, distinct from the Edict we are treating of. The name perpetuum edictum was given in early times to the praetor's annual edicts, intended as the rule of ordinary practice, as distinguished from special proclamations—to “id quod jurisdictionis perpetuas causas, non quod prout res incidit, in albo propositum erat” (Dig. 2. tit. 1. a. 7); but, after the reform of Hadrian, the epithet perpetuum seems to have acquired new force. Though all the great principles of the Jus Honorarium were settled before the end of the republic, though the Edict had long assumed an approach to permanence, not only in matter but in form (for the earlier writers upon the Edict appear to follow the same order with those who wrote after Hadrian), the new edictum perpetuum was manifestly endowed with an additional authority, which, if it did not preclude the future exercise of the jus edicendi in magistrates, must have practically restricted it to cases not provided for in the compilation of Julianus. In a manuscript at Florence (Cod. Laurent. Plut. lxxx. cod. 6) of a Graeco-Roman Epitome of Law of the tenth century, Hadrian is said to have associated Servius Cornelius with Julianus in the task of consolidation and arrangement; but the Graeco-Roman jurists are very unsafe authorities in matters of history, and the author of the cited Epitome may have been led to mention a Cornelius in connection with the Edict, from having heard of the lex Cornelia (proposed by the tribune C. Cornelius in B.C. 67), by which it was enacted “ut praetores ex edictis suis perpetuis jus dicerent.” [C. CORNELIUS; CORNELIUS, SERVIUS.] The other early writers who mention the labours of Julianus on the Edict are Aurelius Victor (de Caes. 19), Eusebius (Chron. ad A.U.C. 884, n. 2147), and Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Misc. x. 20). How far the reform affected the edict of the praetor peregrinus (which was in the main similar to that of the praetor urbanus) and the edict of the aediles (which seems subsequently to have been treated of as an appendage to the praetor's edict, Pauli Sententiae, i. tit. 15. a. 2), there are not sufficient data to determine. (F. A. Biener, de Salvii Juliani in edicto praetoris meritis libe aestumandis, 4to. Lips. 1809; Francke, de Edicto praetoris urbani, prae-

In the Roman law there was a form of proceeding, called the Interdictum Salvianum, by which a landlord might obtain possession of goods of his tenant, which had been pledged as a security for the payment of the rent. (Gaius, iv. 147.) Cujas suspected that Julianus the jurist was the author of the Interdictum Salvianum, and in this conjecture was followed by Ménage (Amoen. Jur. c. 24), but, as Bynkershoek has shown (Olevar. Jur. Rom. i. 24), the Interdictum Salvianum is probably of much earlier date than the reign of Hadrian. It is commented upon by Julianus as an established form of proceeding, which had been extended by equitable construction to cases not originally contemplated (interdictum utile), and he does not use a single expression to render it likely that he himself introduced or invented it. (Dig. 43. tit. 33. a. 1.)

Pomponius enumerates Aburnus Valens, Tuscinius, and Julianus, as the successors of Javolenus in the leadership of the Sabinian school of jurists. The addition of Julianus to the tenets of his school is clear, from many passages in his remains, but he was not an undeviating adherent. Thus, in Dig. 43. tit. 24. a. 11. § 12, he differs from Cassius; and in Dig. 40. tit. 4. a. 57, Gaius observes that his opinion is inconsistent with the principles of Cassius and Sabinus.

He was a voluminous legal writer, and a very able reasoner upon legal subjects. His style is easy and clear, and, though it has often been said that his language abounds in Graecisms, not one has been pointed out, except the use of the word manifestus, in such an expression as “Manifestus est dotem relegasse,” (Dig. 33. tit. 4. a. 3.) His opinion was highly valued by contemporary and succeeding jurists, who constantly cite him with approbation, and some of whom appear to have consulted him personally on difficult questions. (Pat. Frag. 77, Dig. 37. tit. 5. a. 6, Dig. 30. tit. 1. a. 39.) He is one of those foremost jurists whose names are mentioned by way of example in the citation-law of Valentinian III. (Cod. Theod. i. tit. 4. a. 3.) His authority is cited by emperors in their Constitutions, as by Leo and Anthemius in Cod. 6. tit. 61. a. 5, and by Justinian in Cod. 4. tit. 5. a. 10, Cod. 2. tit. 19. a. 24, Cod. 3. tit. 33. a. 15, Nov. 74 pr. About 457 extracts from his works are inserted in the Digest. In Hommel's Palingenesia these fragments occupy ninety pages. He is more often cited by other jurists than any legal writer, except Ulpian, Paulus, and Papinian, and he is commonly named without special reference to the passage where his opinion is contained. Volusius Maecianus and Terentius Clemens both call him Julianus noster (Dig. 35. tit. 1. a. 85, Dig. 28. tit. 6. a. 6), perhaps as his pupils, or perhaps as his associates in the imperial council. In the fragments of Africanus there appears to be such a constant reference to the opinions of Julianus, that Africanus is generally supposed to have been his pupil.

The following are the titles of his works:—

1. Digestorum Libri XC. It was perhaps this title which led Mattheus Blastares, in the preface to his Syntagma, to the blunder of attributing the Digest of Justinian to Hadrian. By some the voluminous Digest of Julianus has been confounded with the reformed Edict, which was comprised in a single book. The Digesta, like other works of other jurists bearing the same title, appears to have been a system of Roman law, following the arrangement of the Edict, and compiled from the commentators on the text of the Edict. In Julian's Digest, the actual words of the Edict seem to have been inserted and interpreted. The work cited in Dig. 3. tit. 2. a. 1, as Julianus, libro 1<sup>o</sup> ad Edictum, is perhaps no other than the Digesta of Julianus, but the reading of the Florentine MS. is doubtful, and it is very likely that Ulpianus ought to be substituted for Julianus. In Dig. 1. tit. 3. a. 32, the 94th book of the Digesta is cited, but here there is undoubtedly an error in the reading of lxxxiii. in place of lxxxiii. Indeed, L. T. Gronovius asserts that the fourth x in the Florentine manuscript is not from the first hand. The Digesta was annotated by the Proculian Ulpian Marcellus, one of the very few jurists who seem more disposed, whenever it is practicable, to censure than to praise Julianus; hence Cujas remarks (Obs. xiii. 35) that there can scarcely be a stronger proof of the correctness of an opinion than the agreement of Marcellus and Julianus. Another critic was found in Mauricius (Dig. 2. tit. 14. a. 7. § 2, and Dig. 7. tit. 1. a. 25. § 1). Cervidius Scaevola (Dig. 2. tit. 14. a. 54, Dig. 18. tit. 6. a. 10) was a less unfavourable annotator. The fragment in Dig. 4. tit. 2. a. 11, is inscribed "Paulus lib. iv. Juliani Digestorum notat," and there is a similar inscription in Dig. 18. tit. 5. a. 4, but there is no mention in the Florentine Index of any special work of Paulus upon Julianus. There are 376 extracts from the Digesta of Julianus in the Digest of Justinian. In modern times, the celebrated Cujas wrote lectures on the Digesta of Julianus. (Jac. Cujacii Recitationes solennes ad Salmi Juliani libros Digestorum, Opera, vol. i.)

2. Ad Minicium, or Ex Minicio, or Apud Minicium Libri VI. In these various ways is this work named in the Florentine Index and the inscriptions of the Fragments. [FEROX.] This was a commentary upon some work of Minicius Natalis, who lived under Vespasian and Trajan. It appears to follow the arrangement not of the Edict, but of the Libri Juris Civilis of Sabinus. Of the forty fragments in the Digest, those from the first and second book relate to testaments, bonorum possessiones, legacies, and fidei-commissa; those from the third, to the patria potestas and the power of the dominus; those from the fourth, to loans and contracts; those from the fifth, to marriage, tutela, acquiring possession, &c.; those from the sixth, to interdicts and procedure. In Dig. 19. tit. 1. a. 11. § 15, Ulpian appears to cite the tenth book, but the reading ought probably to be altered from x to v.

3. Ad Ursetum Libri IV. A commentary upon some work of Urseus Ferox. From the forty-two extracts in the Digest, it appears that Julianus in this treatise followed the series of the books of Sabinus.

4. De Ambiguitatibus Liber Singularis. From this work there are four extracts in the Digest. It explained the legal sense of ambiguous words, and the rules of interpretation to be applied to obscure expressions in wills and contracts.

These are all the ascertained works of Julianus. That Julianus wrote upon Sextus has by some been inferred from the expression "Juliano ex Sexto placuit" in Gaius, ii. 218, compared with Fragmenta Vaticana, § 88. Bertrandus, from a misunderstanding of the expression "tractatu proposito" in Cod. 6. tit. 60. a. 5, imagined that he wrote a special treatise, De Dotali Praedio.

JU'LIUS, was ordained bishop of Rome, as the successor of Mark, on the 6th of February, A. D. 337, a short time before the period when the persecution against Athanasius was most fiercely revived in consequence of the permission accorded to him by Constantine, Constantius, and Constans to quit Trèves, where he had been living in exile, and return to Alexandria. Julius, who desired to be considered the arbiter of the dispute, invited both parties to appear before a council summoned to meet at Rome in the month of June, 341, a proposal gladly accepted by Athanasius, but evaded by his opponents. The cause of the former having been fully investigated before this assembly, he and his adherents were declared guiltless of all the crimes with which they had been charged, and were restored to the full exercise of all their rights,—a decision confirmed by the synod of Sardica, held A. D. 347, by permission of Constantius at the solicitation of Constans, in the proceedings of which the Arian dignitaries refused to take any share, because the bishops whom they had condemned were not excluded. Throughout the struggle, the prelates of the Western churches, in their eagerness for victory, made many most important admissions with regard to the authority of the Roman see, admissions which were carefully noted, and at a subsequent period turned to the best account. Julius died on the 12th of April, A. D. 352, after having occupied the papal chair for upwards of fifteen years.

Many epistles of this pope connected with the Athanasian controversy have perished; but two, unquestionably genuine, are still extant, written in Greek, one addressed to the inhabitants of Antioch in 342, the other to the Alexandrians in 349, both preserved in the Apologia contra Arianos of Athanasius. They will be found also in the Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum of Constant (fol. Par. 1721), p. 350, p. 399, and Append. p. 69, with notes and illustrative pieces; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. v. (fol. Venet. 1769), p. 3.

The letters Ad Dionysium Alexandrinum; Ad Docum; Ad Cyrillum Alexandrinum, on topics connected with the Incarnation; fragments of a Sermo de Homosinio, several Decreta, and various other tracts collected in the compilation of Constant, Append. p. 69, all of which have at different periods been ascribed to Julius, are now universally admitted to be the work of other hands, many of them being forgeries by the Eutychians.

JU'LUS, the eldest son of Ascanius, who claimed the government of Latium, but was obliged to give it up to his brother Silvius, and received a compensation in the form of a priestly office. (Dionys. i. 70; Liv. i. 2.) According to the author of De Orig. Gent. Rom. 15, the Latins believed that Ascanius was identical with Julius, and that out of gratitude they not only described him as a son of Jupiter, but also called him Jobus, and afterwards Julius. It is at any rate not impossible that Julius may be a diminutive of Dius. The Roman Julia gens traced their origin to this Julius. [JULIA GENS.] [L. S.]

JULUS, the name of an ancient patrician family of the Julia gens, which obtained the highest dignities in the early times of the republic.

1. C. JULIUS, L. P. JULUS, consul in a.c. 489 with P. Pinarius Mamercinus Rufus, in whose consulship the Volscians under Coriolanus commenced war against Rome. (Dionys. viii. 1.) Livy omits the consuls of this year altogether.

2. C. JULIUS, C. F. L. N., JULUS, son of No. 1, consul in b. c. 482 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus, was elected to the office in consequence of an agreement between the two parties in the state, who, after the most violent opposition in the consular comitia, had at length consented that C. Julius should be chosen as the popular, and Fabius as the aristocratical candidate. Such is the account of Dionysius; but Livy merely says that the discord in the state was as violent this year as previously. The consuls marched against the Veientes; but as the enemy did not appear in the field, they returned to Rome, after only laying waste the Veientine territory. (Dionys. viii. 90, 91; Liv. ii. 43.)

This C. Julius was a member of the first decemvirate, b. c. 451, and it is recorded as an instance of the moderation of the first decemvirs, that, though there was no appeal from their sentence, Julius, notwithstanding, accused before the people in the comitia centuriata P. Sestius, a man of patrician rank, in whose house the corpse of a murdered person had been found, when he might have himself passed sentence upon the criminal. (Liv. iii. 33; Cic. de Rep. ii. 36; Dionys. x. 56; Diod. xii. 23.) C. Julius is again mentioned in b. c. 449, as one of the three consuls who were sent by the senate to the plebeians when they had risen in arms against the second decemvirate, and were encamped upon the Aventine. (Liv. iii. 50; Ascon. in Cic. Cornel. p. 77, ed. Baier.)

3. VOPISCUS JULIUS, C. F. L. N., JULUS, son of No. 1, and brother of No. 2, was consul with L. Aemilius Mamercus in b. c. 473. Livy (ii. 54) mentions Opiter Verginius as the colleague of Aemilius, but says that he had found in some annals the name of Vopiscus Julius in place of Verginius. There were great civil commotions at Rome in this year. First came the murder of the tribune Genucius, and the consequent excitement; and since the consuls, flushed with this victory, as they deemed it, over the people, pressed the levy of troops with more than usual rigour, and among other acts of oppression attempted to compel one Volero Publicius to serve as a common soldier, though he had previously held the rank of centurion, the people at length became so indignant, that they rose against the consuls, and drove them out of the forum. (Liv. ii. 54, 55; Dionys. ix. 37-41; Diod. xi. 65; Flor. i. 22.)

4. C. JULIUS, C. F. C. N., JULUS, son of No. 2, was consul in a. c. 447, with M. Geganius Macerinus, and again in a. c. 435, with L. Verginius Tricostus. In the latter year Rome was visited with such a grievous pestilence, that not only were the Romans unable to march out of their own territory to devastate the enemy's, but even offered no opposition to the Fidenates and Veientes, who advanced almost up to the Colline gate. While Julius manned the walls, his colleague consulted the senate, and eventually named a dictator. (Liv. iii. 65, iv. 21; Diod. xii. 29, 49.) According to Licinius Macer, Julius was elected consul for the third time in the following year, with his colleague of the preceding. Other accounts mentioned other persons as the consuls; and others again gave consular tribunes this year. (Liv. iv. 23.)

5. L. JULIUS, VOP. F. C. N., JULUS, son of No. 3, one of the three consular tribunes in a. c. 438. (Liv. iv. 16; Diod. xii. 38.) He was magister equitum in a. c. 431 to the dictator, A. Postumius Tubertus, who left him and the consul for the year, C. Julius Mento, in charge of the city, while he marched against the Aequians and Volscians. (Liv. iv. 26, 27; Diod. xii. 64, who places the dictatorship in the preceding year.) In the following year, a. c. 430, L. Julius (erroneously called by Cicero C. Julius) was consul with C. Papirius Crassus. Having learnt from the treachery of one of the tribunes, that the latter intended to bring forward a law which was much wished for by the people, imposing a pecuniary fine instead of the one in cattle, which had been fixed by the Aternia Tarpeia lex, a. c. 454, the consuls anticipated their purpose, and proposed a law by which a small sum of money was to be paid in place of each head of cattle (multarum aestimatio). This law was occasioned, according to Cicero, by the censors, L. Papirius and P. Pinarius, having, through the infiction of fines, deprived private persons of an immense quantity of cattle, and brought them into the possession of the state. (Liv. iv. 30; Diod. xii. 72; Cic. de Rep. ii. 35; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. vol. ii. note 690.)

6. SEX. JULIUS JULUS, consular tribune in a. c. 424, with three colleagues. (Liv. iv. 35; Diod. xii. 82.)

7. C. JULIUS, L. F. VOP. N., JULUS, grandson of No. 3, consular tribune in a. c. 408, with two colleagues, and again in a. c. 405, with five colleagues. In the former year he and his colleague, Cornelius Cossus, vehemently opposed the nomination of a dictator; and in the latter year he took part with his colleagues in the commencement of the siege of Veii. (Liv. iv. 56, 61; Diod. xiii. 104, xiv. 17.) He was censor in a. c. 393, and died in his year of office. (Liv. v. 31, ix. 34; Plut. Cassell. 14.)

8. L. JULIUS JULUS, consular tribune in a. c. 403, with five colleagues, according to the Capitoline Fasti. Diodorus mentions only five tribunes, but Livy increases the number to eight. Six is probably the real number, to which Livy has added the two censors. The consular tribunes of this year continued the siege against Veii during the winter. (Liv. v. 1, 2; Diod. xiv. 35.)

9. L. JULIUS, L. F., VOP. N., JULUS, the son of No. 5, and the grandson of No. 3, consular tribune in a. c. 401, with five colleagues, and a second time in a. c. 397, with the same number of colleagues. In the former of these two years the consular tribunes entered upon their office on the kalends of October instead of the ides of December, which was the usual time, in consequence of a defeat sustained by their predecessors before Veii; and their own year of office was distinguished by the number of foreign wars and civil broils. In the latter year Julius, with his colleague, Postumius, fell upon the Tarquinienenses, who had made a plundering inroad into the Roman territory, and stripped them of the booty they had gained. (Liv. v. 9, 10, 16; Diod. xiv. 44, 85.)

10. L. JULIUS JULUS, consular tribune in a. c. 388, with five colleagues; and a second time in a. c. 379, with seven colleagues. (Liv. vi. 4, 30; Diod. xv. 23, 51.)

11. C. JULIUS JULUS, was nominated dictator in a. c. 352, under pretence of an apprehended war with the Etruscans, but in reality to carry the election of two patricians in the consular comitia, in violation of the Licinian law. (Liv. vii. 21.)

JULUS ANTONIUS. [ANTONIUS, No. 19.] JUNCUS, a Greek philosopher, from whose treatise "On Old Age" (περὶ γήρατος) considerable extracts are made by Stobaeus, but of whose life and age we know nothing. The work was in the form of a dialogue, and the writer appears to have been a Platonic philosopher. (Stobaeus, Florileg. tit. 115. § 26, 116. § 49, 117. § 9, 121. § 35, ed. Gaisford.)

Tacitus (Ann. xi. 35) speaks of a Roman senator, Juncus Vergilianus, who was put to death in the reign of the emperor Claudius: but perhaps we should read Junius instead of Juncus.

JUNIA. 1. The wife of C. Marcellus, the augur, and the mother of C. Marcellus, who was consul in a. c. 50. She is mentioned with great respect by Cicero in his congratulatory letters to her son and husband upon the election of the former to the consulship. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 7, 8.)

2. The daughter of Servilia and D. Junius Silanus, consul in a. c. 62. She was also the half-sister of M. Junius Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, who was the son of Servilia by her first husband, M. Junius Brutus, tribune of the plebs in a. c. 83. Junia was married to M. Lepidus, subsequently the triumvir. When Cicero was in Cilicia, in a. c. 50, he was told that she was not faithful to Lepidus: he speaks of her portrait being found among the chatels of the debauchee P. Veditius, and expresses his surprise at her brother and husband taking no notice of her conduct. He afterwards speaks of her in one of the Philippics in terms of praise (probatissima uxor). She seems, at all events, to have won the affections of her husband; and when she became involved in the conspiracy formed by her son Lepidus against the life of Octavian, after the battle of Actium, her husband offered to become security for her. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1, xiv. 8, Phil. xiii. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 88; Appian, B. C. iv. 50.)

3. JUNIA TERTIA, or TERTULLA, own sister of the preceding, and consequently half-sister of M. Brutus. The enemies of the dictator, Caesar, spread abroad the report that her mother, Servilia, had introduced her to Caesar's favour, when she herself became advanced in years. Tertia was the wife of C. Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers; but she survived her husband a long while, for she did not die till the sixty-fourth year after the battle of Philippi, a. d. 22, under the reign of Tiberius. Her property was very large; but though she left legacies to almost all the great men of Rome, she passed over the emperor Tiberius. He did not, however, resent the slight, but allowed her funeral to be celebrated with all the usual honours: the ancestral images of twenty illustrious houses were carried before her bier; "but Cassius and Brutus," says the historian, "shone before all the others, from the fact that their statues were not seen." (Suet. Caes. 50; Macrobi. Sat. ii. 2; Cic. ad Att. xiv. 20, xv. 11; Tac. Ann. iii. 76.)

JUNIA CALVINA. [CALVINA.]

JUNIA SILANA. [SILANA.]

JUNIA TORQUATA. [TORQUATA.]

JUNIA GENS, one of the most celebrated of the Roman gentes, was in all probability originally patrician, as we can hardly conceive that the first consul, L. Junius Brutus, connected as he was with the family of the Tarquins, could have been a plebeian, although the latter hypothesis is maintained by Niebuhr. But however this may be, it is certain that, with the exception of the first consul and his sons, all the other members of the gens were plebeians. [BRUTUS.] The family names and surnames which occur in the time of the republic are, BRUTUS, BUBULCUS, GRACCHANUS, NORBANUS, PACIACUS, PENNUS, PERA, PULLUS, SILANUS: the few who are mentioned without any cognomen are given below, under JUNIUS. Many Junii appear under the empire with other surnames than those mentioned above, but of course they cannot be regarded as any part of the real Junia gens: of these an alphabetical list is likewise given below.

JUNIUS, 1. Q. JUNIUS, one of the tribunes of the plebs in a. c. 315, who endeavoured to excite the people against the murderers of Sp. Maelius. (Liv. iv. 16.)

2. D. JUNIUS was stationed with a force by the consul, Ap. Claudius, in the second Punic war, a. c. 212, to command the mouth of the Volturnus. (Liv. xxv. 22.)

3. T. JUNIUS, L. F., a contemporary of Sulla, possessed no mean oratorical powers, but was unable to rise beyond the tribuneship of the plebs, on account of his always suffering from ill health. He accused and obtained the condemnation of P. Sextius, praetor designatus, for bribery at the elections. (Cic. Brut. 48.)

4. M. JUNIUS, the previous defender of Cicero's client, P. Quintus, but was absent on an embassy when Cicero spoke on behalf of Quintus, a. c. 81. (Cic. pro Quint. 1.)

5. C. JUNIUS, presided as judex quaestionis in the year of Verres's praetorship, a. c. 74, in the court which condemned Scamander, Fabricius, and Oppianicus, for having attempted to poison the elder Cluentia. The opinion that this verdict was gained by bribing the judges, and, among them, Junius, was so strongly believed, and excited such universal indignation, that Junius, although he had been aedile, and had a good prospect of obtaining the praetorship, was obliged to retire from public life altogether, and the Judicium Junianum became a bye-word for a corrupt and unrighteous judgment. (Cic. pro Cluent. 1, 20, 27, 29, 33, c. Verr. i. 10, 61; Pseudo-Acon. in Verr. p. 141, ed. Orelli.) This Junius had a son of the same name. (Pro Cluent. 49.)

6. M. JUNIUS, the praetor before whom Cicero defended D. Matrinius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 45; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10.)

JUNO. The name of Juno is probably of the same root as Jupiter, and differs from it only in its termination. As Jupiter is the king of heaven and of the gods, so Juno is the queen of heaven, or the female Jupiter. The Romans identified at an early time their Juno with Hera, with whom she has indeed many resemblances, but we shall endeavour here to treat of the Roman Juno exclusively, and to separate the Greek notions [HERA] entertained by the Romans, from those which are of a purely Italian or Roman nature. Juno, as the queen of heaven, bore the surname of Regina, under which she was worshipped at Rome from early times, and at a later period her worship was solemnly transferred from Veii to Rome, where a sanctuary was dedicated to her on the Aventine. (Liv. v. 21, 22, xxii. 1, xxvii. 37; Varr. de L. L. v. 67.) She is rarely described as hurling the thunderbolt, and the main feature of her character is, that she was to the female sex all that Jupiter was to the male, and that she was regarded as the protectress of every thing connected with marriage. She was, however, not only the protecting genius of the female sex in general, but accompanied every individual woman through life, from the moment of her birth to the end of her life. Hence she bore the special surnames of Virginis and Matrona, as well as the general ones of Opigena and Sospita (Ov. Fast. vi. 33; Horat. Carmin. iii. 4, 59; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 84; August. de Civ. Dei. iv. 11; Festus, p. 343, ed. Müller), under which she was worshipped both at Lanuvium and at Rome. (Liv. xxiv. 10, xxvii. 3, xxxii. 30; Ov. Fast. ii. 56; Cic. de Div. i. 2.) On their birthday women offered sacrifices to Juno surnamed natalis, just as men sacrificed to their genius natalis (Tibull. iv. 6. 13. 15); but the general festival, which was celebrated by all the women, in honour of Juno, was called Matronalia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), and took place on the 1st of March. Her protection of women, and especially her power of making them fruitful, is further alluded to in the festival Populifugia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) as well as in the surname of Februa, Februata, Februta, or Februaria. (Fest. s. v. Februarius, p. 85, ed. Müller; comp. Ov. Fast. ii. 441.) Juno was further, like Saturn, the guardian of the finances, and under the name of Moneta she had a temple on the Capitoline hill, which contained the mint. (Liv. vi. 20.) Some Romans considered Juno Moneta as identical with Minerva, but this identification undoubtedly arose from the desire of finding in the name Moneta a deeper meaning than it really contains. [MONETA.] The most important period in a woman's life is that of her marriage, and, as we have already remarked, she was believed especially to preside over marriage. Hence she was called Juga or Jugalis [JUGA], and had a variety of other names, alluding to the various occasions on which she was invoked by newly-married people, such as, Domiduca, Iterduca, Pronuba, Cinzia, Prema, Pertunda, Flouia, and Lucina. (Virg. Aen. iv. 166, 457, with Serv. note; Ov. Heroid. vi. 43; August. de Civ. Dei. vi. 7, 11, vii. 3; Arnob. iii. 7, 25, vi. 7, 25; Fest. s. v.) The month of June, which is said to have originally been called Junonia, was considered to be the most favourable period for marrying. (Macrob. Sat. i. 12; Ov. Fast. vi. 56.) Juno, however, not only presided over the fertility of marriage, but also over its inviolable sanctity, and unchastity and inordinate love of sexual pleasures were hated by the goddess. Hence a law of Numa ordained that a prostitute should not touch the altar of Juno, and that if she had done so, she should with dishevelled hair offer a female lamb to Juno. (Gell. iv. 3.) Women in childbirth invoked Juno Lucina to help them (Plaut. Aulul. iv. 7, 11; Plut. Quæst. Rom. 77; Propert. v. 1, 95; Arnob. iii. 9, 21, 23), and after the delivery of the child, a table was laid out for her in the house for a whole week (Tertull. de Anim. 39), for newly-born children were likewise under her protection, whence she was sometimes confounded with the Greek Artemis or Eileithyia. (Catull. xxxiv. 13; Dionys. Hal. iv. 15; comp. MATUTA.)

As Juno has all the characteristics of her husband, in so far as they refer to the female sex, she presides over all human affairs, which are based upon justice and faithfulness, and more especially over the domestic affairs, in which women are more particularly concerned, though public affairs were not beyond her sphere, as we may infer from her surnames of Curialis and Populonia. [Comp. EMPANDA.] In Etruria, where the worship of Juno was very general, she bore the surname of Cupra, which is said to have been derived from the name of a town, but it may be connected with the Sabine word cyprus, which, according to Varro (de L. L. v. 139), signified good, and also occurs in the name of vicus Cyprus. At Falerii, too, her worship was of great importance (Dionys. i. 21), and so also at Lanuvium, Aricia, Tibur, Praeneste, and other places. (Ov. Fast. vi. 49, 59; Liv. v. 21, x. 2; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 739; Strab. v. p. 241.) In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted. [L. S.]

JUNOPULUS [JANOPULUS.]

JUPITER, or perhaps more correctly, JUPITER, a contraction of Diocis pater, or Diespiter, and Diocis or dies, which was originally identical with diæum (heaven); so that Jupiter literally means "the heavenly father." The same meaning is implied in the name Lucesus or Lucerius, by which he was called by the Oscans, and which was often used by the poet Naevius (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 570; comp. Fest. s. v. Lucretium, p. 114, ed. Müller; Macrob. Sat. i. 15; Gell. v. 12.) The corresponding name of Juno is Lucina. It is further not impossible that the forgotten name, divus pater Falacer, mentioned by Varro (de L. L. v. 84, vii. 45), may be the same as Jupiter, since, according to Festus (s. v. fulas, p. 88, ed. Müller), fulandum was the Etruscan name for heaven. The surname of Supinalis (August. de Civ. Dei. vii. 11) likewise alludes to the dome of heaven.

As Jupiter was the lord of heaven, the Romans attributed to him power over all the changes in the heavens, as rain, storms, thunder and lightning, whence he had the epithets of Pluvius, Fulgurator, Tonitrualis, Tonans, Fulminator, and Serenator. (Appul. de Mund. 37; Fest. s. v. procurum; Suet. Aug. 91.) As the pebble or flint stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, Jupiter was frequently represented with such a stone in his hand instead of a thunderbolt (Arnob. vi. 25); and in ancient times a flint stone was exhibited as a symbolic representation of the god. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 641; August. de Civ. Dei. ii. 29.) In concluding a treaty, the Romans took the sacred symbols of Jupiter, viz. the sceptre and flint stone, together with some grass from his temple, and the oath taken on such an occasion was expressed by per Jovem Lapidem jurare. (Fest. s. v. Feretrius; Liv. xxx. 43; Appul. de Deo Socrat. 4; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 12; Gell. i. 21; Polyb. iii. 26.) When the country wanted rain, the help of Jupiter was sought by a sacrifice called aquileum (Tertull. Apol. 40); and respecting the mode of calling down lightning, see ETCIUS. These powers exercised by the god, and more especially the thunderbolt, which was ever at his command, made him the highest and most powerful among the gods, whence he is ordinarily called the best and most high (optimus maximus), and his temple stood on the capitol; for he, like the Greek Zeus, loved to erect his throne on lofty hills. (Liv. i. 10, 38, xliii. 55.) From the capitol, whence he derived the surnames of Capitolinus and Tarpelius, he looked down upon the forum and the city, and from the Alban and sacred mounts he surveyed the whole of Latium (Fest. s. v. Sacer Mons), for he was the protector of the city and the surrounding country. As such he was worshipped by the consuls on entering upon their office, and a general returning from a campaign had first of all to offer up his thanks to Jupiter, and it was in honour of Jupiter that the victorious general celebrated his triumph. (Liv. xxi. 63, xli. 32, xlii. 49.) The god himself was therefore designated by the names of Imperator, Victor, Invictus, Stator, Opitulus, Feretrius, Prædator, Triumphator, and the like. (Liv. i. 12, vi. 29, x. 29; Ov. Fast. iv. 621; August. de Civ. Dei. viii. 11; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 223; Appul. de Mund. 37; Festus, s. v. Opitulus; Cic. de Leg. ii. 11, in Verr. iv. 58.) Under all these surnames the god had temples or statues at Rome; and two temples, viz. those of Jupiter Stator at the Mucian gate and Jupiter Feretrius, were believed to have been built in the time of Romulus. (Liv. i. 12, 41; Dionys. ii. 34, 50.) The Roman games and the Feriae Latinae were celebrated to him under the names of Capitolinus and Latialis.

Jupiter, according to the belief of the Romans, determined the course of all earthly and human affairs: he foresaw the future, and the events happening in it were the results of his will. He revealed the future to man through signs in the heavens and the flight of birds, which are hence called the messengers of Jupiter, while the god himself is designated as Prodigialis, that is, the sender of prodigies. (Plaut. Amphit. ii. 2, 107.) For the same reason Jupiter was invoked at the beginning of every undertaking, whether sacred or profane, together with Janus, who blessed the beginning itself (August. de Civ. Dei. vii. 8; Liv. viii. 9; Cato, de R. R. 134, 141; Macrob. Sat. i. 16); and rams were sacrificed to Jupiter on the ides of every month by his flamen, while a female lamb and a pig were offered to Juno on the kalends of every month by the wife of the rex sacrorum. (Macrob. Sat. i. 15; Or. Fast. i. 587; Fest. s. v. Idulis Ovis.) Another sacrifice, consisting of a ram, was offered to Jupiter in the regia on the nundines, that is, at the beginning of every week (Macrob. Sat. i. 16; Festus. s. v. nundinas); and it may be remarked in general that the first day of every period of time both at Rome and in Latium was sacred to Jupiter, and marked by festivals, sacrifices, or libations.

It seems to be only a necessary consequence of what has been already said, that Jupiter was considered as the guardian of law, and as the protector of justice and virtue: he maintained the sanctity of an oath, and presided over all transactions which were based upon faithfulness and justice. Hence Fides was his companion on the capitol, along with Victoria; and hence a traitor to his country, and persons guilty of perjury, were thrown down the Tarpeian rock. Faithfulness is manifested in the internal relations of the state, as well as in its connections with foreign powers, and in both respects Jupiter was regarded as its protector. Hence Jupiter and Juno were the guardians of the bond of marriage; and when the harmony between husband and wife was disturbed, it was restored by Juno, surnamed Conciliatrix or Viriplaca, who had a sanctuary on the Palatine. (Fest. s. v. Conciliatrix; Val. Max. ii. 1. § 6.) Not only the family, however, but all the political bodies into which the Roman people was divided, such as the gentes and curiæ, were under the especial protection of the king and queen of the gods; and so was the whole body of the Roman people, that is, the Roman state itself. The fact of Jupiter being further considered as the watchful guardian of property, is implied in his surname of Hercius (from the ancient herctum, property), and from his being expressly called by Dionysius (ii. 74), ἄγρος Ζεύς, i. e. Jupiter Terminus, or the protector of boundaries, not only of private property, but of the state.

As Jupiter was the prince of light, the white colour was sacred to him, white animals were sacrificed to him, his chariot was believed to be drawn by four white horses, his priests wore white caps, and the consuls were attired in white when they offered sacrifices in the capitol the day they entered on their office. (Festus. s. v. albigulerum pileum.) When the Romans became acquainted with the religion of the Greeks, they naturally identified Jupiter with Zeus, and afterwards with the Egyptian Ammon, and in their representations of the god they likewise adopted the type of the Greek Zeus. JUSTINIANA. [VALENTINIANUS.]

JUSTINIANUS, I. FLAVIUS ANICIUS, surnamed MAGNUS, or THE GREAT, emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE and ROME from A. D. 527 to 565. His descent and family connections are given in the following genealogical table:—

The date of the birth of Justinian is fixed on the 11th of May, A. D. 483, in L'Art de Vérifier les Dates (vol. i. p. 409), where the question is critically investigated. His birthplace was the village of Tauresium, in the district of Bederiana, in Dardania, where he afterwards built the splendid city of Justiniana, on the site of which stands the modern town of Kostendil. (See D'Anville, Mémoires sur deux villes qui ont porté le nom de Justiniana, in the 31st vol. of Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres.)

At an early age Justinian went to Constantinople, where his uncle Justin, who had risen to high military honours, took care of his education and advancement. During some time he lived as an hostage at the court of Theodoric, king of the East Goths. After the accession of his uncle Justin to the imperial throne, in 518, he rose to eminence, and prepared his own fortune by securing that of the emperor. Active in the destruction of the eunuch Amantius and his associates, he contrived or perpetrated the murder of Vitalian, the Goth, so famous by his rebellion against the emperor Anastasius, and who was stabbed at a banquet in the presence of Justin and Justinian. In reward for his faithful allegiance, Justinian was made commander-in-chief of the armies in Asia; but he was no warrior, and preferred remaining at Constantinople, where he canvassed the friendship of the clergy and the senators. He was advanced to the consulship in 521, and his influence became so great, that, at the suggestion of the senate, the aged emperor adopted him, and proclaimed him co-emperor. 1st of April, 527. Justin died a few months afterwards, and Justinian was crowned by the patriarch of Constantinople, together with his wife, the actress Theodora, whom he raised to the dignity of empress, in spite of the opposition of his mother and other relatives. [THEODORA.]

Justinian signalled his accession by public festivals more splendid than the Greeks had ever witnessed, and the money alone which was distributed among the people is said to have amounted to 288,000 pieces of gold. Had he not been an excellent financier, his extravagances might have impeded his operations against the enemies of the empire, against whom he was obliged to prosecute the war which had been begun by his predecessor; but he understood thoroughly the subtle art of emptying those purses again which his liberality had filled; and if his generals were not successful against the Persians, it was not for want of money. The Huns on the northern shores of the Euxine, especially around the Palus Maecotis, or the Sea of Azof, were either subjugated or submitted voluntarily; and the Arabs, who made frequent incursions into Syria as far as Antioch, were likewise, though with more difficulty, compelled to desist from hostilities. The relations between Constantinople and Persia were of an indifferent character, and an open war broke out between the two powers, when Justinian promised to assist Teiathua, the king of the Lazi, between Pontus and the Caucasus, who came to Constantinople to implore the aid of the Romans against the Persians. In the first campaign against these hereditary enemies of Rome, the generals of Justinian, Belisarius, Cyricus, and Petrus, were defeated; but their successor, Petrus Notarius, was successful. The war was chiefly carried on in Armenia, but also on the frontiers of Syria and Mesopotamia, and lasted till 532, when, after as many defeats as victories, but without being compelled by necessity, Justinian made peace with Chosroes, the Persian king, who desisted from further hostilities on receiving an annual tribute of 440,000 pieces of gold. Justinian wished for peace with Persia, because he intended to make war against the Vandals in Africa, and to subdue, if possible, the political factions by which the empire had so often been shaken, and which had created a fearful riot in the very year that the peace was concluded with Persia. In January 532, Justinian honoured the public feast in the hippodrome with his presence, being surrounded by vast numbers of the "Blue faction" (oi Bévrotai), who were adherents of the orthodox Catholic church, and, consequently, partisans of the orthodox emperor. Suddenly some of the "Green faction" (oi Πράσινοι), who had already made much noise, rose and complained of several grievances, especially that the emperor patronised the Blue, and showed himself too indulgent towards their riotous and dissolute conduct. They further complained of fiscal oppression and the partial administration of justice. In all these points they were perfectly right. The emperor answered them through a crier (Μαγίστρος, the Latin Mandator), and a long dialogue ensued, which grew more and more violent on both sides, and which Theophanes gives with apparent fidelity. The Blues took the emperor's part; the quarrel came to blows, and after a short struggle within the hippodrome, the infuriated factions rushed into the streets, and soon Constantinople was filled with murder and bloodshed. The houses of the leaders of the two parties were demolished, others were set on fire; and every body being engaged either in saving their own lives or in attempting the lives of others, the flames spread from street to street, and a general conflagration consumed thousands of houses, the church of St. Sophia, a large part of the imperial palace, the baths of Zeuxippus (Alexander), the great hospital of Sampsas, and a vast number of churches and public or private palaces. After five days' murder and plunder, many thousands of dead bodies covered the streets, or lay roasting among burning ruins. These riots are known by the name of the πλκα riots, the word πλκα, "be victorious," having been the war-cry of both the Blue and the Green. Unfortunately for the emperor, the two factions, after fighting against each other, perceived that the victory of neither would remove those abuses against which the Green had first risen, and they consequently formed an union, and turned their fury against such of the imperial officers as were most suspected of peculation and oppression. The chief objects of their hatred were the quaestor Tribonian, the jurist, and the praefect John, of Cappadocia; Justinian deposed them both, in order to appease the popular fury, but in vain. Hypatius and Pompeius, two nephews of the late emperor Anastasius, who were removed from the court because they were suspected of being engaged in the riots, were, apparently against their will, chosen by the populace to act as their leaders; Hypatius was proclaimed emperor, and Justinian, despairing of quelling the rebellion, prepared to fly with his treasures to Heracleia, in Thrace, none of his ministers, not even Belisarius, having succeeded in discovering any means of saving their master in this critical moment. He would have been lost but for his wife Theodora.

who exercised an extraordinary influence over him. Being present at the privy council, where the emperor declared his resolution of leaving the city, she rose, and with impressive words, sometimes reproaching and sometimes encouraging, produced a happy change in the minds of Justinian and his councillors. Nurses bribed the chiefs of the Blue, and soon rekindled those hostilities between the two factions which only an extraordinary event had appeased for a moment; and, sure of the assistance of the Blue, Belisarius led a body of 3000 veterans against the hippodrome, where the Green had fortified themselves. In a dreadful carnage 30,000 of the Green were massacred within the space of one day; and Hypatius and Pompeius having been made prisoners, were led to death, with eighteen other leaders of patrician or consular rank. Thus ended one of the most terrible riots that had ever happened at Constantinople; but the power of the Green was far from being broken, and the two factions continued to make the hippodrome an occasional scene of bloodshed during the whole reign of Justinian.

Immediately after these troubles Justinian made serious preparations for a war against the Vandals. His pretext was to avenge the deposition of the aged Hilderic, the lawful king of the Vandals, and a great favourite of Justinian, on account of his orthodoxy, who had been deprived of his throne by the warrior Gelimer; but his design upon Carthage was blamed by the people, who had in mind the unhappy campaign of Basiliscus against the Vandals in A. D. 468, and still more so by most of his ministers, especially John of Cappadocia, who, however, acted from very selfish motives. [JOANNES OF CAPPADOCIA.] Nor does it appear that Justinian originated the plan, which seems to have been suggested to him by Theodora and Antonina, the wife of Belisarius, and to which he was finally persuaded by this great general. This was the last contest between Rome and Carthage, but on neither side was it carried on by Romans or Carthaginians, those who boasted of the former name being Greeks and Scythian or Gothic barbarians, while the defenders of Carthage were a mixture of Germans and Slavonians, commanded by Germanic chiefs. An army of 35,000 soldiers, commanded by Belisarius, left the Bosphorus in June, 533, in a fleet of 500 ships, manned by 20,000 mariners, and among the troops were several thousand archers with coats of mail, who fought on horseback, and of which Procopius gives a description which strongly resembles that of the brave Caucasians in our time. From the Bosphorus the fleet made for Methone (Modon), in Messenia, where the troops were landed, and remained a short time on the shore to refresh themselves; thence they sailed round the Peloponnese, reached Zante, and cast anchor at Caucana, about 50 miles from Syracuse, where they were well treated by the Goths—a great act of imprudence on their part—and they finally landed on the African shore, near the promontory of Caput Vada, now Capaudia, at five days' journey south of Carthage. Gelimer, having dispatched part of his army and fleet for the conquest of Sardinia, was unable to offer any effective resistance: moreover, the aborigines of the country, and the descendants of the former Roman settlers, received the Romans as Catholic brethren, and Belisarius advanced as far as the palace of Grasse, only 50 miles from Carthage, meeting only with friends, and not with enemies. At 10 miles distance from Carthage the Romans encountered the main army of the Vandals, who were routed, and so completely dispersed, that Gelimer despaired of defending his capital with success, and fled into the interior, in order to collect a new army. A few days afterwards, on the 15th of September, 533, the inhabitants of Carthage opened their gates to the victor, not only without resistance, but with manifestations of joy. While Belisarius employed his time in repairing the fortifications of Carthage, Gelimer succeeded in raising a considerable number of troops, and his brother Zano, who had meanwhile conquered Sardinia, returned in haste with his army, which, however, was only 5000 men strong, and joined Gelimer in his camp at Balla, five days' journey from the capital. They marched upon Carthage, and their forces increased daily; so that when they arrived at Tricameron, 20 miles from Carthage, they commanded an army ten times more numerous than that of Belisarius. But the Vandals who defended Africa were no longer the same who had conquered it: they were enervated by the climate and the luxuries of the South; and in a pitched battle at Tricameron they were entirely defeated. Gelimer fled into the mountains in the South, but was pursued by the Roman Pharas, who kept him besieged in a castle on Mount Papua, where he was reduced to such extremity that he at last surrendered, and after having been presented to Belisarius at Carthage, was sent to Constantinople, where he was treated by Justinian with great generosity. [GELIMER.] After the conquest of Carthage, Belisarius reduced the whole tract of Africa along the shore of the Mediterranean, as far as the columns of Hercules, and brought likewise the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, as well as the Baleares, under the authority of Justinian.

The overthrow of the Vandal kingdom in Africa was followed by a war with the East Goths in Italy, which arose out of the following circumstances, in which the cunning and artfulness of Justinian were no less conspicuous than the frank heroism of Belisarius. Shortly after the accession of Justinian, the young king of the East Goths, Athalaric, died, and his mother Amalasuntha, a highly gifted woman, who was the youngest daughter of the great Theodoric, succeeded her son, and, in order to establish her power the better, married her cousin Theodat. It happened, however, that Justinian contemplated a marriage with that queen, although he was already married to Theodora; and we cannot doubt that, in order to obtain his ends, he would have sacrificed both his wife and king Theodat. Suspecting his designs, Theodora secretly negotiated with Theodat, and made him great promises, if he would put Amalasuntha to death. Theodat saw his danger, and lost no time in seizing his unfortunate queen, and confining her in a castle, where she was found strangled some time after her imprisonment (534). The anger of Justinian was extreme, and as the Gothic kingdom was shaken by political factions, while his own power had much increased through his conquest of Africa, he prepared for an invasion of Italy. The pretext he alleged was to avenge the murder of Amalasuntha. He began his hostile demonstrations by demanding the fortress of Lilybæum, in Sicily, from the Goths: this town had been given to Thrasimond, king of the Vandals, by Theodoric the Great, but after the overthrow of the Vandals in 534, the Goths occupied the town, and refused to surrender it to Justinian, when he claimed it as an appendage of the Vandal kingdom. Thus the war broke out, the chief events of which, till the final recast of Belisarius in 548, are related in the life of BELISARIUS. When Belisarius was recalled, the Roman army was in a critical position, because the brave Gothic king, Totilas, had gained great advantages over Belisarius, and after his recall the Goths made such progress as to reduce the Roman power in Italy to a shadow. Totilas took Rome by a stratagem, restored the senate, and made it once more the seat of the Gothic empire. Thence he sailed to Calabria, took Tarentum and Rhegium, conquered Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, and despatched a fleet of 300 gallees, which were probably manned by Greek natives of Southern Italy, for the Goths were no mariners, to the coast of Greece, where the Gothic warriors landed, and spread terror among the inhabitants. They pushed as far as Nicopolis and Dodona, and Totilas sent envoys to Justinian, offering him peace, and promising to assist him against any enemy, if he would desist from his designs upon Italy. Justinian would perhaps have accepted his offers but for the circumstance that the Goths being Arians, the orthodox church in Italy was in danger of being overthrown by schismatics. Fresh troops were consequently sent to Italy, and Germanus, the nephew of Justinian, who was renowned by many victories over the Bulgarians, the Persians, and the Mauritians, was destined to command them, but died at Sardica, in Illyricum, on his march to Italy. [GERMANUS, No. 2.] The choice of Germanus proves the danger in which the empire was placed by the victories of Totilas. This prince was dear to the Goths through his marriage with Mathasuntha, daughter of Amalasuntha, and grand-daughter of Theodoric the Great; and as he was also one of the best Roman generals, a suspicious man like Justinian must have had urgent motives for sending him into Italy, where, in case of success, he had still greater chances of becoming king of the Goths than Belisarius could have had in making himself independent in Africa. But Germanus was a man of so excellent a character as to be above the suspicions even of a Justinian. The mere fact of his being appointed to the command roused the spirit of the Roman army, and ere the eunuch Narses was chosen to succeed him, the Gothic fleet had been defeated, and Sicily reconquered by Artabannus. Narses led the Roman army round the Adriatic into Italy, while a fleet followed him along the shore, and in a dreadful battle at Tagina (July, 552) slew 6000 Goths, and dispersed the rest. Totilas fell in the conflict, and his bloody dress was sent as the most acceptable trophy to Justinian. The successor of Totilas, Teias, continued the war, but he likewise was killed in a pitched battle on the river Sarnus, near Naples, and his death was the downfall of the Gothic kingdom in Italy. A host of Franks and Alemanni descended from the Alps to dispute the possession of Italy with Narses, and their first inroad was so irresistible that they penetrated as far as the straits of Sicily. But in a battle on the river Volturrus, near the bridge of Casilinum, they were routed with great slaughter by Narses, who drove their scattered remnants beyond the Alps (554). Narses was appointed exarch, or viceroy, of Italy, and took up his residence at Ravenna, and he united his efforts with those of his master in settling the domestic state of Italy, which was nearly ruined through the protracted war, while millions of her inhabitants had perished by the sword and famine.

To these conquests the lieutenants of Justinian in Africa added a considerable tract in Spain, along the shores of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, from the south-western extremity of Algarve in the west to the confines of the modern kingdom of Murcia in the east, which the West Goths were obliged to cede to the victorious Romans; and the fortunate Justinian now reigned over the whole extent of the Roman empire as it existed under the earlier emperors, except the greater part of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, where the most warlike of all the barbarians of those times exercised an authority unchecked by either Romans or Greeks. The strength of Justinian's empire, however, did not correspond with its dimensions. Both the Romans and Greeks were enervated, and little disposed to serve in the field, when they could buy foreigners to defend Rome and Constantinople; and the practice of enlisting barbarians proved very dangerous, since so many veterans, who returned into their native forests or steppes, informed their brethren of the internal weakness of the Roman empire. We thus see that, notwithstanding the fear which the victories of Belisarius, Narses, Germanus, and so many other great generals, necessarily caused among the immediate neighbours of the Romans, many barbarian nations, that lived at greater distances from the Roman frontiers, pushed slowly towards Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor, in order to be ready to invade the empire at the first opportunity. From the extreme north of Germany, the Longobards, of Saxon origin, advanced towards the Danube, and settled in Moravia and Northern Hungary, whence, but a few years after the death of Justinian, they broke forth for the conquest of Italy. Their neighbourhood appeared so dangerous to Justinian, that he tried to gain them to his interests, and to use them as a barrier against other enemies, by ceding to them Pannonia and Noricum. The latter province was, however, soon taken from the Longobards by the Franks. The neighbours of the Longobards, the Gepidae, had founded a kingdom in Eastern Hungary and Transylvania as early as the middle of the fifth century; and since they were always annoying the Romans in Illyricum, Justinian availed himself of their feuds with the Longobards, and assisted the latter. In consequence of this, the power of the Gepidae was weakened, but that of the Longobards increased in proportion; and had Justinian lived but two years longer, he would have seen that the final overthrow of the Gepidae had, as its immediate consequence, the destruction of the Roman power in Italy by the Longobards. Still farther in the East, on the river Don, appeared in 557 the Avars, a nation of Turkish origin. In accordance with his usual policy of turning the feuds of the barbarians to his own profit, Justinian lavished his money upon the Avars, and employed them together with his own forces against some barbarian tribes which annoyed the Roman possessions in the Chersonesus Taurica (the Crimea). This was in 558. Only four years afterwards the whole of the nations north of the Danube, as far west as modern Bavaria, was subjugated by the Avars, and Justinian II. paid dearly for the timid and wavering conduct of Justinian I.

Among the nations subdued by the Avars were the Bulgarians, between the Don and the Volga, who, in 559, passed the frozen Danube, and under their chief, Zabergan, ravaged Thrace and Macedonia, and appeared under the walls of Constantinople. The capital was saved by Belisarius, whom Justinian rewarded with a dry compliment.

If we turn our eyes from the West to the East, we find that the treaty of peace had scarcely been concluded between Constantinople and Persia, before the Persian king Chosroes or Nushirwán, with his accustomed faithlessness, violated its conditions, and a new and terrible war broke out in 540. According to Procopius, however, Justinian purposely excited the Persian king to take up arms, and, at any rate, wished for a new war, which is the more likely, as he was then at the pinnacle of his power. In the year mentioned Nushirwán invaded Syria, and the Roman army being too weak to arrest his progress, he spoiled the principal towns of their riches, and laid siege to Antioch, which was defended by Germanus. This general thought his forces insufficient for an effective resistance, and consequently withdrew, a step for which he has been charged with cowardice, although on many other occasions he had shown himself a brave and fearless man. The "queen of the East" soon became a prey to the Persians, and after having been plundered, was destroyed by fire. The Asiatic provinces of Justinian would have been lost but for the timely arrival of Belisarius (541), who through a well calculated invasion of Mesopotamia and Assyria, compelled Nushirwán to leave the province of Pontus which he was ravaging, and to hasten to the defence of his hereditary dominions. Suddenly Belisarius was recalled to Constantinople, and during his absence Nushirwán collected his forces, and set out for a new invasion of Syria and Palestine. In this emergency Belisarius was again put at the head of the Roman armies in those quarters; and the mere fact of his presence was sufficient to induce Nushirwán to repossess the Euphrates. Every body now expected that Belisarius would march forthwith upon Ctesiphon, when the unfavourable turn of the Gothic war required his presence in Italy (543). No sooner was he gone than 30,000 Romans suffered a severe defeat from 4000 Persians; but the differences between the two empires were nevertheless settled to the satisfaction of Justinian, and a sort of truce was made, in consequence of which that part of the East was no longer disturbed by the Persians. It happened, however, that the Lazians and Colchians became tired of their dependence upon Constantinople, and implored the protection of Nushirwán, who accepted the offer, and placed garrisons in the principal towns of those nations. A few years were sufficient to show them that the rapacity of the king was still greater than that of the emperor, and they accordingly entreated Justinian to receive them again among his subjects, and to deliver them from their Persian oppressors. Justinian despatched Dagisteus with 7000 Romans and 1000 Zani into Lazica; and Petra, the strongest fortress of the country, was taken from the Persians by storm, after a memorable and protracted siege (549—551). This war lasted, with various success, till 561, when, tired of eternal bloodshed, the two monarchs came at last to an agreement. Through the peace of 561 the tranquillity of the East was finally restored, but Justinian bought it on the dishonourable condition of an annual payment of 30,000 pieces of gold. Yet the profit of this negotiation was on the side of Justinian, because Nushirwán renounced his claims upon Colchis and Lazica, both of which countries were then renowned for their gold mines; and the restoration of peace in all his Eastern dominions was a sufficient consideration to induce Justinian to expend so small a sum as 30,000 pieces of gold. In the beginning of the Persian war Justinian concluded a singular alliance. At that time there was a Christian kingdom in Southern Arabia, which extended over the provinces of Yemen and Hadhramaut, and was then commonly called the kingdom of the Homeritæ. Dunaan having seized the supreme power, persecuted the Christians, who found assistance in the person of Eleebam, the Negus or Christian king of Abyssinia, who came over to Arabia, and made himself master of the Homeritic kingdom. With this Eleebam Justinian entered into negotiations, and in 533 despatched Nonnosus as ambassador to him, to induce him to unite his forces with the Romans against the Persians, and to protect the trade between Egypt and India, especially that of silk, which Justinian wished to establish by sea, through the assistance of the inhabitants of Abyssinia and Arabia. Nonnosus ascended the Nile, and was received by Eleebam at Axum, but he did not attain his objects. Soon afterwards the Homeritæ freed themselves from the Abyssinian supremacy; but the rise of Mohammedanism proved the ruin of the Christians in Arabia, for the power of the Abyssinian kings in Africa was weakened through internal discord and revolutions. Gibbon remarks with great justice, that "these obscure and remote events are not foreign to the decline and fall of the Roman empire. If a Christian power had been maintained in Arabia, Mohammed must have been crushed in his cradle, and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the world."

The final overthrow of the Gothic power in Italy, the peace with Persia, the reconquest of Lazica, and the last victories of Belisarius over the Bulgarians in 559, followed each other so closely, and were of such importance in their consequences, that Justinian was allowed during the last years of his life to enjoy in peace the extraordinary power which his ambition made him wish for, but which he owed entirely to the skill and heroism of Belisarius, Narses, and Germanus, and many other generals, as well as to the valour and discipline of the troops formed by those eminent officers. Nine months after Belisarius, the victim of his base ingratitude, had sunk into the grave, the emperor Justinian died, on the 14th of November, 565, at the age of eighty-three, and left an empire, colossal in size, threatening in its appearance, but rotten in its foundations, to the imbecile son of his sister Vigilantia, Justinus II.

After this sketch of the principal political events of the reign of Justinian, it remains to say a few words on the manner in which he guarded his empire against so many enemies which surrounded it, and on the system of his government at home.

The ancient Roman system of fortifying the frontiers of the empire was carried by Justinian to an extent which plainly shows the great danger to which his subjects were constantly exposed; for not only were the outer frontiers secured by an immense number of forts and towers, interspersed with larger regular fortresses, but even most of the towns in the very heart of Greece, Thrace, and Asia were provided with walls and towers, to protect the inhabitants against the irresistible inroads of the barbarians. Thence Montesquieu observes, that the Roman empire at the time of Justinian resembled the Frankish kingdom in the time of the Norman inroads, when, in spite of every village being a fortress, the kingdom was weaker than at any other period. The entire course of the Danube was defended by about eighty forts, of different dimensions, all of which were guarded by numerous garrisons; other fortresses were erected beyond the river, in the middle of the countries of the barbarians. But these detached forts were utterly unable to protect Thrace against an enemy who used to appear suddenly with overwhelming forces, leaving no alternative to the Roman garrisons than of shutting themselves up within their walls, and of beholding as inactive spectators the Bulgarians swimming over the Danube with 20,000 horses at once, or crossing it in the winter on the solid ice. Similar forts were built, too, from the junction of the Save with the Danube north, towards Pannonia, and they proved quite as ineffective against the Avars as the forts along the Danube against the Bulgarians. Italy was fortified by nature, yet the Franks crossed the Alps with impunity. Thence the necessity of creating a system of inland fortifications. The ancient Greek wall across the Thracian Chersonnese, near Constantinople, was carefully restored, and brought to a degree of strength which caused the admiration of Procopius; the Bulgarians nevertheless crossed it, and fed their horses in the gardens round Constantinople. Similar walls, with towers, were constructed across Thessaly (beginning with the defiles of Thermopylae) and across the isthmus of Corinth; yet Bulgarians, Slavonians, and other barbarians, kept the inhabitants of Greece in constant fear of being carried off as slaves. At whatever point these savage warriors appeared, they were always the strongest, and the poor Romans had no other chance of safety left than of taking refuge within the larger towns, the solid fortifications of which were sufficient to keep the enemy at a distance. In the north-east the isthmus of the Chersonnesus Taurica, the present Crimea, was fortified in the same way as the isthmus of Corinth, by a long wall. The Roman possessions along the eastern shores of the Euxine and in the Caucasus were covered with forts and military stations; and from the corner of Colchis to the sources of the Euphrates, and along the river as far as Syria, and thence along the edge of the Syro-Arabic desert, there was scarcely a town or a defile but was surrounded by walls and ditches, or shut up by massive barriers of stone, against the inroads of the Persians. Syria was thought to be sufficiently guarded by the great desert between the Euphrates and the Lebanon, and the fortifications of the Syrian towns were allowed to fall into decay, till the repeated invasions of Nushirwan and the sack of Antioch directed the attention of Justinian to that quarter also. Darn, not far from Nisibis, was the strongest bulwark of the empire on the side of Mesopotamia, and constantly provoked the jealousy of the Persians.

The enormous sums which the defence of the empire required, together with the gold which

Justinian lavished upon the barbarians, involuntarily led to the system of his administration. Procopius, in his Secret History or Anecdota, gives an awful description of it; but however vicious that administration was, the colours of Procopius are too dark, and his motives in writing that work were not fair. There was decided order and regularity in the administration, but the leading principles of it were suspicion and avarice. The taxes were so heavy, their assessment so unequal, that Gibbon compares them to a hail-storm that fell upon the land, and to a devouring pestilence with regard to its inhabitants. In cases of necessity, the inhabitants of whole districts were compelled to bring their stores of corn to Constantinople, or other places where the troops might be in want of it, and they were either not paid at all, or received such bad prices that they were often completely ruined. In all the provinces the officers of the crown took much more from the people than the law allowed, because the venality of places was carried on openly as a means of filling the emperor's treasury, and the purses of his prime minister; and those who purchased places, which were, after all, badly paid, could not keep their engagements with the sellers, nor enrich themselves, without carrying on that system of robbery, which is at the present day the general practice in Turkey and most of the other countries in the East. Justinian certainly tried to check peculation and venality (Novella, viii.), but this thundering edict was soon forgotten, and it would seem that the emperor himself lent his endeavours to throw it into oblivion. Another great abuse which the principal officers made of their power was that of prevailing upon wealthy persons to make wills in their favour, to the disadvantage of the natural heirs. A great source of revenue for the imperial treasury consisted in the numberless duties, entry fees, and other charges, mostly arbitrary, laid upon trade and manufactures, and we may fairly presume that the tradespeople were as much oppressed as the land-owners. Some branches of trade, as for instance silk, were made monopolies of the crown, and, in short, there were no means left untried to fill his treasury. However, he never tampered with the coinage, nor gave it an artificial value. The millions thus obtained by Justinian were not only sufficient to cover the expenses occasioned by the army, the fortifications, the wars, and the bribery of barbarians, but enough remained to enable him to indulge his passion of perpetuating his name by public festivals, and especially by those beautiful buildings and monuments which were erected by his order, and render his time conspicuous in the history of art. Procopius describes them in his work "De Aedificiis Justiniani." The church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, that splendid edifice, which, though now transformed into a Turkish mosque, still excites the admiration of the spectator, was the most magnificent building erected by Justinian. Besides this Church of St. Sophia, there were twenty-five other churches constructed in Constantinople and its suburbs, among which were the beautiful churches of St. John the Apostle and St. Mary the Virgin, near the Blachernae, the latter of which he perhaps only repaired. The imperial palace at Constantinople was embellished with unparalleled splendour and taste; and his new palace with the gardens at Heraeum, near Chalcedon, was praised as the most beautiful residence in the world. The "Antiquities of Constantinople," by Petrus Gyllius (English translation by John Ball, London, 1729), give a description of the most remarkable buildings of Justinian, in Constantinople. Justinian paid 45 centenaries of gold (nearly 200,000*l.*), towards the rebuilding and embellishment of Antioch, after it had been destroyed by an earthquake; his native village he transformed into a large and splendid city, to which he gave his name; and, in short, there was not a town of consequence in his vast dominions, from the Columns of Hercules to the shores of the Caspian, but could show some beautiful monument of the emperor's splendour and taste. Asia Minor still contains a great number of edifices erected by Justinian, and our modern travellers have discovered many which were formerly unknown. Indeed his love of splendour and his munificence in matters of taste, show, or luxury, no less than his extraordinary power, made his name known over the world, whence he received embassies from the remotest nations of Asia. In his reign the silk-worm was brought to Constantinople, by some Nestorian monks, who had visited their fellow-Christians in China.

In 541 Justinian abolished the consulship, or, more correctly, discontinued the old-established custom of choosing consuls. The consulate being a mere title, it was but reasonable to do away with it, although the name was still dear to the people; but it was not abolished by law until the reign of the emperor Leo Philosophus (886—911.) Justinian likewise shut up the schools at Athens and Alexandria, where the Neo-Platonists still professed dogmas which the orthodox emperor thought dangerous to Christianity. In the time of Justinian, however, those schools were only a shadow of what they had been in the first centuries of our era. Christian orthodoxy was one of the most important objects which Justinian endeavoured to establish in his empire, and many of his laws testify his zeal on behalf of the church and the clergy. But his piety was exaggerated, and toleration was a thing unknown to him. He persecuted Christian sectaries, Jews, and pagans, in an equally heartless manner, and actually endeavoured to drive them all out of his dominions. Towards the end of his life, however, Justinian changed his religious opinions so much that he was considered a complete heretic. Nestorianism, which he was so active in condemning at the fifth General Council, the second of Constantinople, in 553, was the doctrine which he embraced.

The character of Justinian presented a strange mixture of virtues and vices, but he was neither so depraved as Procopius depicts him, nor so accomplished as the modern jurists of Germany and France represent him in their admiration for his legislation. His private life was exemplary. He was frugal, laborious, affable, and generous, but his mean suspicions and unreasonable jealousy never allowed him to gain the love of his friends or the esteem of his subjects. His conduct towards Belisarius was execrable. Another of his vices was rapacity, and it would seem that he considered men created to work, not for themselves, but for him alone. Thence the little regard he paid to the complaints of his subjects with reference to his perpetual wars; and although he assisted them with great liberality when they were suffering from the consequences of those plagues and earthquakes which signalled his time, his motive was vanity as much as humanity. If we look at his endless and glorious wars, we should think that he was a great warrior himself, or possessed at least great military talents: but however great his talents were, they were not in that line; he never showed himself in the field, and his subjects called him a bigoted and cowardly tyrant. As a statesman he was crafty rather than wise; yet his legislation is a lasting monument of his administrative genius, and has given him a place in the opinion of the world far beyond that which he really deserves. #### THE LEGISLATION OF JUSTINIAN.

The idea of forming a complete code of law has been attributed to Pompey, to Cicero, and to Julius Caesar. Such, too, was the original plan of Theodosius the younger, although a much more limited design was ultimately carried into effect in the Theodosian Code. [DIODORUS.] Shortly before the reign of Justinian, upon the submission of the Western empire to Germanic rule, the Roman law was still allowed to retain its force in the West by the side of a newly-introduced Germanic jurisprudence. The Lex Romana, as it was barbarously called, remained the law of the subjugated Romans, while the Durburi, as the Germans were proud to be styled, continued to live under their own Teutonic institutions. Under this anomalous system of personal laws, many difficulties must have arisen, and it was found necessary to make separate collections of such sources of law as were to be recognised for the future in regulating the respective rights and duties of the subjugated Roman provincials and their conquerors. In the West Gothic kingdom, which was established in Spain and a part of Gaul, a collection of Roman laws was formed during the reign of Alaric II. (A. D. 484—507), partly from the Theodosian, Gregorian, and Hermogenian Codes, and partly from the works of jurists. This collection is known in modern times by the name Breviarium Arianis [ANIANUS], or Breviarium Alaricianum. In A. D. 493 the Ostrogoths became masters of Italy, and in A. D. 500 Theodoric the Great published for the use of the whole population of the Ostrogothic kingdom a set of rules based on the Roman, not the Gothic law. About the year A. D. 517 the Lex Romana Burgundiorum was compiled for the use of the Burgundian Romans. The Burgundian conquerors, since towards the middle of the fifth century, established a kingdom upon the banks of the Rhone, had already a similar code of their own, called Carodabada.

Though the necessities which called for these legislative efforts in the kingdoms of the West did not exist to the same extent in the Oriental empire, there were not wanting other reasons for legal reform and consolidation. From the time of Constantine, the fresh and vigorous spirit of the classical jurists seems to have vanished. Many of the most active intellects were now turned away from legal to religious discussions. Jurisprudence, no longer the pursuit of the minister and statesman, became the handicraft of freedmen. (Mamert. Panegy. x. 20.) The law was oppressed by its own weight. The complexity of practice, the long series of authoritative writings, the unwieldy bulk of express enactments, and the multitude of voluminous commentators, were sufficient to bewilder the most resolute jurist. In the midst of conflicting texts, it was hard to find out where the true law lay. By the citation law of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. (Theod. Cod. 1. tit. 4. a. 3), the majority of juristic suffrages was substituted for the victory of scientific reasoning. [GAJUS, p. 196.] The schools of law established by Theodosius II. at Rome and Constantinople (Cod. 11. tit. 18) were unable to revive the practical energy of former times. A host of pedants and pretenders came into existence. Some quoted at second-hand the names of ancient jurists, whose works they had never read, while others derided all appeal to scarce and antiquated books, which they boasted that they had never seen. To them the name of an old jurist was no better than the name of some outlandish fish. (Amm. Marcell. xxx. 4; Jac. Gothofredus, Prolegomena ad Theod. Cod. i.)

Such were the evils which Justinian resolved to remedy. In his conceptions of the measures necessary for this purpose he was more vast than all who had preceded him, and he was more successful in the complete execution of his plan. It seems to have been his intention to establish a perfect system of written legislation for all his dominions; and, to this end, to make two great collections, one of the imperial constitutions, the other of all that was valuable in the works of jurists. He was personally not unacquainted with the theory and the working of the law; for, in his youth, he had devoted careful attention to the study of jurisprudence at Constantinople; and, in his manhood, had discharged the duties of the most important offices in the state.

The first work attempted by Justinian, as the most practical and the most pressing, was the collection of imperial constitutions. This he commenced in A. D. 528, in the second year of his reign. The task was entrusted to a commission of ten, who are named in the following order: Johannes, Leontius, Phocas, Basilides, Thomas, Tribonianus, Constantinus, Theophilus, Dioscorus, Præsentinus. (Const. Hæc quæ necessario.) In compiling preceding constitutions, and making use of the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian Codes, the commission was armed with very ample powers. It was authorized to correct and retrench, as well as to consolidate and arrange. The commissioners executed their task speedily. In the following year, on the 7th of April, A. D. 529, the emperor confirmed the "Novum Justinianum" Code, giving it legal force from the 16th of April following, and abolishing from the same date all preceding collections. Little did he then think how short was destined to be the duration of his own new code! (Const. Summa Republicæ.)

At the end of the following year (Const. Deo Auctore, dated Dec. 15. A. D. 530), Tribonian, who had given proof of his great ability in drawing up the code, was authorised to select fellow-labourers to assist him in the other division of the undertaking—a part of Justinian's plan which the emperor justly regarded as the most difficult, but also as the most important and the most glorious. Tribonian was endowed with rare qualifications for such an appointment. He was himself deeply learned in law, and possessed in his library a matchless collection of legal sources. He had passed through many gradations of rank, knew mankind well, and was remarkable for energy and perseverance. "His genius," says Gibbon, "like that of Bacon, embraced as its own all the business and knowledge of the age." In pursuance of his commission, he selected the following sixteen coadjutors: Constantinus, comes sacrarum largitionum; Theophilus, professor at Constantinople; Dorotheus, professor at Berytus; Anatolius, professor at Berytus; Cratinus, professor at Constantinople, and eleven advocates who practised in the courts of the præfecti prætorio, namely, Stephanus, Menna, Prodocius, Eutolmius, Timotheus, Leonidas, Leontius, Plato, Jacobus, Constantinus, Joannes. This commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received from former emperors "auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandique legum." They were ordered to divide their materials, under fitting titles, into fifty books, and to pursue the arrangement of the first code and the perpetual edict. Nothing that was valuable was to be excluded, nothing that was obsolete was to be admitted, and neither repetition nor inconsistency was to be allowed. This "juris enucleati codex" was to bear the name Digesta or Pandectæ, and to be compiled with the utmost care, but with all convenient speed. Rapid indeed was the progress of the commissioners. That which Justinian scarcely hoped to see completed in less than ten years, was finished in little more than three; and on the 30th of Dec. A. D. 533, received from the imperial sanction the authority of law. It comprehends upwards of 9000 extracts, in the selection of which the compilers made use of nearly 2000 different books, containing more than 3,000,000 (trecenties decem millia) lines (versus or στίχοι). (Const. Tanta, Const. Δέδωκεν.)

This extraordinary work has been blamed by men of divers views on divers accounts. Tribonian and his associates, regarding rather practical utility than the curiosity of archaeologists, did not scruple at times so to adulterate the extracts they made, that a theorizer in legal history might easily be misled if he trusted implicitly to their accuracy. Hence the emblemata Triboniani have been to many critics a fertile topic of reprehension. The complaints of others are levelled against scientific rather than historical delinquencies. Unity and system, say they, could result only from a single complete code of remodelled laws, and not from the lazy plan of two separate collections, made out of independent pre-existing writings; and though, from the circumstances of the time, Justinian may have been forced to adopt the latter alternative, it was unphilosophical to commence with the constitutions in place of the jurists. Those principles which lie at the foundation of jurisprudence pervade the writings of the Roman lawyers, and their works are in reality more full of practical law than the constitutions to which occasional exigency gave birth. Then the arrangement of the Digest sins against science. The order of the Edict, which it followed, was itself based on the order of the twelve tables, and was historical or accidental, not systematic. There is no pars generalis—no connected statement of first principles—no regular development of consequences. Leading maxims are introduced incidentally, and matters of the greatest moment, as the law of procedure, are scattered under various heads—here a little, and there a little.

The Digest is divided into seven partes, and is also divided into fifty books. The partes begin respectively with the 1st, 5th, 12th, 20th, 28th, 37th, and 45th books. Each book is divided into titles, and each title has a rubric or heading denoting the general nature of its contents. The division into seven parts, though the late Hugo often took occasion to insist upon its importance, has been little attended to in modern times. Under each title are separate extracts from ancient jurists—sometimes only a single extract. These were not originally numbered, but they were headed by the name of the author, and a reference to his work (inscriptions). Justinian directed that a catalogue should be prefixed to the Digest with the names of all the authors cited, and of the particular works from which the extracts were taken. Such a catalogue, though not perhaps the genuine original, is placed at the beginning of the celebrated Florentine manuscript of the Digest, and is thence called the Florentine Index. The jurists from whom extracts are directly taken, often cite other jurists, but seldom literally. These are, however, quod or literal, though not direct extracts, from Q. Mucius Scaevola, Aelius Gallus, and Labeo. There are 39 jurists, from whose works the Digest contains literal extracts, whether made directly or at second-hand; and these 39 are often called the classical jurists, a name sometimes extended to all those jurists who lived not later than Justinian, and sometimes confined to Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius, and Modestinus, from the special manner in which these five are mentioned in the citation law of Valentinian III. Extracts from Ulpian constitute about one third of the Digest; from Paulus about one sixth; from Papinian about one twelfth. In Hommel's Palingenesia Pandectarum the fragments of each jurist are collected and printed separately: an attempt is made to reanimate the man—to restore his individuality—by bringing together his dispersed limbs and scattered bones.

The internal arrangement of the separate fragments of jurists under each title would appear at first sight to be completely fortuitous. It is neither chronological nor alphabetical; nor does it consistently and uniformly follow any rational train of thought, depending on the subject treated of. Blume (as he now writes himself, or Bluhme, as the name was formerly written) has elaborately expounded a theory which, though rejected by Tigerström and others, seems to rest upon the foundation of facts, and must at least be something like the truth. No one can form a sound opinion of the merits of Blume's theory without a careful examination of a great number of titles in the Digest. It is found that the extracts under each title usually resolve themselves into three masses or series—that the first series is headed by extracts taken from commentaries on Sabinus; the second from commentaries on the Edict; and the third from commentaries on Papinian. Hence he supposes that the commission was divided into three sections, and that to each section was given a certain set of works to analyse and break up into extracts. The masses or series he names from the works that head them: the Sabinian, Edictal, and Papinian masses; although each mass contains extracts from a great number of other works unconnected with Sabinus, the Edict, or Papinian. Besides these three principal masses of extracts, a set of miscellaneous extracts, forming an appendix to the Papinian mass, seems to have been drawn up in order to complete the selection, and may be said to form a fourth, or supplementary mass, called by Blume the Post-Papinian.

Regularly, the mass that contained the greatest number of fragments relating to any particular title appears first in that title. The total number of fragments belonging to the Sabinian mass exceeds the number in the Edictal, and the Edictal fragments are more numerous than the Papinian. Hence the usual order is S, E, P. By these initial letters (previously used by Blume) the brothers Kriegel in their edition of the Digest (Lips. 1833), mark the separate fragments, to denote the masses with which they are classed. The fragments belonging to the supplementary mass are marked Pp. For the details of exceptions from this arrangement, and the reasons for such exceptions; for lists of the works of ancient jurists, so classed as to show to what mass the fragments of each work belong; and for applications of the theory to critical purposes, the reader is referred to Blume's justly celebrated essay on the Ordnung der Fragmente in den Pandecten, in the 4th volume of Savigny's Zeitschrift, and to the following works: Hugo, Lehrbuch der Digesten, 2te Ausg. 8vo. Berl. 1828; Reimar, Bemerkungen über die Inscriptioen-räthen der Pandecten fragmenta, 8vo. Götting. 1830; the synoptic tables appended to the Digest in the edition of the brothers Kriegel, which forms part of the last Leipzig edition of the Corpus Juris Civilis.

It may seem remarkable that the credit of this discovery should be reserved to so recent a date. Most of the moderns who investigated the subject had sought, by reference to the actual contents of the fragments, to make out the principle on which they were arranged; but it was an examination of the inscriptions that led Blume to his theory. Some approximations to it had been previously made by inquirers who followed the same clue. Ant. Augustinus had observed that, in each title, the fragments taken from different books of the same work were regularly arranged, an extract from book 2, never coming before an extract from book 1. Giphanius (Oeconomia Juris, 4to, Franc. 1606, c. ult.) had gone further than Augustinus; and Jac. Gothofredus, in his commentary on the title of the Digest, "De Regulis Juris" (Opera Minora, p. 719, 739), approaches more closely than Giphanius to Blume's discovery.

It is to be remarked that most of the institutional works, and most of the dogmatic treatises on the pure jus civile of Rome—on the law of Rome as unaltered by legislation or equitable construction—furnish extracts to the Sabinian mass. The works which relate to the modifications of the original law introduced by the jus honorarium fall naturally into the Edictal mass; while the Papinian mass consists of fragments from works which relate chiefly to the practical application of the law, e. g. cases and opinions relating to miscellaneous points in the construction of wills. Those who are still opposed to Blume's theory think that the compilers of the Digest were led to their arrangement of the fragments by something like a natural development of the subject treated under each title: that they inserted at the commencement of a title such passages as explain the law institutionally, or such as relate chiefly to the original principles of the jus civile: that they then proceeded to the modifications of the original law, and finally to its practical applications. According to this theory, the principle of internal arrangement, though rude, would lead incidentally to something like uniformity in the order of the works analysed: according to Blume's theory, where the contents of a title proceed from the simple to the more complex, such an arrangement is secondary and dependent on the general character of the three groups of works analysed by different sections of the commissioners. He admits, however, that some of the exceptions to the general rule of arrangement which his theory propounds result from attention to the natural order of ideas. Thus, at the beginning of a title, fragments are placed, severed from the mass to which they regularly belong if they contain definitions of words or general divisions of the subject, or give a summary explanation of leading principles.

Considering the short time in which the Digest was completed, and the peculiarity of its arrangement, its compliance with the requisitions of Justinian deserves high commendation. It was not, however, entirely free from repetitions of the same passage under different titles (leges geminatae), nor from the insertion of fragments under inappropriate heads (leges fugitiae or erratae), nor from the admission of actual inconsistencies or contradictions (antinomiae, leges inter se pugnantes).

Justinian forbade all commentary on his collections, and prohibited the citation of older writings. It is said that Napoleon exclaimed, when he saw the first commentary on the Code Civil, "Mon Code est perdu!" and Justinian seems to have been animated with the same spirit. He allowed no explanation save the comparison of parallel passages (indices, paratitula), and the interpretation of single words or phrases. Such at least were his original injunctions, though they were not long obeyed. The text was to be written in letters at length, all abbreviations (notae, sigla) and numeral figures being interdicted.

The emperor was desirous that the body of law to be compiled under his direction should be all in all, not only for practice, but for academical instruction; but the Digest and the Code, though they were to form part of an advanced stage of legal education, led far into detail, which could not well be understood by beginners. It became necessary therefore to compose an elementary work for students. Already in the constitution, Deo Auctore, of Dec. A. D. 530, Justinian had declared his intention of ordering an elementary work to be written. The composition of it was entrusted to Tribonian, in conjunction with Theophilus and Dorotheus, who were respectively professors in the two great schools of law at Constantinople and Berytus. Florentinus and other Roman jurists had written elementary works (Institutiones, Regularum libri), but none were so famous as the Institutes and Res Quotidianae of Gaius, which were taken as the basis of Justinian's Institutes. Other treatises, however, were also made use of, and alterations were made for the purpose of bringing the new treatise into harmony with the Code and the Digest. Hence there is an occasional incongruity in the compilation, from the employment of heterogeneous materials. For example, at the very commencement the discordant notions of Gaius and Ulpian on the jus naturale and the jus gentium are brought together, but refuse to blend in consistent union. The general arrangement of the work, which is divided into four books, does not materially differ from that of the Institutes of Gaius, of which we have given a sketch under GAIUS, pp. 201, 202. The Institutes received the imperial sanction on the 21st of November, 529, and full legal authority was conferred upon them, from the 30th of December, A. D. 529, the same day from which the Digest was to take effect as law. (Proem. Instit.; Const. Tanta, § 23.)

Had it been possible to make law for ever fixed, and had the emperor's workmen been able to accomplish this object, the desire of Justinian's heart would have been fulfilled. But there were many questions upon which the ancient jurists were divided. Under the earlier emperors, these differences of opinion had given rise to permanent sects [CAPIRO]; nor were they afterwards entirely extinguished, when party spirit had yielded to independent eclecticism. The compilers of the Digest tacitly, by their selection of extracts, manifested their choice; but a Catholic doctrine, the great object of Justinian's wishes, was not thus to be accomplished. At the suggestion of Tribonianus, the emperor began, while his compilations were yet in progress, to issue constitutions having for their object the decision of the ancient controversies. These constitutions helped to guide the compilers of the Digest and Institutes; but, as they were issued from time to time after the first constitutionum codex (the greater part of them in the years 529 and 530), it was found desirable, when they had reached the number of fifty, to form them into a separate collection, which seems to have been published under the title L. Constitutionum Liber. This collection has not come down to us in a separate form, for its legal authority was repealed upon the revision of the Constitutionum Codex; and the separate publication of the Fifty Decisions has been doubted; but the phrase in the ancient Turin Gloss upon the Institutes, Sicut libro L. constitutionum invenies (Savigny, Geach. des R. R. im Mittelalter, vol. ii. p. 452, ed. 2), confirms the inference to be drawn from Const. Cordi, § 1, and Inst. I. tit. 5. § 3. (Brunquell, Hist. Jur. Rom. ed. 1742, p. 239—247; Hugo, Civilist. Mag. vol. v. p. 118—125.)

Even after the publication of the fifty decisions, the imperfection and ambiguity of the existing law required to be remedied by further constitutions. The incompleteness of the Code of A. D. 529 was now apparent, and Justinian was not indisposed to the revision of a compilation, which, having been made at the commencement of his reign, contained but little of his own legislation. Accordingly, the task of revision was entrusted to Tribonianus (who had no part in the original compilation), with the assistance of the legal professor Dorotheus, and the advocates, Menna, Constantinus, and Joannes. They were empowered to omit, to improve, and to add; and, in the formation of the secunda editio, or repetita praelectio, care was taken to insert the constitutions of Justinian which had appeared since the first edition. It is probable that all the Fifty Decisions were incorporated, although we have not the means of precisely identifying them. On the 16th of Nov. A. D. 534, Justinian issued a constitution, giving legal force to the new edition of the Code, from the 29th of Dec. 534. To this new edition, in contradistinction to the former (which was now superseded and carefully suppressed), has been usually given the name Codes Repetitae Praelectionis. It is now ordinarily called the Code of Justinian, although it is more correctly called Constitutionum Codex, since the other collections of Justinian are also entitled to the name of Codes. The earliest constitution contained in the Code is one of Hadrian, the latest one of Justinian, dated Nov. 4., A. D. 534. The matter of constitutions older than Hadrian had been fully developed in the works of jurists. The Code is divided into 12 books, and the books into titles, with rubrics denoting their contents. Under each title, the constitutions are arranged chronologically. Each constitution is headed by an inscriptio, or address, and ended by a subscriptio, announcing the place and time of its date. The general arrangement corresponds on the whole with that of the Digest, so far as the two works treat of the same subject, but there are some variations which cannot be accounted for. For instance, the law of pledges and the law of the father's power occupy very different relative positions in the Digest and the Code. Some constitutions, which are referred to in the Institutes, do not appear in the modern manuscripts of the Code; and it is doubtful whether they were omitted by the compilers of the second edition, or left out by subsequent copyists.

Justinian, though fond of legal unity, was fond of law-making. If he had lived long enough, there might perhaps have been a second edition of the Digest. When the new Code was published, he contemplated the necessity of a supplement to it, and promised that any legislative reforms which he might afterwards make should be formed into a collection of Novellae Constitutiones. (Const. Cordi, § 4.) Many such Novells (νεαυλ διατάξεις), with various dates, from Jan. 1. 535, to Nov. 4. 564, were published from time to time, by authority, in his life-time. The greater part were promulgated in the first five years after the publication of the new Code; and there is a marked diminution in the number of Novells subsequent to the death of Tribonian in 545. There are extant at least 165 Novells of Justinian, making many reforms of great consequence, and seriously affecting the law as laid down in the Digest, Institutes, and Code. Though the imperial archives contained all the Novells that were issued from time to time, no collective publication by official authority seems to have taken place before Justinian's death, for Joannes Scholasticus, at the beginning of his collection of 87 chapters, compiled from the Novells of Justinian, between A. D. 565 and 578, speaks of those Novells as still σποράδιη κειμένης. (Heimbach, Anecdota, vol. ii. p. 208.)

very great praise. They have long exercised, and, pervading modern systems of law, continue to exercise, enormous influence over the thoughts and actions of men. It is true that they exhibit a certain enslavement to elements originally base, for there was much that was narrow and barbarous in the early law of Rome; but, partly by tortuous fictions, and partly by bolder reform, the Roman jurisprudence of later times struggled to arrive at better and more rational rules. The Digest is especially precious, as preserving the remains of jurists whose works would otherwise have been wholly lost, notwithstanding their great value as illustrations of history, as materials for thinking, and as models of legal reasoning and expression. If adherence to the contents of the imperial law during the middle ages cramped on the one hand the spontaneity of indigenous development, it opposed barriers on the other to the progress of feudal barbarism.

We proceed now to give some account of the literary history, and to mention the principal editions, separate and collective, of Justinian's compilations. The editions up to the end of the first third of the 16th century are scarce, for, from the inconvenience of their form, and the variety of contractions they employ, they have been subjected to the same fate with the early manuscripts: but, like the early manuscripts, they are often of use in correcting the text.

The first printed edition of the Institutes is that of Petrus Schreyffer, fol. Mogunt. 1468. The last edition of importance is that of Schrader, 4to. Berlin, 1832. This is an exceedingly learned and elaborate performance, and is intended to form part of an intended Berlin Corpus Juris Civilis, which is still promised, but has hitherto made no further visible progress. Among the exegetical commentators, Vinnius, à Costa, and Otto, will be found the most useful. The Institutiones cum Commentario Academico, by Vinnius, first appeared 4to. Amst. 1642, and has been frequently reprinted. The Elzevir Vinnius of 1665 is, typographically, the neatest; but the jurist will prefer those editions which are enriched with the notes of Heineccius, and contain the Quaestiones Selectae of Vinnius. (2 vols. 4to. Lugd. 1747, 1755, 1761, 1767, 1771.) The Commentarius ad Institutiones of à Costa (Jean de la Coste) first appeared, 4to. Paris, 1639; but the best editions are those of Van de Water (4to. Ultraj. 1714), and Rüdiger (4to. Lugd. 1744). The Commentarius et Notae Criticae of Everard Otto first appeared 4to. Traj. ad Rhén. 1729; and the best edition is that of Iselin (4to. Basil. 1760). The commentaries of Balduinus (fol. Paris, 1546), Hotomann (Basil. 1560, 1569, Lugd. 1588), Grapianus (4to. Ingols. 1596, &c.), Bachovius (4to. Frank. 1628, 1661, &c.), Merillius (4to. Paris, 1654, Traj. ad Rhén. 1739), and Hoppius (Dant. 1693, &c.; and edited by Walchius, 4to. Frank. ad Moen. 1772), also deserve mention. There are modern French commentaries and translations by Blondeau, Ducaurroy, Ortolan, and Esmeu; and there is an English translation, with the Latin text and notes, by George Harris, LL.D. (4to. London, 1796, 1812.) We regard the Greek Paraphrasis of Theophilus as the most useful of all commentaries, but the original work is so clear as seldom to require voluminous explanation; and yet without reason was an Esmay, as long ago as the first year of the 18th century, composed by Hen-berg, professor of law at Helmstadt, De Multitudine nimia Commentatorum in Institutiones Juris. The Institutes of Justinian were edited, jointly with those of Gaius, by Klünze and Böcking (4to. Berol. 1829). The most valuable critical editions anterior to Schrader's are those of Haloander (Nurem. 1529), Contius (Paris, 1567), Cujas (Paris, 1585; re-edited by Köhler, Göttingen, 1773), Biener (Berlin, 1812), and Bucher (Erlangen, 1826). A complete account of the literature connected with the Institutes would fill a volume. The reader is referred for full and authentic information on the subject to Spangenberg, Einführung in das Corpus Juris Civilis; Böcking, Institutiones, pp. 145—158; Prodromus Corporis Juris Civilis a Schrader, Clossio, Tafelro edendi, 8vo. Berol. 1823; Beck, Indicis Codicum et Editionum Juris Justiniani Prodromus, 8vo. Lips. 1823; and the editions of the Institutes by Biener and Schrader.

The literary history of the Digest has been a subject of hot and still unextinguished controversy. The most celebrated existing manuscript of this work is that called the Florentine, consisting of two large quarto volumes, written by Greek scribes, probably not later than the end of the sixth, or the beginning of the seventh century. It was formerly supposed by some to be one of the authentic copies transmitted to Italy in the lifetime of Justinian, but this opinion is now abandoned. It is, in general, free from contractions and abbreviations, which were strictly forbidden by the emperor, but letters and parts of letters are sometimes made to do double duty, as necesses esset (geminationes), and AB for AB (monogrammata). The Florentine manuscript was for a long time at Pisa, and hence the glossators refer to its text as littera Pisane (P. or Pi.), in contradistinction to the common text (littera vulgata). Its history before it arrived at Pisa, is doubtful. According to the testimony of Odofredus, who wrote in the 13th century, it was brought to Pisa from Constantinople, and Bartolus, in the 14th century, relates that it was always at Pisa. We are strongly inclined to put faith in the constant tradition that it was given to the Pisans by Lothario the Second, after the capture of Amalfi, in A. D. 1135 (?), as a memorial of his gratitude to them for their aid against Roger the Norman. The truth or falsehood of this tradition would be a matter of little importance, if it were not usually added, among other more apocryphal embellishments, that Lothario directed the Digest to be taught in the schools, and to be regarded as law in the courts; and that the Roman law had been completely forgotten, until the attention of the school of Bologna was turned to it by the ordinance of the emperor, consequent upon the finding of the manuscript. (Sigonius, de Regno Ital. xi. in fine.) It is certain that soon after the capture of Amalfi, the Roman law, which had long been comparatively neglected, was brought into remarkable repute by the teaching of Irnerius, but this renaissance is attributed by Savigny to the growing illumination of men's minds, and to that felt want of legal science which the progress of commerce and civilisation naturally produces. He thinks that civilisation, excited by these causes, not by any sudden discovery, had only to put forth its arm and seize the sources of Roman law, which were previously obvious and ready for its grasp.

Pisa was conquered by the Florentine Caponius, in 1406, and the manuscript was brought to Flo-

Where the Florentine manuscript may have been before the siege of Amalfi is of little consequence; but it is of great consequence that we should be able to decide another much disputed question, namely, whether the Florentine manuscript be or be not the sole authentic source whence the text of all other existing manuscripts, and of all the printed editions, is derived. In favour of the affirmative opinion there are several facts, which have not, we think, been satisfactorily accounted for. The leaves of the Florentine manuscript are written on both sides and the last leaf but one, in binding the volume, has been so placed as to reverse the order of the pages. The fault is copied in all the existing manuscripts. The order of the 8th and 9th titles in the 37th book of the Digest is reversed in the Florentine manuscript, but the error is corrected by the scribe by a Greek note in the margin. There are fragments similarly reversed in lib. 35, tit. 2, and lib. 40, tit. 4, and similarly corrected. In the other existing old manuscripts, written by men who did not understand Greek, the error is reproduced, but not the correction. On the other hand, an interpolation added in Latin in the margin of the Florentine manuscript, is inserted in the text of the other manuscripts. For this reason, the last four fragments of lib. 41, tit. 3, are wrongly converted into a separate title, with the rubric de Soluto. In the 20th and 22nd titles of the 48th book, there are blanks in the Florentine manuscript, indicating the omission of several fragments, which were first restored by Cujas from the Basilica. The omissions exist in all the ancient manuscripts. In general, where the text of the Florentine manuscript presents insuperable difficulties, no assistance is to be derived from the other manuscripts, whereas they all, in many passages, retain the errors of the Florentine. Their variations are nowhere so numerous and arbitrary as where the Florentine is defective or corrupt. Moreover, they appear to be all later than the beginning of the twelfth century; and, in general, the older they are, the less they depart from the Florentine.

In opposition to these facts, the supporters of the conflicting theory adduce many passages of the ordinary text in which the omissions and faults of the Florentine manuscript are corrected and supplied. Some of the variations are not improvements, some may be ascribed to critical sagacity and happy conjecture, and some may have been drawn from the Basilica or other Eastern sources: yet, in the list which Savigny has given, a few variations remain, which can scarcely be accounted for in any of these ways. Passages from the Digest, containing readings different from those of the Florentine manuscript, occur in canonists and other authors, anterior to the supposed discovery at Amalfi. Four palimpsest leaves of a manuscript of the Digest, nearly as old as the Florentine, were found at Naples by Gaupp, and an account of them was published by him at Breslau, in 1823. They belong to the tenth book, but are nearly illegible.

In most of the manuscripts and early editions, the Digest consists of three nearly equal volumes. The first, comprehending lib. 1—24, tit. 2, is called Digestum Vetus; the second, comprehending lib. 24, tit. 3—lib. 38, is called Infirmitatum; the third, comprehending lib. 39—lib. 50, is called Digestum

Novum. The Digestum Vetus and Digestum Novum are each again divided into two parts; the second part of the former beginning with the 12th book; the second part of the latter with the 45th. The Infortiatum is divided into three parts, of which the second begins with the 30th book, and the third (strangely enough) with the words tres partes occurring in the middle of a sentence, in Dig. 35, tit. 2. s. 82. The third part of the Infortiatum is hence called Tres Partes. The glossators often use the name Infortiatum for the first two parts of the second volume, e. g. Infortiatum cum Tribus Partibus; and sometimes the Tres Partes are attached to the Digestum Novum. In order to explain these peculiarities, many conjectures have been hazarded. It is most probable that the division owes its origin partly to accident; that the Digestum Vetus first came to the knowledge of the earliest glossators; that they were next furnished with the Digestum Novum; then with the Tres Partes, which they added to the Digestum Novum; and that then they got the Infortiatum, so called, perhaps, from its being forced in between the others; and that finally, in order to equalize the size of the volumes, they attached the Tres Partes to the Infortiatum. The common opinion is that the Infortiatum derived its name from having been reinforced by the Tres Partes.

The editions of the Digest, with reference to the character of their text, may be divided into three classes, the Florentine, the vulgate, and the mixed. Politianus and Bologninus had both carefully collated the Florentine manuscript, but no edition represented the Florentine text before the year A. D. 1553, when the beautiful and celebrated edition of Laelius Taurellius (who, out of paternal affection, allowed his son Franciscus to name himself as the editor) was published at Florence. This edition is the basis of that given by Gebauer and Spangenberg in their Corpus Juris Civilis, and these editors had the advantage of referring to the later collation of Brenkmann. The vulgate editions have no existing standard text to refer to. The ideal standard is the text formed by the glossators, as revised by Accursius. Their number is immense. The first known edition of the Digestum Vetus was printed by Henricus Clarin (fol. Perusiae, 1476), although Montfaucon (Bibl. MSS. p. 157) mentions the existence of an edition of 1473, of the first and second parts of the Digest. The first edition of the Infortiatum is that of Pücher (fol. Rom. 1475), and the first Digestum Novum was printed by Pücher (fol. Rom. 1476). In the early vulgate editions the Greek passages of the original are given for the most part in an old Latin translation, and the inscriptions prefixed to the extracts, and referring to the work and the author, are either imperfect or wanting. Of the mixed editions, the earliest is that which was edited by Baubliommus (Paris, 1523, 1524), with the aid of the collation of Politianus, but the most celebrated is that of Haloander (4to. Nuremb. 1529), published without the gloss. Haloander was, himself, a daring and adventurous critic, and made much use of the conjectural emendations of Budæus and Alciatus.

The commentators upon the Digest and upon separate portions of it are extremely numerous. Among the most useful are Duarenus (Opera, Luc. 1765), Cujacius, Ant. Faber (Rationalia in Pandectis, Lugd. 1659—1663), Donellus, Ant. Matthæus (De Crimiisibus, Commentarius ad lib. 47 et 48 Dig.), Bynkershoek, Noodt. The commentaries of Voet and Pothier are well known in this country. The voluminous Meditationes in Pandectas of Leyserus, and the still more voluminous German Erklärungen of Glück, with the continuations of Mühlenthal and Reichardt, are interesting, as showing the construction put upon the law of the Digest, in cases that occur in modern practice. One of the most valuable works upon the Digest is Ant. Schulting's Notæ ad Digesta, cum annotationibus Nic. Smalberg, 7 vol. 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1804—1835. Here the reader will find ample references to the work where the difficulties of the text are best explained. The Pandectarum of Thibaut and the Doctrina Pandectarum of Mühlenthal are not commentaries on the Digest, but are systematic expositions of the civil law, as it exists in Germany at this day.

In Brenkmann's Historia Pandectarum will be found a full account of the early state of the controversy relating to the history of the Florentine manuscript. The writings of Augustinus, Grandi, Tanucci, Guadagni, Schwartz, and others, who have signalled themselves in this field, are referred to in Walch's note on Eckhard's Erasmæti Juris, § 74; and the researches of Savigny on the same subject will be found in the second and third volumes of his "History of the Roman Law in the Middle Ages." For detailed information as to editions of the Digest and Commentaries on that work, Spangenberg's Einführung, and Beck's Prodromus, may be consulted with advantage.

The earliest manuscript containing a portion of the Constitutionum Codex is a palimpsest in the Chapter House at Verona, and two of the 10th century have been lately discovered by Blæme at Pistoia and Monte Casino. In the early editions the first nine books are separated from the other three, which, relating principally to the public law of the Roman empire, were often inapplicable in practice under a different government. Hence, by the glossators, the name Codex is given exclusively to the first nine books; while the remainder are designated by the name Tres Libri. At first the inscriptions and subscriptions of the constitutions were almost always omitted, and the Greek constitutions were wanting. Haloander considerably improved the text, and was followed by Russardus, Cujas, Augustinus, and Continus, were of service in restoring to their places the omitted constitutions (leges restitutas). Leunclavius (1575), Charondas (1575), Pacius (1580), Dionysius Gothofredus (1583), Petrus and Franciscus Pithæus (Obs. ad Cod. Par. fol. 1689), all contributed to the criticism and restoration of the text; and in more modern times, Biener, Witte, and the brothers Heimbach, have similarly distinguished themselves.

The first edition of the first nine books was printed by P. Schoyffer (fol. Mogunt. 1475); and the Tres Libri first appeared (along with the Novells and the Libri Feudorum) at Rome (fol. 1476). The first edition of the twelve books was given by Haloander (fol. Noremb. 1530).

Cujas and Wissenbach are among the best commentators on the Code. The commentaries of the latter comprise the first seven books (in lib. v. prior. 4to. Franeg. 1660; in lib. v. et vi. ib. 1664; in lib. vii. ib. 1664).

For further particulars as to the other editions and commentators, reference may be made to Spangenberg's Einführung, Beck's Prodromus, Richter's

Beiträge zur Revision der Justin. Cod., and the preface of S. Hermanni to his edition of the Code in the Leipzig edition of the Corpus Juris Civilis, commenced by the brothers Krieger.

An abstract of the first eight books of the Code, made at latest in the 9th century, was discovered by Niebuhr at Perugia; and this Summa Perusina has been edited by G. E. Heimbach, in the second volume of his Anecdota (fol. Lips. 1840).

We possess the Novella of Justinian in three ancient forms; the Latin Epitome of Julianus, of which we have already spoken [JULIANUS]; an ancient Latin translation (the Authenticum, or Versio Vulgata), containing 134 Novella, and the Greek collection, numbering 168 Novella.

Of the 134 Novella contained in the Versio Vulgata, the glossators recognised only 97 as practically useful, and these were the only Novella to which they appended a gloss. As the Institutes, Digest, and Code, were divided into books and titles, the glossators divided the 97 glossed Novella (which they arranged chronologically) into nine books, intended to correspond with the first nine books of the Code. These books were called collationes. Under each collatio was placed a certain number of constitutions, and each constitution formed a separate title, except the 8th, which was divided into two titles. There were thus 98 titles. The rubrics of the constitutions, and the division into chapters and paragraphs, though not due to Justinian, were probably older than the glossators, and to be attributed to the original collectors or translators. The 97 glossed Novella, thus divided, constituted the liber ordinarius; the remaining Novella of the Authenticum were called extravagantes or authentice extraordinarias, and were divided into three collationes, to correspond with the last three books of the Code: but, as they were not used in forensic practice, they soon ceased to be copied in the manuscripts. The oldest printed edition of the versio vulgata is that of Vit. Pücher, containing the 97 Novella, with the gloss, followed by the last three books of the Code (Rom. 1476).

The Greek collection of the Novella of Justinian was made for the use of the Oriental lawyers, probably under Tiberius II., who reigned A. D. 578—582. The Greek collection was not confined to constitutions of Justinian. There are four of Justin II., three of Tiberius II., and four edicts (eparchica, formae) of the praefectus urbi and praefectus praetorio. A list of the rubrics of the 168 Novella was first printed in Latin by Cujas (Expositio. Novell. fol. Lagd. 1570), and the original Greek text of this list is given in the second volume of Heimbach's Anecdota. It is called Index Reginae, from having been found in the queen's library at Paris.

The Greek Novella were wholly unknown to the glossators. Haloander was the first who published them at Nuremberg, in 1531, from an imperfect Florentine manuscript. Scringier, a Scotchman and Professor of the Civil Law at Geneva, afterwards published them from a less imperfect Venetian manuscript. The collection of Scringier was printed by H. Stephanus at Geneva in 1558. Neither the Venetian nor the Florentine manuscript contains in full the 168 Novella. Sometimes the mere title of an omitted Novell is inserted; sometimes only the number of the Novell is given, and the lacuna is marked by asterisks.

Haloander gave a Latin version of the Novella he translated. Scringier published the Greek without a translation; but the Novella, which are contained in Scringier and not in Haloander, were translated by Agylaeus. (Supplementum Novellarum, Colon. 1560.)

The labours of Contius constituted the next important stage in the literary history of the Novella. He formed a Greek text from combining Haloander and Scringier. He formed a Latin text from the Versio Vulgata, so far as he was acquainted with it. This he supplied by a translation from the Greek, partly his own and partly compiled from Haloander. He subjoined the matter contained in Julian's Epitome, so far as it was not contained either in the Versio Vulgata or in the published Greek Novella. In this manner he made up the 168 Latin Novella, which compose the stock of Novella in ordinary modern editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis.

Contius published many editions of the Novella, differing among themselves in a way which it is necessary to remark. Some of the editions contained the gloss, and in these the 97 glossed Novella were arranged as usual in the old nine collationes, while all the remaining Novella were subjoined as a tenth collatio. An important change, however, took place in the unglossed edition of 1571. In this, Contius classed the 168 Novella with reference to their dates (though there are some exceptions to the chronological order), and distributed them, so arranged, into nine collationes, and subdivided the collationes into titles. The same order was reproduced in the edition of 1581, and has been followed ever since in all but the glossed editions. From the account which we have given, it will easily be conceived that great confusion has been occasioned in references by the varieties of arrangement in different editions of the Novella: for example, the 131st Novell of modern editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis forms, according to the arrangement of Contius, the 14th title of the 9th collatio, while it was the 6th title of the 9th collatio of the old glossators.

Of modern editions since the time of Contius, it is unnecessary to say much. Under the title Novellae Constitutiones Justinianae, a Graeco in Latinum versus opera Hombergk zu Vach (4to. Marburg, 1717), more is performed than is promised. The author presents to us not only a very good new Latin translation, but the Greek text, and a series of Latin Novella from the versio vulgata, of which the original Greek has not been preserved, and valuable critical notes. The translation of Hombergk zu Vach is the basis of that of Osenbrüggen, the editor of the Novella in the Leipzig Corpus Juris Civilis.

Among the best commentators upon the Novella may be mentioned Cujas, Joach. Stephanus (Expositio Novellarum, 8vo. Franc. 1608), and Matthaeus Stephanus (Commentarius Novellarum, 4to. Gryphw. 1631. Cum notis Brunnemanni, 4to. Vitob. 1700, 4to. Lips. 1707.)

G. E. Heimbach, in the first volume of his Anecdota, has published the remains of the ancient commentators, Athanasius Scholasticus, Theodorus Hermopolitanus, Philoxenus, Symbarius, and Anonymus.

Much labour and learning have been recently expended in unravelling the intricacies of this part of literary history, and in correcting the errors of former writers on the Novella. Biener's Geschichte der Novellen Justinian's contains the most accurate and elaborate information upon this subject. G. E. Heimbach's essay, De Origine et Patris Corporis quod clxxiii. Novellis Constitutionibus constat (8vo. Lips. 1844), contains some questionable views. Morteneuil has treated of the Novells in his Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i. pp. 25—60.

The separate Novells were designated by the glossators by the name Authenticæ, but that word has also another signification, which it is necessary to explain, in order to prevent the mistakes which have sometimes occurred in consequence of this verbal ambiguity. In their lectures on the Institutes and the first nine books of the Code, the earliest glossators were accustomed to insert in the margin of their copies abbreviated extracts from such parts of the Novells as made alterations in the law contained in the text. In reading the Digest, they referred to the notes contained in the margin of the Code. At a later period these abstracts were discontinued in the Institutes. In the Code they were taken from the margin, and placed under the text, where they still appear, distinguished by Italic type in most of the modern editions. They are called Authenticæ either, as some assert, from their representing the latest authentic state of the law, or from the name of the source whence they were taken, and which, in practice, they nearly superseded. Certain capitularies of Frederic I. and Frederic II., emperors of Germany, about the end of the 12th century, were treated by the glossators as Novells, and thirteen extracts taken from them are inserted in the Code, with the inscription "Nova Constitutio Frederici." They are known by the name Authenticæ Fredericianæ.

The collections of Justinian, together with some later appendages, formed into one great work, are commonly known by the name Corpus Juris Civilis. The later appendages are really arbitrary and misplaced additions, having no proper connection with the law of Justinian, and they vary in different editions. They consist, for the most part, of a collection of constitutions of Leo the Philosopher, anterior to A. D. 893; of some other constitutions of Byzantine emperors, from the 7th to the 14th century; of the so-called Canones Sanctorum Apostolorum; of the Fœdorum Consuetudines; a few constitutions of German and French monarchs; and the Liber de Pace Constantiæ.

The expression Corpus Juris was employed by Justinian himself (Cod. 5. tit. 13. s. 1); but the earliest editions of the whole of his legal collections have no single title. Russardus first chose the title Jus Civile. The modern name Corpus Juris Civilis appears first in D. Godefroi's edition of 1583, though the phrase had been employed by others before him. The old glossed editions consist of five volumes, folio (usually bound in five different colours), namely: 1. Digestum Vetus; 2. Infortitatum; 3. Digestum Novum; 4. The Codes, i. e. the first nine books of the Code; 5. Volumen, or Volumen Parvum, or Volumen Legum Parvum, containing the Tres Libri, the Authenticæ, and the Institutiones. The latter had a separate title-page, and was sometimes bound as a separate volume, distinct from the Volumen. This arrangement was first departed from by R. Stephanus in his edition of the Digest in five instead of three volumes (8vo. Paris, 1527—1528). The editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis may be divided into the glossed and the unglossed. The gloss is an annotation which was gradually formed in the school of Bologna, and finally settled by Accursius. It is of great practical importance, since, in the countries which adopted the civil law, the portions without the gloss did not possess legal authority in the courts. Quod non recipit glossa, id non recipit curia, was the general maxim. All the editions up to that of Claud. Chevallon (12mo. Paris, 1525—1527) have the gloss. The latest glossed edition is that of J. Fehius (Lugd. 1627.) This celebrated edition has on the title-page of every volume (in allusion to the place of its publication, Lyons) the representation of a living lion, surrounded by bees, with the motto Ex forti dulcedo. Hence it is known by the name Édition du Lion Mouchet — a name also given to one of the previous editions of D. Gothofredus. (Fol. Lugd. 1589.) The very valuable index of Daoyz is appended as a sixth volume to the edition of J. Fehius. Of the unglossed editions, some have notes and some have none. Of the unglossed editions with notes, the two most celebrated and useful are that of D. Godefroi and Van Leeuwen (2 vols. fol. apud Elsevirios, Amst. 1663), and that of Gebauer and Spangenberg (2 vols. 4to. Gotting. 1776, 1797). Of the editions without notes the most beautiful and convenient is the well-known, but not very correct 8vo. Elzevir of 1664, distinguished as the Pars Secunda edition, from an error in p. 150. Two editions by Beck, one in 4to. and one in 5 vols. 8vo., were published at Leipzig in 1825—1836. The latest edition is that which was commenced by the brothers Krieger in 1833, and completed in 1840, Hermann having edited the Code, and Osenbrüggen the Novells. The edition undertaken by Schrader and other eminent scholars will, if completed as it has been begun, supersede for some purposes all that have gone before it. The old editions of Contius, Russardus, Charondas and Pacius, are sought for by critics. A more complete enumeration of the editions of the collective Corpus Juris Civilis will be found in Bücking's Institutionen, p. 85—88.

There is a French translation of the whole Corpus, with the Latin text en regard, published at Paris 1805—1811. In this work we have: 1. The Institutes, by Huloit, 1 vol. 4to. or 5 vols. 8vo.; 2. The Digest, by Huloit and Berthelot, 7 vols. 4to. or 35 vols. 12mo.; 3. The Code, by Tissot, 4 vols. 4to. or 18 vols. 12mo.; 5. The Novells, by Berenger, 2 vols. 4to. or 10 vols. 12mo. to which is appended, 6. La Clef des Loix Romaines, ou Dictionnaire, &c., 2 vols. 4to. There is also a German translation of the whole Corpus, by a society of savans, edited by C. E. Otto, Bruno Schilling, and C. F. F. Sintenis (7 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1830—1833). [J. T. G.]

THE COINS OF JUSTINIAN.

The coins of Justinian, which are very numerous, have been explained in an interesting monogram entitled, "Die Münzen Justiniana, mit sechs Kupfertafeln," by M. Pinder and J. Friedländer, Berlin, 1843. These writers give a satisfactory explanation of the letters COMO, which frequently appear on the coins of the Byzantine emperors, and which have given rise to much dispute. That CON should be separated from OM, and that they signify Constantinople, seems clear from the legends ΛΟΒ, ΤΕΩΣ, and ΡΑΟΣ, which indicate respectively the towns of Aquileia, Thessalonica, and Treves. The above-mentioned writers suppose that OM represent the Greek name OM, and that they consequently indicate the number 72. In the time of Augustus forty gold coins (aurei or solidi) were equal to a pound; but as these coins were struck lighter and lighter, it was at length enacted by Valentinian I. in A.D. 367 (Cod. 10. tit. 72 (70), a. 5), that henceforth 72 solidi should be coined out of a pound of gold; and we accordingly find CONVS for the first time on the coins of the latter emperor.

In the reign of Justinian the custom was first introduced of indicating on the coins the number of the year of the emperor's reign. This practice began in the twelfth year of Justinian's reign, and explains the reason why Justinian enacted, in the eleventh year of his reign, that in future all official documents were to contain in them the year of the emperor's reign. (Novella, 47.) In the same year another change was made in the coins. Hitherto they had represented the emperor as a warrior with a lance; but Justinian, who carried on his wars by means of his generals, and who was more interested personally in legislation, theological disputes, and public buildings, caused himself to be represented with the imperial globe and no longer as a warrior.

The drawing below represents a medal of Justinian, which was found by the Turks among the ruins of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, in the year 1751. It was carried to Constantinople, where it was bought by Desalleure, who presented it to Louis XV. It was stolen from the royal collection at Paris, in the year 1832, but an engraving of it had been previously given by De Boze, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, vol. xvi. p. 523. Its loss is the more to be deplored, as it is the only specimen known to be in existence. The obverse represents the head of Justinian with the legend D N IVSTINIANVS PP AVG; he wears a richly adorned helmet, behind which is the nimbus, and holds in his right hand a spear. On the reverse the emperor is riding on a horse, adorned with pearls; the helmet, the nimbus, the spear, and the dress, correspond to the representation on the obverse: before him walks Victory, looking round at him, and carrying in her left hand a trophy; by the side of Justinian's head a star appears. The legend is SAVS ET GLORIA ROMANORVM. This medal was struck probably in the early years of the emperor's reign, as the face is that of a young man, and the obverse resembles what we find on the early coins of Justinian. De Boze thinks that it has reference to the Persian victories.

is very remarkable in the history of the Eastern empire. The civil wars by which the empire of the Arabs was shaken compelling the khalif to cease making war without his realm, in order to obtain peace within, he bound himself to pay a daily "tribute of 1000 pieces of gold, one slave, and one horse of noble breed." The emperor in his turn ceded to the khalif one moiety of the income of Armenia, Iberia (in the Caucasus), and Cyprus, which were henceforth held in joint occupancy by the two monarchs, and he promised to employ his forces and authority in compelling the Mardaites or Maronites, in Mount Lebanon, to refrain from molesting the Arabs. This promise was a great political blunder, the consequences of which are still felt by the inhabitants of the Lebanon and Syria. Leontina, one of the most distinguished generals of the Greeks, and afterwards emperor, having been charged with executing the treaty in the case of the Maronites, assassinated their chief Joannea, compelled the people to take the oath of allegiance, and persuaded 10,000 Maronites to leave their native mountains with their wives and children, and to settle in Thrace and Armenia. Until then the Christian Maronites had been a barrier against the progress of the Arabs in these quarters, and no sooner were they thus dispersed than the Mohammedans obtained a firm footing in the Taurus and Anti-Taurus, and found themselves enabled to invade Asia Minor at their leisure. It is true the Maronites never lost their independence entirely, but other tribes, hostile to them, settled in Lebanon; and they continued to be what they still are, an outpost surrounded by the enemies of Christianity, scarcely able to maintain themselves on their native rocks, and unable to make a step beyond them.

It was expected that the energy which young Justinian had shown on many occasions would lead him to perform great and good actions; but his bad character soon became manifest, and caused a universal and deep disappointment throughout his dominions. Instead of establishing peace in the church, he caused new dissensions through his intolerance: the Manicheans were cruelly persecuted; many thousands were put to death by the sword or by fire; and the remainder were driven into merciless exile. In 688 he broke the peace with the Bulgarians, and obtained a splendid victory over them; but having allowed himself to be surprised by another army, he was totally routed, lost half of his troops, and fled in confusion to Constantinople. About the same time the Arabs set out for their fourth invasion of Africa. Justinian exerted himself with great activity in opposing their designs; a numerous fleet carrying a strong body of troops, left Constantinople, and, being reinforced by the garrisons of Sicily, compelled the Arabs to retreat in haste to their native country. Instead of availing himself of his success, Justinian foolishly gave up his joint occupancy of Cyprus, which was forthwith seized by the Arabs, who, encouraged by the strange conduct of the emperor, invaded Asia Minor and Mesopotamia in 692, and in the following year conquered all Armenia. Justinian consoled himself with pleasures, and found relief in torturing his subjects. His luxury, especially his love of erecting magnificent buildings, in which he rivalled his great namesake Justinian I., involved him in extraordinary expenses, and the art of inventing new taxes soon became his

MEDAL OF JUSTINIAN I.

JUSTINIANUS II., surnamed RHINOMETETUS (he whose nose is cut off), emperor of the East (A.D. 685—695 and 704—711), succeeded his father Constantine IV. Pogonatus, in the month of September, A.D. 685, at the age of sixteen. Soon after his accession he made a truce of ten years with the khalif 'Abdu-l-malek, which favourite occupation. He was ably assisted by two monsters whose names are branded in the history of civilisation. Stephanus, the minister of finances, so pleased his master by his skill in plundering, that he continued to enjoy his favours, although he threatened the emperor's mother, Anastasia, with the punishment inflicted upon naughty children; and the monk Theodatus, who rose to the dignity of Logotheta, was unsurpassed in the art of realising the rapacious measures of his colleague. Those who could not pay the taxes were driven out of their homes, tortured, or hanged by hundreds; and those who refused paying them were stifled with the smoke of damp burning straw, till they gave up either their property or their lives. The people of Constantinople, exasperated by rapacity and cruelty, showed symptoms of rebellion, and, in a moment of fury, Justinian ordered his guards to rush into the streets and to massacre all whom they might find abroad. The order became known before it was executed, and a general rebellion ensued, to which chance gave an able and successful leader. Leontius, the commander against the Maronites, having become suspected by Justinian, soon after his return from that campaign was arrested and confined in a prison, where he remained about three years, till the emperor, who neither dared to put him to death, nor liked to have him alive in his capital, suddenly restored him to liberty, and gave him the government of Greece, with an order to set out immediately. As he was in the act of stepping on board a galley in the Golden Horn, he was stopped by an exasperated and trembling crowd, who implored him to save them from the fury of Justinian. Without hesitation he put himself at the head of the people. To St. Sophia! they shouted. Thousands of well-armed men soon surrounded the cathedral, and in a few hours the revolution was achieved, and Leontius was seated on the imperial throne. Justinian, a prisoner loaded with chains, was dragged before him; the mob demanded his head; but Leontius remembering the kindness of the father of Justinian, saved the life of his rival, and banished him to Cherson in the present Crimea. Previous to his departure, however, Justinian had his nose cut off: hence his name Ῥινότμητος. (A. D. 695.)

After a reign of three years Leontius was de-throned and confined in a prison, in 698, by Tiberius Absimar, who reigned till 704, when the exiled Justinian regained possession of his throne under the following circumstances:

In his exile Justinian thought of nothing but revenge, and his misfortunes, far from smoothing his violent temper, increased the fury of his passions. He ill treated the inhabitants of Cherson, where he seems to have exercised some power, or enjoyed at least too much liberty, so unmercifully that they formed a plan to put him to death. He escaped their just resentment by a sudden flight to Busiris, the khan of the Khazars, who received him well, gave him his sister Theodora in marriage, and assigned him the town of Phanagoria, in the present island of Taman on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, as a residence. When Tiberius became informed of this, he bribed Busiris, who sent out messengers with an order to kill the imperial refugee. But Theodora discovered their designs, and having communicated them to her husband, he killed two of the messengers, sent his faithful wife back to her brother, and escaped to Terbelis, the king of the Bulgarians. Terbelis was soon persuaded to undertake one of those sudden inroads for which the Bulgarians were so much dreaded in those times, and before Tiberius knew that his rival had fled from Phanagoria, he saw him with fifteen thousand Bulgarian horse under the walls of Constantinople. Some adherents of Justinian led the barbarians secretly into the city, and flight was now the only safety for Tiberius. Overtaken at Apollonia, he was carried back to Constantinople, and together with his brother Heraclius, and the deposed and still captive emperor Leontius, dragged before Justinian, who was just amusing himself in the Hippodrome. While they lay prostrate before him the tyrant placed his feet on the necks of his two rivals, and continued to look at the performances and to listen to the savage demonstration of joy of the people, who were shouting the verses of the psalmist: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under thy feet." Having at last satisfied his revenge he ordered them to be put to death. A system of persecution was now carried on against the adherents of Leontius and Tiberius, of which few examples are found in Byzantine history: the capital and the provinces swarmed with informers and executioners, who committed unheard of cruelties, while the confiscated property of the unhappy victims was employed in satisfying the demands of Terbelis. As early as 708 the friendship between the khan and the emperor was at an end. Terbelis treated and was justified in treating Justinian as a madman. War was declared, and Justinian having suffered a total defeat at Anchialus, returned to Constantinople to commit fresh cruelties. About this time the Arabs took Tyana and made great progress in Asia Minor, and the inhabitants of Ravenna having shown their discontent with the rapacity of the exarch, an expedition was sent against them, and after the town had been taken, it was treated worse than if it had belonged to the Persians or Bulgarians: the rich spoil of that ruined city was carried to Constantinople. In 710 Pope Constantine was summoned to appear at Nicomedeia before the emperor, who had some ecclesiastical reform in view, and he went thither trembling, but against his expectation was treated with great honours, and returned in the following year. From Nicomedeia, where he had resided for some time, Justinian was compelled to fly suddenly to his capital, as a body of Arabs had penetrated as far as Chalcedon. Unable to obtain any advantage over them, Justinian resolved to cool his fury in the blood of the Chersonites, and the savage Stephanus was sent against them with a fleet and the order to destroy the whole population. They found, however, time to fly into the country, and Stephanus returned in anger, after having hanged, drowned, or roasted alive, only a few hundreds where he hoped to massacre thousands. Neither he nor his fleet reached the capital: a storm destroyed the ships, and the Euxine swallowed up the crew. He had no sooner left Cherson than the inhabitants returned to their city, a general insurrection arose, and Bardanes was proclaimed emperor, and assumed the purple under the name of Philippius (Philippicus). Infuriated at the loss of his fleet, and the escape of the Chersonites, Justinian fitted out a second expedition, under the command of Marcellus, who, however, found Cherson well fortified and still better defended. Trembling to appear before their master without having executed his bloody orders, Maurus with his whole army joined Philippicus, who, with them and his own forces, forthwith sailed for Constantinople. Meanwhile, Justinian was gone to Sinope, on the Euxine, opposite the Crimea, in order to be as near as possible to the theatre of the war, and he was delighted when he discovered his fleet on the main in the direction of the Bosphorus. He was soon informed of the rebellion, and hastened to his capital, in order to prepare a vigorous defence, but on his way thither he received the terrible news that Constantinople had surrendered to Philippicus, and that his son, the youthful Tiberius, had been assassinated on the altar of the Church of the Holy Virgin. He hastened back to Sinope, but while he was hesitating what to do, he was overtaken by Elias, once his friend, but whom he had cruelly persecuted, and who put him to death (December, 711). Elias struck off the tyrant's head and sent it to Constantinople, where it arrived in January, 712. Philippicus now reigned without opposition. Justinian was the last emperor of the family of the great Heraclius; and he was the first who caused the image of Christ to be put on his coins. (Theophan. p. 303, &c.; Niceph. Call. p. 24; Cedren. p. 440, &c.; Zonaras, vol. ii. p. 91, &c.; Glycas, p. 279; Const. Manasses, p. 79; Const. Porphy. *De Adm. JUSTINIANUS, the second son of Germanus, and the grand-nephew of Justinian I. (see the genealogical table prefixed to the life of that emperor), a distinguished general, becomes first conspicuous in the Gothic campaign of A. D. 550, when, after exerting himself in raising the army that was to invade Italy through Illyricum, he was appointed, on the sudden death of his father, to succeed him in the supreme command. He was then very young, but the time of his birth can only be conjectured: it was probably about 530. In the following year he commanded, with his elder brother, Justin, against the Slavonians; and he is also mentioned as the commander of the Greek auxiliaries of Alboin against Thrasimund, king of the Gepidae. His name became universally known as one of the first generals of the empire, when the regent, Tiberius, appointed him, in 574, or, as some say, 576, commander-in-chief of an army of 150,000 German and Scythian mercenaries, against the Persian king, Chosroes, who had invaded Armenia. Justinian advanced from Cappadocia, and Chosroes pushed on to meet him. The encounter took place at Melitene, in Lesser Armenia, not far from the Euphrates; and after a sharp struggle, the left wing of the Persians was totally routed; in consequence of which Chosroes was compelled to retreat in haste and confusion into the heart of his dominions. This splendid victory was equally due to the military skill of Justinian, and the undaunted valour of Cura, a Scythian in the Greek service. Upon this Justinian crossed the Euphrates, and turning to the left, conquered part of northern Persia, took up his winter-quarters in Hyrcania, and returned unmolested in the following spring to Armenia. But there he suffered a severe defeat from the Persian general, Tamchroes, in consequence of which the pending negotiations for peace were abruptly broken off by Chosroes, and the war continued without any prospect of a speedy termination. Tiberius, dissatisfied with Justinian's conduct in this campaign, recalled him, and gave the command to Mauricius. Justinian thought himself unfairly dealt with, and entered into a conspiracy to assassinate Tiberius on the day of his coronation, and to have himself chosen in his stead. It appears that he had no chance of success, for he voluntarily confessed his evil designs, and Tiberius generously pardoned him. When, in the following year, 579, Tiberius was absent from the capital, the empress Sophia, who expected that Tiberius would have married her, but was grievously disappointed at seeing that he was secretly married to another, persuaded Justinian to resume his former designs, promising to assist him with her treasures and influence. The plan was discovered, the property of Sophia was confiscated, and a watch was put upon her; but Justinian was again pardoned by the noble Tiberius. The time of Justinian's death is not known. JUSTINIANUS, son of Mauricius. [MAURICIUS.]

JUSTINUS I., or the elder, emperor of the East from A. D. 518—527, was of barbarian, probably Gothic extraction. Tired of the humble occupation of a shepherd, for which he had been brought up in his native village, Tauresium, in Dardania, he went to Constantinople in company with two youthful comrades, to try his fortune in the capital. Justin entered the guards of the emperor Leo, and through his undaunted courage soon rose to some eminence. He served with great distinction against the Isaurians and the Persians, and his merits were successively rewarded with the dignities of tribunus, comes, senator, and at last commander-in-chief of the imperial guards, an important post, which he held in the reign of the emperor Anastasius. It was expected that the aged Anastasius would appoint one of his three nephews his future successor, but as they evinced little capacity, the emperor hesitated. His prime minister, the eunuch Amantius, availed himself of his master's irresolution to promote his own interest by bringing about the election of his creature Theodatus, and for this purpose entrusted large sums of money to Justin, with which he was to bribe the guards and other persons of influence to espouse the cause of Theodatus. He expected that an illiterate and rude barbarian, who resembled Hercules more than Mercury, would faithfully execute his orders. But he was greatly mistaken. Justin employed the money for his own elevation; and when Anastasius died, on the 10th July, 518, it was not Theodatus whom the army proclaimed emperor, but Justin, who thus ascended the throne without opposition, at the advanced age of sixty-eight. Justin could neither read nor write, and was in every respect a rude soldier; but his predecessor Anastasius was scarcely more civilized, and the people preferred a brave master to a learned one. Feeling his incapacities as a statesman, Justin committed the direction of affairs to the quaestor Proclus, and this excellent man discharged his functions to the satisfaction of both master and subjects. Soon after his accession, as it appears, Justin assumed the noble name of Anicius; some, however, believe that he had pre-vionally been adopted by a member of that illustrious family. Amantius, indignant at being cheated by a rustic, gave vent to his feelings, and perhaps conspired with Theodatus. They were accordingly accused of treason, and, what was still worse, of heresy, and they paid for their imprudence with their heads. Several of their associates shared their fate. In 519 Justin, who was a staunch adherent of the orthodox church, and had adopted energetic measures against the Eutychians, concluded an arrangement with pope Hormisdas, in consequence of which the harmony between Rome and Constantinople remained undisturbed during a considerable time, to the great satisfaction of the East. In the following year, 520, Justin adopted his nephew Justinian, whom he had withdrawn in early youth from their native village, and the government was henceforth in the hands of Justinian. The elevation of Justinian was signalized by an event which occasioned great discontent and disorders in the empire. The Goth Vitalian, so famous by his war against Anastasius, and who held the offices of consul and magister militum, under Justin, became an object of suspicion and jealousy to the emperor and his crafty nephew, and on rising from a banquet to which he had been invited, was treacherously assassinated by the order and in presence of Justin and Justinian. Vitalian was beloved by the faction of the Green, who immediately took up arms, and as they were opposed by the Blue, who enjoyed the favour of the emperor, great troubles arose, which lasted during three years, without Justin's becoming well acquainted with the extent of danger. When he was at last apprised of it, he appointed one Theodotus prefect of the capital, who succeeded in restoring peace. In 522 some misunderstanding arose between Justin and Theodoric, king of the East Goths in Italy, who was offended with Justin because he continued to appoint consuls, a dignity which, in the opinion of Theodoric, could only be conferred by the master of Rome; but Justin prudently renounced the privilege, leaving its exercise entirely to the Gothic king, who accordingly appointed Symmachus and the famous Boethius consuls for the year 522. In the same year misunderstandings arose between Justin and the Persian king Cabades, on account of the kingdom of Colchis or Lazica. Cabades proposed to the emperor, as a guarantee for their mutual friendship, to adopt his favourite son Nushirwan or Chosroes, who afterwards reigned over Persia with so much glory, and Justin would have complied with the king's wishes, but for the interference of the wise quaestor Proclus, on whose advice the emperor declined the proposition. Annoyed by the failure of his plan, Cabades prepared for war, the outbreak of which was hastened by Gurgenus, king of Iberia, throwing himself upon the protection of the emperor. The Persians having invaded Iberia, Justin dispatched Sittas and Belisarius against them, and this is the first time that the name of Belisarius becomes known in history. He was, however, not successful in this campaign, but was, nevertheless, appointed governor of the great fortress of Dara, on the confines of Mesopotamia and Syria, and the historian Procopius was appointed his secretary. The war was carried on for some years without leading to important results on either side. In 525 a terrible earthquake and the overflowing of several rivers carried destruction through some of the finest cities of the empire. In the East Edessa, Anazarba, and Pompeiopolis were laid in ruins, and in Europe Corinth and Dyrrachium met with a similar fate. But the destruction of Antioch at the same time by fire and water offered a still more heart-rending sight. When Justin heard of its awful fate, he ordered the theatres to be closed, took off his royal diadem, and dressed himself in mourning. He spent two million pounds sterling towards the rebuilding of Antioch, which was done with the utmost splendour, and he evinced a proportionate liberality towards the other sufferers. On the whole, Justin, though a barbarian and a fanatic, was a man of good sense, a sincere well-wisher of his subjects, and successful in choosing capable persons to govern them; his knowledge of the human character was remarkably sound. He died on the 1st of August, 527, shortly after having conferred the dignity of Augustus upon his nephew and successor, the great Justinian. He was buried in the church of Euphemia near his wife Euphemia, a woman as illiterate and rude as her husband, but who never interfered with public affairs, and who caused that church to be built at her expense. JUSTINUS II., the younger, emperor of the East, from A. D. 565—578, and nephew of the great Justinian. (See the genealogical table prefixed to the life of Justinian I.) His reign is signalized by important and extraordinary events. Justin had infinitely less merit than his cousins Justinus and Justinian, the sons of Germanus, who had distinguished themselves in the field against the Persians, and were universally beloved for the frankness of their character; but he was of a crafty disposition, and while his cousins exposed their lives in the defence of the empire, he prudently remained at Constantinople and courted the aged Justinian. In order to insinuate himself the better into his uncle's favour, he married Sophia, the niece of the empress Theodora, a beautiful and clever woman, but ambitious, imperious and revengeful. In the night that Justinian died (13th of November, 565), Justin had retired to his apartments, and was fast asleep, when he was suddenly awakened by a loud knocking against his door: it was a deputation of the senate, composed of some of its members who had witnessed the emperor's death, and now came to congratulate Justin, whom, according to their report, the dying monarch had appointed his successor. Whether this was true or not, no time was lost by Justin and his friends. He went immediately to the senate, who were already waiting for him, and after a document had been read to him, which purported to be the will of Justinian, he was forthwith proclaimed emperor. Early in the following morning he repaired to the hippodrome, which was filled by an immense and anxious crowd, and after having delivered divers fine speeches, which met with boisterous acclamation, he issued a general pardon for all offenders, and, in order to convince the people the more completely of his virtuous and generous sentiments, summoned the numerous creditors of Justinian to come forth with their claims. They obeyed eagerly, and their astonishment was still greater when a file of porters made their appearance, each sighing under the weight of an enormous bag of gold : in a few hours the whole of Justinian's debts was discharged. The people found no limits to their praise and delight, and their admiration of their new master was at its height, when Sophia, imitating the noble example set by her lord, opened her treasury and paid the debts of a host of poor people. At the same time the orthodox Justin issued an edict of universal toleration ; all persons exiled for their religion, except Eutychius, were recalled and restored to their families or friends ; and the church enjoyed a state of peace for fifty years, unprecedented in the annals of the ecclesiastical history of the East. The golden age seemed to have arrived in Constantinople and the provinces.

Too soon, however, did the real character of Justin show itself, and sadly disappointed the sanguine hopes of the Greeks. An embassy of the khan of the Avars having solicited an audience, Justin dismissed them haughtily and provoked the resentment of their chief ; and he exhibited an equally overbearing conduct in his negotiations with the Persians, whence an early rupture might easily be prognosticated. In 566 the indignation of the Greeks was provoked by the murder of Justin the younger, the emperor's cousin. This distinguished prince excited the jealousy of both Justin and Sophia, and, from the Danube, where he commanded against the Avars, he was suddenly sent as governor to Egypt, but had scarcely put his foot on the shore of Alexandria, when he fell under the dagger of a hired assassin. His numerous friends were exasperated ; it was said that they had conspired against the emperor, and the alleged conspiracy was stifled in blood. The treasures Justin had spent in satisfying the creditors of Justinian, he recovered by a system of oppression and rapacity which surpassed even that of his predecessor, and the places under government were sold without shame or disguise. Italy, exhausted and ravaged by the Gothic war and its consequences famine and disease, was in a deplorable state. Alboin, king of the Longobards, coveted that fair conquest of Justinian, but his hopes were checked through fear of Narses, who still held the command at Ravenna. Yet Narses was approaching the extreme limits of human life, and Alboin resolved to wait, and to increase his power by breaking that of his troublesome neighbours the Gepidae, who reigned in Hungary. He entered into an alliance with the Avars, and in 566 the Gepidae disappeared from among the independent barbarians in Europe. Every one could now foresee an invasion of Italy, and Justin ought consequently to have concentrated his power in the plains of the Po, and put both his treasures and soldiers at the free disposition of Narses. Narses, however, was hated by Sophia, and he had given just causes of complaint to the Italians, by his arbitrary government and his extreme rapacity. Justin, listening to the foolish advice of his wife, sent him an order to return to Constantinople, and bring with him his own riches and those of the public treasury ; and Narses, having remonstrated, pointing out the imminent danger from the Longobards, Sophia sent him a most insulting letter, which so roused the fury of the old general that he invited Alboin to turn his arms against Italy, promising that he would not take the command of the Romans. Soon afterwards, however, he deeply regretted his faithlessness, and tried to dissuade Alboin from the undertaking. But it was too late, the Longobards descended into Italy, and Narses died of grief. [NARSES.]

In 568 Alboin descended the Julian Alps, with his stern Longobards and numerous contingents of Bavarians, Suevians, and other Germans : 20,000 Saxons, the kinamen and old confederates of the Longobards, joined the expedition with their wives and children. Longinus, the successor of Narses, was an incompetent general, who had neglected to fortify the passes through the Alps, and thus the barbarians rushed down into Italy like an Alpine torrent. Forum Julii, built by Caesar, was the first town they conquered, and, having been made by Alboin the seat of a feudal duchy, which extended over the adjacent districts, was the cause of that province being now called Friuli, or in German Friaul, which is a corruption of Forum Julii : Grasuif was its first duke. Aquileia soon followed the fate of Forum Julii, and its fugitive inhabitants took refuge on the Venetian islands. In 569 Alboin took Mantua, conquered Liguria as far as the Cottian Alps, and on the 8th of September of the same year, victoriously entered Milan (Mediolanum), where he was crowned king of Italy. Henceforth the country surrounding Milan was called Longobardia, or Lombardy, the name which it still bears. In the following year Alboin made himself master of a large portion of Central Italy, and founded a second feudal duchy at Spoleto, where Faroald reigned under his supremacy. The establishment of a third duchy at Benevento was the fruit of the campaign of 570 : Alboin found a strong colony of Longobards in that place, who had settled there nineteen years previously, having received the town with its territory from Narses, in reward for their services in the Greek armies ; their chief, Zotto, was made duke. In 571 Calabria fell into the hands of the Longobards, and now the name of Calabria was given by the Greek government to the narrow peninsula of Bruttium and part of Lucania, countries which are still called Calabria. Rome and Ravenna, however, as well as different other portions of Italy in the north and in the south, withstood the conqueror, and remained under the sway of the emperor.

While the most splendid conquest of Justinian was thus wrested from the Greeks, Justin found consolation in pleasures and luxury, leaving the government in the hands of his wife, his ministers, and his eunuchs. At the very time that Italy was taken from him, he was involved in a dangerous war with the Persians, which broke out under the following circumstances. The Turks having by this time made great conquests in the countries to the north of Persia, gave umbrage to the Persian king Chosroes, especially since they concluded an alliance with Justin, and Chosroes began hostilities by invading and subjugating the kingdom of the Homeritæ, in Southern Arabia. Encouraged by the approach and success of the Turks, the Iberians and Persarmenians threw off the Persian yoke, and submitted to Justin, on condition of his defending them against Chosroes. The emperor promised to do so, and at the same time refused to pay the annual tribute of 30,000 pieces of gold, which had been fixed by former treaties. Thus war broke out in 572. Justin sent Marcian against the Persians, an able general, who found no army on his arrival at the frontiers, but created one in a short time, and did more than could have been expected under such circumstances. He was shut up for some time in the important fortress of Dara. Reinforced by the contingents of the Laxians and other Caucasian nations, he suddenly sallied forth, laid siege to Nisibis, and offered battle to Choroas, who approached with an army of 100,000 men. At this critical moment Acacius arrived from Constantinople with an order for Marcian to hasten directly to the capital, and surrender the command to him. Marcian obeyed, but no sooner was he gone than the whole Greek army disbanded, as Acacius was known to be destitute of all military talent. The consequence was that Syria was ravaged by the Persians with fire and sword, and Dara, the bulwark of the empire, was taken by Choroas, after a long and gallant resistance. When this news reached Constantinople, Justin showed all the symptoms of insanity, and his mental disorder increased so much as to make him unfit for any business (574). The entire government now devolved upon the empress Sophia.

Two years previously Alboin had been assassinated, shortly after he had taken Pavia, where his successor Clepho took up his residence. This king was slain a short time after his accession, but the Longobards, nevertheless, maintained themselves in the greater part of Italy. These events were coincident with a war against the Avars, who worsted the Greek commander Tiberius, a great general at the head of a bad army. The state of the empire was so critical that Sophia persuaded Justin to adopt Tiberius and to make him Caesar. The emperor followed the advice, and in 574 the new Caesar was presented to the senate. Sophia acted wisely in buying a truce of one year from the Persians for the sum of 45,000 pieces of gold, which was soon afterwards prolonged for three years, by an annual tribute of 30,000 pieces. But this truce did not include Armenia, and thus Choroas set out in 576, or more probably as early as 574, with a large army to extend the frontiers of his realm in the north-west. With great exertions and sacrifices Tiberius succeeded in raising an army of 150,000 foreign mercenaries, with whom he despatched Justinian, the emperor's cousin, against the Persians, thus leaving Italy unprotected and Greece open to the inroads of the Slavonians. The details of this remarkable campaign are narrated in the lives of Tiberius and Justinian. Justinian obtained splendid victories, and sent 24 elephants to Constantinople; but he sustained in his turn severe defeats, and was succeeded in the supreme command by Mauricius, who, in 578, penetrated as far as the Tigris. The war was still raging with unabated fury, when Justin, whose mental sufferings were increased by an ulcer on his leg, felt his dissolution approaching, and consequently created Tiberius Augustus on the 26th of September, 578, and had him crowned and publicly acknowledged as his successor. Justin died on the 5th of October following; the best action of his life was the choice of his successor. (Corippus, *De Laud. JUSTINUS, the elder son of Germanus (see the genealogical table prefixed to the life of Jus-tinian I.), a general of great distinction and popularity in the army, but justly suspected by Justinian I. and Justin II., on account of his ambition and faithlessness. In A. D. 551 he held a command in the army against the Slavonians, and shared its defeat in the battle of Adrianople. He was more fortunate against the Persians in Colchia, over whom he obtained a complete victory on the river Phasis (555), in consequence of which he was entrusted with the command in chief, which had been taken from Martinus. Some time after he discovered the secret designs of the khan of the Avars, who had sent an embassy to Constantinople under the pretext of making a treaty of alliance, while their real object was the purchase of arms, and the stores which they were secretly sending into Avaria were consequently taken from them by Justin, who commanded on the Avarian frontiers (the Danube). The accession of his cousin Justin proved fatal to him: they had made an agreement that, after the expected death of Justinian, the son of Germanus should be Caesar, while the other Justin, the son of Vigilantia, was to reign as Augustus. But no sooner was the latter seated on the throne, than Justin, the subject of this article, was recalled from the Danube, and after having been detained a short time at Constantinople, was sent as governor (Dux and Augustalis) to Alexandria, where he was, however, treated like a prisoner, and, shortly after his arrival, treacherously assassinated while asleep. His murder caused several of his friends to conspire against the emperor, as is narrated in the life of Justin II. (Theophan. p. 198, 204—210, ed. Paris; Agathias, ii. 18, iii. 2, 17—23, iv. 13—22; Procop. Bell. Goth. iii. 32; Evagrius, v. 1, 2.)

JUSTINUS, son of Mauricius. [MAURICIUS.] JUSTINUS, the historian. We possess a work entitled Justinus Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV., in the preface to which the author informs us that his book was entirely derived from the Universal History (totius Orbis Historias), composed in Latin by Trogus Pompeius. Before proceeding, therefore, to consider the former, it is necessary to inquire into the contents and character of the more important and voluminous archetype.

From the statement of Trogus Pompeius himself, as preserved by Justin (xliii. 5), we learn that his ancestors traced their origin to the Gaulish tribe of the Vocontii, that his grandfather received the citizenship of Rome from Cn. Pompeius during the war against Sertorius, that his paternal uncle commanded a squadron of cavalry in the army of the same general in the last struggle with Mithridates, and that his father served under C. Caesar (i.e. the dictator), to whom he afterwards became private secretary. It is hence evident that the son must have flourished under Augustus; and since the recovery of the standards of Crassus from the Parthians was recorded towards the close of his history, it is probable that it may have been published not long after that event, which took place A. C. 20. Our knowledge of this production is derived from three sources which, taken in combination, afford a considerable amount of information with regard to the nature and extent of the undertaking. 1. A few brief fragments quoted by (Pliny?), Vopiscus, Jerome, Augustin, Orosius, Priscian, Isidorus, and others down to John of Salisbury and Matthew of Westminster. 2. The Excerpts of Justin. 3. A sort of epitome found in several MSS., indicating, under the name of prologues (prologi), the contents of each chapter in regular order, bearing a close resemblance, in form and substance, to the summaries prefixed to the books of Livy, and, like these, proceeding from some unknown pen.

We thus ascertain that the original was comprised in 44 books, that the title was Liber Historiarum Philippicarum, the additional words et totius mundi origines et terrarum situs, given by the author of the prologues, being in all probability an inaccurate explanation appended by himself. The term Historiarum Philippicarum was employed because the chief object proposed was to give a complete account of the origin, rise, progress, decline, and extinction of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but in the execution of this design, Trogius permitted himself, in imitation of Herodotus and Theopompus, to indulge in so many excursions, that a very wide field of investigation was embraced, although the designation Universal History is altogether inapplicable. In the first six books, which served as a sort of introduction to the rest, while ostensibly examining into the records of the period anterior to Philip I., he took a survey of the various states which eventually became subject to, or in any way connected with, the Macedonians. In this manner the empires of the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, were passed under review: the expedition of Cambyses against Egypt led to a delineation of that country and its people: the contest of Darius with the Scythians was accompanied by a geographical sketch of the nations which bordered on the northern and eastern shores of the Euxine: the invasion of Xerxes brought the Athenians and Thebans on the stage, who in turn called up the Spartans and other Dorian clans. A narrative of the Peloponnesian war naturally succeeded: with the fatal expedition to Sicily was interwoven a description of that famous island, of its races, and of the colonies spread over its surface. The downfall of Athens was next recorded, followed by the enterprise of the younger Cyrus, the campaigns of Agesilaus in Asia, and various minor events, until the decay of the Lacedæmonian and the rise of the Boeotian influence gradually introduced the history of Macedon, which, commencing with the seventh book, was continued down to the ruin of Perseus and the abortive attempt of the impostor Andriacus, which were detailed in the thirty-third. But even after the main subject had been fairly commenced, it could only be regarded in the same light as the argument of an Epic poem, which admits of continual episodes and digressions—the guiding thread of the discourse, which, although often apparently lost, forms the connecting links by which the various portions of the complicated fabric are united and held together in one piece. Thus the interference of Philip in the affairs of Greece suggested an exposition of the causes which led to the Sacred War: his attacks upon Perinthus and Byzantium involved a disquisition on the early fortunes of the cities in question: his dispute with the Scythians and his relations with the Persians afforded an apology for resuming the chronicles of these nations: the transactions of Artaxerxes Mnemon produced an account of the Cyprians and Paphlagonians, while the exploits of Alexander the Epirotan furnished a pretext for an essay on the Apulians, Sabines, and Samnites. The strife which arose among the successors of Alexander the Great formed in itself an almost inexhaustible theme, while the ambitious schemes of Pyrrhus were illustrated by a dissertation on the Sicilians and Carthaginians, which occupied no less than six books. After the reduction of Macedonia to a Roman province, with which, as we have seen above, the thirty-third book closed, the following nine were devoted to the affairs of Asia, Pontus, Syria, Egypt, and Boeotia, including the Parthian monarchy; the forty-second and forty-third contained a sketch of the steps by which the Romans had attained to supremacy; and in the last were collected some scattered notices in reference to the Ligurians, Massilians, and Spaniards, the Greeks having been previously (lib. xxiv.) discussed.

To what period Justin (who is designated in one MS. as Justinus Frontinus, and in another as M. Junianus Justinus, while the great majority exhibit the simple appellation Justinus) belongs it is impossible to determine with certainty. The expression which he employs (viii. 4. § 7), "Græciam etiam nunc et viribus et dignitate orbis terrarum principem" would in itself be scarcely sufficient to prove that he flourished under the Eastern emperors, even if it related to the age in which he composed, and not, as it does in reality, to the particular epoch of which he happened to be treating in his narrative; while the words "Imperator Antonine," which appear in the preface, are to be found in no MS. now extant, but are probably an interpolation foisted in by some of the earlier editors who followed Isidorus, Jornandes, and John of Salisbury, in confounding Justin the historian with Justin the Christian father and martyr. The earliest writer by whom he is mentioned is Saint Jerome (Proem. in Daniel), and therefore he cannot, at all events, be later than the beginning of the fifth century.

Justin has been frequently censured by scholars in no measured terms for the slovenly manner in which he executed what they are pleased to consider as an abridgment of Trogius. It is unquestionable that many leading events are entirely omitted, that certain topics are dismissed with excessive brevity, that others not more weighty in themselves are developed with great fulness, and that in consequence of this apparent caprice an air of incoherence and inequality is diffused over the whole performance. But before subscribing to the justice of these animadversions, it would be well to ascertain if possible the real object of the compiler. Now we are distinctly told by himself (Præf.) that he had occupied his leisure during a residence in the city by selecting those passages of Trogius which seemed most worthy of being generally known, passing over such as in his estimation were not particularly interesting or instructive. Thus it is clear that the pages of Justin are not to be viewed in the light of a systematic compendium of Trogius, but rather, in his own words, as an Anthology (breve florum corpusculum), and that the criticisms alluded to above are altogether inapplicable to what is professedly merely a collection of Elegant Extracts. We may indeed lament that he should have thought fit to adopt a plan by which we have entirely lost, or at least very imperfectly retained, a mass of valuable information on a great variety of topics, of which we are ignorant; but on the other hand, we must feel grateful to the labours, which have preserved from oblivion many facts not recorded elsewhere.

To discover the sources from which a lost writer derived his materials would seem to be a hopeless quest, when it is certain that most of these sources have themselves disappeared. For not only did Trogus enter upon large departments of historical research, where we can compare him with no authority now extant; but even when he trod the ground previously travelled over by Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Polybius, we clearly perceive that far from confining himself to their statements, he frequently adopted accounts completely at variance with those which they followed. It is certain, however, that his guides were exclusively Greek, and we have every reason to believe that to no one did he owe more than to Theopompus, from whom he borrowed not only the title, but much of the general plan and execution of his work. He was also, we may conjecture, largely indebted to Ephorus, Timæus, and Posidonius; but our limits forbid us to enter upon an inquiry which has been prosecuted with great learning by Heeren in the essay quoted below.

We must not omit to remark that the quotations from Trogus found in Pliny appear to be all taken from a treatise De Animalibus mentioned by Charisius (p. 79. ed. Putsch.), and not from his histories.

The Editio Princeps of Justin was printed at Venice by Jensen, 4to. 1470, and another very early impression which appeared at Rome without date or name of printer is ascribed by bibliographers to the same or the following year. The first critical edition was that of Marcus Antonius Sabellicus, published along with Florus at Venice, fol. 1490, and again in 1497 and 1507: it was superseded by that of Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1522; the volume containing also Cornelius Nepos; and this in turn gave way to that of Bongarsius, 8vo. Paris, 1581, in which the text was revised with great care, and illustrated by useful commentaries; but conjectural emendations were too freely admitted. Superior in accuracy to any of the preceding is the larger edition of Graevius, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1683; that of Hearne, 8vo. Oxon. 1705; and above all, those of Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1719 and 1760, belonging to the series of Variorum Classica, in 8vo. The last of these is in a great measure followed by Frotscher, 3 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1827, whose labours exhibit this author under his best form.

Numerous translations have from time to time appeared in all the principal languages of Europe. The earliest English version is that executed by Arthur Goldinge, printed at London in 4to, by Tho. Marsha, 1564, and again in 1570, with the following title, "Thabridge MENTE of the Histories of Trogus Pompeius, gathered and written in the Latē tung, by the famous historiographer Justine, and translated into English by Arthur Goldinge: a worke containing brevely great plentye of mooste delectable Histories and notable examples, worthy not only to be read, but also to bee embraced and followed of al men. Newlie conferred with the Latin cōpye, and corrected by the Translator. Anno Domini 1570. Imprinted at London by Th. Marsha." We have also translations by Codrington, 12mo. Lond. 1654; by Thomas Brown, 12mo. Lond. 1712; by Nicolas Bayley, 8vo. Lond. 1732; by John Clarke, 8vo. Lond. 1732; and by Turnbull, 12mo. Lond. 1746; most of which have passed through several editions.

The fragments spoken of at the beginning of this article will be found in Plin. H. N. vii. 3, x. 33, xi. 39, 52, xvii. 10, xxxi. sub fin.; Vopisc. Aureliana, 2, Prob. 2; Hieron. Proem. in Daniel, Comment. in Daniel, c. 5; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, iv. 6; Oros. i. 8, 10, iv. 6, vii. 27, 34; Isidor, *de N. Every thing that is known or can be conjectured with regard to Trogus, Justin, and their works, is contained in the "Commentationes de Trogi Pompeii eiusque epitomatoris Justinifontibus et auctoritate," by Heeren, printed originally in the 15th volume of the Göttingen Transactions, and prefixed to the edition of Frotscher. JUSTINUS (Iovēstinos), ecclesiastical. 1. Surnamed the MARTYR (ὁ Μάρτυρ), or the PHILOSOPHER (ὁ Φιλόσοφος), one of the earliest of the Christian writers, was a native of Flavia Neapolis, or the New City of Flavia (Justin. Apolog. Prima, c. 1), which arose out of the ruins, and in the immediate vicinity of the ancient town, called Shechem in the Old Testament and Sychar in the New. The year of his birth is not known: Dodwell, Grabe (Spicileg. SS. Patrum, aec. ii. p. 147), and the Bollandists (Acta Sanctorum, April. vol. ii. p. 110, note c), conjecture from a passage of Epiphanius (Adv. Hæres. xlv. 1), which, as it now stands, is clearly erroneous, that he was born about A. D. 89; but this conjecture (which is adopted by Fabricius) is very uncertain, though sufficiently in accordance with the known facts of his history. Tillemont and Ceillier place the birth of Justin in A. D. 103, Maran in A. D. 114, Halloix in A. D. 118. He was the son of Priscus Bacchius, or rather of Priscus, the son of Bacchius, and was brought up as a heathen; for though he calls himself a Samaritan (Apolog. Secunda, c. 15, Dialog. cum Tryphone, c. 120), he appears to mean no more than that he was born in the country of Samaria, not that he held that Semi-Judaism which was so prevalent among his countrymen. (Comp. Apolog. Prima, c. 53, sub med.) He devoted himself to philosophy, and for a considerable time studied the system of the Stoics, under a teacher of that sect; but not obtaining that knowledge of the Deity which he desired, and finding that his teacher undervalued such knowledge, he transferred himself to a Peripatetic, who plumed himself on his acuteness, whom, however, he soon left, being disgusted at his avarice, and therefore judging him not to be a philosopher at all. Still thirsting after philosophical acquirements, he next resorted to a Pythagorean teacher of considerable reputation, but was rejected by him, as not having the requisite preliminary acquaintance with the sciences of music, geometry, and astronomy. Though at first disheartened and mortified by his repulse, he determined to try the Platonists, and attended the instructions of an eminent teacher of his native town, under whom he became a proficient in the Platonic system. His mind was much puffed up by the study of incorporeal existences, and especially by the Platonic doctrine of ideas, so that he soon conceived he had become wise; and so greatly were his expectations raised, that, says he, "I foolishly hoped that I should soon behold the Deity." Under the influence of these notions he sought opportunities for solitary meditation; and one day, going to a lone place near the sea, he met with an old man, of meek and venerable aspect, by whom he was convinced that Plato, although the most illustrious of the heathen philosophers, was either unacquainted with many things, or had erroneous notions of them; and he was recommended to the study of the Hebrew prophets, as being men who, guided by the Spirit of God, had alone seen and revealed the truth, and had foretold the coming of the Christ. The conversation of this old man with Justin, which is narrated with considerable fulness by the latter (Dial. cum Tryph. c. 3, &c.), led to Justin's conversion. He had, while a Platonist, heard of the calumnies propagated against the Christians, but had hardly been able to credit them. (Apolog. Secunda, c. 12.) The date of his conversion is doubtful. The Bollandists place it in A. D. 119; Cave, Tillemont, Ceillier, and others, in A. D. 133; and Halloix about A. D. 140.

Whether Justin had lived wholly at Flavia Neapolis before his conversion is not quite clear: that it had been his chief place of abode we have every reason to believe. Otto conjectured, from a passage in his works (Cohortat. ad Græc. c. 13), that he had studied at Alexandria; but, from the circumstance that while in that city he had seen with interest the remains of the cells built, according to the Jewish tradition, for the authors of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, we are disposed to place his visit to Alexandria after his conversion. He appears to have had while yet a heathen an opportunity of seeing the firmness with which the Christians braved suffering and death (Apol. Secunda, c. 12), but we have no means of knowing where or on what occasion.

Justin retained as a Christian the garb of a philosopher, and devoted himself to the propagation, by writing and otherwise, of the faith which he had embraced. Tillemont argues from the language of Justin (Apolog. Prima, c. 61, 65) that he was a priest, but his inference is not borne out by the passage; and though approved by Maran, is rejected by Otto, Neander, and Semisch. That he visited many places, in order to diffuse the knowledge of the Christian religion, is probable (comp. Cohortat. ad Græc. cc. 13, 34), and he appears to have made the profession of a philosopher subservient to this purpose. (Dialog. cum Tryphon. init.; Euseb. H. E. iv. 11; Phot. Bibl. cod. 125.) According to what is commonly deemed the ancient record of his martyrdom (though Papebroche considers it to narrate the death of another Justin), he visited Rome twice. On his second visit he was apprehended, and brought before the tribunal of Rusticus, who held the office of prefectus urbi; and as he refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, he was sentenced to be scourged and beheaded; which sentence appears to have been immediately carried into effect. Several other persons suffered with him. Papebroche rejects this account of his martyrdom, and thinks his execution was secret, as that the date and manner of it were never known: the Greek Menaia (a. d. 1 Junii) state that he drank hemlock. His death is generally considered to have taken place in the persecution under the emperor Marcus Antoninus; and the Chronicon Paschale, (vol. i. p. 258, ed. Paris, 207, ed. Venice, 482, ed. Bonn), which is followed by Tillemont, Baronius, Pagi, Otto, and other moderns, places it in the consulship of Orphitus and Pudens, A. D. 165; Dupin and Semisch place it in A. D. 166, Fleury in A. D. 167, and Tillemont and Ma-ran in A. D. 168. Papebroche (Acta Sanctorum, April. vol. ii. p. 107), assigning the Apologia Secunda of Justin to the year 171, contends that he must have lived to or beyond that time. Dodwell, on the contrary, following the erroneous statement of Eusebius in his Chronicon, places his death in the reign of Antoninus Pius; and Epiphanius, according to the present reading of the passage already referred to, which is most likely corrupt, places it in the reign of the emperor Hadrian or Adrian, a manifest error, as the Apologia Prima is addressed to Antoninus Pius, the successor of Hadrian, and the second probably to Marcus Aurelius and L. Verus, who succeeded Antoninus. The death of Justin has been very commonly ascribed (comp. Tatian. contra Græcos, c. 19; Euseb. H. E. iv. 16, and Chron. Paschale), to the machinations of the Cynic philosopher Crescens. The enmity of Crescens, and Justin's apprehension of injury from him, are mentioned by Justin himself (Apolog. Secunda, c. 3); but that Crescens really had any concern in his death is very doubtful. [CRESCENS.] Justin has been canonized by the Eastern and Western churches: the Greeks celebrate his memory on the 1st June; the Latins on the 13th April. At Rome the church of S. Lorenzo without the walls, is believed to be the resting-place of his remains; but the church of the Jesuits at Eystadt, in Germany, claims to possess his body; there is, however, no reason to believe that either claim is well founded. The more common epithet added to the name of Justin by the ancients is that of "the philosopher" (Epiph. l. c.; Euseb. Chronicon, lib. ii.; Hieronym. de Vir. Illust. c. xxiii.; Chron. Paschale, l. c.; Georgius Syncellus, pp. 350, 351, ed. Paris, p. 279, ed. Venice; Glycas, Annal. pars iii. p. 241, ed. Paris, 186, ed. Venice, 449, ed. Bonn); that of "the martyr," now in general use, is employed by Tertullian (Adv. Valent. c. 5), who calls him "philosophus et martyr;" by Photius (Biblioth. cod. 48, 125, 232), and by Joannes Damascenus (Sacra Parall. vol. ii. p. 754, ed. Lequien), who, like Tertullian, conjoins the two epitheta.

In our notice of the works of Justin Martyr we adopt the classification of his recent editor, J. C. T. Otto, by whom they are divided into four classes.

I. UNDISPUTED WORKS. I. 'Απολογία πρώτη ὑπὲρ Χριστιανῶν πρὸς Ἀντωνίνον τὸν Εὐσεβῆ. Apologia prima pro Christianis ad Antoninum Pium. In the only two known MSS. of the Apologies, and in the older editions of Justin, e. g. that of Stephanus, fol. Paris, 1551, and that of Sylburg, fol. Heidelberg, 1593, this is described as his Second Apology. It is the longer of the two Apologies, and is one of the most interesting remains of Christian antiquity. It is addressed to the emperor Antoninus Pius and to his adopted sons "Verissimus the Philosopher," afterwards the emperor M. Aurelius, and "Lucius the Philosopher" (we follow the common reading, not that of Eusebius), afterwards the emperor Verus, colleague of M. Aurelius. From the circumstance that "Verissimus" is not styled Caesar, which dignity he acquired in the course of A. D. 139, it is inferred by many critics, including Pagi, Neander, Otto, and Semisch, that the Apology was written previously, and probably early in that year. Eusebius places it in the fourth year of Antoninus, or the first year of the 230th Olympiad, A. D. 141, which is rather too late. Others contend for a later date still. Justin himself, in the course of the work (c. 46), states that Christ was born a hundred and fifty years before he wrote, but he must be understood as speaking in round numbers. However, Tillemont, Grabe, Fleury, Ceillier, Maran, and others, fix the date of the work in A. D. 150. To this Apology of Justin are commonly subjoined three documents. (1.) Ἀδριανοῦ ὑπὲρ Χριστιανῶν ἐπιστολή, Adriani pro Christianis Epistola, or Exemplum Epistolae Imperatoris Adriani ad Minucium Fundanum, Proconsulem Asiae. This Greek version of the emperor's letter was made and is given by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 9.) Justin had subjoined to his work the Latin original (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8), which probably is still preserved by Rufinus in his version of Eusebius, for which in the work of Justin the version of Eusebius was afterwards substituted. (2.) Ἀντωνίου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Ἀσίας, Antonini Epistola ad Communes Asiae. It is hardly likely that this document was inserted in its place by Justin himself; it has probably been added since his time, and its genuineness is subject to considerable doubt. It is given, but with considerable variation, by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 13), and was written, according to the text of the letter itself as it appears in Eusebius, not by Antoninus, but by his successor M. Aurelius. (3.) Μάρκου βασιλέως ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς τὴν σύγκλητον, en ἧ μαρτυρεῖ Χριστιανούς αἰτίους γεγενῆσθαι τῆς νίκης αὐτῶν, Marci Imperatoris Epistola ad Senatum qua testatur Christianos victoriam causam fuisse. This letter, the spuriousness of which is generally admitted (though it is said by Tertullian, Apolog. cap. 5, that a letter of the same tenor was written by the emperor), relates to the famous miracle of the thundering legion. [M. AURELIUS, p. 441]. 2. Ἀπολογία δευτέρα ὑπὲρ τῶν Χριστιανῶν πρὸς τὴν Ῥωμαϊκὴν σύγκλητον, Apologia Secunda pro Christianis ad Senatum Romanum. This second and shorter Plea for the Christians was addressed probably to the emperors M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus, or rather to Aurelius alone, as Verus was engaged in the East, in the Parthian war. It was written on occasion of an act of gross injustice and cruelty, committed by Urbicus, praefectus urbi at Rome, where Justin then was. Neander adopts the opinion maintained formerly by Valesius, that this Apology (placed in the older editions before the longer one just described) was addressed to Antoninus Pius: but Eusebius (H. E. iv. 17, 18), and Photius (Bibl. cod. 125), among the ancients; and Dupin, l'agi, Tillemont, Grabe, Ruinart, Ceillier, Maran, Mosheim, Semisch, and Otto, among the moderns, maintain the opposite side. Otto thinks it was written about A. D. 164; others place it somewhat later. Scaliger (Animadv. in Chron. Euseb. p. 219), and Papebroche (Acta Sanctorum, Aprilis, vol. ii. p. 106), consider that this second Apology of Justin is simply an introduction or preface to the first, and that the Apology presented to Aurelius and Verus has been lost; but their opinion has been refuted by several writers, especially by Otto. Two Fragmenta, given by Grabe in his Spicileg. Saecul. ii. p. 173, are supposed by him to belong to the second Apology, in the present copies of which they are not found; but the correctness of this supposition is very doubtful. 3. Πρὸς Τρυφῶνα Ἰουδαίων διάλογος, Cum Tryphone Iudaeo Dialogus. This dialogue, in which Justin defends Christianity against the objections of Trypho, professes to be the record of an actual discussion, held, according to Eusebius (H. E. iv. 18), at Ephesus. Trypho describes himself as a Jew "flying from the war now raging," probably occasioned by the revolt under Barchochebas, in the reign of Hadrian, A. D. 132—134. But though the discussion probably took place at this time, it was not committed to writing, at least not finished, till some years after, as Justin makes a reference to his first Apology, which is assigned as we have seen to A. D. 158 or 139. It has been conjectured that Trypho is the Rabbi Tarphon of the Talmudists, teacher or colleague of the celebrated Rabbi Akiba, but he does not appear as a rabbi in the dialogue. The dialogue is, perhaps, founded upon the conversation of Justin with Trypho, rather than an accurate record of it; but the notices of persons, and especially the interesting account of Justin's own studies and conversion, are likely to be generally correct. It appears to be mutilated, but to what extent is a matter of dispute. Two fragments are assigned to it by Grabe, Spicileg. Saec. ii. p. 175; but it is doubtful with what correctness.

It is to be observed, that although Otto ranks the Dialogus cum Tryphone among the undisputed works of Justin, its genuineness has been repeatedly attacked. The first assault was by C. G. Koch, of Apenrade, in the Duchy of Sleswick (Justin Martyris Dialogus cum Tryphone... notitiae, com. vicius), but this attack was regarded as of little moment. That of Wetstein (Prolog. in Nov. Test. vol. i. p. 66), founded on the difference of the citations from the text of the LXX. and their agreement with that of the Hexaplar edition of Origen, and perhaps of the version of Symmachus, which are both later than the time of Justin, was more serious, and has called forth elaborate replies from Krom (Diatribe de Authentia Dialog. Just. Martyr. cum Tryph. &c. 8vo. 1778), Eichhorn (Einführung in das A. T.), and Kredner (Beiträge zur Einleitung, &c.). The attack was renewed at a later period by Lange, but with little result. An account of the controversy is given by Semisch (book ii. sect. i. ch. 2), who contends earnestly for the genuineness of the work. It may be observed that the genuineness even of the two Apologies was attacked by the learned but eccentric Hardouin.

II. DISPUTED OR DOUBTFUL WORKS. 4. Ἀδριανὸς πρὸς Ἑλληνας, Oratio ad Graecos. If this is indeed a work of Justin, which we think very doubtful, it is probably that described by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 18) as treating περὶ τῶν δαemonῶν φύσεως (Comp. Phot. Bibl. cod. 125); and by Jerome (De Vir. Illust. c. 23) as being "de Daemone natura;" for it is a severe attack on the flagitious immoralities ascribed by the heathens to their deities, and committed by themselves in their religious festivals. Its identity, however, with the work respecting demons is doubted by many critics. Cave supposes it to be a portion of the work next mentioned. Its genuineness has been on various grounds disputed by Oudin, Senler, Semisch, and others; and is doubted by Grabe, Dupin, and Neander. The grounds of objection are well stated by Semisch (book ii. sect. ii. c. 1). But the genuineness of the piece is asserted by Tillemont, Ceillier, Cave, Maran, De Wette, Baumgarten-Crusius, and others, and by Otto, who has argued the question, we think, with very doubtful success. If the work be that described by Eusebius it must be mutilated, for the dissertation on the nature of the daemons or heathen deities is said by Eusebius to have been only a part of the work, but it now constitutes the whole. 5. Λόγος Πασανετικός πρὸς Ἑλληνας, Cohortatio ad Græcos. This is, perhaps, another of the works mentioned by Eusebius, Jerome and Photius (l. cc.); namely, the one said by them to have been entitled by the author Ἐλεγχος, Confutatio, or perhaps Τὸ Πλατῶνος ἔλεγχος, Platonis Confutatio (Phot. Bibl. cod. 232), though the title has been dropped. Others are disposed to identify the work last described with the Confutatio. The genuineness of the extant work has been disputed, chiefly on the ground of internal evidence, by Oudin, and by some German scholars (Semler, Arendt, and Herbig); and is spoken of with doubt by Neander; but has been generally received as genuine, and is defended by Maran, Semisch (b. ii. sect. i. c. 3), and Otto. It is a much longer piece than the Oratio ad Græcos. 6. Περὶ μοναρχίας, De Monarchia. The title is thus given in the MSS. and by Maran. A treatise under nearly the same title, Περὶ Θεοῦ μοναρχίας, De Monarchia Dei, is mentioned by Eusebius, Jerome, and Photius (l. cc.). The word Θεοῦ is contained in the title of the older editions of the extant treatise, which is an argument for Monotheism, supported by numerous quotations from the Greek poets and philosophers. As, according to Eusebius, Justin had used citations from the sacred writings, which are not found in the extant work, it is probable that if this be the genuine work, it has come down to us mutilated. Petavius and Tillemont, in a former age, and Herbig and Semisch, in the present day, doubt or deny the genuineness of this treatise, and their arguments are not without considerable force; but the great majority of critics admit the treatise to be Justin's, though some of them, as Cave, Dupin, and Ceillier, contend that it is mutilated. Maran, understanding the passage in Eusebius differently from others, vindicates not only the genuineness but the integrity of the work. Some of the passages quoted from the ancient poets are not found in any other writing, and are on that account suspected to be the spurious additions of a later hand. 7. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Διόγνητον, Epistola ad Diogenetum. This valuable remnant of antiquity, in which the writer describes the life and worship of the early Christians, is by some eminent critics, as Labbe, Cave, Fabricius, Ceillier, Baumgarten-Crusius, and others, ascribed to Justin: by others, as Tillemont, Le Nourry, Oudin, Neander, and Semisch, it is ascribed to some other, but unknown writer, whom some of these critics suppose to have lived at an earlier period than Justin. Grabe, Dupin, Maran, and Otto, are in doubt as to the authorship. Both Otto and Semisch give a lengthened statement of the arguments on the question: those of Semisch, derived chiefly from a comparison of the style and thoughts of the author with those of Justin in his undisputed works, seem decisive as to the author being a different person from him.

The fragment of Justin on the Resurrection is noticed below under No. 14, among the lost works.

III. SPURIOUS WORKS. 8. Ἀνατροπὴ δογματῶν τῶν Ἀριστοτελικῶν, Quorundam Aristotelis Dogmatum Confutatio. Possibly this is the work described by Photius (Bibl. cod. 125) as written against the first and second books of the Physics of Aristotle. Its spuriousness is generally admitted; scarcely any critics except Cave, and perhaps Grabe, contend that it belongs to Justin; but its date is very doubtful, and its real authorship unknown.

9. Ἐκθεσις τῆς ὁρθῆς ὁμολογίας, Expositio rectæ Confessionis. Possibly this is the work cited as Justin's by Leontius of Byzantium, in the sixth century; but it was little known in Western Europe till the time of the Reformation, when it was received by some of the reformers, as Calvin, as a genuine work of Justin, and by others, as Melancthon and the Magdeburg Centuriators, placed among the works of doubtful genuineness. But it is now generally allowed that the precision of its orthodoxy and the use of various terms not in use in Justin's time, make it evident that it was written at any rate after the commencement of the Arian controversy, and probably after the Nestorian, or even the Eutychian controversy. Grabe, Ceillier, and some others ascribe it to Justinus Siculus [No. 3]. 10. Ἀποκρίσεις πρὸς τοὺς ὁρθοδόξους περὶ τινῶν ἀναγκῶν ζητημάτων, Responsiones ad Orthodoxos de quibusdam Necessariis Quaestionibus. This is confessedly spurious. 11. Ἐρωτήσεις Χριστιανικαὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἑλληνας, Quaestiones Christianae ad Græcos, and Ἐρωτήσεις Ἑλληνικαὶ πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς, Quaestiones Græcae ad Christianos. Keatner alone of modern writers contends for the genuineness of these pieces. It is thought by some, that either these Answers, &c., or those to the Orthodox just mentioned, are the Ἀποκρίσιν κατὰ τῆς εὐσεβείας κεφαλαιώδεις ἐπιλόξεις, Brief Resolutions of Doubts unsavourable to Piety, mentioned by Photius (Bibl. cod. 125). 12. Epistola ad Zenam et Serenum, commencing Ἰουστίνους χεῖρ καὶ Σερήνῃ τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς χαίρειν, Justinus Zenae et Sereno fratribus salutem. This piece is by the learned (except by Grabe, Cave, and a few others), rejected from the works of Justin Martyr. Halloix, Tillemont, and Ceillier, ascribe it to a Justin, abbot of a monastery near Jerusalem, in the reign of the emperor Heraclius, of whom mention is made in the life of St. Anastasius the Persian; but Maran considers this as doubtful.

IV. LOST WORKS.—13. Σύνταγμα κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γεγενημένων αἱρέσεων, Liber contra omnes Haereses, mentioned by Justin himself in his Apologia Prima (c. 26, p. 70, ed. Maran. vol. i. p. 194, ed. Otto), and therefore antecedent in the time of its composition to that work. 14. Λόγος α. Σύγγραμμα κατὰ Μαρκίονος, or Πρὸς Μαρκίωνα, Contra Marcionem. (Irenaeus, Adv. Haeres. iv. 6, conf. v. 26; Hieron. de Viris Illust. c. 23; Euseb. H. E. iv. 11; Phot. Bibl. cod. 125.) Baumgarten-Crusius and Otto conjecture that this work against Marcion was a part of the larger work, Contra omnes Haereses, just mentioned; but Jerome and Photius clearly distinguish them. The fragment De Resurrectione Carnis preserved by Joannes Damascenus (Sacra Parvuli Opera, vol. ii. p. 756, &c., ed. Lequien), and usually printed with the works of Justin, is thought by Otto to be from the Liber contra omnes Haereses, or from that against Marcion (supposing them to be distinct works), for no separate treatise of Justin on the Resurrection appears to have been known to Eusebius, or Jerome, or Photius; but such a work is cited by Procopius of Gaza, In Octateuch. ad Genes. iii. 21. Semisch, however (Book ii. Sect. i. c. 4), who, with Grabe and Otto, contends for the genuineness of the fragment, which he vindicates against the objections of Tillemont, Le Nourry, Maran, Neander, and others, thinks it was an independent work. 15. Ψαλμῆς, Psalter, a work, the nature of which is not known; and 16. Περὶ ψυχῆς, De Anima, both mentioned by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 18) and Jerome (l. c.). Besides these works, Justin wrote several others, of which not even the names have come down to us (Euseb. iv. 18); but the following are ascribed to him on insufficient grounds: 17. Ἐκκλησιαστικὴς Ἐκλογὴς, Commentarius in Hesaiameron, a work of which a fragment, cited from Anastasius Sinaita (In Hesaiem. Lib. vii.), is given by Grabe (Spicil. SS. Patr. vol. a. saec. ii. p. 195) and Maran (Opp. Justin.). Maran, however, doubts if it is Justin's, and observes that the words of Anastasius do not imply that Justin wrote a separate work on the subject. 18. Πρὸς Ἐδδαίον σοφιστὴν περὶ πρὸς νολας καὶ πλοτεως, adversus Euphrasium Sophistam, de Providentia et Fide, of which a citation is preserved by Maximus (Opusc. Polemica, vol. ii. p. 154, ed. Combéfiis). This treatise is probably the work of a later Justin. 19. A Commentary on the Apocalypse. The supposition that Justin wrote such a work is probably founded on a misunderstanding of a passage in Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 9.), who says that "Justin Martyr interpreted the Apocalypse:" but without saying that it was in a separate work. The authorship of the work, Περὶ τοῦ τὰν τῶν, De Universo, mentioned by Photius (Bibl. cod. 48), was, as he tells us, disputed, some ascribing it to Justin, but apparently with little reason. It is now assigned to Hippolytus. [HIPPOLYTUS, No. 1.]

Nearly all the works of Justin, genuine and spurious (viz. all enumerated above in the first three divisions except the Oratio ad Graecos and the Epistola ad Diognetum), were published by Robert Stephanus, fol. Paris, 1551. This is the editio princeps of the collected works; but the Cohortatio ad Graecos had been previously published, with a Latin version, 4to. Paris, 1539. There is no discrimination or attempt at discrimination in this edition of Stephanus between the genuine and spurious works. The Oratio ad Graecos and the Epistola ad Diognetum, with a Latin version and notes, were published by Hen. Stephanus, 4to. Paris, 1592, and again in 1595. All these works, real or supposed, of Justin were published, with the Latin version of Langus, and notes by Frid. Sylburgius, fol. Heidelberg, 1593; and this edition was reprinted, fol. Paris, 1615 and 1636, with the addition of some remains of other early fathers; and fol., Cologne (or rather Wittenburg), 1686, with some further additions. A far superior edition, with the remains of Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hermias the Philosopher, with a learned preface and notes, was published, "opera et studio unius ex Monachis congreg. S. Mauri," i. e. by Prudentius Maranus, or Maran, fol. Paris, 1742. In this the genuine pieces, according to the judgment of the editor (Nos. 1–6 in our enumeration), are given in the body of the work, together with the Epistola ad Diognetum, of the authorship of which Maran was in doubt. The two Apologies were placed in their right order, for the first time, in this edition. The remaining works, together with fragments which had been collected by Grabe (who had first published, in his Spicilegium SS. Patrum, the fragment on the Resurrection, from Joannes Damascenus) and others, and the Martyrium S. Justin., of which the Greek text was first published in the Acta Sanctorum, April. vol. ii., were given in the Appendix. From the time of Maran, no complete edition of Justin was published until that of Otto, 2 vols. 8vo. Jena, 1842–1844. The first volume contains the Oratio ad Cohortatio ad Graecos, and the Apologia Prima and Apologia Secunda. The second contains the Dialogus cum Tryphone, the Epistola ad Diognetum, the fragments, and the Acta Martyrii Justin et Sociorum. Several valuable editions of the separate pieces appeared, chiefly in England. The Apologia Prima was edited by Grabe, 8vo. Oxford, 1700; the Apologia Secunda, Oratio ad Graecos, Cohortatio ad Graecos, and De Monarchia, by Hutchin, 8vo. Oxford, 1703; and the Dialogus cum Tryphone, by Jebb, 8vo. London, 1719. These three editions had the Latin version of Langus, and variorum notes. The Apologia Prima, Apologia Secunda, and Dialogus cum Tryphone, from the text of Rob. Stephanus, with some corrections, with the version of Langus, amended, and notes, were edited by Thirlby, and published, fol. London, 1722. It has been conjectured that this valuable edition, though published under the name of Thirlby, was really by Markland. The Apologia Prima, Apologia Secunda, Dialogus cum Tryphone, and the fragments, are given in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandi. We do not profess to have enumerated all the editions of the Greek text, and we have not noticed the Latin versions. Full information will be found in the prefaces of Maran and Otto. There are English translations of the Apologies by Reeves, of the Dialogue with Trypho by Brown, and of the Exhortation to the Gentiles by Moses. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 8–13, 16–18; Hieronym. De Vir. Illustr. c. 23; Phot. Bibl. cod. 48, 125, 232, 234; Martyrium s. Acta Martyrii Justin. apud Acta Sanctorum, April. vol. ii.; a. apud Opera Justin. edit. Maran and Otto; Halloix, Illustrat. Eccl. Orient. Scriptorum Vitae, Saecul. ii. p. 151, &c.; reprinted with a Comment. Praefatus et Notae, by Papebroche, in the Acta Sanctorum, April. vol. ii.; Grabe, Spicilegium SS. Patrum, Saecul. (s. vol.) ii. p. 133; Baronius, Annales, ad annos 130, 142, 143, 150, 164, 165; Pagi, Critica in Baronium; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 69, ed. Oxford, 1740–1743; the ecclesiastical histories of Tillemont, vol. ii. p. 344, &c.; Fleury, vol. i. pp. 413, &c., 476, &c.; Neander and Milman; Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque, &c.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. ii. p. 1, &c.; Lardner, Credibility, &c.; Otto, De Justin Martyris Scriptis; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 52, &c.; Semich, Justin Martyr. (transl. by Ryland in the Biblical Cabinet); and the Prolegomena and notes to the editions of Justin, by Maran and Otto.)

2. Of JERUSALEM. In the Acta S. Anastasii Perseae Martyris, of which two Latin versions are given in the Acta Sanctorum, Janu. vol. ii. p. 426, &c., mention is made of Justin, who was abbot of the monastery of St. Anastasius, about four miles distant from Jerusalem, about A. D. 620. To this Justin some critics ascribe the Epistola ad Zenon et Severum, which has been ascribed to Justin Martyr, and printed among his works. [No. 1.]

3. Of SICILY, bishop of one of the sees in that island in the latter part of the fifth century. He was present at a council held at Rome A. D. 483 or 484, under Pope Felix III., in which Petrus Fullo (Frangepan), or Peter the Fuller, patriarch of Antioch, was condemned as a heretic, for having added to the "trinitarian" the heretical words "who suffered for us." Several bishops, among whom was Justin, desirous of recalling Peter from his errors, addressed letters to him. The letter of Peter, in the original Greek, with a Latin version, Epistola Justinus Episcopi in Sicilia, ad Petrum Fulconem s. Chaphensem, is given in the Concilia (vol. iv. col. 1103, &c., ed. Labbe; vol. ii. col. 839, ed. Hardoin; vol. vii. col. 1115, ed. Mansi.) The genuineness of this letter, and of six others of similar character, from various Eastern or Western bishops, which are also given in the Concilia, is disputed by Valestinus (Observat. Eccles. ad Evagrium Libri duo, Lib. I. De Petro Antiochen. Episcop. c. 4); but defended by Cave (Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 438), who, however, contends that the Greek text is not the original, but a version from the Latin. Pagi (Critice in Baronii Annales, ad ann. 485, c. 15) proposes to correct the reading of the title of Justin's letter from "Episcopi in Sicilia," to "Episcopi in Cilicia;" others would read the name "Justinianus," but on what authority we do not know. Dodwell and others ascribe to this Justin the Responsiones ad Orthodoxos, and the Expositio Rectas Confessionis, reputed to be by Justin Martyr, and printed with his works. [No. 1.] (Cave, l. c.; Mongitor. Biblioth. Sicula, vol. i. p. 417, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 53; vol. xi. p. 661; vol. xii. p. 635.) [J. C. M.]

JUSTINUS, HESYCHIUS. [HESYCHIUS, No. 5.]

JUSTINUS, JULIUS, the name of one of the lexicographers prefixed to the work of Suidas, but instead of which we ought to read Julius Vestinus. [VESTINUS.]

JUSTUS (Ἰούστος), a Jewish historian of Tiberias in Galilee, was a contemporary of the Jewish historian Josephus, who was very hostile to him. Justus wrote, according to Photius (Bibl. cod. 33), a chronicle of the Jewish kings, from the time of Moses down to the death of Herod, in the third year of the reign of Trajan. The style of the work, which is lost, is said by Photius to have been concise, and the author omitted many of the most important events, such as the history of Christ, which it was a common practice with Jewish writers to pass over unnoticed. Justus is further charged with having falsified the history of the wars with Rome, which led to the destruction of Jerusalem. (Comp. Joseph. Vit. §§ 37, 65, 74, who gives a long account of him, and censures him very severely.) He edited his work after the death of Agrippa and the other great men of the time, because, as Josephus says, he knew that his accounts were false, and had reason to fear the consequences. Some writers (Euseb. H. E. iii. 9; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τίσεπλος) speak of a work of his on the Jewish war, but this may refer only to the last portion of his chronicle, which Diogenes Laertius (ii. 41) calls a Στάσις. Suidas (s. v. Ἰούστος) mentions some other works of Justus, of which however not a trace has come down to us.

JUSTUS CATONIUS. [CATONIUS.] JUSTUS, FABIVS, a friend of Tacitus, who addresses him in the beginning of his treatise De Oratoribus. He was also connected by friendship with the younger Pliny, who mentions him in his letters (Epist. i. 11, vii. 2), and we have every reason for believing that he was a distinguished rhetorician of the time. [L. S.]

imperial constitutions. Of his Constitutionum Libri XX. there are 16 fragments in the Digest, not extending beyond the 8th book. The constitutions cited are all reprints of the Antonines, either Marcus alone (Dig. 2. tit. 14. a. 60) or Marcus and Verus jointly. Of the collector nothing more is known, but his date is inferred from the circumstance that the Antonines are named in the extracts taken from his work without the epithet Divus. (Aug. C. Stockmann [Car. Aug. Hennike], Papirii Justii, Icti Romani, fragmenta observationum illustrata, 4to, Lips. 1792; Petr. Elisa Piepers, de Papirio Justo, Icto, 4to, Lug. Bat. 1824.) [J. T. G.]

JUTURNA, the nymph of a well in Latium, famous for its excellent healing qualities. Its water was used in nearly all sacrifices (Serv. ad Aen. xii. 139; Varr. de L. L. v. 71), and a chapel was dedicated to its nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius by Lutatius Catulus; sacrifices were offered to her on the 11th of January both by the state and private persons. (Ov. Fast. i. 463; Serv. l. c.) A pond in the forum, between the temples of Castor and Vesta, was called Lacus Juturnae, whence we must infer that the name of the nymph Juturna is not connected with juria, but probably with juvare. She is said to have been beloved by Jupiter, who rewarded her with immortality and the rule over the waters. (Virg. Aen. xii. 140, 878; Ov. Fast. ii. 585, 606.) Arnobius (iii. 29) calls her the wife of Janus and mother of Fontus, but in the Aeneid she appears as the affectionate sister of Turnus. (Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 101, &c.) [L. S.]

JUVENALIS, DECIMUS JUNIUS. The small amount of direct information which we possess with regard to the personal history of Juvenal is derived almost exclusively from a very meagre memoir, which bears the name of Suetonius, but which is by most critics ascribed, with greater probability, to Valerius Probus, or some later grammarian. We are here told that the poet was either the son or the "alumnus" of a rich freedman; that he occupied himself, until he had nearly reached the term of middle life, in declaiming, more, however, for the sake of amusement than with any view to professional exertion; that, having subsequently composed some clever lines upon Paris the pantomime, he was induced to cultivate assiduously satirical composition; that for a considerable period he did not venture to publish his essays; but that having eventually attracted numerous audiences, and gained great applause, he inserted in one of his new pieces the verses which had formed a portion of his first effort, those, namely, which we now read in Sat. vii. 86—91, where, speaking of the popularity of Statius, he adds:

— "sed quum fregit subaellia verau
Eurit, intactam Paridi nisi vendat Agaven.
Ille et militiae multis largitur honorem,
Semestri vatum digitos circumligat auro.
Quod non dant proceres, dabit histrio; tu Camerinos
Et Barea, tu nobilium magna atria curas!"

That the actor (or as actor) being at that time in high favour at court, and enjoying extensive influence, Juvenal became an object of suspicion, as one who had indirectly (figurate) censured the corrupt practices of the day; and although now an old man of eighty, was forthwith, under the semblance of honourable distinction, appointed to the command of a body of troops quartered in a remote district of Egypt, where he died within a very brief space, the victim of disgust and grief. The account of the banishment to Egypt is supposed to be corroborated by the general tenor of the fifteenth satire, and especially by the words (44—46)

“Horrida sane
Aegyptus, sed luxuria, quantum ipse notavi, Barbara famoso non credit turba Canopo,” which are interpreted to imply personal observation, while Sidonius Apollinaris is believed to refer to the same personages and the same events, when he says (Carm. ix. 270—274.),

“Non qui tempore Caesaris secundi
Aeterno coluit Tomos reatu.
Nec qui consimili deinde casu
Ad vulgi tenuem strepitum auram
Iratu fuit histronis crepul.”

Several other biographies are found in the MSS., but all certainly of a later date than that of which we have given an abstract. These agree, in many points, almost word for word, with the above narrative, but differ much from it and from each other in various details connected with the misfortune and fate of the satirist. Thus one of these declares that the events happened in the reign of Nero; and in this it is supported by the scholiast on Sat. vii. 92; that Juvenal returned to the city, and, being filled with grief in consequence of the absence of his friend Martial, died in his eighty-first year. In another we are told, that having been exiled towards the close of Domitian's career, and not recalled by the successors of that prince, he died of old age, under Antoninus Pius. In a third it is stated that Trajan, incensed by an attack upon his favourite, Paris, despatched the author of the libel upon an expedition against the Scotch. Joannes Malelas of Antioch, who is copied by Suidas, records (Chronogr. lib. x. p. 262. ed. Bonn) the banishment of Juvenal by Domitian to the Pentapolis of Libya, on account of a lampoon upon “Paris the dancer,” whom, it is evident from what follows, the Byzantine confounds with some other individual; and, finally, the old commentator on the fourth satire ignorantly imagines that the lines 37, 38, were the cause, and the Oasis the place of exile.

“Quum jam semianimem laceraret Flavius orbem

Before going farther, we must remember that there were two famous pantomimes who bore the name of Paris, one contemporary with Nero, the other with Domitian, and that each was put to death by the emperor, under whom he flourished (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 18, lxxvii. 3; Sueton. Ner. 54, Dom. 3, 10); but it is evident, from the transactions with Statius alluded to in the lines quoted above, that the second of these is the Paris of the seventh satire. This being premised, we shall find that the older annotators, taking the words of the pseudo-Suetonius in what certainly appears at first sight to be their natural and obvious acceptation, agree in believing that Juvenal, on account of his insolent animadversions on the all-powerful minion of the court, was banished at the age of eighty by Domitian to Egypt, where he very soon afterwards sunk under the pressure of age and sorrow. But a careful examination of the historical notices in the satires themselves will at once prove that this opinion is untenable, although we must carefully separate what is certain from what is doubtful. Thus it is often asserted that the thirteenth satire belongs to A.D. 119 or even to A.D. 127, because written sixty years after the consulship of Pontius (see v. 17), as if it were unquestionable that this Pontius must be the C. Pontius Capito who was consul A.D. 59, or the L. Pontius Capito who was consul A.D. 67, while, in reality, the individual indicated is in all probability C. Pontius Capito, who was consul A.D. 12, since we know, from Statius, that Rutilius Gallicus (see v. 157) was actually city praefect under Domitian. Again, the contest between the inhabitants of Ombi and of Tentyra is said (xv. 27) to have happened “super consule Junio;” but even admitting this name to be correct, and the MSS. here very much, we cannot tell whether we ought to fix upon Appius Junius Sabinius, consul A.D. 84, or upon Q. Junius Rusticus, consul A.D. 119. We have, however, fortunately evidence more precise.

1. We know from Dion Cassius (lxvii. 3) that Paris was killed in A.D. 83, upon suspicion of an intrigue with the empress Domitia.

2. The fourth satire, as appears from the concluding lines, was written after the death of Domitian, that is, not earlier than A.D. 96.

3. The first satire, as we learn from the forty-ninth line, was written after the condemnation of Marius Priscus, that is, not earlier than A.D. 104. These positions admit of no doubt or cavil, and hence it is established that Juvenal was alive at least 17 years after the death of Paris, and that some of his most spirited productions were composed after the death of Domitian. Hence, if the powerful “histrio” in the biography of the pseudo-Suetonius be, as we should naturally conclude, the same person with the Paris named in the preceding sentence, it is impossible that Juvenal could have been banished later than A.D. 83; it is impossible that he could have died immediately afterwards, since he was alive in A.D. 100; and it is incredible that if he had pined for a long series of years at a distance from his country his works should contain no allusion to a destiny so sad, while, on the other hand, they bear the most evident marks of having been conceived and brought forth in the metropolis amid the scenes so graphically described.

Salmasius was much too acute not to perceive this difficulty; but clinging to the idea that Juvenal actually was banished to Egypt at the age of 80 and there died, he endeavoured to escape from the embarrassment by supposing that the seventh satire, containing the lines composed originally against Paris, was not published until the accession of Hadrian; that the word “histrio” does not refer to Paris at all, but to some player of that epoch protected by the sovereign, who, taking offence at the passage in question, disgraced the author of what he considered as a scarcely hidden attack upon his abuse of patronage. This notion is followed out by Dodwell (Annal. Quintil. § 37), who maintains that all the satires were published after the elevation of Hadrian, whom he supposes to be the object of the complimentary address, “Et spes et ratio studiorum in Caesare tantum,” expressions which Salmasius refers to Trajan, and the scholiast to Nero! But although the words both in the satire and in the memoir might, without much violence, be accommodated to some such explanation, yet the hypothesis, taken as a whole, is so fanciful and so destitute of all external support, that it has been adopted by few scholars, while Franke has written two elaborate pamphlets for the purpose of demonstrating that the whole tale of the banishment to Egypt is a mere figment of the grammarians; that the ignorance of topography displayed in the 15th satire, by placing Ombi in the immediate vicinity of Tentyra, is such as to render it highly improbable that the author had at any time visited the country of which he speaks, and that the whole paragraph containing the words "quantum ipse notavi," is palpably a gross interpolation.

Without pretending to embrace the views of this or of any previous critic to their full extent, we may safely assume a sceptical position, and doubt every point which has been usually assumed as true. The narratives contained in the different ancient biographies are so vague and indistinct that they could scarcely have proceeded from a contemporary or from any one who drew his knowledge from a clear or copious source, while the contradictory character of many of the statements and the manifest blunders involved in others, prevent us from reposing any confidence in those particulars in which they agree, or are not confuted by external testimony. The only facts with regard to Juvenal upon which we can implicitly rely are, that he flourished towards the close of the first century, that Aquinum, if not the place of his nativity, was at least his chosen residence (Sat. iii. 319), and that he is in all probability the friend whom Martial addresses in three epigrams.

There is, perhaps, yet another circumstance which we may admit without suspicion. We are told that he occupied himself for many years of his life in declaiming; and assuredly every page in his writings bears evidence to the accuracy of this assertion. Each piece is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing and sonorous; the successive attacks upon vice are all planned with systematic skill; the arguments are marshalled in imposing array; they advance supported by a heavy artillery of powerful and well-aimed illustrations, and sweeping impetuously onward, carry by assault each position as in turn assailed. But although the impression produced at first is overwhelming, the results are not permanent. The different poems are too obviously formal works of art; and while the figures in each picture are selected with anxious care, grouped with all attention to effect, and rich with the most brilliant colouring, the composition as a whole is deficient in the graceful ease and reality which impart such a matchless charm to the less regular and less elaborate sketches of Horace. The means by which the two great satirists seek to achieve their object are as widely different as the tempers and habits of the men. It is impossible to imagine a contrast more striking than is presented by the playful, good-humoured gaiety with which the one would laugh his hearers out of their follies and their guilt, and by the uncompromising sternness with which the other seeks to scare them, calling to his aid frightful images and terrific denunciations. In the one case, however, we are fully convinced of the absolute sincerity of our monitor; we feel that his precepts are the fruit of long experience, proceeding from one who, having mingled much with the world, and encountered its perils, is filled with kindly sympathy for the difficulties and dangers of those whom he warns to avoid the rocks and shoals on which he had himself well nigh been wrecked; while the stately well-measured indignation of the other belongs to the eloquence of the head rather than of the heart; and the obvious tone of exaggeration which pervades all his thundering invectives leaves us in doubt how far this sustained passion is real, and how far assumed for show. But while the austere and misanthropic gloom of Juvenal touches less deeply than the warm-hearted social spirit of his rival, we must not forget the difference of their position. Horace might look with admiration upon the high intellect of his prince, and the generous protection extended by him to literature; and he might feel grateful to the prudent firmness which had restored peace after long years of civil bloodshed, while a decent show of freedom was still left. But the lapse of half a century had wrought a fearful change. Galling to the proud spirit filled with recollections of ancestral glory, must have been the chains with which the coarse tyranny of Nero and Domitian ostentatiously loaded their dependents; deep must have been the humiliation of the moralist who beheld the utter degradation and corruption of his countrymen: the canker was perchance too deeply-seated even for the keenest knife, but delicate and gentle palliatives would have been worse than mockery.

The extant works of Juvenal consist of sixteen satires, the last being a fragment of very doubtful authenticity, all composed in heroic hexameters, and divided, in several MSS., into five books, an arrangement which, although as old as the time of Priscian, is altogether arbitrary and unmeaning. According to this distribution, the first book comprehends Sat. i. ii. iii. iv. v.; the second Sat. vi.; the third Sat. vii. viii. ix.; the fourth Sat. x. xi. xii.; and the fifth the remainder.

Not less than six very early impressions of Juvenal have been described by bibliographers, each of which may claim the distinction of being the Editio Princeps, but the honour would seem to be divided between the three following:—

1. A folio, in Roman characters, containing 68 sheets, with 32 lines in each page, without date and without name of place or of printer. See Maittaire, Annal. Typog. vol. i. p. 296.
2. A quarto, in Roman characters, containing 80 sheets, with 25 lines in each page, without date and without name of place, but bearing the name of Ulric Han, and therefore printed at Rome.
3. A quarto, in Roman characters, containing 71 sheets, with 30 lines in each page, without name of place or of printer, but bearing the date 1470, and supposed to be the work of Vindelino de Spira.

The text, as first exhibited, underwent a gradual but slow improvement in the editions of Jac. de Rubeis, fol. Venet. 1475; of G. Valla, fol. Venet. 1486; of Mancinellus, fol. Venet. 1492; of Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1501, 1535, and another without date; of Junta, 8vo. Florent. 1513; of Colinaeus, 8vo. Paris, 1528, 1535, 1542; of Gryphius, 8vo. Lugd. 1534, 1535, 1538, 1545, 1560, 1576; of R. Stephanus, 8vo. Paris, 1544, 1549; of Pulmannus, 8vo. Antv. 1565, 24mo. 1585; and was at length reduced to a satisfactory form by P. Pitheous, 8vo. Paris, 1585, Heidelberg. 1590; and above all, by Nic. Rigaltius, 12mo. Paris, 1613, 8vo. 1616, whose readings were adopted almost implicitly for nearly two centuries, until the labours of Rupert, 8vo. Lips. 1801; Gott. 1808, Lips. 1819; of Achaintre, 8vo. Paris, 1810; of Weber, 8vo. Weimar, 1825; and of Heinrich, 8vo. Bonn, 1839, effected probably everything that our present resources will permit us to accomplish.

Our author appears to have been studied with extreme avidity upon the revival of letters, and the presses of the fifteenth century teemed with commentaries. The earliest were those of Angelus Sabinus and Domitius Calderinus, both published in fol. at Rome in 1474; followed by those of Georgius Merula, fol. Venet. 1478, and Tarras, 1478; of Georgius Valla, fol. Venet. 1486; of Antonius Mancinellus, fol. Venet. 1492; of Badius Ascensius, 4to. Lugd. 1498; of Joannes Britannicus, fol. Venet. 1499. To these may be added the annotations of Pulmannus, Pithoeus and Rigaltius, attached to their editions, as specified above; of Lubinus, 8vo. Rostoch. 1602, 4to. Hanov. 1603; of Farnabius, 12mo. 1612, very often reprinted; of Prateus, the Delphin editor, 4to. Paris, 1684; of Heninnius, 4to. Ultraj. 1685, 4to. Lugd. Bat. 1695; and of Marshall, 8vo. Lond. 1723. The brief remarks of Coelius Curio, which were first appended to the edition of Colinaeus, 8vo. Paris, 1528, and afterwards in a much enlarged and improved shape to that of Frobenius, fol. Basil, 1551, possess much merit. The old scholia were first printed in a complete form in the edition of Pithoeus, 8vo. Paris, 1585. The whole of the above have been repeatedly reprinted both entire and in selections.

The student who provides himself with the editions of Heninnius, 4to. Lugd. Bat. 1695; of Achaintre, of Rupert, and of Heinrich, will possess every thing he can require. The commentary of Heinrich, written in German, is the best that has yet appeared.

The earliest English versions are those of Barten Holyday (best ed. fol. Oxford, 1673), and of Sir Robert Stapylton (best ed. fol. London, 1660), both of which enjoyed considerable popularity during the seventeenth century. Although the lines in Holyday are ludicrously quaint and rugged, the meaning of the original is for the most part represented with great fidelity, and the commentary attached may still be consulted with advantage. Dryden has rendered the first, third, sixth, tenth and sixteenth satires, in language full of genius and spirit, but always paraphrastic, and often inaccurate. The most faithful and scholarlike translation which has yet appeared is that of Gifford, 4to. Lond. 1802; and much praise is due to that of Badham, at least to the second edition, published in Valpy's Family Classical Library.

All the ancient documents regarding the life of Juvenal will be found collected and arranged in the edition of Rupert, and the various inferences deduced from them have been fully discussed by Franke in his two dissertations, the first published at Altona and Leipzig, 8vo. 1820; the second at Dorpat, fol. 1827; by C. Hermann, in his Disputatio de Juvenalis Satirarum Septimas Temporibus, 4to. Gott. 1843; by Pinzger, in Jahn's Jahrbücher für Philologie, vol. xiv. p. 261; and by Düntzer, in the sixth supplemental volume to the same work, p. 373. [W. R.]

in Umbria, May 3, A. D. 369. He converted many of the people to Christianity, and is said to have performed several miracles, both during his life, and also by his relics after his death, which took place Aug. 7, A. D. 376. His epitaph is preserved, and also a rhyming Latin hymn, which used to be sung in his honour by the church of Narnia, on the day on which his memory was observed, viz. May 3. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. i. p. 376; Surin, de Probatis Sanctorum Histor. vol. vii. p. 361; Bavaria, Nomencl. Sanc. Profess. Medicor.) [W. A. G.]

JUVENCUS VETTIUS AQUILINUS, one of the earliest among the Christian poets, flourished under Constantine the Great, was a native of Spain, the descendant of an illustrious family, and a presbyter of the church. These particulars, for which we are indebted chiefly to St. Jerome, comprise the whole of our knowledge with regard to the personal history of this writer, who owes his reputation to the first of the two following works:—

1. Historia Evangelicæ Libri IV., published about A. D. 332, a life of Christ in hexameter verse, compiled from the four evangelists. The narrative of St. Matthew is taken as the groundwork, the additional facts supplied by the three others are interwoven in their proper places, the whole thus forming a complete harmony of the Gospels. The liberal praises bestowed upon Juvenus by divines and scholars, from St. Jerome down to Petrarch, must be understood to belong rather to the substance of the piece than to the form under which the materials are presented. We may honour the pious motive which prompted the undertaking, and we may bestow the same commendation upon the laborious ingenuity with which every particular recorded by the sacred historians, and frequently their very words, are forced into numbers; but the very plan of the composition excludes all play of fancy and all poetical freedom of expression, while the versification, although fluent and generally harmonious, too often bids defiance to the laws of prosody, and the language, although evidently in many places copied from the purist models, betrays here and there evident indications of corruption and decay. The idea that this production might be employed with advantage in the interpretation of the Scriptures, inasmuch as it may be supposed to exhibit faithfully the meaning attached to various obscure passages in the early age to which it belongs, will not, upon examination, be found to merit much attention.

2. Liber in Genesim, in 1541 hexameters, divided into as many chapters as the original; an attempt, it would appear, to render the study of the Old Testament more generally popular by clothing it in a metrical dress, the plan and execution being in every respect similar to the Historia Evangelicæ. For a long period the first four sections alone were known to exist, and were variously ascribed by different critics to Tertullian, Cyprian, or Salvianus of Marseilles; but the entire book, together with the real author, were made known in the beginning of the eighteenth century, from a MS. of the eleventh century, and published by Durand. (See below.)

3. St. Jerome and other ecclesiastical biographers mention some hexameters upon the sacraments, but of these no trace remains.

The Editio Princeps of the Historia Evangelicæ was printed at Deventer in Holland, 4to. 1490; it is included in the Poetæ veterum Ecclesie Opera of G. Fabricius, fol. Basil. 1564; in the Opera et Fragmenta vet. Poet. Lat. of Maittaire, fol. Lond. 1713; in the Bibliotheca Patr. Max. Lugdun. 1677, vol. iv. p. 35; and was published separately with a collection of commentaries, by Reusnchius, 8vo. Lips. 1710.

The Liber in Genesis first appeared in its complete form in Martene et Durand, Scriptorum et Monumentorum Amplissima Collectio, fol. Paris, 1723, vol. ix. p. 14, from whence it was reprinted, along with the Historia Evangelica, in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venet. 1770, vol. iv. p. 587.

(Hieron. De Vir. Ill. 84, Ep. ad Magnum, Chron. Euseb. ad A. D. cccxix.; Gebser, De C. Vetus Aquinasi Juvenii Vita et Scriptis, 8vo. Jen. 1827.) [W. R.]

JUVENTIA GENS, an ancient plebeian gens, which came from Tusculum (Cic. pro Planc. 8), and settled in Rome, probably in the course of the fourth century B. C. According to the statement of L. Cassius, who united with L. Juventius Laterensis in accusing Cn. Plancius, Cicero's client, the first plebeian aedile was a member of the Juventia gens. The correctness of this statement is denied by Cicero; but whether true or false, the fact of its being made sufficiently proves the antiquity of the gens. (Cic. pro Planc. 24.) The name does not occur again in history till the year A. C. 197 [JUVENTIUS, No. 1]; and the first of the gens who obtained the consulship was M. Juventius Thalna in A. C. 163. Notwithstanding their antiquity and nobility, none of the Juventii played any prominent part in history, and the name is indebted for its celebrity chiefly to the two jurists who lived in the second century of the Christian aera. [CELSUS, JUVENTIUS.]

The family-names of this gens are CELSUS, LATRENSIS, PRADO, THALNA: a few occur without a surname. Owing to the common interchange of B and V, the name is frequently written Jubenius in manuscripts and inscriptions.

JUVENTINUS ALBIUS OVIDIUS, the name attached to thirty-five distichs entitled Elogia de Philomela, containing a collection of those words which are supposed to express appropriately the sound uttered by birds, quadrupeds, and other animals. Take as a specimen,

Mus avidus mintrit, velox mustecula drindit,
Et grillus grillat, desticat inde sores.

The age of the author is quite unknown, but from the last couplet in the piece it would appear that he was a Christian. Bernhardt has endeavoured to prove from Spartianus (Gracchus der Röm. Litt. p. 135), that this and other trifles of a similar description were composed by the contemporaries of the emperor Geta, the son of Septimius Severus and the brother of Caracalla. (Berman. Anthol. Lat. v. 143, or n. 233, ed. Meyer; Wernsdorff, Poet. Lat. Minores, vol. vii. p. 178, and p. 279.) [W. R.]

JUVENTIUS. 1. T., a tribune of the soldiers who fell in battle in A. C. 197, when the consul Q. Minucius Rufus was defeated by the Cisalpine Gauls. (Liv. xxxiii. 22.)

2. T., mentioned by Livy (xlii. 27) as one of the legati sent into Apulia and Calabria to purchase corn in B. C. 172, is probably the same as the T. Juventius Thalna who was praetor in A. C. 194. [THALNA.]

3. A comic poet, who probably lived in the middle of the second century A. C. He is referred to by Varro (L. L. vi. 50, vii. 65, ed. Müller) and A. Gellius (xviii. 12).

4. P., praetor in A. C. 149, who was defeated and slain in battle in Macedonia by the usurper Andronicus (Pseudophilippus). [ANDRONICUS.] (Liv. Epit. 50; Flor. ii. 14; Eutrop. iv. 13; Oros. iv. 22.)

5. A beautiful youth, to whom Catullus has addressed several of his poems. (Carm. 24, 48, 99.)

C. JUVENTIUS, a Roman jurist, one of the numerous auditores of Q. Mucius, P. f. Scaevola, the Pontifex Maximus. He is mentioned by Pomponius along with Aquilius Gallus, Balbus Lucilius, and Sextus Papirius, as one of the four most eminent pupils of Mucius. Nothing more is known of him. His works possessed high authority, and were incorporated by Servius Sulpicius in his own writings. In the time of Pomponius, the original productions of the disciples of Mucius were scarce, and were known chiefly through the books of Servius Sulpicius. (Dig. l. tit. 2. a. 2. § 42.) [J. T. G.]

T. JUVENTIUS, an advocate, who was much employed in private causes. He was a slow and rather cold speaker, but a wily disputant. He possessed considerable legal knowledge, as did also his disciple Q. Orbius, who was a contemporary of Cicero. (Brut. 48.) Ch. Ad. Ruperti thinks that the T. Juventius mentioned by Cicero is the same with the disciple of Mucius, to whom Pomponius gives the praenomen Caius. (Animad. in Enchirid. Pomponii, iii. 8.) [J. T. G.]

IX'ION (Ἰξίον), a son of Phlegyas (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 62; comp. Strab. x. p. 442, who calls him a brother of Phlegyas), or, according to others, a son of Antion by Perimela, of Pasion, or of Area. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ii. 39; Diod. i. 69; Hygin. Fab. 62.) According to the common tradition, his mother was Dia, a daughter of Deioneus. He was king of the Lapithae or Phlegyes, and the father of Peirithous. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 14.) When Deioneus demanded of Ixion the bridal gifts he had promised, Ixion treacherously invited him, as though it were to a banquet, and then contrived to make him fall into a pit filled with fire. As no one purified Ixion of this treacherous murder, and all the gods were indignant at him, Zeus took pity upon him, purified him, and invited him to his table. But Ixion was ungrateful to his benefactor, and attempted to win the love of Hera. Zeus made a phantom resembling Hera, and by it Ixion became the father of a Centaur, who again having intercourse with Magnesian mares, became the father of the Hippocentaurs. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 39, &c. with the Schol.; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1185; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 6.) Ixion, as a punishment, was chained by Hermes with his hands and feet to a wheel, which is described as winged or fiery, and said to have rolled perpetually in the air or in the lower world. He is further said to have been scourged, and compelled to exclaim, "Benefactors should be honoured." (Comp. Schol. ad Hom. Od. xxi. 303; Hygin. Fab. 33, 62; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 601; Georg. iii. 38, iv. 484; Schol. Venet. ad Il. i. 266.) [L. S.]

IX'YON, a surname of Demetrius, the grammarian, of Adramyttium. [Vol. I. p. 968, a.]

IXIONIDES, a patronymic, applied by Ovid (Met. viii. 566) to Peirithous, the son of Ixion; but the plural, Ixionidae, occurs also as a name of the Centaurs. (Lucan, vi. 386.) [L. S.]

I'XIUS (Ἰξίος), a surname of Apollo, derived from a district of the island of Rhodes which was called Ixiæ or Ixia. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰξίαι; comp. Strab. xiv. p. 655.) [L. S.]

IYNX (Ἰύνξ), a daughter of Peitho and Pan, or of Echo. She endeavoured to charm Zeus, or make him, by magic means, fall in love with Io; in consequence of which Hera metamorphosed her into the bird called Iynx (iynx torquilla). (Schol. ad Theocrit. ii. 17, ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 380, Nem. iv. 56; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 310.) According to another story, she was a daughter of Pierus, and as she and her sisters had presumed to enter into a musical contest with the Muses, she was changed into the bird Iynx. (Anton. lib. 9.) This bird, the symbol of passionate and restless love, was given by Aphrodite to Jason, who, by turning it round and pronouncing certain magic words, excited the love of Medea. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 380, &c.; Tzet. l. c.) [L. S.]

LABDA (Λάβδα), a daughter of the Bacchiad Amphion, and mother of Cypselus, by Eetion. (Herod. v. 92.) According to the Etymologicum Magnum (p. 199), her name was derived from the fact of her feet being turned outward, and thus resembling the letter Λ. [Comp. CYPSÆLUS.] [L. S.]

LABDA'CIDAE (Λάβδακίδαι), a patronymic from Labdacus, and frequently used not only to designate his children, but his descendants in general, and is therefore applied not only to Oedipus, his son, but to Polyneices, Eteocles, and Antigone. The family of the Labdacidæ is particularly famous in ancient story, on account of the misfortunes of all that belonged to it. (Soph. Antig. 560; Stat. Theb. vi. 451, and many other passages.) [L. S.]

LABDACUS (Λάβδακος), a son of the Theban king, Polydorus, the son of Cadmus, by Nycteis, who was descended from a Spartan family. Labdacus lost his father at an early age, and was placed under the guardianship of Nycteus, and afterwards under that of Lycus, a brother of Nycteus. When Labdacus had grown up to manhood, Lycus surrendered the government to him; and on the death of Labdacus, which occurred soon after, Lycus again undertook the guardianship of his son Laius, the father of Oedipus. (Paus. ix. 5. § 2; Eurip. Hera. Fur. 27; Apollod. iii. 5. § 5; comp. NYCTEUS.) [L. S.]

LA'BEO, Q. ANTI'STIUS, a Roman jurist, one of those disciples of Servius Sulpicius, who are stated by Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. a. 2. § 44) to have written books which were digested by Ausidius Namusa. He was the father of the more eminent jurist of the same name, who lived under Augustus. In his attachment to the ancient republican liberty, he joined the conspiracy of Brutus and was one of the murderers of Julius Caesar. Constant to the party he had espoused, he was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and, after the defeat, was unwilling to survive Brutus, who, he was told, had pronounced his name with a sigh before his death. Having dug in his tent a hole of the length of his body, he settled his worldly affairs, and sent messages to his wife and children. Then, taking the hand of his most faithful slave, he turned him round (as was usual in the ceremony of manumission), and, giving him his sword, presented his throat to be stabbed, and was buried in his tent in the hole which he had dug. (Schol. ad Horat. Sat. i. 3. 83; Plut. Brut. 12; Appian, B. C. iv. 135.) [J. T. G.]

LA'BEO, M. (?) ANTI'STIUS, the son of the subject of the preceding article, adopted the republican opinions of his father, and finally eclipsed him in reputation as a jurist. His prænomen is uncertain. The Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 3. 83) calls him Marcus, and Gellius (xx. 1) calls him Quintus. In his youth he was prompted by his active intellect to cultivate philosophy, and to apply himself to various branches of learning. He became a proficient in logic, philosophy, and archaeology, and turned these acquirements to profit in the cultivation of law. In tracing the origin and signification of Latin words he was peculiarly skilful, and by this kind of knowledge he was able to unravel many legal knots. He received the elements of his legal education from Trebatius, but he also listened to the instruction of Tubero and Ofilius. Pomponius states that he was a legal innovator (plurima innovare instituit, Dig. i. tit. 2. a. 2. § 47), whereas, the letter of Capito, cited by Gellius, makes him out to be a strict adherent to ancient usages (ritum tamen nil haberet, nisi quod justum sanctumque esse in Romanis antiquitatibus legisset, Gell. xii. 12). Under the article CARRO [Vol. I. p. 600], we have mentioned the manner in which it has been attempted to reconcile these testimonies. Though in private law Labeo was an innovator, he held fast to the ancient forms of the constitution. The anecdote of his refusing to obey the summons of a tribune, while he admitted the right of a tribune to arrest (Gell. l. c.), is an instance of his pertinacity in matters of public right. On the other hand, his resort in his own case to codicilli (a word used in very different senses in Roman and in English law) instead of a formal testament, proves that he was not averse to every kind of legal novelty. (Inst. tit. 25, pr.) It is also a proof of the great authority he possessed, that codicilli were universally recognised as admissible, after the precedent which Labeo had afforded in his own case. If Labeo, our jurist, be referred to in Dig. 34. tit. 2. a. 32. § 6, we are in possession of a clause of his will, containing a bequest to his wife Neratia.

The rugged republicanism of Labeo (libertas quaedam nimia atque recora) was not pleasing to Augustus, and it has been supposed by many that the Labeone insanior of Horace (Sat. i. 3. 80) was a stroke levelled against the jurist, in order to please the emperor; though Wieland has suggested that, at the time when Horace wrote his first book of Satires, Labeo the jurist was probably too young and undistinguished to provoke such sarcasm.

In the year B. C. 18 Labeo was one of those who were appointed by Augustus to nominate senators, and, in the exercise of his power, he nominated M. Lepidus, who was disliked by the emperor. (On being threatened with punishment by Augustus, for selecting an unfit person, he answered, "Each of us has a right to exercise his own discretion, and what harm have I done in admitting into the senate one whom you allow to be pontiff?" The answer was clever, and not unacceptable to the emperor, who wished to be pontiff himself, but could not make up his mind to go to the length of depriving Lepidus of that dignity. A proposal was made in the senate, that the senators should guard Augustus by turns, by passing the night in his ante-chamber. Labeo, not liking the plan, but not wishing openly to oppose it, excused himself by saying, "I am a senator, and not fit to sleep near the emperor." (Dion Cass. liv. 15; Suet. Aug. 54.)

We have already [CAPITO] fully adverted to the contrast between Labeo and Capito, and have given an account of the different legal sects which they founded. Tacitus (Ann. iii. 75) calls these two great rival jurists of the age of Augustus duo decora pacis. The statement of Pomponius (l. c.), that Labeo refused the consulship, seems to be inconsistent with the statement of Tacitus (l. c.), that Labeo became popular from the wrong he suffered in not rising above the praetorship. The following is the most plausible explanation of the apparent inconsistency:—Labeo was of an older and far more distinguished family than Capito, whose ancestors first came into notice in the time of Sulla, whereas the Antistii are heard of in the earliest period of Roman history, and by reference to Eckhel it will be found that there are still many subsisting medals of the gens Antestia or Antistia, but none of the gens Attea. In age, too, it is probable that Labeo was senior to Capito. The wrong spoken of by Tacitus may, therefore, have consisted in allowing Labeo to remain praetor at a time when regularly he might have expected the consulship, and in promoting Capito, out of the ordinary course, over his head. This wrong would not have been purged by a subsequent offer on the part of the emperor to make Labeo consul suffectus.

Perhaps the desire of leisure to pursue his studies may have been the real cause, or may have contributed, along with the feeling of having suffered a slight, as a cause of Labeo's refusal to accept political power, offered in such a way, and at such a time, that it possessed little value. He devoted himself to reading and literature, and the study of his profession. Half of every year he spent at Rome in giving instruction to his pupils, and answering in public the questions of those who consulted him on legal points; and six months he passed in the country in writing books. Of these he left no fewer than four hundred behind him, a number at which we need not be surprised, when we consider how small in general were the ancient libri and volumina. His works were more in request in subsequent ages than those of most of the refereb. By Gaius he is cited several times, and his name appears more than once in the Institutes. The extracts from Labeo in the Digest occupy about twelve pages in Hommel's Palingenesia Pandectarum. They are sixty-one in number, but the name of Labeo occurs in other passages of the Digest no fewer than five hundred and forty-one times. He wrote commentaries on the laws of the twelve tables (Gell. i. 12; ib. vii. 15, where the second book is cited; ib. xx. 1) and upon the Praetor's Edict, in at least four books (Gell. xiii. 10; Dig. 11. tit. 4. s. 1. § 5). Ulpian cites Labeo libro primo praelectoris urbis (Dig. 50. tit. 16. s. 19), and refers to his thirtieth book praelectoris perynni (Dig. 4. tit. 3. s. 9. § 4). The books so cited by Ulpian may form

Of his works, the Florentine Index mentions only Πειθαρχὴ Βέλλα δέκα, and Posteriorum Βέλλα δέκα, and these are the works from which the greater number of passages from Labeo that occur in the Digest are taken. The Peitharchon or Probabilium are cited sometimes simply (as in Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 53), and sometimes with the addition of Paulo Epitomatorum (as in Dig. 28. tit. 1. s. 2). It is doubtful whether any of the remains of Labeo given in the Digest, even those which appear to be cited from his original writings, were not taken by the compilers from his works as they appeared in the remodelled editions of subsequent commentators. (Von Regius, Ἐναρτογραφίαν, i. 25, in Otto, Thea. vol. ii. p. 1493; Blume, in Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. iv. p. 317, &c.) The Peitharchon of Labeo treated of general rules of law which, though probabilities, were sometimes fallacious; and Paulus, in his notes, directed attention chiefly to the particular cases which formed exceptions to the rule. (Bynkershoek, Oss. iii. 16.) Of the Libri Posteriorum of Labeo, and the Epitome of that work made by Javolenus, we have already treated under the article JAVOLENUS. The Libri (qu. Liber) Epistolarum and Libri Responsorum of Labeo, are referred to under LABEO, DOMITIUS, while his Commentarii de Jure Pontificio and his other theological works, are mentioned under LABEO, CORNELIUS. In ancient times, not only were commentaries written upon him by Paulus and Javolenus, but we read of the Notae upon Labeo of Proculus (Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 10. § 1; Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 69; Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 65. § 5), and of a certain Quintus (Dig. 4. tit. 3. s. 7. § 7); and we find from Dig. 28. tit. 5. s. 17. § 5, that his Posteriorum Libri were annotated by Aristo and by Aulus (probably Aulus Cassellius). In modern times, according to Maiansius (Ad XXX. Ictorum Frag. Comment. vol. i. praef.), Sebastian Ortega commented specially on his remains; but such a work (like the works of many other Spanish jurists) is unknown to the legal bibliographers. (Bach. Hist. Jur. Rom. iii. 1. § 10; Zimmern. R. H. G. vol. i. § 82, 83; Chr. Thomasius, Comparatio Antistii Labeonis et Ateii Capitonis, 4to. Lips. 1683; Chr. Thomasius, Comparatio Labeonis et Trebatii, 4to. Lips. 1684; Corn. van Eck, De Vita, Moribus et Studiis M. Antistii Labeonis et C. Ateii Capitonis 8vo. LABEO, ATEIUS, a contemporary of Pliny, who mentions his fancy for small pictures (H. N. xxxv. 4). Bertrandus (de Jurisp. i. 7. § 4) would read Antistius for Ateius, and, unmindful of chronology, would confound the picture-fancier with the celebrated jurist of the time of Augustus. But we ought probably to read Titidius instead of Ateius. See below, p. 695, a. [J. T. G.]

LA'BEO, C. ATI'NIUS. 1. Tribune of the plebs in B. C. 197, and praetor peregrinus in 195. (Liv. xxxiii. 22, 25, 42, 43.)

2. Praetor in B. C. 190. He received Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2.) [C. P. M.]

LA'BEO, A'TTIUS, a Roman poet, the author of a translation of the poems of Homer, which is no longer extant. (Wernsdorf, Poetae Lat. min. vol. iv. p. 577.) [C. P. M.]

LA'BEO, CLAU'DIUS, a Batavian, was prefect of the Batavian ala, which went over from Luperus to Civilis. [CIVILIS.] Civilis, whose rival he was in their native town, not being willing to incur the odium of putting him to death, and yet fearing that, if allowed to remain with his army, he might excite disaffection, sent him as a prisoner among the Frisii. He afterwards escaped, and offered his services to Vocola, who gave him a small force, with which he carried on an irregular warfare against the insurgents. He was defeated by Civilis, who, however, tried in vain to crush him. [CIVILIS.] (Tac. Hist. iv. 18, 56, 66, 70.) [P. S.]

LA'BEO, CORNE'LIIUS, a writer cited by Macrobius. He wrote books of Fastis (Saturn. i. 16), and of Oraculo Apollinis Clarii (i. 18). From the former work are probably extracted the passages cited in Saturn. i. 12. He evidently went deep into mythological speculations. That he wrote a treatise entitled De Dis Penatibus cannot fairly be inferred from Saturn. iii. 4, though it is clear that he treated of the Penates. In Saturn. iii. 10, Labeo, without the name Cornelius (Labeo, aezagenimo et octavo libro), is coupled with Ateius Capito, and it is evident from the context, that here the same Labeo is meant as in Saturn. iii. 4. Hence, there appears to be some ground for suspecting that Macrobius intends to designate the celebrated jurist Antistius Labeo, the contemporary of Capito, and has given to him by mistake the name Cornelius. This suspicion is confirmed, when we find that Cornelius Labeo is nowhere mentioned but in Macrobius, that Labeo, without any additional name, is cited by other writers as having written on exactly similar subjects; and when we know that Antistius Labeo the jurist wrote upon pontifical law, was given to mythological research, and was learned in antiquity (litteras antiquiores altioresque penetraverat, Gell. xiii. 10). Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iii. 168) cites a work of Labeo De Dis Animalibus, and Fulgentius (de Prisco Sermone, § 4. s. v. Manales) gives a fragment from the work of Labeo De Disciplinis Hetruscis Tagetis et Bacchetidis. There are several passages relating to ancient Roman mythology, cited from Labeo by St. Augustin (De Civ. Dei, ii. 11 (compare viii. 13), ii. 14, iii. 25, ix. 19, xxii. 28).

Now we know from the citations of Festus (s. v. Proculiunt, Spurcum, Prox, Sistere fana), that Antistius Labeo, the jurist, wrote a treatise, containing at least 15 books, de Jure Pontificio, and it is not unlikely that the 68th book, cited by Macrobius (Saturn. iii. 10), is one of the books of this treatise. Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2. § 47) tells us that Antistius Labeo left behind him 400 volumes. The work De Officio Augurum, mentioned by Festus (s. v. Remisso), probably formed a part of the treatise De Jure Pontificio. It cannot be doubted that the Labeo cited by Festus (s. v. l'opularia Sacra, Pulia Saza), by Pliny (H. N.

x. 15), and by Aulus Gellius (xv. 27), from the work of Laelius Felix ad Q. Mucium, is Antistius Labeo the jurist. Antistius Labeo probably treated of the Penates as Cornelius Labeo did, according to Macrobius, for we learn from Festus (s. v. Penatis) that Antistius Labeo thought that the word Penatis might be used in the singular number. Other fragments, similarly relating to antiquarian and pontifical researches (e. g. Festus, s. v. Septimontio, Prosimurium, Scriptum Lapidem, Scexapita, Sabiore Arietem; Plut. Quaest. Rom. c. 46), where Antistius alone or Antistius Labeo is expressly mentioned, confirm our opinion as to the mistake of Macrobius (who is not accurate in names), and as to the identity of the jurist with the writer whom he calls Cornelius Labeo. (Heinec. Hist. Jur. Rom. § 182; Bach. Hist. Jur. Rom. iii. 1. § 10; Bynkershoek, Praetermissa ad Pomponium, § 47; Dirksen, Bruchstücke aus den Schriften der Römischen Juristen, p. 74—83.) [J. T. G.]

LA'BEO, DOMITI'US. In Dig. 28. tit. 1. s. 27, is contained an epistle of Domitius Labeo to Juventius Celsus, with the rude answer of the latter [CELSUS, Vol. I. p. 662]. In Dig. 41. tit. 3. s. 30. § 1, Pomponius cites Labeo Libri Epistolarum, and Cujas supposes that for Labeo should be read Javolenus, as the Libri Epistolarum of Antistius Labeo the jurist are nowhere else mentioned; but there is nothing unusual in the work of a jurist being ἀπὸ ἀνέγνωτορ.

It is not unlikely, indeed, that the Libri Epistolarum cited by Pomponius is identical with the Libri Responsorum of Antistius Labeo, of which the 15th book is cited by Ulpian, in Coll. Leg. Rom. et Mos. xii. 7. We have Labeo restitui in Dig. 37. tit. 1. s. 3. § 1. and in Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 12. § 35, we find the expression Neratius, lib. ix. epistolarum respondit, showing that epistolae and responsa may be used synonymously. As the proposed alteration of Cujas is unnecessary, so there is no need for the conjecture of Bertrandus (De Jurisp. i. 10. § 9), that the Labeo mentioned in Dig. 41. tit. 3. s. 30. § 1. is Domitius Labeo. In Dig. 28. tit. 1. s. 27, Domitius Labeo is the questioner, and it is the jurist who is questioned from whom we should expect the publication of Epistolae. There is nothing even to prove that Domitius Labeo was a jurist, though he is classed as such by Cotta, Rivallius, Eberlinus and others. It is true that one jurist sometimes consulted another, as Atilicinus consulted Proculus (Dig. 23. tit. 4. s. 17), but epistolae were more frequently addressed to jurists by non-professional persons. B. Rutilius (Vitas Ictorum, c. 60) seems to think that in Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 39. § 40, the extract is taken from one Labeo, and contains a citation of another Labeo, and that Domitius Labeo cites the earlier jurist, Antistius Labeo; but in the extract referred to, it is Javolenus who cites Antistius Labeo. (Gail. Grot. de Vit. Ict. ii. 4. § 8; Ménage, Amoens. Jur. c. 20; Alphen, de Javoleno, c. 4. § 2.)

It has been supposed by some that the ignorance of law manifested by Domitius Labeo in his celebrated letter, is rather an argument that he was not a jurist, and Celsus has been thought unpolite, but not hasty, in charging him with folly. But F. Kämmerer (Beiträge zur Geschichte und Theorie des Römischen Rechts, pp. 208—226) has shown that this question may have a deeper meaning than is commonly supposed. We find from Ulpian (Dig. 28. tit. 1. s. 21. § 2), that in wills whom there ought to be testes rogati, one who was accidentally present alterius rei causa could not be a witness. Ulpian qualifies the rule, by saying that a person, though asked to come for another purpose, might be a witness, if specially informed before the attestation that he was wanted as such. The question of Domitius Labeo may mean to ask whether a person, invited to write the will, and not specially to witness it, was a good witness, if he signed without further intimation that his testimony was required. [J. T. G.]

LABEO, Q. FA'BIUS, was quaestor urbanus in a. c. 196. The augurs and priests had for some years resisted the payment of the tributum; but, after a stout contest, Labeo and his colleague L. Aurelius compelled them to yield the point, and pay up all arrears. (Liv. xxxiii. 42.) In a. c. 189 he was elected praetor, and was appointed by lot to the command of the fleet. Eager for some opportunity of distinguishing himself, he sailed from Ephesus to Crete, where it was reported that a large number of Roman citizens were in a state of slavery. None but the Gortynii heeded his demand that they should be surrendered; but from them he obtained a considerable number (4000 according to Valerius Antias), which afforded him a pretext for demanding a triumph. He then sent three ships to Macedonia, to demand the withdrawal of the garrisons of Antiochus from Aenus and Maronia. The treaty with Antiochus had just been concluded by Cn. Manlius, and in accordance with the terms of it Labeo was despatched to Patara, to destroy the ships of the king which were there. He afterwards got possession of Tennes, and then conducted the fleet back to Italy. The triumph which he demanded was accorded to him, notwithstanding the opposition of the tribunes. (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50, 60, xxxviii. 39, 47.) In a. c. 185 he became a candidate for the consulship; but App. Claudius succeeded in getting his brother Publius elected in his stead. This was the second repulse of the kind which he had received. (Liv. xxxix. 32.) In the following year he was appointed one of the triumvirs for planting colonies at Potentia and Pisaurum. (Id. 44.) In a. c. 183 he was elected consul with M. Claudius Marcellus. Liguria was assigned to the consuls as their province. (Id. 45.) He was created pontifex in a. c. 180. (xl. 42.) Cicero (De Off. i. 10) has a story of a trick by which either Labeo, or somebody else, having been appointed arbitrator between the towns of Nola and Neapolis, respecting some disputed land, obtained a tract of territory for the Romans. [C. P. M.]

LABEO, POMPO'NIUS, governor of the province of Moesia for eight years, in the reign of Tiberius. The emperor, in a letter to the senate, denounced him as guilty of maladministration and other offences. Labeo by a voluntary death anticipated the threatened execution. (A. D. 34.) His wife Paxaea imitated his example. (Tac. Ann. iv. 47. vi. 29; Dion Cass. lvi. 24.) [C. P. M.]

LABEO, TITID'NIUS, a Roman painter, celebrated for small panel pictures. He was of praetorian rank, and was at one time proconsul of Gallia Narbonensis, in which office he made himself contemptible. He died at a great age, shortly before the time when Pliny the Elder wrote. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7.) The common reading is Alcius Labeo. Jan (Schulz. it. 1833, p. 723) suggested Tutidius, which is adopted by Sillig, in his edition of Pliny. The MSS. are corrupt. [P. S.]

LABERIUS DE'CIMUS, a Roman eque, and a distinguished writer of mimes. He was born about a. c. 107, and died in January 43 (Hieron. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 184. 2), at Puteoli, in Campania. At Caesar's triumphal games in October, a. c. 45, P. Syrus, a professional mimus, seems to have challenged all his craft to a trial of wit in extemporaneous farce; and Caesar, to whom Laberius may have been known through his friend Cn. Matius, himself a mimambiic poet, offered him 500,000 sesterces to appear on the stage. Laberius was sixty years old, and the profession of a mimus was infamous, but the wish of the dictator was equivalent to a command, and he reluctantly complied. Whether, by this somewhat wanton exercise of power, the usually indulgent Caesar meant to disgrace Laberius personally, or the equestrian order generally, or merely to procure for the spectators of the games an unusual spectacle, is uncertain. Laberius, however, had revenge in his power, and took it. His prologue awakened compassion, and perhaps indignation: and during the performance he adroitly availed himself of his various characters to point his wit at his oppressor. In the person of a beaten Syrian slave he cried out,—

Marry! Quirites, but we lose our freedom, and all eyes were turned upon the dictator; and in another mime he uttered the pregnant maxim Needs must he fear, who makes all else adread.

Caesar, impartially or vindictively, awarded the prize to Syrus, saying to Laberius

Though I favoured you, Laberius, Syrus bears the palm away.

He returned to him, however, his equestrian ring, and permitted him to resume his seat among the equites. As Laberius was passing by the senatorian benches to the equestrian, Cicero called to him, "Were we not so crowded here, Laberius, I would make room for you,"—a double allusion to the degradation of the histrionic eque and to the number of low-born and foreign senators created by Caesar. But Laberius parried the hit by replying, "I marvel, Cicero, you should be crowded, who usually sit on two stools,"—Cicero being at the time unjustly suspected of wavering in his politics. As Laberius was leaving the stage at the conclusion of a mime Syrus said to him, Whom upon the stage you strove with, from the benches now applaud.

In the next mime, Laberius, alluding at once to Syrus' victory, and to Caesar's station, responded in graver tone,—

None the first place for ever can retain —
But, ever as the topmost round you gain, Painful your station there and swift your fall.
I fell — the next who wins with equal pain
The slippery height, falls too — pride lifts, and lowers all.

(Macrob. Sat. ii. 3, 7, vii. 3; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 11, xii. 18; Hor. Sat. i. 10, 6; Suet. Caes. 39; Sen. de Ira. ii. 11, Controver. iii. 18; comp. Ziegler, de Mim. Roman. Götting. 1788; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. i. 16, § 3.)

If the prologue of Laberius, the longest fragment of his works (Macrob. Sat. ii. 7), may be taken as a specimen of his style, he would rank above Terence, and second only to Plautus, in dramatic vigour, and Horace's depreciation of him (Sat. i. 10, 6) might stand beside Pope's sneer at Chaucer, and "such writing as is never read." But there is reason to infer that the diction of Laberius abounded in unauthorised words (Gell. xvi. 7) and in antitheses and verbal jokes (Sen. Contr. 18), allowable in a farce-writer, but beneath the dignity of comedy. He was, however, evidently an original thinker, and made great impression on his contemporaries. (Niebuhr, Lectures on Rom. Hist. vol. ii. p. 169.) The fragments of Laberius are collected by Bothe, Poet. Scen. Latin. vol. v. pp. 202—218. A revised text of the prologue has been published, with a new fragment by Schneide- win, in the Rheinisches Museum for 1843, p. 632, &c. A writer of verse, named Laberius, is mentioned by Martial (Ep. vi. 14.) [W. B. D.]

Q. LABERIUS DURUS, a tribune of the soldiers in Caesar's army, fell in battle in the second invasion of Britain, B. C. 54. He is by mistake called Labienus by Orosius. (Caes. B. G. v. 15; Oros. vi. 9.)

LABERIUS MAXIMUS was procurator of Judaea in A. D. 73, 74, the third and fourth years of Vespasian's reign. After the destruction of Jerusalem the emperor sent Laberius orders to offer for sale all the lands in Judaea. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 6, § 6.) A Laberius Maximus, whether the same is uncertain, was banished by Trajan on suspicion of aspiring to the purple (Spartian. Hadrian. 5); and a person of the same name is mentioned by Martial (Ep. vi. 14) and by Pliny (Ep. x. 16). [W. B. D.]

LABIENUS, the name of a Roman family, which does not occur in history till the last century of the republic. Most modern writers say that Labienus was a cognomen of the Atia gens, but there is no authority for this in any ancient author. The name was first assigned to this gens by P. Manutius, but apparently on conjecture; and although Spanheim (De Proest. et Usu Numism. vol. ii. pp. 11, 12) pointed out that there was no authority for this, the error has been continued down to the present day, as, for instance, in Orelli's Onomasticon Tullianum.

1. Q. LABIENUS, the uncle of T. Labienus [No. 2], joined Saturninus when he seized the capitol in B. C. 100, and perished along with the other conspirators on that occasion. It was under the pretence of avenging his death that his nephew accused Rabirius of the crime of perduellio. (Cic. pro Rabir. 5, 7.)

2. T. LABIENUS was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 63, the year of Cicero's consulship; and, under pretence of avenging his uncle's death, as is mentioned above, he accused Rabirius of perduellio. The real reason, however, of his undertaking this accusation was to please Julius Caesar, whose motives for bringing the aged Rabirius to trial have been mentioned elsewhere. [CAESAR. p. 541.] Rabirius was defended by Cicero, who was then exerting himself to please the senatorial party, and who consequently speaks of the tribune with great contempt, and heaps upon him no measured terms of abuse. Being entirely devoted to Caesar's interests, Labienus introduced and carried a plebiscitum, repealing the enactment of Sulla, which gave the college of pontiffs the power of electing its members by co-optation, and restoring to the people the right of electing them. It was in consequence of this new law that Caesar obtained the dignity of pontifex maximus this year. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 26, 27, 37; Suet. Caes. 12, 13; Cic. pro Rabir. passim.) It was likewise no doubt at Caesar's suggestion, who was anxious to gratify Pompey, that Labienus and his colleague T. Ampius Balbus proposed those honours to Pompey, which have been detailed elsewhere. [Vol. I. p. 455, a.] (Comp. Vell. Pat. ii. 40.)

All these services did not go unrewarded. When Caesar, after his consulship, went into his province of Transalpine Gaul in A. C. 58, he took Labienus with him as his legatus, and treated him with distinguished favour. We find that Labienus had the title of pro praetore (Caes. B. G. i. 21), which title had doubtless been conferred upon him by Caesar's influence, that he might in the absence of the proconsul take his place, and discharge his duties. Labienus continued with Caesar during a great part of his campaigns in Gaul, and showed himself an able and active officer. He was with Caesar throughout the whole of his first campaign (B. C. 58). According to Appian (Celt. 3, 15) and Plutarch (Caes. 18), it was Labienus who cut to pieces the Tigurini; but Caesar ascribes the merit of this to himself (B. G. i. 12); and as he never manifests a disposition to appropriate to himself the exploits of his officers, his authority ought to be preferred to that of the former writers. He speaks, moreover, of the services of Labienus in this campaign; and after the conquest of the Helvetii and the Germans we find him leaving Labienus in command of the troops in their winter-quarters, while he himself went into Cisalpine Gaul to discharge his civil duties in this province. (Caes. B. G. i. 10, 22, 54.)

As we have no further mention of Labienus in Gaul for the next three years, it is probable that he quitted the army when Caesar returned to it, after the winter of A. C. 58. His absence was supplied by P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir; but when the latter left Gaul, in B. C. 54, in order to join his father in the fatal expedition against the Parthians, Caesar may perhaps have sent for Labienus, or the prospect of honour and rewards may have again attracted him to the camp of his patron. However this may be, we find Labienus again in Gaul in A. C. 54, in the winter of which year he was stationed with a legion among the Remi, on the confines of the Treviri. Here he defeated the latter people, who had come under the command of Induciomarus, to attack his camp, and their leader fell in the battle. Still later in the winter Labienus gained another great battle over the Treviri, and reduced the people to submission. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, 53—58, vi. 7, 8; Dion Cass. xi. 11, 31.)

In the great campaign against Vercingetorix in B. C. 52, which was the most arduous but at the same time the most brilliant of all Caesar's campaigns in Gaul, Labienus played a distinguished part. He was sent by Caesar with four legions against the Senones and Parisii, and took up his head-quarters at Agendicum. From this place he marched against Lutetia, which was burnt at his approach; and in his subsequent retreat to Agendicum, which was rendered necessary by the revolt of the Aedui and the rising of the Bellovaci, his conduct is greatly praised by Caesar. He subsequently reached Agendicum in safety, after gaining a complete victory over Camulogenus, who commanded the enemy. During the winter of this year he was left in command of the troops, while Caesar repaired, according to his usual custom, to Cisalpine Gaul; and finding that Commius, the Atrebatian, was endeavouring to excite a new revolt in Gaul, he made an ineffectual attempt to remove him by assassination. During the two following years, which preceded the breaking out of the civil war, Labienus continued to hold the chief command in the army, next to Caesar himself. In B. C. 51 Caesar sent him into Gallia Togata, or Cisalpine Gaul, to defend the Roman colonies, lest the barbarians should make any sudden attack upon them; and on his return into Transalpine Gaul, he was again despatched against the Treviri, whom he had conquered three years before, and whom he again subdued without any difficulty. So much confidence did Caesar place in Labienus, that when he returned into Transalpine Gaul in B. C. 50, he left Labienus in command of Cisalpine Gaul, that the latter might in his absence still further win over the Roman citizens in his province to support Caesar in his attempts to gain the consulship for the year following. (Caes. B. G. vii. 57—62, viii. 23, 24, 25, 45, 52; Dion Cass. xl. 38, 43.)

But Caesar's confidence was misplaced. The great success which Labienus had gained under Caesar, and which was rather due to Caesar's genius than to his own abilities, had greatly elated his little mind, and made him fancy himself the equal of his great general, whom he was no longer disposed to obey as heretofore. (Comp. Dion Cass. xli. 4.) Such conduct naturally caused Caesar to treat him with coolness; and the Pompeian party eagerly availed themselves of this opportunity to gain him over to their side. They entered into negotiations with him in this year, while he was in Cisalpine Gaul, and their efforts were successful, notwithstanding the large fortune which had been bestowed upon him by Caesar (comp. Cic. ad Att. vii. 7), and the other numerous marks of favour which he had received at his hands. Accordingly, on the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, Labienus took an early opportunity to desert his old friend and captain. The news of his defection was received at Rome with transport; and Cicero speaks of it again and again in terms of the greatest exultation. "I look upon Labienus as a hero," he writes to Atticus; "that great man Labienus," he calls him in another letter, and speaks of "the tremendous blow" (maxima plaga) which Caesar had received from the desertion of his chief officer. But this "hero" was destined to disappoint grievously his new friends. He brought no accession of strength to their cause; he had not sufficient influence with Caesar's veterans to induce them to forsake the general whom they idolised; even the town of Cingulum, on which he had spent so much money, was one of the first to open its gates to Caesar (Caes. B. C. i. 15); and in war his talents seem to have been rather those of an officer than of a commander; he was more fitted to execute the orders of another than to devise a plan of action for himself. In a few weeks' time we find Cicero speaking of him in very altered language, and expressing a desire for the arrival of Afranius and Petreius, as little was to be expected from Labienus. (In Labieno parum est dignitas, Cic. ad Att. viii. 2. § 3; comp. Cic. ad Att. vii.

11, 12, 13, a, b. 15, 16, ad Fam. xiv. 14, xvi. 12.)

In the following year (B. C. 48) Labienus took an active part as one of Pompey's legates in the campaign in Greece. Here he distinguished himself, like many others of Pompey's officers, by his cruelty and overweening confidence; though we ought perhaps to make some deduction from the unfavourable terms in which he is spoken of by Caesar. Appian, however, relates (B. C. ii. 62), that it was through the advice of Labienus that Pompey did not follow up the success which he had gained at Dyrrhachium, by forcing Caesar's camp, which he might easily have done, and thus have brought the war to a close. And the act of cruelty committed by Labienus after this battle was of so public a nature, that Caesar would not have ventured to record it unless it had been actually committed. He is related to have obtained from Pompey all Caesar's soldiers who had been taken prisoners in the battle, to have paraded them before the Pompeian army, and, after taunting them as his "fellow-soldiers," and upbraiding them by asking "whether veteran soldiers were accustomed to fly," to have put them to death in the presence of the assembled troops. In the council of war held before the fatal battle of Pharsalia, he expressed the utmost contempt for Caesar's army, and thus contributed his share to increase that false confidence, which was one of the main causes of the disastrous issue of the battle. (Caes. B. C. iii. 13, 19, 71, 87.)

After the defeat at Pharsalia Labienus fled to Dyrrhachium, where he found Cicero, and informed him of the news (Cic. de Div. i. 32), but at the same time, to give some courage to his party, pretended that Caesar had received a severe wound in the engagement. (Frontin. Strat. ii. 7. § 13.) From Dyrrhachium Labienus repaired with Afranius to Coreyra, in order to join Cato; and from thence he proceeded to Cyrene (Plut. Cat. Min. 56), which refused to receive him, and finally he joined the scattered remnants of the Pompeian party in Africa. Here Scipio and Cato, two of the most celebrated leaders of the Pompeians, collected a considerable army. Labienus had at first the command of an army near Ruspina, where he fought against Caesar, in B. C. 46, at first with some success, but was at length repulsed. Soon after this battle Labienus united his forces with those of Scipio, under whom he served as legate during the rest of the campaign. (Dion Cass. xli. 10, xliii. 2; Appian, B. C. ii. 95; Hirt. B. Afr. 15—19, &c.)

When the battle of Thapsus placed the whole of Africa in Caesar's power, Labienus fled into Spain with the surviving relics of his party, in order to continue the war there in conjunction with Cn. Pompey. At the battle of Munda, which was fought in the following year, B. C. 45, Labienus was destined once more to oppose his old commander, and by a strange fatality to give the death-blow to the very party that had welcomed him with so much joy. The battle was undecided, and would probably have remained so, had not Labienus quitted his ranks, to prevent Bogud, king of Mauritania, from capturing the Pompeian camp. The Pompeian troops, thinking that Labienus had taken to flight, lost their courage, wavered, and fled. Labienus himself fell in the battle, and his head was brought to Caesar. The general character of Labienus has been sufficiently shown by the above sketch: he seems to have been a vain, haughty, headstrong man; nothing is recorded of him which exhibits him in a favourable light; and with the exception of his military abilities, which were not, however, of the highest order, he possessed nothing to distinguish him from the general mass of the Roman nobles of his time. (Dion Cass. xliii. 30, 38; Flor. iv. 2; Appian, B. C. ii. 105; Auctor, B. Hisp. 18, 31.)

3. Q. LABIENUS, the son of the preceding, joined the party of Brutus and Cassius after the murder of Caesar (B. C. 44), and was sent by them into Parthia to seek aid from Orodes, the Parthian king. [ARSACES XIV.] Here he remained for a considerable time, and before he could obtain any definite answer from Orodes, the news came of the battle of Philippi (B. C. 42). Seeing that the triumvirs were resolved to spare none of their opponents, Labienus made up his mind to continue in Parthia; but circumstances soon occurred which enabled him to take revenge upon the victorious party. The attention of Octavian was fully engaged by the affairs of Italy and the war against Sex. Pompey; and Antony, to whom the government of the East had devolved, had retired to Egypt, captivated by the charms of Cleopatra, and careless about every thing else. Labienus persuaded Orodes to embrace this favourable opportunity for the invasion of the Roman provinces in Asia; and accordingly the Parthian king entrusted to him and Pacorus a large army for the purpose. They crossed the Euphrates, and invaded Syria, in B. C. 40. At first they were repulsed from the walls of Apameia; but as almost all the fortified places were garrisoned by the old soldiers of Brutus and Cassius, who had joined the army of the triumvirs after the victory of the latter, Labienus and Pacorus met with little resistance. Most of these troops joined their banners; but their commander, Decidius Saxa, continued firm in his allegiance to Antony. He was, however, easily overcome in battle; and as the fruit of this victory, Labienus and the Parthians obtained possession of the two great towns of Antioch and Apameia. While Pacorus remained with the Parthians in Syria, to complete the subjugation of the country, advancing for that object as far south as Palestine, Labienus, with the Roman troops he had collected, entered Asia Minor in pursuit of Saxa, whom he overtook and slew in Cilicia, and then proceeded along the south of Asia Minor, receiving the submission of almost all the cities in his way. The only resistance he experienced was from Alabanda, Mylasa, and Stratoniceia; the two former of which he took by force [compare HYBREAS], while the latter successfully resisted all his efforts. Hereupon he assumed the name of Parthian emperor, a title which we also find upon his coins, as is mentioned below. In adopting this title, Dion Cassius remarks (xlviii. 26), Labienus departed from the custom of all Roman commanders, who were wont to take such titles from the names of the people whom they conquered, of which we have examples in Scipio Africanus, Servilius Isauricus, Fabius Allobrogicus, and the like, while Labienus, on the contrary, assumed his from the victorious nation. It was in reference to this that Hybreas, when he was defending Mylasa, sent Labienus the taunting message that he would call himself the Carian emperor.

These successes at length roused Antony from his inactivity. He sent an army into Asia Minor in B. C. 39, commanded by P. Ventidius, the most able of his legates, who suddenly came upon Labienus before the latter had received any intelligence of his approach. Not having any of his Parthian allies with him, he dared not meet Ventidius in the field, and, accordingly, fled with the utmost haste towards Syria, to effect a junction with Pacorus. This, however, was prevented by the rapid pursuit of Ventidius, who came up with him by Mount Taurus, and stopped him from advancing further. Here both parties remained for some days, Ventidius waiting for his heavy-armed troops, and Labienus the arrival of the Parthians. The latter marched to his assistance, but were defeated by Ventidius before they joined Labienus, whom they then deserted, and fled into Cilicia. In these circumstances Labienus, not daring to engage with Ventidius, abandoned his men, and fled in disguise into Cilicia. Here he remained concealed for some time, but was at length apprehended by Demetrius, a freedman of Octavian, and put to death. It would appear, from a statement of Strabo (xiv. p. 600), that this Labienus possessed the same arrogance and vehemence of temper which distinguished his father. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 24–26, 39, 40; Liv. Epid. cxxvii.; Flor. iv. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 78; Plut. Ant. 30, 33; Appian, B. C. v. 65, 133; Justin, xlii. 4.) The coin annexed has on the obverse the head of Labienus, with the legend Q. LABIENVS PARTHICVS IMP., and on the reverse a horse, which refers clearly to the celebrated cavalry of the Parthians. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 146.)

COIN OF Q. LABIENUS.

4. LABIENUS was one of those included in the proscription of the triumvirs in B. C. 43, but we know not whether he was in any way connected with the other persons of this name. It is related of him that he had taken an active part in apprehending and killing those who had been proscribed by Sulla; and deeming it disgraceful not to meet a similar fate with courage, he seated himself in front of his house, and quietly waited for the assassins. (Appian, B. C. iv. 26.) Whether this Labienus is the same as the one whose place of concealment his freedmen could be induced by no tortures to reveal (Macrob. Satur. i. 11), is doubtful: the account of Appian would imply that they were two different persons, as the former did not seek to conceal himself.

5. T. LABIENUS, a celebrated orator and historian in the reign of Augustus, appears to have been either the son or grandson of the Labienus who deserted Julius Caesar. [No. 3.] He retained all the republican feelings of his family, and, unlike most of his contemporaries, never became reconciled to the imperial government, but took every opportunity to attack Augustus and his friends. In consequence of his bitterness he received the nickname of Rabienus from the imperial party. He was an intimate friend of Cassius Severus, and as enemy of Asinius Pollio, whom he branded in one of his orations as the assur or parasite of Augustus. He is represented by the elder Seneca as very poor, of an infamous character, and universally hated; but his oratorical talents must have been very great, as Seneca justly remarks, to have obtained under these circumstances the remarkable reputation which he enjoyed as an orator. In his speeches he adopted a style of oratory which partook of the leading characteristics both of the ancient and modern schools, so that each party could claim him. The history which Labienus wrote was apparently one of his own times; since the elder Seneca relates, that when he heard him on one occasion reading his history, he passed over a great part, remarking that it could only be read after his death; but if the work had related merely to past times, he probably would not have feared to have read it. Labienus seems never to have been engaged in any plots against Augustus; but his enemies at length revenged themselves upon him, by obtaining a decree of the senate that all his writings should be burnt. This indignity affected Labienus so much, that, resolving not to survive the productions of his genius, he shut himself up in the tombs of his ancestors, and thus perished. His death probably took place in A. D. 12, as Dion Cassius relates (lvi. 27) that several libellous works were burnt in that year. Caligula allowed the writings of Labienus, as well as those of Cremutius Cordus and Cassius Severus, which had shared the same fate, to be again collected and read. (Senec. Controv. v. pp. 328—330, ed. Bipont.; Suet. Cal. 15.)

We find mention of only three orations of Labienus:—1. An oration for Figulus against the heirs of Urbinius: the cause of the latter was pleaded by C. Asinius Pollio. (Quintil. iv. 1. § 11; Tac. de Orat. 38.) 2. An oration against Pollio, which may, however, be the same as the preceding, and which was ascribed by some to Cornelius Gallus. (Quintil. i. 5. § 8.) 3. An oration against Bathyllus, the freedman of Maecenas, who was defended by Gallio. (Senec. Controv. v. p. 330.)

(De Chambort, Dissert. sur T. Labienus, in the Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions vol. x. pp. 98—110; Meyer, Orator. Rom. Fragmenta, pp. 528—531, 2nd ed.; Westermann, Gesch. der Römischen Beredsamkeit, § 73, n. 3; Weichert, de Cassio Parmensis, pp. 319—324; comp. Bentley, ad Hor. Serm. i. 3. 82, who proposes to read Labiens instead of Labeone in that passage.)

LABOTAS (Λαβότας, Paus.), fourth king of Sparta in the line of Agia, has nothing recorded of his reign except that he saw the commencement of the Spartan quarrel with Argos. (Paus. iii. 2. § 3.) Herodotus says that Lycurgus was his uncle and guardian. The other account, which names the Procid Charilaus as the name of the young king, is so generally stated by ancient writers [CHARILAEA], that, although Pausanias read the passage in Herodotus as it now stands, Wesseling and Clinton approve the correction, ἐπιτροπεύοντα δδελφίδου μὴ δωκυῖ, βασιλεύοντος δὲ Σπάρτηντων Λαβόταου. (Herod. i. 65.) A similar difficulty attaches to the name, which Pausanias says Herodotus spelt Λαβύτης; whereas our MSS., it seems, have only Λαβότας and Λαβόταου. [A. H. C.]

had at Labranda. (Herod. v. 119; Strab. xiv. p. 659; Plut. Quæst. Gr. 46.) [L. S.]

LABYNETUS (Λαβύνητος), a name common to several of the Babylonian monarchs. It seems to have been a title rather than a proper name. A Labynetus is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 74) as mediating, in conjunction with a prince of Cilicia, a peace between Cyaxares and Alyattes. From the chronology, it is clear that this Labynetus must have been identical with Nebuchadnezzar.

Another Labynetus is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 77) as a contemporary of Cyrus and Croesus, with the latter of whom he was in alliance. This Labynetus is the same with the Belshazzar of the prophet Daniel. By other writers he is called Nabonadius or Nabonidus. He was the last king of Babylon. [CYRUS.] The mode in which the city was captured by Cyrus is described by Herodotus, i. 188. [C. P. M.]

LACEDAEMON (Λακεδαίμων), a son of Zeus by Taygete, was married to Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he became the father of Amyclae, Eurydice, and Asine. He was king of the country which he called after his own name, Lacedaemon, while he gave to his capital the name of his wife, Sparta. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. iii. 1. § 2, &c.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Λακων.) He was believed to have built the sanctuary of the Charites, which stood between Sparta and Amyclae, and to have given to those divinities the names of Clea and Phaenna. (Paus. iii. 18. § 4.) An heroum was erected to him in the neighbourhood of Therapne. (Paus. iii. 20. § 2.) [L. S.]

LACEDAEMONIUS (Λακεδαίμωνιος), son of Cimon, so named by his father in honour of the Lacedaemonians, had for his mother, according to Steimbrotus, an Arcadian; according to Diodorus Periegetes, Isodice, daughter of Euryptolemus, son of Megacles. He was joint commander of the ten ships which the Athenians, after making alliance with the Corcyreans, despatched to assist them, B.C. 432. Plutarch has what seems a foolish story, that this appointment to a quite inadequate squadron was a piece of political spite on the part of Pericles; and that the reinforcement which quickly followed was only sent in consequence of general complaints. (Plut. Cim. 16, Per. 29; Thuc. i. 45.) [A. H. C.]

LACEDAS (Λακῆδας), or, as Herodotus (vi. 127) calls him, Leodeas, a king of Argos, and father of Melas, is reckoned to have been a descendant of Medon in the fifth generation. (Paus. ii. 19. § 2.) Another person of the same name is Lacedas, the son of Pheidon. Some writers not only identify the two, but try to prove that the Lacydas mentioned by Plutarch (De Cap. ex insimul. 89.) is likewise the same person. (Comp. Wyttenbach, ad Plat. L. c.; Schubart and Wals ad Paus. L. c.) [L. S.]

LACER, C. JU'LIUS, an architect in the time of Trajan. His name is preserved in an inscription on a bridge which he built over the Tagus at Alcantara. (Gruter, p. 162.) [P. S.]

C. LACERIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 401, was elected by the other tribunes (by cooptatio) through the influence of the patricians, who were anxious to set aside the Lex Trebonia. (Liv. v. 10.)

by Demetrius Poliorcetes. He was afterwards secretly gained over by Cassander, who incited him to aim at the acquisition of the tyranny, hoping to be able through his means to rule Athens. (Paus. i. 25. § 7.) He does not seem, however, to have been able to effect this purpose until Athens was besieged by Demetrius (B.C. 296), when he took advantage of the excitement of the popular mind to expel Demochares, the leader of the opposite party, and establish himself as undisputed master of the city. We know but little either of the intrigues by which he raised himself to power or of his proceedings afterwards; but he is described in general terms by Pausanias, as "of all tyrants the most inhuman towards men, and the most sacrilegious towards the gods." He plundered the temples, and especially the Parthenon, of all their most valuable treasures, stripping even the statue of Athena of her sacred ornaments. At the beginning of his rule he had procured a decree to be passed, forbidding, under pain of death, even the mention of treating with Demetrius; and he succeeded in inducing, or compelling, the Athenians to hold out until they were reduced to the last extremities of famine. At length, however, he despaired of doing so any longer, and, stealing out of the city in disguise, made his escape to Thebes. (Paus. i. 25. § 7, 29. § 10; Plut. Demetr. 33, 34, De Is. et Ostr. 71, p. 379, Adv. Epicur. p. 1090, &c.; Polyæn. iv. 7. § 5; Athen. ix. p. 405, f.) A story is told of him by Polyæneus (iii. 7. § 1), that being pursued by some horsemen of Demetrius, he escaped from them by dropping gold pieces along the road as he fled. According to the same author, he remained at Thebes until it was taken by Demetrius, when he fled from thence to Delphi, and afterwards to Thrace. Here he was again in danger of falling into the hands of his enemy, Demetrius having invaded Thrace during the captivity of Lysimachus, and besieged the town of Seatos, in which Lachares then happened to be; but he once more succeeded in making his escape to Lysimachia. (Polyæn. iii. 7. §§ 2, 3.) We again hear of him at Cassandrea as late as B.C. 279, when he was expelled from that city by Apollodorus, on a charge of having conspired to betray it into the hands of Antiochus. (Id. vi. 7. § 2.) Hence it appears clear that Pausanias is mistaken when he states that Lachares was murdered soon after his escape from Athens, for the sake of the wealth he was supposed to have accumulated. (Paus. i. 25. § 7.) [E. H. B.]

LACHARES (Λαχάρης), a rhetorician of Athens, who flourished in the fifth century of our era, under the emperors Marcianus and Leo. He was a disciple of Heracleon, and in his turn he was the instructor of many eminent men of the time, such as Eustephius, Nicolaus, Asterius, Proclus, and Superianus. (Suid. s. vv. Λαχάρης, Σουπριανός; Marinus, Vit. Procl. 11.) He is spoken of in terms of very high praise both by Suidas and Marinus, as a man of a noble character and an orator of great popularity in his time. Suidas mentions several works of his, but all are lost, and scarcely a single trace of them has come down to us. His titles are: 1. Περὶ κάλλους, καὶ κόμματος, καὶ περιόδου. (Comp. Schol. ad Hermog. in the Rhet. Græc. vol. iii. pp. 719, 721, vol. vii. p. 930.) 2. Διαλέξεις, or Disputations. 3. Ἱστορία ἢ κατὰ Κορροῦτον: whether this was an historical or a rhetorical work is uncertain, no historian of the

LACHES (Λάχης), an Athenian, son of Melanopus, was joined with Charoëdes in the command of the first expedition sent by the Athenians to Sicily, in B.C. 427. His colleague was soon after slain in battle, and Laches, being left sole general, took Messina, and gained some slight advantages over the Epizephyrian Locrians. In B.C. 426 he was superseded by Pythodorus, with whom Sophocles and Eurymedon were shortly joined, and was recalled, apparently to stand his trial on a charge of peculation in his command, brought against him by Cleon. (Thuc. iii. 86, 88, 90, 99, 103, 115, vi. 1, 6, 75; Just. iv. 3; Arist. Vesp. 240, 836, 895, 903, 937; Dem. c. Tim. § 145; Schol. ad Arist. Vesp. 240, 836.) The Scholiast thinks that Aristophanes, in the Wasps, meant no reference to Laches in the arraignment of the dog Labe, for cheese-stealing. But the name of Laches' demus Aexone (comp. Plat. Lach. p. 197), and the special mention of Sicilian cheese, seem to fix the allusion beyond dispute, while by the accusing dog, the κύων Κυδαθηναίους, himself as great a ficher, Cleon is as evidently intended. Laches, we find from Plato (Lach. p. 181), was present at the battle of Delium, in B.C. 424. In B.C. 421 he was one of the commissioners for concluding the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta, as well as the separate treaty between these states in the same year. He was also one of the commanders of the force sent to Argos, in B.C. 418, when Alcibiades induced the Argives to break the truce made in their name with the Lacedæmonians, by Thrasylus and Alciphron; and in the same year he fell at the battle of Mantinea, together with his colleague Nicostratus. (Thuc. v. 19, 24, 61, 74.) In the dialogue of Plato which bears his name, he is represented as not over-acute in argument, and with temper on a par with his acuteness. His son Melanopus was one of those whom, being in possession of some prize-money, which was public property, the law of Timocrates would have abridged. (See Dem. c. Tim. p. 740.) [E. E.]

LACHESIS. [MORRIS.]

LACINIA (Λακινία), a surname of Juno, under which she was worshipped in the neighbourhood of Croton, where she had a rich and famous sanctuary. (Strab. vi. p. 261, &c., 281; Liv. xxiv. 3.) The name is derived by some from the Italian hero Lacinus, or from the Lacinian promontory on the eastern coast of Bruttium, which Thetis was said to have given to Juno as a present. (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 552.) It deserves to be noticed that Hannibal dedicated in the temple of Juno Lacinia a bilingual inscription (in Punic and Greek), which recorded the history of his campaigns, and of which Polybius made use in writing the history of the Hannibalian war. (Polyb. iii. 33; comp. Liv. xxviii. 46.) [L. S.]

LACINIUS (Λακίνιος). 1. An Italian hero and fabulous robber, by whom Hercules, on his expedition in Italy, is said to have been robbed of some of the oxen of Geryones, and who was killed by the hero in consequence. After the place of the murder was purified, Hercules built a temple to Hera (Juno), surnamed Lacinia. (Diod. iv. 24; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 552.)

2. A son of Cyrene and king among the Brut-tians, by whom, according to some, the temple of Juno Lacinia was built. (Serv. I. c.) [L. S.]

LACIUS (Λακίος), an Attic hero, to whom a sanctuary was erected on the sacred road from Athens to Eleusis, and from whom the demus of Lacia or Laciadae derived its name. (Paus. i. 37. § 1.) [L. S.]

LACO (Λακός), son of Aeimnestus, proxenus of the Spartans at Plataea, was chosen with Astynachus, son of Asopolous, to address the Lacedaemonians in behalf of the Plataean people, when the town capitulated, in the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 427. In their mouths is placed the pathetic speech given in Thucydides. (Thuc. iii. 52.) [A. H. C.]

LACO, a native of Anagnia, the ancient capital of the Hernicani, mentioned by Cicero as one of Antony's boon-companions—poculorum principes—in the revelries at Varro's country-house, A. C. 44. (Philipp. ii. 41, ad Att. xvi. 11.) [W. B. D.]

LACO, CORNELIUS, originally a praetor's counsel (Heinroce. Antiq. Rom. iv. 6, § 9), was promoted by Galba, A. D. 70, to the posts of court-chamberlain and praetorian prefect. Of the three favourites of Galba, who from their influence with him were called his pedagogues (Suet. Galb. 14; Dion Cass. lxi. 2), Laco was the most selfish and not the least arrogant. In the disputes concerning the appointment of a colleague and successor to Galba, Laco opposed the nomination of Otho, and moved, it is said, by his intimacy with Rubellius Plautus, supported that of Piso. In the divisions of Galba's court and favourites Laco seems to have taken part with Icelus. [ICELUS.] Galba wished to send Laco to appease the discontent of the legions under Vitellius in Germany; but he refused to go, and was thought to have contributed to his patron's destruction by concealing from him the murmurs of the soldiery, and by advising him, when the praetorians had declared for Otho, to present himself to the mutineers. On Otho's accession Laco was ordered for deportation; but the centurion who guarded him had secret orders to put him to death on the way. Laco, however, according to Plutarch (Galb. 13), perished at the same time with Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 6, 13, 14, 19, 26, 33, 46; Suet. Galb. 14; Plut. Galb. 13, 26, 29.) [W. B. D.]

LACO, GRAECINUS, was commander of the night-watch (praefectus vigilum) in the 18th year of the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 31. When the emperor had commissioned Sertorius Macro to arrest Sejanus, Laco was stationed with his band of vigiles around the temple of Apollo, in which the senate was held. At a preconcerted signal, after Tiberius' letter (Juv. Sat. x. 71) had been read, Laco entered with his guards and took Sejanus into custody. For this service, which from the power of the criminal required both secrecy and boldness, Laco was rewarded with a large pecuniary donation and with the quaestorian ornaments. (Dion Cass. lvi. 9, 10, 12.) [W. B. D.]

LACRATES (Λακράτης). 1. A general sent out by the Thebans, at the head of 1000 heavy-armed troops, to assist Artaxerxes Ochus in his invasion of Egypt, B. C. 350. He commanded that division of the royal forces sent against Pelusium. (Diod. xvi. 44, 49).

2. A Pythagorean, a native of Metapontum, mentioned by Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. c. 36). Another reading of the name is Lactritus. [C. P. M.]

LACRITUS (Λακρίτος), a sophist, a native of Phaeolis, known to us chiefly from the speech of Demosthenes against him. A man named Androcles had lent a sum of money to Artemo, the brother of Lacritus. The latter, on the death of his brother, refused to refund the money, though he had become security for his brother, and was his heir. Hence the suit instituted against him by Androcles, for whom Demosthenes composed the speech in question. Lacritus was a pupil of Isocrates, of which he seems to have been rather vain. (Dem. in Lacr. p. 928.) Photius (Cod. 260, p. 487, a. ed. Bek.) speaks of him likewise as the author of some Athenian laws. (Plut. Dec. Orat. p. 837, b.) [C. P. M.]

LACTA'NTIUS. Notwithstanding the high reputation enjoyed by this father, no sure record has been preserved by which we can determine either his exact name, or the place of his nativity, or the date of his birth. In modern works we find him usually denominated Lucius Coelius Firmianus Lactantius; but the two former appellations, in the second of which Coecilus is often substituted for Coelius, are both omitted by Hieronymus, and also in many MSS, while the two latter are frequently presented in an inverted order; moreover, we have no means of deciding whether Firmianus is a family or a local designation; and some critics, absurdly enough perhaps, have imagined that Lactantius is a mere epithet, indicating the milk-like softness and sweetness which characterise the style of this author. Since he is spoken of as having been far advanced in life about A. D. 315, he must have been born not later than the middle of the third century, probably in Italy, possibly at Firmium, on the Adriatic, and certainly studied in Africa, where he became the pupil of Arnobius, who taught rhetoric at Sica. His fame, which surpassed even that of his master, became so widely extended, that about A. D. 301 he was invited by Diocletian to settle at Nicomedeia, and there to practise his art. The teacher of Latin eloquence, however, found so little encouragement in a city whose population was chiefly Greek, that he was reduced to extreme indigence; and, without attempting to turn his talents to account as a public pleader, abandoned his profession altogether, devoting himself entirely to literary composition. There can be little doubt that at this period he became a Christian; and his change of religion may in no small degree have proved the cause of his poverty; for we can scarcely suppose that he would have been left without support by the emperor, had he not in some way forfeited the patronage of the court. We know nothing farther of his career until we find him summoned to Gaul, about A. D. 312—318, when now an old man, to superintend the education of Crispus, son of Constantine, and it is believed that he died at Treves some ten or twelve years afterwards (A. D. 325—330).

Among the writings of Lactantius we must assign the first place to I. Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII., a sort of introduction to Christianity, intended to supersede the less perfect treatises of Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and Cyprian. It is partly polemical, since it contains a direct attack upon the pagan system; partly apologetic, since it undertakes to defend the new faith from the misrepresentations of its adversaries; partly didactic, since it presents an exposition of the beauty, ho liness, and wisdom of pure religion; thus seeking to recommend the principles of the true belief to the favour of the philosophers and educated men of the age, to whom chiefly the work is addressed. The period at which this manual was composed is involved in considerable doubt. There is on the one hand a direct allusion (v. 17. § 5) to a persecution still raging (Spectatae sunt enim spectanturque adhuc per orbem poenae cultorum Dei, &c.), which seems to point to the horrors under Diocletian; while on the other hand Constantine is addressed by name as emperor, at the beginning of the first, second, fourth, and fifth books. These classes, it is true, are omitted altogether in several MSS., and hence have by some editors been rejected as spurious; while others avoid the difficulty by supposing that the task, commenced in Bithynia, was completed in Gaul, after a lapse of twenty years; or by adopting the plausible conjecture of Baluze, that copies passed into circulation at Nicomedeia, from which one family of MSS. was derived, and that a second edition was published at a later epoch under happier auspices. Each of the seven books into which the Institutions are divided bears a separate title, whether proceeding from the author or from a transcriber it is impossible to say, and constitutes as it were a separate essay. In the first, De Falsa Religione, the ruling providence and unity of God are asserted, the unreasonableness of a plurality of deities is demonstrated, and the absurdity of the popular creed is illustrated by an examination of the history and legends of the ancient mythology. In the second, De Origine Erroris, the same subject is pursued, with reference particularly to the folly of paying reverence to idols, and then the steps are traced by which men gradually wandered away from the plain and simple truth. The third, De falsa Sapientia, exposes the empty pretences of so-called philosophy, which is pronounced to be an arrogant but weak imposture, a mass of flimsy speculations upon physics, morals, and theology, at once unsubstantial and contradictory. The fourth, De vera Sapientia et Religione, points out that pure religion is the only source whence pure wisdom can flow, and then proceeds to prove that Christianity is the religion required, by entering into an inquiry with regard to the nature and history of the Messiah. The fifth, De Justitia, is occupied with a disquisition upon righteousness, which, having been banished from earth by the invasion of the heathen gods, was brought back by Christ; and concludes with a vehement denunciation of the injustice and impiety of those who persecuted the followers of the Saviour. The sixth, De Vero Cultu, treats of the manner in which homage ought to be rendered to the one true God. The seventh, De Vita Beata, embraces a great variety of discussions; among others, an investigation of the chief good, the immortality of the soul, the duration of the world, the second coming of Christ, the general resurrection, future rewards and punishments.

II. An Epitome of the Institutions, dedicated to Pentadius, is appended to the larger work and is attributed to Lactantius by Hieronymus, who describes it as being even in his time defectus; and in fact, in all the earlier editions this abridgement begins at the sixteenth chapter of the fifth book of the original. But in the eighteenth century the work was discovered nearly entire in a very ancient MS. deposited in the royal library at Turin, and was published at Paris in 1712 by C. M. Paff, chancellor of the university of Tübingen. It may be observed, that Walchius and others have doubted whether the Epitome really proceeded from the pen of Lactantius, but we can scarcely prefer their conjectures to the positive testimony of Jerome.

III. De Ira Dei, addressed to an unknown Donatus, is a controversial tract, directed chiefly against the Epicureans, who maintained that the deeds of men could produce no emotions either of anger or of pleasure in the Deity; a position which Lactantius declares to be subversive of all true religion, since it at once destroys the doctrine of rewards and punishments.

IV. De Officio Dei s. De Formatione Hominis, addressed to a certain Demetrianus. The first part of this book, to which there seems to be a reference in the Institutions (ii. 10. § 15), belongs to natural theology, being an argument in favour of the wisdom and beneficence of God, deduced from the wonderful contrivances and adaptations of means to ends discernible in the structure of the human frame; the second part is devoted to speculations concerning the nature of the soul.

V. De Mortibus Persecutorum. See CAMELIUS. VI. Hieronymus speaks of Lactantius as a poet, and several pieces still extant have been ascribed to him, but erroneously. These are, 1. De Phœnice, in elegiacs, containing a collection of all the most remarkable tales and legends regarding the far-famed Arabian bird. It is probably a compilation comparatively modern. For full information with regard to its history see Wernsdorff, Poetae Lat. Minores, vol. iii. p. 283. 2. Symposium, an assemblage of one hundred riddles. This is noticed in the article FIRMIANUS. 3. De Pascha ad Felicem Episcopum, in elegiacs, is generally believed to have been composed by VENANTIUS HONORIUS CLEMENTIANUS Fortunatus, who flourished in the middle of the sixth century. 4. De Passione Domini, in hexameters, one of the most admired productions of the Christian muse, not unworthy of Lactantius, but bearing in its language the impress of a much later age. It will be found in the Postarum Veterum Eccles. Op. Christiana, edited by G. Fabricius, Bas. fol. 1564, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum Mar., Lugdun. 1677, vol. ii. p. 671.

VII. Lactantius, according to Hieronymus, was the author of a Symposium, of a piece called Grammaticus, of an itinerary in hexameters, Obsequium de Africa usque Nicomediam, of two books, Ad Asclepiadem, who had himself addressed to Lactantius a work De Providentia summi Dei (Instit. vii. 4), of four books of epistles Ad Probum, two Ad Severum, and two Ad Demetrianum, all of which are now lost. It appears from his own words (Instit. vii. 1, sub fin.), that he had formed the design of drawing up a work against the Jews, but we cannot tell whether he ever accomplished his purpose.

The style of Lactantius, formed upon the model of the great orator of Rome, has gained far him the appellation of the Christian Cicero, and not undeservedly. No reasonable critic, indeed, would now assert, with Picus de Mirandula, that the imitator has not only equalled but even surpassed the beauties of his original. But it is impossible not to be charmed with the purity of diction, the easy grace, the calm dignity, and the sonorous flow of his periods, when compared with the harsh phraseology and barbarous extravagance of his African contemporaries, or the stiff affectation, vulgar finery, and empty pomposity, of the Graeco-Italian rhetoricians. He was unquestionably also a man of extensive erudition; and much curious and valuable information concerning ancient superstition and ancient philosophy may be gathered from his pages, in which are preserved many quotations from lost works of interest and importance. His merits as a theologian are more questionable. It is almost certain that he became a convert late in life: he probably did not receive instruction from a judicious teacher, nor fully comprehend all that he had learned. His expressions relative to the nature of Christ, his view of the redemption, his rapture of the day of judgment, his predictions concerning the millennium, the unsuspecting confidence with which he quotes such authorities as the Sibylline oracles and Hermes Trismegistus, the line of argument adopted in the De Ira Dei, his remarks on the immortality of the soul and on early death, may be given as a few examples out of many which might be adduced of erroneous doctrines, of rash and unwarrantable conclusions, of unsound criticism, of reasoning rhetorical but not logical, of superficial investigation, and false induction. The charge of a leaning towards Manicheism and Anti-Trinitarian opinions seems altogether unfounded.

The Editio Princeps of Lactantius is one of the earliest specimens of the typographical art in existence, having been printed at the monastery of Subiaco in 1465 by Sweynheym and Pannartz; a second and a third impression by the same printers appeared at Rome in 1468 and 1470, the last under the editorial inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria. The great popularity of this author, and the multitude of MSS. dispersed over Europe, gave rise to a multitude of editions, of which the most notable are that of Gallaeus, Lug. Bat. 1660, forming one of the series of Variorum Classics, in 8vo.; that of C. Cellarius, Lips. 8vo. 1698; that of Walchius, Lips. 8vo. 1715; that of Heumann, Gotting. 8vo. 1736; that of Bünnemann, Lips. 8vo. 1739; and that of Le Brun and Lenglet du Fresnoy, Paris, 2 vols. 4to. 1748.

(Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 79, 80; Chronic. Euseb. ad ann. cccxviii., Comment. in Eccles. c. 10, Comment. in Ephes. c. 4, Ad Paulin. Epist.; Lactant. Divin. Institut. i. l. § 8, v. 2. § 2, iii. 13. § 12; Schröckh, Kirchengesch. vol. v. p. 232; Schönemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. i. § 2; Bähr, Gesch. der Römisch. Litterat. Suppl. Band. 1<sup>o</sup> Abtheil. § 9, 2<sup>o</sup> Abtheil. § 38—46.) [W. R.]

LACTANS, LACTURNUS, and LACTURCIA, Roman divinities, who were believed to protect the young fruits of the field. (Serr. ad Aen. i. 315; August. De Civ. Dei. iv. 3.) Some believe that Lactans and Lacturcia are mere surnames of Ops, and that Lacturnus is a surname of Saturnus. (Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. pp. 129, 132.) [L. S.]

LACTUR'CA, a surname of M. Valerius Maximus, consul, B. C. 456. [MAXIMUS.]

LACTUCI'NUS, a surname of M. Valerius Maximus, consular tribune, B. C. 398 and 395. [MAXIMUS.]

LACUMACES, a Numidian, the younger son of Oesaces, king of the Maesylia, was placed on the throne while a mere child by Mezetus, who had overthrown his brother Capusa. On the landing of Masinissa in Africa, Lacumaces repaired to the court of Syphax to solicit assistance, but was attacked by Masinissa on his march, and narrowly escaped falling into his hands. He, however, obtained from Syphax a large auxiliary force, with which he joined his guardian Mezetus, but their combined armies were defeated by Masinissa, and they themselves fled to Syphax for refuge. From thence they were induced by the conqueror to return, and Lacumaces was received at the court of Masinissa with the honours due to his royal birth. (Liv. xxix. 29, 30.) [E. H. B.]

LACY'DES (Λακύνδης). 1. A native of Cyrene, the son of Alexander. In his youth he was poor, but remarkable for his industry, as well as for his affable and engaging manners. He removed to Athens, and attached himself to the New Academy, according to a silly story quoted by Eusebius (Praep. Evang. xiv. 7) from Numenius, because the facility with which his servants robbed him without being detected, convinced him that no reliance could be placed on the evidence of the senses. He was a disciple of Arcesilaus, and succeeded him as president of the school, over which he presided for 26 years. The place where his instructions were delivered was a garden, named the Λακύνδειον, provided for the purpose by his friend Attalus Philometor king of Pergamus. This alteration in the locality of the school seems at least to have contributed to the rise of the name of the New Academy. Before his death Lacydes resigned his place to Telecles and Evander of Phocia, a thing which no philosopher had ever done before him. He died in B. C. 241, according to Diogenes Laertius (iv. § 60; comp. Aelian, V. H. ii. 41; Athen. x. p. 438. a.), from the effects of excessive drinking. According to Eusebius (Praep. Ev. xiv. 7), he was so frugal, in other respects at least, that he was styled δίκονομος. In his philosophical tenets he followed Arcesilaus closely. Cicero (Acad. ii. 6), speaking of the latter, says: "cujus primo non admodum probata ratio, quamquam floruit quum acumine ingenii tum admirabili quodam lepore dicendi proxime a Lacyde solo retenta est." Suidas (s. v. Λακ.) mentions writings of his under the general name of φιλόσοφα or περί φύσεως. (Diog. Laert. iv. 59—61.)

2. A peripatetic philosopher, mentioned by Aelian (Hist. An. vii. 41), and Pliny (H. N. x. 22). Nothing is recorded of him but that he had a pet goose which never left him either by day or by night. [C. P. M.]

LADAMAS, artist. [MOSCHION.]

LADAS (Ἀδδας). 1. A celebrated runner, a native of Laconia. He gained the victory at Olympia in the δόλιχος, and expired soon after. There was a monument to his memory on the banks of the Eurotas. In Arcadia, on one of the roads leading to Orchomenus, was a stadium, called the stadium of Ladas, where he used to practise. There was a famous statue of him by Myron, in the temple of Apollo Lycius at Argos, and another statue in the temple of Aphrodite Nicephorus. (Paus. ii. 19. § 7, iii. 21. § 1, viii. 12, § 3.) His swiftness became proverbial among the Romans. (Catull. lv. 25; Auctor ad Herenn. iv. 3; Juv. xiii. 97; Mart. ii. 86. 8, x. 100. 5.)

2. A native of Aegium in Achaea, who gained a victory in the foot race at Olympia, in the 126th Olympiad, B. C. 280. (Paus. iii. 21. § 1, x. 23, § 14.) [C. P. M.]

LADO'GENES or LADO'NIS (Λαδογενής or Λαδωνίς), a name by which the poets sometimes designated Daphne, the daughter of Ladon. (Paus. x. 7; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 6; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

LADON (Λάδων). 1. A river god of Arcadia, is described as a son of Oceanus and Thetys, and as the husband of Stymphalia, by whom he became the father of Daphne and Metope. (Hes. Theog. 344; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vi. 143; Diod. iv. 72; Paus. viii. 20, § 1, x. 7, in fin.)

2. The dragon, who was believed to guard the apples of the Hesperides. He is said to have been able to assume various tones of voice, and to have been the offspring of Typhon and Echidna; but he is also called a son of Ge, or of Phorcys and Ceto. He had been appointed to watch in the gardens of the Hesperides by Juno, and never slept; but he was slain by Heracles; and the image of the fight was placed by Zeus among the stars. (Hes. Theog. 333; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1396; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 484; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 6.) [L. S.]

LAECA, PORCIUS, l. P., was tribune of the plebs B. C. 199, and by his veto prevented Manlius Acidinus on his return from Spain from entering the city in an ovation, which had been granted him by the senate. [ACIDINUS, No. 1.] Laeca was appointed in B. C. 196 one of the triumviri epulones, who were first created in that year (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Epulones); and in the following year, B. C. 195, he was one of the praetors, and was stationed with an army in the district of Pisae in Etruria, that he might co-operate with the consul Valerius Flaccus, who was carrying on war in Northern Italy against the Gauls and Ligurians. (Liv. xxxii. 7, xxxiii. 42, 43.) The name of Laeca occurs on coins of the Porcia gens, of which a specimen is given below. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, with the legend P. LAECA, ROMA and x: the reverse represents three figures, the centre one is a man clad in the paludamentum, laying his right hand on the head of a citizen wearing a toga, and behind him stands a lictor; beneath these figures there is on most coins the legend PROVOCO, which, however, is wanting in the one figured below. This evidently refers to the lex Porcia de Provocatione (Liv. x. 9; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31, pro Rabir. 3, 4); and as the name of P. Laeca occurs on the coin, it is supposed that the law may have been proposed by the above-mentioned P. Laeca in his tribunate in B. C. 199. There is nothing improbable in this supposition; but the name of the proposer of the law is not mentioned by any ancient writer. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 286; Pighius, Ann. Rom. vol. ii. p. 255, &c.)

COIN OF P. PORCIUS LAECA.

2. M., a senator and a leading member of the Catilinarian conspiracy. It was at his house that the conspirators met in November, B. C. 63. (Sall. Cat. 17, 37; Cic. in Cat. i. 4, ii. 16, pro Sull. 2, 18; Flor. iv. 1, § 3.)

LAEDUS, silver-chaser. [LEOSTRATIDES.]

LAE LAPS (Λαελᾶψ), i. e. the storm-wind, which is personified in the legend of the dog of Procris which bore this name. Procris had received this extremely swift animal as a present, either from Artemis or Minos, and afterwards left it to her husband Cephalus. When the Teucrian fox was sent as a punishment to the Thebans, to which they had to sacrifice a boy every month, and when Creon had requested Amphiryon to deliver the city of the monster fox, Cephalus sent out the dog Laelaps against the fox. The dog overtook the fox, but Zeus changed both animals into a stone, which was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes. (Apollod. ii. 4, § 6; Hygin. Fab. 189, Poet. Astr. ii. 35; Ov. Met. vii. 771.) [L. S.]

LÆLIA. 1. The elder of the two daughters of C. Laelius, surnamed the wise. She was married to Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, by whom she had two daughters, Mucia major and minor. Laelia was celebrated for the purity with which she spoke her native language, and she transmitted her conversational excellence to two generations—to her daughters the Muciae, and to her granddaughters the two Liciniae. Her son-in-law, L. Licinius Crassus [CRASSUS, No. 23], whose eloquence profited by her instructions, describes Laelia's conversation as a perfect model of the antique tone of Naevius and Plautus; and Cicero, in whose early manhood she was still surviving, represents her diction as possessing a certain indefinite Roman grace and propriety, of which highly educated women were the best depositaries, and which conveyed a correct and lively image of the eloquence of her father Laelius and his illustrious friend, the second Africanus. The conversation of Laelia gave the tone to the polished society of her age, and was distinguished from that of Cornelia, the mirror of a later generation, by its native Latinian, and by its sincerity and earnestness, which qualities were in some degree sacrificed afterwards to exotic graces, and to a composite idiom borrowed from the schools and sophists of Athens. (Cic. Brut. 58, § 111, de Or. iii. 12, § 44.)

2. The younger of the two daughters of C. Laelius the wise, married C. Fannius Strabo. (Cic. Brut. 26, § 101.) [W. B. D.]

LÆLIA GENS, plebeian, appears in the Fasti for the first time in B. C. 190. Its only regular cognomen is Balbus [BALBUS], though Laelius who was the friend of the younger Scipio Africanus was sometimes surnamed Sapiens.

The following stemma exhibits the extinction of one branch of the Laelii in the male line after the fourth generation, and the marriages and descendants of the female line:—

STEMMA LAELIORUM.

LAELI'ANUS, U'LPIUS CORNE'LIIUS. Trebellius Pollio assigns the fourth place in his list of the thirty tyrants [AUREOLUS] to a certain Lollianus, who, according to the narrative of the Augustan historian, was the leader of the insurrection by which Postumus [POSTUMUS] was overthrown; and after gallantly defending Gaul from the incursions of the Germans, was himself slain by his own soldiers, who mutinied on account of the severe toils which he imposed, and proclaimed Victorinus [VICTORINUS] in his stead. These events took place, it would appear, in the course of A. D. 267. Victor, in his Caesars (c. 33), calls the same individual Laelianus; Victor, in his Epitome (c. 32), Aelianus; and Eutropius (ix. 7) L. Aelianus.

But coins are extant in all the three metals, executed apparently by the same workmen as those of Postumus, bearing on the obverse the legend IMP. C. LAELIANUS P. F. AVG., or IMP. C. ULP. COR. LAELIANUS, which would lead us at once to conclude that the name placed at the head of this article was the real designation of this pretender to the purple. A solitary medal, however, believed to be genuine, was once contained in the collection of the prince of Waldeck, from whence it was stolen, which exhibited IMP. C. LOLLIANUS P. F. AVG.; and to complete the confusion, many numismatologists refer to this epoch a small brass, with IMP. C. Q. VALENS. AELIANUS. P. AVG. on the obverse, and on the reverse JOVI. CONSER. AVGG., words which indicate a divided sovereignty. This last medal, may, however, be assigned, with more probability, to that Aelianus who, along with Amandus, headed the rebellion of the Bagaudae in the reign of Diocletian. COIN OF LAELIANUS.

LAELIUS. 1. C. LAELIUS, was from early manhood the friend and companion of P. Corn. Scipio Africanus, and their actions are so interwoven, that it is difficult to relate them separately. (Polyb. x. 3; Vell. Pat. ii. 127.) Laelius first appears in history as the commander of the Roman fleet in the attack on New Carthage, B. C. 210. To him alone was confided the destination of the armament, which, in correspondence with the movements of the land forces, he conducted from the mouth of the Ebro to the haven of the Carthaginian capital of Spain. Laelius, during the assault, blockaded the port, after its capture occupied the city with his marines, and, for his services, received from Scipio a golden wreath and thirty oxen. (Polyb. x. 3, 9; Liv. xxvi. 42, 48; Appian, Hispan. 20.) Having assisted in distributing the booty, the hostages, and the prizes of valour to the soldiers, he was dispatched to Rome with the captives and the tidings of victory. He arrived thither early in A. C. 209, and, after reporting to the senate and the people the fall of New Carthage, and delivering up his prisoners—among whom were Mago, the governor of the city, fifteen members of the great council of Carthage, and two members of the council of elders,—he rejoined Scipio at Tarraco. (Polyb. x. 18, 19, 37; Liv. xxvi. 48, 51, xxvii. 7.) Throughout the war in Spain, Sicily, and Africa, Laelius acted as confidential legatus to his friend, nor until A. C. 202, when the senate appointed him Scipio's quaestor extraordinary, had he any official rank or station. (Liv. xxx. 33.) At the battle of Baecula, in the upper valley of the Guadalquivir, he commanded Scipio's left wing, A. C. 208 (Polyb. x. 39; Liv. xxvii. 18; Appian, Hispan. 25, 26); and in A. C. 206, a storming-party, when Illiturgi, on the right bank of the Baetis, was taken (Liv. xxviii. 19, 20); a detachment of the fleet, when Gades was expected to revolt, with which he defeated the Punic admiral Adherbal in the straits (Liv. xxviii. 23, 30); and the cavalry, when Indibilis was routed (Polyb. xi. 32, 33; Liv. xxviii. 33). Twice he visited the court of Syphax, king of the Masaesylians, and the most powerful of the African princes, whose alliance was of equal importance to Carthage and to Rome. The first time he went as Scipio's envoy, the next as his companion; and, many years afterwards, he related to their common friend, the historian Polybius (Polyb. x. 3), the particulars of that memorable banquet at which Syphax entertained at one table and on one couch two successive conquerors of Spain, the Punic Hadrubal and the Roman Scipio. (Polyb. xi. 24; Liv. xxviii. 17, 18; Appian, Hispan. 29.) After the Carthaginians had evacuated Spain, Laelius returned with Scipio to Rome, and was present at his consular comitia, in the autumn of A. C. 206. (Polyb. xi. 33; Liv. xxviii. 38.)

The completion of the second Punic war was naturally assigned to the conqueror of Spain; but while Scipio was assembling his forces in Sicily, Laelius, with a portion of the fleet, was despatched to the African coast. He disembarked at Hippo Regius; the farms and vineyards of a populous and unguarded district afforded abundant spoil; the high road to Carthage was thronged with fugitives, and it was believed that Scipio himself, whose preparations were known and dreaded, had landed with the main army. At Hippo the Massylian chief Masinissa renewed his overtures to Rome. He urged Laelius to hasten Scipio's invasion, and warned him to return without delay, since the Carthaginians had discovered their error, and were preparing to cut off his retreat. Laelius accordingly returned to Messana. His booty betrayed the wealth and weakness of Carthage, and whetted the appetite of the legions for the plunder of Africa. (Liv. xxix. 1, 4, 6.)

In the spring of A. C. 204, Laelius, with twenty war-galleys, convoyed the left division of transports from the harbour of Lilybaeum to the Fair Promontory. (Liv. xxix. 24—27.) On the mainland he again ably seconded his friend. To him and Masinissa was entrusted the burning of the Punic and Numidian camps (Polyb. xiv. 4; Liv. xxx. 3—6); the pursuit of Hasdrubal and Syphax far into the arid wastes of Numidia (Polyb. xiv. 9; Liv. xxx. 9, comp. ib. 17; Appian, Pun. 26—28); and the capture of the Masaesylian king and his capital Cirta, for which services Laelius received for the second time a golden crown (Liv. xxx. 11—16). At Cirta he asserted the severe discipline of Rome towards its most faithful allies, by tearing Masinissa from the arms of Sophoniba, the beautiful and unfortunate daughter of Hasdrubal Barca (Liv. xxx. 12). A second time also he was the usher of victory and of a train of illustrious captives—Syphax and his Massælyan nobles—to the senate and people of Rome (xxx. 16, 17). He was detained in Italy until the last Carthaginian envoys had received their final answer, and rejoined Scipio in Africa in the latter months of B. C. 203 (xxx. 22, 25). At the battle of Zama in the following year, he commanded the Italian horse that formed the extreme left of the Roman line. His repulse and pursuit of the Numidian cavalry exposed the enemy's flank, and his charge at the close of the day, on Hannibal's reserve, determined Scipio's victory (Polyb. xv. 9, 12, 14; Liv. xxx. 33–35; Appian, Pun. 41, 44). A third time Lælius was despatched to Rome: but he then announced not the fall of a city or of a single host, but the consummation of a war, which for sixteen years had swept over Italy, and risen to the barriers of Rome itself. (Liv. xxx. 35, 40.)

The civil career of Lælius began after his military life had comparatively closed. It was less brilliant, but his influence with the senate was at all times great. (Liv. xxxvii. 1.) If, as seems probable, he was nearly of the same age with his illustrious friend, Lælius was born about B. C. 235 and may have been in his fortieth year when chosen prætor in 196. His province was Sicily (Liv. xxxiii. 24, 26). He failed in his first trial for the consulship. Scipio's popularity was on the wane, and the old patrician party in the ascendant (xxxv. 10). He was, however, elected consul in B. C. 190, two years after his rejection (Liv. xxxvi. 45). Whether time and the accidents of party had wrought any change in their ancient friendship, we are not told; but it was through Scipio Africanus that Lælius lost his appointment to the province of Greece, and the command of the war against Antiochus the Great [ANTIOCHUS III.] (Liv. xxxvii. 1; Cic. Philipp. xi. 7), which he probably desired as much for wealth as for glory, since the Lælii were not rich (Cic. Cornel. ii. Fragm. 8, p. 453, Orelli). He obtained instead the province of Cisalpine Gaul, where he remained two years, engaged in colonising the ancient territory of the Boians (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50). In B. C. 174, he was one of a commission of three, sent into Macedonia to counteract the negotiations of Carthage (Liv. xli. 22), and in B. C. 170 he was despatched by the senate to inquire into certain charges brought against C. Cassius, consul in B. C. 171, by some of the Gaulish tribes of the Grisons. The date of Lælius' death is unknown. (Zonar. ix. 13; Frontin. Strat. i. l. 1. § 3, i. 2. § 1, ii. 8. § 16.)

2. C. LÆLIUS SAPIENS, was son of the preceding. His intimacy with the younger Scipio Africanus was as remarkable as his father's friendship with the elder (Vell. ii. 127; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 7), and it obtained an imperishable monument in Cicero's treatise "Lælius sive de Amicitia." He was born about B. C. 186—5; was tribune of the plebs in 151; prætor in 145 (Cic. de Amic. 25); and consul, after being once rejected, in 140 (Cic. Brut. 43, Tusc. v. 19; Plut. Imp. Apophthegm. p. 200). His character was dissimilar to that of his father. The elder Lælius was an officer of the old Roman stamp, softened, perhaps, by his intercourse with Polybius, but essentially practical and enterprising. A mild philosophy refined, and, it may be, enfeebled the younger Lælius, who, though not devoid of military talents, as his campaign against the Lusitanian guerilla-chief Viriatus proved (Cic. de Off. ii. 11), was more of a statesman than a soldier, and more a philosopher than a statesman. From Diogenes of Babylon [DIOGENES, literary, 3], and afterwards from Panaetius, he imbibed the doctrines of the stoic school (Cic. de Fin. ii. 8); his father's friend Polybius was his friend also; the wit and idiom of Terence were pointed and polished by his and Scipio's conversation (Suet. vit. Terent. 2; Prolog. Terent. Adolph. 15; Cic. ad Att. vii. 3; comp. Quint. Inst. x. l. § 99); the satirist Lucilius was his familiar companion (Cic. de Fin. ii. 8; Hor. Sat. ii. l. 65; Schol. Vet. in Hor. loc.); and Cælius Antipater dedicated to him his history of the Punic war (Cic. Orat. 69).* Lælius was so distinguished also for his sagacious science, that, according to Cicero (Phil. ii. 33), "Lælius" and "bonus arguer" were convertible terms. (Id. De Nat. Deor. iii. 2.)

The political opinions of Lælius were different at different periods of his life. At first he inclined to the party which aimed at renovating the plebs by making them again land-owners, and at raising the equites into an efficient middle-class. He endeavoured, probably during his tribunate, to procure a re-division of the state-demesnes, but, either alarmed at the hostility it excited, or convinced of its impracticability, he desisted from the attempt, and for his forbearance received the appellation of the Wise or the Prudent (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 8). Lælius indeed had neither the steady principles of Tiberius, nor the fervid genius of C. Gracchus. He could discern, but he could not apply the remedy for social evils. And after the tribunate of the elder Gracchus, B. C. 133, his sentiments underwent a change. He assisted the consuls of A. C. 132 in examining C. Blossius of Cumæ and the other partizans of Tib. Gracchus (Cic. de Amic. 11; comp. Plut. Tib. Gracch. 20), and in A. C. 130, he spoke against the Papirian Rogation, which would have enabled the tribunes of the plebs to be re-elected from year to year (Cic. de Amic. 25; Liv. Epit. 59). But although Lælius was the strenuous opponent of the popular leaders of his age—the tribunes C. Licinius Crassus, B. C. 145, C. Papirius Carbo, B. C. 131, and C. Gracchus B. C. 123—122—nature had denied him the qualities of a great orator. His speeches read better than those of his contemporary and rival C. Serrius Galba, yet Galba was doubtless the more eloquent. (Cic. Brut. 24.) Lælius in his own age was the model, and in history is the representative of the Greek culture which sprang up rapidly at Rome in the seventh century of the city. Serene and philosophical by temperament (Cic. de Off. i. 26; Sen. Ep. 11), erudite and refined by education, Lælius was among the earliest examples of that cosmopolitan character (Cic. Tusc. iv. 3), which, in Cicero's time, had nearly effaced the old Latin type, and of which the younger Brutus perhaps presents the fairest aspect. Smoothness—lenitas (Cic. de Orat. iii. 7. § 28), which he probably derived from his old master Diogenes (Gell. vii. 14), was the characteristic of his eloquence. It was better adapted for a deliberative assembly than for the tumult of the forum. Cicero, indeed (Brut. 21),—and his censure is confirmed by the author of the dialogue De Causis Corruptae Eloquentiae (25)—complains of a certain harshness and crudity in the diction of Laelius. The grammarians resorted to his writings for archaisms (Festus, s. v. Satura; Nonius, s. v. Saturnian), and he may have shown habits of study rather than of business. But the defect was perhaps as much in the organ he employed as in Laelius himself. The Latin tongue was yet in the bondage of the old Saturnian forms (comp. Varr. R. R. i. 2); and had not acquired the ductility and copiousness it possessed in Cicero's age. A fragment of the younger Scipio's orations, preserved by Macrobius (Satura. ii. 10), will afford a notion of the language of Laelius.

The titles of the following orations of Laelius have been preserved:—1. De Collegiis, delivered by Laelius when praetor, B. C. 145. It was directed against the rogation of C. Licinius Crassus, then tribune of the plebs, who proposed to transfer the election of the augurs from the college to the people in their tribes. The bill was rejected through Laelius' eloquence. (Cic. Brut. 21, de Amic. 25, de Repub. vi. 2, de Nat. Deor. iii. 2, 17, where it is described as aureola orationiscula; Nonius, s. v. Saturnian.) 2. Pro Publicanis, B. C. 139. Laelius, after twice pleading in behalf of the revenue-contractors, resigned their cause to his rival C. Servius Galba, since it seemed to require a more acrimonious style than his own. (Cic. Brut. 22.) 3. Dissuasio Legis Popilliae, B. C. 131, against the law of C. Popilius Carbo, which enacted that a tribune, whose office had expired, might be re-elected as often as the people thought advisable. Scipio Africanus the younger supported, and C. Gracchus opposed Laelius in this debate. (Cic. de Amic. 25; Liv. Epit. lxx.) 4. Pro se. The date and immediate occasion of this speech are uncertain; but it was probably in reply to Carbo or Gracchus. An extract from it seems to have once been read in Festus (s. v. Satura; comp. Sallust. Jug. 29.) 5. Laudationes P. Africani minoris, written after B. C. 129. These were mortuary orations, which Laelius, after the manner of Isaeus and the Greek rhetoricians, composed for other speakers. Q. Tubero, the nephew of Africanus (Cic. de Orat. ii. 84), delivered one, and Q. Fab. Maximus, brother of the deceased, the other of these orations, at Scipio's funeral. (Schol. Bob. pro Milon. p. 283, Orelli; comp. Cic. pro Muraena. 36.)

Laelius is the principal interlocutor in Cicero's dialogue De Amicitia; one of the speakers in the De Senectute, and in the De Republica, maintains the reality of justice against the sceptical academician Philus. His domestic life is pleasantly described by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 6) and by Horace (Sat. ii. l. 65—74). He seems to have had a country house at Formiae (Cic. de Rep. i. 39). His two daughters were married, the one to Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, the other to C. Fannius Strabo (de Amic. 8). Of his wit and playfulness—hilaritas (de Off. i. 30), only two specimens have been transmitted (de Orat. ii. 71; Sen. Nat. Quaest. vi. 32). The opinion of his worth seems to have been universal, and it is one of Seneca's injunctions to his friend Lucilius "to live like Laelius." (Cic. Topic. 20, § 78; Sen. Ep. 104.) [W. B. D.]

LAELIUS BALBUS. [BALBUS, No. 7.]

LAELIUS DECIMUS. 1. Was one of Cn. Pompey's lieutenants in the Sertorian war. He was slain in an engagement near the town of Lauro, B. C. 76, by Hirtuleius, a legatus of Sertorius. (Sallust. Schol. Bob. pro Flacc. p. 235, Orelli; Frontin. Strat. ii. 5. § 31; Obsequ. de Prod. 119.) [HIRTULEIUS.] Lucilius, the satirist, as cited by Cicero (De Or. ii. 6), and Cicero himself (ib.) speaks with some contempt of Laelius's pretensions to literature.

2. Son probably of the preceding, impeached L. Flaccus for extortion in his government of Asia Minor B. C. 59. (Cic. pro Flacc. l. 6; Schol. Bob. pro Flacc. p. 228, Orelli.) [VALERIUS FLACCUS, No. 15.] In the civil wars B. C. 49, Laelius commanded a detachment of Cn. Pompey's fleet (Caes. B. C. iii. 5); conveyed Pompey's letters to the consuls (Cic. ad Att. viii. 11, d. 12, A.); watched M. Antony's passage over the Adriatic (Caes. B. C. iii. 40); and, about the time of the battle of Pharsalia, blockaded the harbour of Brundisium. (Caes. B. C. iii. 100.) M. Antony placed Laelius on the list of Pompeians forbidden to return to Italy without licence from Caesar; but the prohibition was subsequently removed. (Cic. ad Att. xi. 7, 14.) [W. B. D.]

LAELIUS, FELIX. [FELIX LAELIUS.]

LAENAS, the name of a distinguished plebeian family of the gens Popillia. The name was derived, according to Cicero (Brut. 14), from the sacerdotal cloak (laena) with which the consul M. Popilius, who was at the same time flamen Carmentalis, rushed from a public sacrifice into the forum, to pacify the plebeians, who were in open revolt against the nobility. The name is to be spelt accordingly Laenas, as the Fasti Capitolini and Diodorus (xvi. 15) have it, and not Lenas, as is found in some MSS. of Livy. The family of the Laenates was unfavourably distinguished even among the Romans for their sternness, cruelty, and haughtiness of character.

1. M. POPILLIUS M. F. C. N. LAENAS, was consul B. C. 359. The civil disturbances which he is said to have suppressed by his authority and eloquence were perhaps more effectually quelled, as Livy intimates (vii. 12), by a sudden attack in the night of the Tiburtines on Rome. The city was full of consternation and fear: at daybreak, however, and as soon as the Romans had organised a sufficient corps, and sallied forth with it, the enemy was repulsed. In the second year after this M. Laenas is mentioned (Liv. vii. 16) as prosecutor of C. Licinius Stolo for the transgression of his own law, which limited the possession of public land to 500 jugera. Pighius (Annales, vol. i. p. 284) has put down Popilius as praetor of the year B. C. 357, but this is not warranted by Livy's expression, as Drakenborch has shown (ad Liv. vii. 16); and it is even improbable, from the term (accusare) used by Valerius Maximus (viii. 6. § 3). Perhaps Popilius was aedile, whose duty it seems to have been to prosecute the transgressors of agrarian as well as usury laws. (Comp. Liv. x. 13.) Popilius was consul again in the next year (B. C. 356), when he drove the Tiburtines into their towns. (Liv. vii. 17.) He was chosen consul for a third time B. C. 350, when he won a hard-fought battle against the Gauls, in which he himself was wounded (Liv. vii. 23; App. Celt. i. 2), and for which he celebrated a triumph—the first ever obtained by a plebeian. Popilius concluded his brilliant career by a fourth consulship, B.C. 348.

2. M. POPILLIUS, M. F. M. N. LAENAS, consul B.C. 316. (Liv. ix. 21.)

3. M. POPILLIUS P. F. P. N. LAENAS, one of the tribunes for establishing a colony near Pisae (Liv. xl. 43), was chosen praetor B.C. 176 (Liv. xli. 18), but obtained leave to stop at Rome instead of going into his province, Sardinia, the command of which was continued to the pro-praetor, Aebutius. Popilius was chosen consul B.C. 172, and sent with an army against the Ligurian mountaineers. He conquered them in a pitched battle, after great slaughter. The remainder of the whole tribe who had escaped from the carnage determined on surrendering themselves to the mercy of the Roman general; but they were all sold as slaves, and their city plundered and destroyed. When this news reached Rome, the senate disapproved of Popilius's proceedings, and decreed, in spite of his haughty and angry remonstrances, that he should restore the Ligurians to liberty, to their country, and, as far as possible, to their property. Popilius, however, acted in direct opposition to this decree. On his return to Rome he was called to account, but escaped through the influence of his family. (Liv. xlii. 22.) Nevertheless, Popilius obtained (B.C. 159) the most honourable office of Rome, that of censor, which he exercised, as may be presumed, with vigour and severity. (Fast. Capitol.; Liv. Epit. 47; Gell. iv. 20; Nonius, s. v. Strigorus.)

4. P. POPILLIUS LAENAS, brother to the preceding, and with him triumph vir coloniae deducendae. (Liv. xl. 43.)

5. C. POPILLIUS, P. F. P. N. LAENAS, brother to the two preceding ones, was consul (B.C. 172) in the year after his brother Marcus had so shamefully treated the Ligurians. He supported his brother, and warded off his punishment. He was the first plebeian consul who had a plebeian for a colleague (Fast. Capitol.); and he served afterwards as legate in Greece. (Liv. xliii. 19, 24.) The haughtiness of his character is most apparent in his behaviour as ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, whom the senate wished to abtain from hostilities against Egypt. Antiochus was just marching upon Alexandria when he was met by the three Roman ambassadors. Popilius transmitted to him the letter of the senate, which Antiochus read and promised to take into consideration with his friends. Then Popilius described with his cane a circle in the sand round the king, and ordered him not to stir out of it before he had given a decisive answer. This boldness so frightened Antiochus, that he at once yielded to the demand of Rome. (Liv. xlv. 12; Polyb. Exc. Legat. 92; Val. Max. vi. 4; Vell. Pat. i. 10; App. Syr. 131.) C. Popilius was consul a second time B.C. 158.

6. M. POPILLIUS, M. F. P. N. LAENAS, the son of No. 3, was consul B.C. 139, and, as pro-consul in the following year, suffered a defeat from the Numantines. (Liv. Epit. 55; Frontin. Strateg. lii. 17; App. Hisp. 79.)

7. P. POPILLIUS, C. F. P. N. LAENAS, was consul B.C. 132, the year after the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was charged by the victorious aristocratical party with the prosecution of the accomplices of Gracchus; and in this odious task he showed all the hard-heartedness of his family. (Cic. Lael. 20; Val. Max. iv. 7; Plut. T. Gracch. 20.) C. Gracchus afterwards aimed at him in particular, when he passed the bill that those magistrates who had condemned a citizen without trial should be called to account. Popilius withdrew himself, by voluntary exile, from the vengeance of Gracchus, and did not return to Rome till after his death. (Vell. Pat. ii. 7; Cic. Brut. 25; Plut. T. Gracch. 20.)

8. C. POPILLIUS LAENAS, the son of the preceding, is mentioned, as well as his father, by Cicero (Brut. 25), as an eloquent speaker. Perhaps he is the same C. Popilius who is spoken of by Cicero (Ferr. i. 13) as being convicted for embezzlement (peculatus).

9. C. POPILLIUS (LAENAS?), served as legate in Asia, and commanded, along with Minucius Rufus, a Roman fleet in the war with Mithridates. (Appian, Mith. 17.)

10. P. POPILLIUS LAENAS, tribune of the people B.C. 85, a furious partisan of Marius, had his predecessor, Lucilius, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, and his colleagues banished. (Vell. Pat. ii. 24.)

11. POPILLIUS LAENAS, a senator who unintentionally frightened Brutus and his fellow-conspirators by his confidential conversation with Caesar in the senate on the day Caesar was murdered. (Appian, B.C. ii. 115, 116.)

12. C. POPILLIUS LAENAS, the military tribune who executed on Cicero the sentence of the triumph in cutting off his head and right hand, for which he was rewarded by Antonius with 1,000,000 sesterces above the stipulated price. (Appian, B.C. iv. 19.) [W. L.]

M. LAENIUS, or LENIUS FLACCUS, a friend of Atticus, who, notwithstanding the stringent edict of Clodia, B.C. 58 ("Lex Clodia in Ciceronem," Pseud. Cic. pro Dom. 17), sheltered Cicero in his country-house near Brundisium, until he could securely embark for Epeirus. The father, brother, and sons of Laenius were equally earnest in befriending the exile. Laenius afterwards, B.C. 51, met Cicero in Asia Minor, and applied to him for a sub-prefecture in Cilicia, where Laenius had money at interest. Cicero, however, refused to gratify him, since he had made a rule to grant no money-lender (negotianti) office in his province. Yet in the same year, and for a similar purpose, he highly recommended Laenius to P. Silius Nerva, pro-praetor in Bithynia and Pontus. (Cic. pro Plancio, 41, ad Fam. xiii. 63, xiv. 4, ad Att. v. 20, 21, vi. 1, 3.)

LAENIUS, STRABO. [STRABO.]

LAERCES (Λαέρκης), a mythical artist in gold, mentioned by Homer, in a passage from which we learn that it was the custom, in offering a sacrifice of the greatest solemnity, to gild the horns of the victim. (Hom. Od. iii. 425; see also Nitzsch's note and the Schol.) [P. S.]

LAERTES (Λαέρτης), a son of Acrisius and Chalconeusa, and husband of Anticleia, by whom he became the father of Odysseus and Ctimene. (Hom. Od. iv. 755, xi. 85, xv. 362, xvi. 118; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1791.) It should, however, be remembered that, according to others, Odysseus was the son of Sisyphus. (Hygin. Fab. 201; Schol. ad Soph. Philoct. 417.) In his youth Laertes had conquered Nericum, a coast town in Cephalonia (Hom. Od. xxiv. 376), and he is also said to have taken part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 173; Apollod. i. 9, § 16.) At the time when Odysseus returned from Troy, Laertes lived in rural retirement, and was occupied with agricultural pursuits, and an old female slave attended to his wants (Od. i. 189); but, after the departure of Telemachus, he was so overpowered by his grief, that he gave up his rustic pursuits. (Od. xvi. 138.) After the murder of the suitors, Odysseus visited him, and led him back to his house, and Athena made him young again, so that soon after he was able to take part in the fight against the approaching Ithacans. (Od. xxiv. 204—370, 497.) [L. S.]

LAERTIUS DIOGENES. [DIOGENES.]

LAESPODIAΣ (Λαισποδίας), was one of three Athenian commanders, who, with a force of 30 ships, joined the Argives in ravaging the Lacedaemonian coast, B. C. 414; and thus, at the moment when Gylippus was sailing for Syracuse, gave the Spartan government justification for open hostilities. He is named again, B. C. 411, as one of three ambassadors who were sent by the Four Hundred to treat with Sparta, but were, when their ship, the Paralus, was off Argos, seized and given in custody to the Argives by the sailors, who proceeded to join the fleet at Samoa. (Thuc. vi. 105, viii. 86.) He had something the matter with the skin or calf of his leg, and arranged his dress to conceal it.

Τὴ δὲ κακὸν δαίμον Λαισποδίας, εἰ τὴν πόσιν ; says Poseidon, when scolding the uncouth Triballus for letting his garment hang about his legs. (Aristoph. ds. 1568.) And the Scholiast gives a variety of references (see also Plut. Symp. vii. 8), which show that his misfortune made him a standing joke with the comedians. [A. H. C.]

LAETA. [GRATIANUS, p. 303.]

LAETI'LIUS. 1. The person whom Verres constantly employed as his tabellarius. (Cic. Verr. ii. 26, 56.)

2. C. LAETILIUS APALUS, whose name occurs as duumvir along with that of Ptolemaeus, the son of the younger Juba, on a coin of New Carthage or Gades. (Eckhel. vol. iv. p. 160, vol. v. p. 232.)

LAETORIUS. 1. M. LAETORIUS, a centurion primi pili, mentioned as the first plebeian magistrate, B. C. 495, chosen even before the secession to the Sacred Hill and the election of the first tribunes of the people; for there cannot be any doubt that this Laetorius was a plebeian, although it is not exactly stated by Livy (ii. 27). He was chosen to establish a guild of merchants (collegium mercatorum), to dedicate a temple of Mercury, and to superintend the corn market. From these functions it is probable that he was aedile, and the conclusion is obvious that the establishment of the plebeian aedileship preceded that of the tribuneship. (Comp. Val. Max. ix. 3. § 6.)

2. C. LAETORIUS, was tribune of the people in B. C. 471, and by his courage and energy decided the success of the Publilian rogation, by which the comitia tributa obtained the power of legislating for the whole community, and of electing the plebeian magistrates, tribunes and aediles, who accordingly must have been chosen formerly either by the comitia curiata or centuriata, a disputed point on which see Dict. of Ant. & v. Tribunes. (Liv. ii. 56—58; Dionys. ix. 41—49.) It seems not improbable that this Laetorius, if not a relation, was the same who, with the praenomen Marcus, occurs in the annals a few years before. [No. 1.]

3. M. LAETORIUS MERGUS, a military tribune during the third Samnite war (B. C. 298—290), was accused of adultery by the tribune of the people, Cominius. He first escaped and then killed himself, but the people passed sentence on him nevertheless. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 11; Suid. s. v. Ἰδίος Λαέρτιος; Dionys. Excerpt. Vales. p. 86, &c., ed. Mai.)

4. M. LAETORIUS PLANCIANUS, magister equitum of the dictator Q. Ogulnius Gallus, B. C. 257. (Fast. Capit.)

5. C. LAETORIUS, curule aedile, B. C. 216, sent as ambassador by the senate to the consuls App. Claudius and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, B. C. 212, praetor, B. C. 210, and decemvir sacris faciundis, B. C. 209. (Liv. xxiii. 30, xxv. 22, xxvi. 23, xxvii. 7, 8.)

6. L. LAETORIUS, plebeian aedile in B. C. 202, was obliged to abdicate as his election was declared invalid on religious grounds. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

7. CN. LAETORIUS, legate of the praetor, L. Fulvius Purpureo in the battle against the Gauls, B. C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 21.)

8. LAETORIUS, a friend of C. Gracchus, who on the wooden bridge opposed himself to the pursuers of Gracchus, and, as he could not stop them, killed himself. (Val. Max. iv. 7. § 2.) Plutarch (C. Gracch. 16, 17) calls him Licinnius.

9. M. LAETORIUS, a senator of the party of Marius, was declared a public enemy by Sulla, escaped from Rome, and afterwards returned with Marius. (Appian. B. C. i. 60, &c.) [W. L.]

LAETUS (Λαῖτος), a Greek writer of uncertain age, who translated from the Phoenician language a work of Theodotus. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 140; Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 11, where Χαῖτος is a false reading.)

LAETUS, Q. AEMI'LIIUS, was praefect of the praetorium under Commodus, and one of the chief agents in his assassination. [COMMODOUS, ECLECTUS, MARCIA.] By Laetus and his associate Eclectus the vacant throne was offered to Pertinax, and Laetus was the first to incite the guards to rebel against the new prince, and to proclaim Sossius Falco, the consul, emperor in his place. At length the turbulent career of this adventurer was brought to a close by Julianus, who put him to death on the suspicion that he was favourable to the claims of Severus. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 19, 22, lxxiii. 1, 6, 8, 9; Herodian. i. 16, 17, ii. 1, 2; Lamprid. Commod. 15, 17; Capitolin. Pertin. 5, 6; Spartian. Julian. 6, Sept. Sever. 4.) [W. R.]

LAETUS, was one of the lieutenants of Septimius Severus in the campaign against the Arabians and Parthians, A. D. 195; and a few years afterwards (A. D. 199) gained great renown by his gallant and successful defence of Nisibis against a sudden attack headed by Vologaesius. Notwithstanding this good service, and the high reputation which he enjoyed both as a statesman and a general, he was put to death by the emperor, who had become jealous of his popularity with the soldiers. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 2, 9, 10.) [W. R.]

LAEVINUS, a cognomen of the Gens Valeria at Rome. It appears on the Fasti for the first time in B. C. 280, and was extant in the age of Augustus (Hor. Sat. i. 6, 12, Schol. Vet.), and in that of Domitian or Nerva. (Mart. Ep. vi. 9.) Laevina is also mentioned by Martial (Ep. i. 62).

1. P. VALERIUS LAEVINUS, one of the consuls in B. C. 280, obtained for his province Southern Italy, and the conduct of the war with Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. Pyrrhus had recently landed at Tarentum, and it was important to force him to engage before he was joined by his Italian allies.

and while he could bring into the field only his own troops and the Tarentines. Laevinus accordingly was despatched early in the spring into Lucania, where, from a strong position he had seized, he watched the movements of the Epeirota. Pyrrhus, to gain time, attempted negotiation, and wrote to Laevinus, offering to arbitrate between Rome, Tarentum, and the Italian allies. Laevinus, however, bluntly bade him leave the Romans to settle their own quarrels, and begone to Epeirus, if he wished them to listen to his overtures. Two of the letters which passed between Pyrrhus and Laevinus are extant, in substance at least, among the fragments of Dionysius. They were probably copied from the history of Hieronymus of Cardia, who consulted Pyrrhus's own memoirs of his Italian campaign. Laevinus and his opponent were encamped on the opposite banks of the Siris; and, while battle was impending, an Epeirot spy was taken in the Roman lines. Laevinus showed him the legions under arms, and bade him tell his master, if he was curious about the Roman men and tactics, to come and see them himself. Laevinus, whose numbers were superior to the enemy, was driven back over the Siris; his camp was taken, and night alone enabled the fugitives to reach an Apulian town, probably Venusia. In the same year, however, he defended Capua, and hung upon the rear of the Epeirot army both in its march to Rome and on its retreat; and he had so effectually restored the courage and discipline of his legions, that Pyrrhus did not venture to attack him. The army of Laevinus, as the penalty of its defeat, remained in camp at the foot of the Samnite highlands throughout the following winter. His name does not again occur in the war with Pyrrhus. (Liv. Epit. xiii.; Dionys. xvii. 15, 16, xviii. 1—4; Dion. Cass. Fr. Petresc. xl.; Appian. Samnit. Fr. x.; Plut. Pyrrh. 16, 17; Zonar. viii. 3; Justin. xviii. 1; Oros. iv. 1; Front. Strat. ii. 4. § 9, iv. 7. § 7; Vict. Vir. iii. 35; Flor. i. 18; Entrop. ii. 11.)

2. M. VALERIUS LAEVINUS, grandson probably of the preceding, was praetor peregrinus in B. C. 215. But at that crisis of the second Punic war—the year following the defeat at Cannae—all the civil magistrates were employed in military commands; and Laevinus, with the legions lately returned from Sicily, was stationed in Apulia, and a fleet of twenty-five galleys was attached to his land-forces, that he might watch the coast of Italy from Brundisium to Tarentum. While he lay encamped near Luceria, his outposts brought in the ambassadors of Philip IV. of Macedonia, whom they had intercepted on their way to Hannibal's quarters. Laevinus, however, deceived as to the purpose of their mission by Xenophanes, the chief of the legation, furnished them with guides and an escort to Rome. [XENOPHANES.] During the autumn of the same year he retook three towns of the Hirpinians, which, after the defeat at Cannae, had revolted to Hannibal. Having placed garrisons in Tarentum and Rhegium, Laevinus with one legion wintered at Brundisium, from whence he watched the eastern coast of Italy, where a Macedonian invasion was expected. Envoys from Oricum, in Epeirus, came to his winter-quarters, announcing the capture of their own city by Philip, and the imminent danger of Apollonia. Laevinus immediately crossed the Adriatic, recovered Oricum, and by a detachment under Q. Naevius

Crista, one of his lieutenants, raised the siege of Apollonia, took Philip's camp, and concluded a league between the Aetolians and Rome. The terms of the league may be gathered from Polybius (ix. 28, &c.). Laevinus was four times re-appointed propraetor, B. C. 214, 213, 212, 211. In the first of these years he wintered at Oricum; in the second, and in 212, 211, he watched the movements of Philip in Aetolia and Achaia. At the comitia in B. C. 211, on account of his services in Northern Greece, he was elected consul without solicitation, in his absence. In the latter part of B. C. 211 he drove the Macedonians from the island of Zacynthus, and from Oeniadae and Nasos in Acarnania. He wintered at Corcyra, and in the following spring took Anticyra, when the news of his election to the consulship reached him. Sickness, however, prevented Laevinus from returning to Rome till the beginning of summer. On landing in Italy, he was met by envoys from Capua, charged with complaints against the pro-consul, Q. Fulvius Flaccus [FULVIUS FLACCUS, No. 2]; and by Sicilians, charged with similar complaints against M. Claudius Marcellus, and he entered Rome with a numerous attendance of these appellants, and of delegates from the Aetolian league. Having reported to the senate his three years' administration in Greece, Laevinus was allotted the province of Italy and the war with Hannibal, which, however, he presently exchanged, by mutual consent, with his colleague Marcellus for Sicily, as the Syracusans deprecated the appointment of Marcellus to the government of that island. The debate on the petition of the Syracusans closed with the senate's recommending their interests to Laevinus. An edict, brought forward by the consuls for raising supplies for the fleet, having excited great alarm and indignation among the Roman commonalty and the Italian allies, already overburdened with taxes for the war in Italy, Laevinus proposed that all who had borne curule magistracies, and all members of the senate, should bring voluntarily to the treasury all their gold, silver, and brass, whether coined, wrought, or bullion, except what was required for family sacrifices, or did not consist of the rings of the equites, the bullae of male children, or certain articles of female ornament. His proposal was cheerfully complied with, and quieted the public discontent, and Laevinus departed for Sicily. By the end of autumn Laevinus reported to the senate the complete expulsion of the Carthaginians from the island. The gates of Agrigentum were opened to him by Mutines, a discontented Numidian chief; and of sixty-six other towns, six were stormed by him, twenty were betrayed, and forty voluntarily surrendered to him. Laevinus encouraged or compelled the Sicilians to resume the pursuit of agriculture, that the island might again become one of the granaries of Rome; and finding at Agathyrna a mixed multitude of criminals, deserters, and fugitive slaves, whose presence was dangerous to the public peace, he exported them to Rhegium, where they did the republic good service as a predatory force against Hannibal in Bruttium. The senate then ordered Laevinus to return to Rome, to hold the consular comitia for A. C. 209. But presently after his arrival he was remanded to his province, which was threatened with a fresh invasion from Africa. He was directed to nominate a dictator, to preside at the elections. But on this post Laevinus and the senate were at variance; and this is probably the cause why, notwithstanding his long services, his name does not appear on the triumphal Fasti. Laevinus, indeed, did not refuse to nominate a dictator, but, that he might protect his own term of office, insisted upon making the nomination after his return to Sicily. This, however, was contrary to usage, which required the nomination to be made within the limits of Italy. A tribune of the plebs, therefore, brought in a bill, with the concurrence of the senate, to compel Laevinus's obedience to its orders. But he left Rome abruptly, and the nomination was at length made by his colleague Marcellus. Laevinus continued in Sicily as pro-consul throughout B. C. 209. His army consisted of the remains of Varro's and Cn. Fulvius Flaccus's legions, which, for their respective defeats by Hannibal at Cannae in B. C. 216, and at Herdonia in 212, were sentenced to remain abroad while the war lasted. To these he added a numerous force of Sicilians and Numidians, and a fleet of seventy gallees. His government was vigilant and prosperous; the island was exempt from invasion, and, by the revival of its agriculture, he was enabled to form magazines at Catania, and to supply Rome with corn. In B. C. 208 Laevinus, still pro-consul, crossed over with a hundred gallees to Africa, ravaged the neighbourhood of Clupea, and, after repulsing a Punic fleet, returned with his booty to Lilybaeum. In the following year he repeated the expedition with equal success. His foragers swept round the walls of Utica, and he again defeated a squadron sent to cut off his retreat. In 206 he conducted the armament back to Italy, and on the arrival of Mago in Liguria in the following year was stationed with the two city legions at Arretium in Etruria. Soon afterwards he was sent, with four other commissioners, to Delphi, and to the court of Attalus I. at Pergamus, to fetch the Idaeian mother to Italy. [FALTO, VALERIUS, No. 3.] In 204 he moved in the senate the repayment of the voluntary loan to the treasury made in his consulate six years before. In 203, in the debate on the terms to be granted to Carthage, Laevinus moved that the envoys be dismissed unheard, and the war be prosecuted. His counsel was followed; and it marks Laevinus as belonging to the section of the aristocracy of which the Scipios were the leaders. At the commencement of the first Macedonian war in 201—200, Laevinus was once more sent as proprætor, with a fleet and army, to Northern Greece, and his report of Philip's preparations gave a new impulse to the exertions of the republic. He died in B. C. 200, and his sons Publius and Marcus honoured his memory with funeral games and gladiatorial combats, exhibited during four successive days in the forum. (Polyb. viii. 3. § 6, ix. 27. § 2, xxii. 12. § 11; Liv. xxiii. 24, 30, 32, 33, 34, 37, 38, 43, xxiv. 10, 11, 20, 40, 44, xxv. 3, xxvi. 1, 22, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 36, 40, xxvii. 5, 7, 9, 22, 29, xxviii. 4, 10, 46, xxix. 11, 16, xxx. 23, xxxi. 3, 6, 50; Flor. ii. 7; Just. xxix. 4; Eutrop. iii. 12; Claud. de Bel. Get. 395.)

3. C. VALERIUS LAEVINUS, son of the preceding, was by the mother's side brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul in B. C. 189. Laevinus accompanied his brother to the siege of Ambracia in that year, and the Aetolians, with whom he inherited from his father ties of friendship, chose him for their patron with the consul in behalf of the Ambraciots and the Aetolian league generally. Fulvius allowed of his mediation, granted the Ambraciots and Aetolians unusually favourable terms, and sent him with their envoys to Rome, to dispose the senate and the people to ratify the peace. In B. C. 179 Laevinus was one of the four prætors appointed under the Lex Baebia (Liv. xl. 44; Fest. s. v. Rogat.; comp. Meyer. Or. Rom. Frugm. p. 62), and obtained Sardinia for his province. In B. C. 176 Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus died suddenly, in his year of office, and Laevinus was appointed consul in his room. Eager for military distinction, Laevinus left Rome only three days after his election, to take the command of the Ligurian war. He triumphed over the Ligurians in B. C. 175. In B. C. 174 he was sent, with four other commissioners, to Delphi, to adjust some new dissensions among the Aetolians. In B. C. 173 the senate despatched him to the Macedonian court, to watch the movements of Perseus; and he was instructed to go round by Alexandria, to renew the alliance of Rome with Ptolemy VI. Philometor. He returned from Greece in B. C. 172. In B. C. 169 Laevinus was one of several unsuccessful candidates for the censorship. (Polyb. xxii. 12. § 10, 14. § 2; Liv. xxxviii. 9, 10, xl. 44, xli. 25, xlii. 6, 17, xliii. 14.)

4. P. VALERIUS LAEVINUS, son of the preceding, was one of the prætors in B. C. 177, and obtained for his province a part of Cisalpine Gaul. (Liv. xxxi. 50, xli. 8.) [W. B. D.]

LAEVIUS. That a poet bearing this appellation ought to be included in a list of the more obscure Roman writers is generally admitted, but wherever the name appears in the received text of an ancient author it will invariably be found that some of the MSS. exhibit either Livius, or Laelius, or Naevius, or Novius, or Pacuvius, or several of these, or similar variations. On the other hand, a considerable number of fragments quoted by grammarians from Ennius, Livius (Andronicus), Naevius, and the earlier bards, must, as internal evidence clearly proves, belong to a later epoch; and many of them, it has been supposed, are in reality the property of Laevius; but every circumstance relating to his works and the age when he flourished is involved in such thick darkness that Vossius (De Post. Lat. c. viii.) declared himself unable to establish any fact connected with his history except that he lived before the reign of Charlemagne; while one or two scholars have called his very existence in question. There are in all perhaps only four passages in the classics from which we can be justified in drawing any conclusion. Two are in Aulus Gellius (ii. 24, xix. 9, comp. 7), one in Apuleius (Apolog. p. 294, ed. Elmenhorst), and one in Ausonius (Parcebas. Cent. Nupt. præf.) From these we may infer, with tolerable security, that Laevius flourished during the first half of the century before the Christian era, being the contemporary of Hortensius, Memmius, Cinna, Catullus, Lucretius, and Cicero; and that he was the author of a collection of lyrical pieces of a light amatory stamp, styled Erotopœgnia, which were pronounced by critics to be deficient in simplicity (implicata), and in no way comparable to the easy flowing graces (Auente carminum deliciae) of the Teian Muse.

A fragment extending to six lines has been preserved by Apuleius (l. c.), another of two lines by Gellius (l. c.), and many which may possibly be long to the same or different works have been brought together by Weichert, whose assumptions are, however, in some instances, in the highest degree arbitrary and fanciful. (Weichert, Poetarum Latinorum Reliquiae, 8vo. Lips. 1830; Wüllner, De Laetio Poeta, 4to. Rocklingh. 1830.) [W. R.]

LAEVUS, CISPUS, a friend and legatus of L. Munatius Plancus, and the bearer of confidential letters from him while prefect of Transalpine Gaul, in B.C. 44, to Cicero at Rome. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 18, 21.) From Livy (v. 35, xxxiii. 37) Laevus appears to have been originally a Ligurian name. [W. B. D.]

T. LAFRENIUS, the name of one of the leaders of the allies in the Maric war, B.C. 90. He is called by other writers Afranius. [AFRANIUS, No. 8.]

LAGIUS (Λάγιος), belonged to the Roman party among the Achaeans, and was one of those whom Metellus sent to Diaeus to offer peace, in B.C. 146. For this, Diaeus threw him and his colleagues into prison; but he afterwards released them for a sum of money, especially as the people of Corinth were sufficiently exasperated already by the cruel execution of Sosicrates, the lieutenant-general. (Pol. xl. 4, 5.) [E. E.]

LAGUS (Λάγος). 1. The father, or reputed father, of Ptolemy, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. He married Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon, who was said to have been pregnant at the time of their marriage, on which account the Macedonians generally looked upon Ptolemy as in reality the son of Philip. (Paus. i. 6. § 2; Curt. ix. 8; Suidas. s. v. Λάγος.) From an anecdote recorded by Plutarch (De coh. Ira, 9, p. 458), it is clear that Lagus was a man of obscure birth; hence, when Theocritus (Idyll. xvii. 26) calls Ptolemy a descendant of Hercules, he probably means to represent him as the son of Philip. Lagus appears to have subsequently married Antigone, niece of Antipater, by whom he became the father of Berenice, afterwards the wife of her step-brother Ptolemy. (Schol. ad Theocr. Id. xvii. 34, 61.)

2. A son of Ptolemy I. by the celebrated Athenian courtesan Thaïs. (Athen. xiii. p. 576, e.) [E. H. B.]

LAGON, a beautiful youth beloved by Brutus. He was a frequent subject of artistic representation. (Mart. ix. 51, xiv. 171; Plin. H. N. xxiv. 8.) [C. P. M.]

LA'GORAS (Λαγόρας), a Cretan soldier of fortune, who, when in the service of Ptolemy IV. (Philopator), was sent by Nicolaus, Ptolemy's general, to occupy the passes of Mount Libanus at Berytus, and to check there the advance of Antiochus the Great, who was marching upon Ptolemais, B.C. 219. He was, however, defeated and dislodged from his position by the Syrian king. In B.C. 215, in the war of Antiochus against Achæus, we find Lagoras in the service of the former; and it was through his discovery of an unguarded part of the wall of Sardis, that Antiochus was enabled to take the city, Lagoras being himself one of the select party who forced their way into the town over the portion of the wall in question. (Pol. v. 61, vii. 15—18.) [E. E.]

LAIAS (Λαίας), a son of Oxyllus and Pieria, king of Elis. (Paus. v. 4. § 2, &c.; comp. ASTOLUS, No. 2.) [L. S.]

LAIPPUS. [DAIPPUS.]

LAIIS (Λαίς), a name borne by more than one Grecian Hetaera. Two were celebrated; but, as the ancient writers in their accounts and anecdotes respecting them seldom indicate which they refer to, and where they do draw the distinction, frequently speak of the one, while what they say of her is manifestly applicable only to the other, it is difficult, and sometimes impossible, to decide how to apportion the numerous notices respecting them which have come down to us. Jacobs, who has bestowed some attention on this subject, distinguishes the two following:—

1. The elder Laïs, a native probably of Corinth. Athenæus (xiii. p. 588) says that she was born at Hyccara, in Sicily, but he has probably confounded her with her younger namesake, the daughter of Timandra (Athen. xii. p. 535, c. xiii. p. 574, e.); for Timandra, as we know from Plutarch (Alc. 39), was a native of Hyccara. The elder Laïs lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her age. Her figure was especially admired. (Athen. xiii. p. 587, d. 588, e.) She was notorious also for her avarice and caprice. (Athen. xiii. p. 570, c. 588, c. 585, d.) Amongst her numerous lovers she numbered the philosopher Aristippus. (Athen. xii. 544, xiii. 588), two of whose works were entitled Πρὸς Λαίαν, and Πρὸς Λαίαν περὶ τοῦ κατόπτρου. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 84.) She fell in love with and offered her hand to Eubotas, of Cyrene [ΕΥΒΟΤΑΣ], who, after his victory at Olympia, fulfilled his promise of taking her with him to Cyrene, in word only—he took with him her portrait. (Aelian, V. H. x. 2; Clemens Alex. Strom. iii. p. 447, c.) In her old age she became addicted to drinking. Of her death various stories were told. (Athen. xiii. p. 570, b. d. 587, e.; Phot. cod. exc. p. 146, 23, ed. Bekker.) She died at Corinth, where a monument (a lioness tearing a ram) was erected to her, in the cypress grove called the Κεῖραρον. (Paus. ii. 2. § 4; Athen. xiii. p. 589, c.) Numerous anecdotes of her were current, but they are not worth relating here. (Athen. xiii. p. 582; Auson. Epyg. 17.) Laïs presenting her looking-glass to Aphrodite was a frequent subject of epigrams. (Brunck. Anal. i. p. 170, 7, ii. p. 494, 5; Anthol. Pal. vi. 1, 19.) Her fame was still fresh at Corinth in the time of Pausanias (ii. 2. § 5), and οὗ Κεῖραρον ὄρε Λαίς became a proverb. (Athen. iv. p. 137, d.)

2. The younger Laïs was the daughter of Timandra (see above), who is sportively called Damaspandra in Athenæus (xiii. p. 574, e.). Laïs was probably born at Hyccara in Sicily. According to some accounts she was brought to Corinth when seven years old, having been taken prisoner in the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and bought by a Corinthian. (Plut. l. c.; Paus. ii. 2. § 5; Schol. ad Aristoph. Plat. 179; Athen. xiii. p. 589.) This story however, which involves numerous difficulties, is rejected by Jacobs, who attributes it to a confusion between this Laïs and the elder one of the same name. The story of Apelles having induced her to enter upon the life of a courtesan must have reference to the younger Laïs. (Athen. xiii. p. 588.) She was a contemporary and rival of Phryne. (Athen. p. 588, c.) She became enamoured of a Thessalian named Hippocleides, or Hippostratus, and accompanied him to Thessaly. Here, it is said, some Thessalian women, jealous of her beauty, enticed her into a temple of Aphrodite, and there stoned her to death. (Paus. ii. 2

§ 5; Plut. vol. ii. p. 767, e.; Athen. xiii. p. 589, b.) According to the scholiast on Aristophanes (Plut. 179), a pestilence ensued, which did not abate till a temple was dedicated to Aphrodite Anoxia. She was buried on the banks of the Peneus. The inscription on her monument is preserved by Athenæus (xiii. p. 589). [C. P. M.]

LAIUS (Λαῖος). 1. A son of Laodæus, and father of Oedipus. After his father's death he was placed under the guardianship of Lycus, and on the death of the latter, Laius was obliged to take refuge with Pelops in Peloponnesus. But when Amphion and Zethus, the murderers of Lycus, who had usurped his throne, had lost their lives, Laius returned to Thebes, and ascended the throne of his father. He married Jocaste (Homer calls her Epicaste), and became by her the father of Oedipus, by whom he was slain without being known to him. His body was buried by Damasistratus, king of Plataeae. (Herod. v. 59; Paus. ix. 5. § 2; Apollod. iii. 5. § 5, &c.; Diod. v. 64; comp. Oedipus.)

2. A Cretan, who, together with Aegolius, Celas, and Cerberus, entered the sacred cave of bees in Crete, in order to steal honey. They succeeded in their crime, but perceived the cradle of the infant Zeus, and that instant their brazen armour broke to pieces. Zeus thundered, and wanted to kill them by a flash of lightning; but the Moerae and Themis prevented him, as no one was allowed to be killed on that sacred spot, whereupon the thieves were metamorphosed into birds. (Anton. Lib. 19; Plin. H. N. x. 60, 79.) [L. S.]

LALA, of Cysicus, a female painter, who lived at Rome at the time when M. Varro was a young man (about B. C. 74). She painted with the pencil, and also practised encaustic painting on ivory with the cestrum. Her subjects were principally pictures of women, among which was her own portrait, painted at a mirror. No painter surpassed her in speed. Her works were so highly esteemed as to be preferred to those of Sopolis and Dionysius, whose pictures filled the galleries at Rome. She was never married. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 13.) It is useless to discuss the inferences drawn from the various reading, inventis for juvenis, as there is no authority in any MS. for that reading; and it can hardly be made to give a good meaning. [P. S.]

LALAGE. Under the name of Lauge two distinct persons are intended by Horace. In one ode (i. 22, 10) a wolf appears to the poet as he is singing of his Lauge; but in another ode (ii. 5, 16) an unnamed friend is advised to defer making love to Lauge until she is older. It is evidently not a personal name, but the Greek λαλῶν, prattling, chattering (Oppian, Hal. i. 135), used as a term of endearment, "little prattler," which accords with the tender age of the Horatian damsel. [W. B. D.]

LA'MACHUS (Λαμάχος), son of Xenophanes, in the 8th year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 424, with a detachment of 10 ships from the tribute-collecting squadron, sailed into the Euxine; and coming to harbour at the mouth of the Calæx, near Heracleia, had his ships destroyed by a sudden flood. He succeeded in making his way by land to Chalcædon. (Thuc. iv. 75.) His name recurs in the signatures to the treaties of B. C. 421. And in the 17th year B. C. 415 he appears as colleague of Alcibiades and Nicias, in the great Sicilian expedition. In the consultation held at Egæsta on their first arrival, in which Nicias proposed a return to Athens and Alcibiades negotiation, Lamachus, while preferring of these two plans the latter, urged, as his own judgment, an immediate attack on Syracuse, and the occupation of Megara, as the base for future attempts, advice which in him may have been prompted less by counsel than courage, but which undoubtedly was the wisest, and would almost certainly have been attended with complete success. In the following year, soon after the investment was commenced, he fell in a sally of the besieged, in advancing against which he had entangled himself amongst some dykes, and got parted from his troops. The loss of his activity and vigour must have been severely felt: his death was one of those many contingencies, each one of which may be thought to have singly turned the scale in the Syracusan contest. (Thuc. vi. 8, 49, 101.)

Lamachus appears amongst the dramatic personae of Aristophanes (Ach. 565, &c. 960, 1070, &c.) as the brave and somewhat blustering soldier, delighting in the war, and thankful, moreover, for its pay. Plutarch, in like manner, describes him as brave and honest, and a hero in the field; but so poor, and so ill-provided, that on every fresh appointment he used to beg for money from the government to buy clothing and shoes; and this dependent position he thinks made him backward to take a part of his own, and deferential to his colleagues—Nicias, perhaps, in especial. (Plut. Nic. 16, cf. ib. 12, 13, and Alcib. 18, 20, 21.) Plato also speaks of his valour. (Lach. p. 188.)

If we may trust a passage of Plutarch (Pericles, 20), Lamachus, in an expedition made by Pericles into the Euxine, was left there in charge of 13 ships, to assist the people of Sinope against their tyrant, Timesilaus; after the expulsion of whom the town received 600 Athenian colonists. The precise date of this occurrence can hardly be established: in Plutarch's narrative, it is previous to the Thirty Years' Peace of B. C. 445. He must therefore have been an old man at the time of his last command. [A. H. C.]

LA'MEDON (Λαμέδων), a son of Coronus, and husband of Pheno, by whom he became the father of Zeuxippe. He was the successor of Epopeus in the kingdom of Sicily. (Pausan. ii. 5, in fin., 6, 2.) [L. S.]

LA'MIA (Λαμία). 1. A daughter of Poseidon, became by Zeus the mother of the Sibyl Herophile. (Paus. x. 12. § 1; Plut. de Pyth. Orac. 9.)

2. A female phantom, by which children were frightened. According to tradition, she was originally a Libyan queen, of great beauty, and a daughter of Belus. She was beloved by Zeus, and Hera in her jealousy robbed her of her children. Lamia, from revenge and despair, robbed others of their children, and murdered them; and the savage cruelty in which she now indulged rendered her ugly, and her face became fearfully distorted. Zeus gave her the power of taking her eyes out of her head, and putting them in again. (Diod. xx. 41; Suidas, s. v.; Plut. de Curia. 2; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 757; Strab. i. p. 19.) Some ancients called her the mother of Scylla. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1714; Arist. de Mor. vii. 5.) In later times Lamiae were conceived as handsome ghostly women, who by voluptuous artifices attracted young men, in order to enjoy their fresh, youthful, and pure flesh and blood. They were thus in ancient times what the vampires are in modern legends.

(Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iv. 25; Horat. de Art. Poet. 340; Isidor. Orig. viii. 11; Apulei. Met. i. p. 57; comp. Spanheim, ad Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 67; EMPURA and MORMOLYCE.) [L. S.]

LA'MIA (Admia), a celebrated Athenian courtesan, daughter of Cleanor. She commenced her career as a flute-player on the stage, in which profession she attained considerable celebrity, but afterwards abandoned it for that of a hetæra. We know not by what accident she found herself on board of the fleet of Ptolemy at the great sea-fight off Salamis (B.C. 306), but it was on that occasion that she fell into the hands of the young Demetrius, over whom she quickly obtained the most unbounded influence. Though then already past her prime, she so completely captivated the young prince, that her sway continued unbroken for many years, notwithstanding the numerous rivals with whom she had to contend. It was apparently not so much to her beauty as to her wit and talents that she owed her power; the latter were celebrated by the comic writers as well as the historians of the period, and many anecdotes concerning her have been transmitted to us by Plutarch and Athenæus. Like most persons of her class, she was noted for her profusion, and the magnificence of the banquets which she gave to Demetrius was celebrated even in those times of wanton extravagance. In one instance, however, she is recorded to have made a better use of the treasures which were lavished upon her by her lover with almost incredible profusion, and built a splendid portico for the citizens of Sicyon, probably at the period when their city was in great measure rebuilt by Demetrius. Among the various flatteries invented by the Athenians to please Demetrius was that of consecrating a temple in honour of Lamia, under the title of Aphrodite, and their example was followed by the Thebans. (Plut. Demetr. 16, 19, 24, 25, 27; Athen. iii. p. 101, i. p. 128, vi. p. 253, xiii. p. 577, xiv. p. 615; Aelian. V. H. xii. 17, xiii. 9.) According to Athenæus, she had a daughter by Demetrius, who received the name of Phila. Diogenes Laërtius (v. 76) mentions that Demetrius Phalereus also cohabited with a woman named Lamia, whom he calls an Athenian of noble birth. If this story be not altogether a mistake, which seems not improbable, the Lamia meant must be distinct from the subject of the present article. [E. H. B.]

LA'MIA, a family of the Aelia gens, which claimed a high antiquity, and pretended to be descended from the mythical hero, Lamus. [LAMUS.] No member of this family is, however, mentioned till the end of the republic, but it was reckoned under the empire one of the noblest families in Rome. (Hor. Carm. iii. 17; Juv. iv. 154, vi. 385.)

1. L. AELIUS LAMIA, was of equestrian rank, and distinguished himself by the zealous support which he afforded to Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy. So great were his services that he was marked out for vengeance by the popular party, and was accordingly banished (relegatus) by the influence of the consuls Gabinus and Piso in B.C. 58. He was subsequently recalled from exile; and during the civil wars he appears to have espoused Caesar's party, since we find that he obtained the aedileship in B.C. 45. During this time he lived on intimate terms with Cicero, and there are two letters of the latter to Brutus, intreating Brutus to use his influence to assist Lamia in his canvass for the praetorship. He seems to have carried his election, and would have been praetor in B.C. 43, the year in which Cicero was put to death. (Cic. pro Sext. 12, in Pison. 27, post Red. in Sen. 5, ad Att. xiii. 45, ad Fam. xi. 16, 17.) This Lamia seems to be the same as the L. Lamia, praetorius or, who is said to have been placed upon the funeral pile as if dead, and then to have recovered his senses, and to have spoken after the fire was lighted, when it was too late to save him from death. (Val. Max. i. 8. § 12; Plin. H. N. vii. 52.)

Lamia was the founder of his family, to whom he appears to have bequeathed considerable wealth, which was acquired by his commercial speculations as a Roman eque. We see from a letter of Cicero to Q. Cornificius that Lamia must have had extensive commercial transactions in Asia (ad Fam. xii. 29); and his gardens at Rome (Horti Lamiani), which Cicero speaks of (ad Att. xii. 21), were a well-known spot even in the time of the emperor Caligula. (Suet. Calig. 59.)

2. L. AELIUS LAMIA, the son of the preceding, and the friend of Horace, was consul in A.D. 3. He was appointed by Tiberius governor of Syria, but was never allowed to enter upon the administration of his province. On the death of L. Pius in A.D. 32, Lamia succeeded him in the office of praefectus urbi, but he died in the following year, A.D. 33, and was honoured with a censor's funeral (Dion Cass. lvi. 19; Tac. Ann. vi. 27.) Two of Horace's odes are addressed to him. (Carm. i. 26, iii. 17.)

3. L. AELIUS LAMIA ARMILIANUS, belonged originally, as we see from the last name, to the gens Aemilia, and was adopted into the gens Aelia. He was consul suffectus in A.D. 80 in the reign of Titus, and was originally married to Domitia Longina, the daughter of Corbulo; but during the lifetime of Vespasian he was deprived of her by Domitian, who first lived with her as his mistress and subsequently married her. [DOMITIA LONGINA.] Lamia was put to death by Domitian after his accession to the throne. (Dion Cass. lvi. 3; Suet. Dom. 1, 10; Juv. iv. 154.) Lamia's full name was L. Aelius Plantius Lamia. (Marini. Atti degli frat. arv. i. tav. xxiii. 25, p. cxxx and 222.)

LAMISCUS (Admiskos), of Samos, is quoted by Palaephatus (De Incred. init. p. 268, ed. Westermann) as a writer repl. deliriorum. There is a Pythagorean of this name mentioned in a letter of Archytas to the tyrant Dionysius the younger. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 22.)

LA'MIUS or LAMUS (Admos), a son of Hercules and Omphale, from whom the Thessalians town of Lamia was believed to have derived its name. (Diod. iv. 31; Steph. Byz. s. vv. Lamia, Βάργαρον; Or. Heroid. ix. 54.) [L. S.]

LAMPA'DIO, C. OCTA'VIUS, a Roman grammarian, who divided into seven books the poem of Naevius on the first Punic war, which had not been divided by its author into books. (Suet. de Illust. Gramm. 2.)

LAMPA'DIUS, a Roman senator, who made himself conspicuous by the boldness of his patriotic and political principles, at a time when the Roman senate was renowned for its servility. In A.D. 408, the Gothic king Alaric offered his services to the emperor Honorius, on condition of receiving in reward several provinces, and an annual tribute of 4000 pieces of gold. Stilicho, who had been carrying on intrigues with Alaric, to the disadvantage of Rome, proposed in the senate to accept those conditions, since the troubles by which Gaul was then shaken could not be quelled without the aid of the Goths. But Lampadius boldly rose, and, using the words of Cicero, "Non est ista pax, sed pectio servitutis!" violently opposed the conclusion of such a degrading convention. The motion of Stilicho was nevertheless carried by the timid senate, and Lampadius was compelled to take sanctuary in a church. Lampadius had a brother, Theodorus, who is likewise favourably spoken of. (Zosim. pp. 535, 536, ed. Oxford, 1679.) [W. P.]

LAMPETIA (Λαμπετή), a daughter of Helios by the nymph Neaera. After her birth she and her sister Phaetusa were carried to Sicily, in order there to watch over the herds of their father. Some call Lampetia a sister of Phaeton. (Hom. Od. xii. 132, &c.; 374, &c.; Propert. iii. 12, 29; Hygin. Fab. 154; Ov. Met. ii. 349.) [L. S.]

LAMPIDO, or LAMPITO. [Λαοτχιδης.]

LAMPON (Λαμων). 1. A native of Aegina, son of Pytheas [Πυθηας], mentioned by Herodotus (ix. 78) as having urged Pausanias after the battle of Plataea to avenge the death of Leonidas by insulting and mutilating the corpse of Mar-donius.

2. An Athenian, a celebrated soothsayer and interpreter of oracles. Cratinus satirized him in his comedy entitled Ἀπαρτίτες (Meineke, Fragm. Com. ii. 1. p. 42, 51). Aristophanes also alludes to him (Ae. 521, 988). Plutarch (Per. 6) has a story of his foretelling the ascendancy of Pericles over Thucydides and his party. In a. c. 444, Lampon, in conjunction with Xenocritus, led the colony which founded Thurii on the site of the ancient Sybaris. (Diod. xii. 10; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 331, Ae. 521, Pax, 1083; Suidas, s. v. Σωποδάριος.) The name Lampon is found amongst those who took the oaths to the treaty of peace made between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians in a. c. 421. (Thuc. v. 19, 24.) Whether this was the soothsayer of that name, or not, we have no means of deciding. [C. P. M.]

M. LAMPONIUS, a Lucanian, was one of the principal captains of the Italians in the war of the allies with Rome, a. c. 90—88. He commanded in his native province at the breaking out of the war, since he drove P. Licinius Crassus [CRASSUS, LUCINIUS, No. 14] with great loss into Grumentum. (Front. Strat. ii. 4, 16.) In the last war with Sulla, a. c. 83—2, when the Samnites and Lucanians had become the allies of the Marian party at Rome, Lamponius was the companion of Pontius of Telesia in his march upon the capital. After victory finally declared for Sulla at the Colline gate, Lamponius disappeared with the herd of fugitives. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 41, 90, 93; Plut. Sull. 29; Flor. iii. 21; Eutrop. v. 8.) Ἀλπίσιος in Diodorus (xxxvii. Eolog. i.) is a misreading for Lamponius. [W. B. D.]

LAMPRIAS (Λαμπρίας), a name which occurs three times in the history of the family of Plutarch of Chaeroneia.

1. The grandfather of Plutarch. (Anton. 28; De Defect. Orac. 8, 88, 46, &c.; Sympos. i. 5, v. 5, ix. 2.)

2. A brother of Plutarch, and a follower of the Peripatetic philosophy. (Sympos. i. 2, 8, ii. 2, viii. 6.)

3. A son of Plutarch, who, according to Suidas (s. v. Λαμπρίας), made a list of all his father's works. This list, which is still extant, was first published by D. Hoeschelius, from a Florentine MS., and afterwards reprinted in the Frankfort edition of Plutarch's works. It is also printed in Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 159, &c., with some additions and alterations from a Venetian MS. But this list, though it is preceded by a letter in which the author calls himself a son of Plutarch, can scarcely be the production of so near a relation and contemporary of Plutarch, for it contains works which are acknowledged by all to have been written many centuries later, perhaps not long before the time of Suidas. It is, however, not impossible that the titles of these spurious works may have been introduced by a later hand, and that the groundwork may really be the work of Lamprias, a son of Plutarch. (Comp. A. Schäfer, Comment. de Libro Vit. Decem Orator. p. 2, &c.)

Another person of the name of Lamprias, though it is perhaps only a fictitious person, occurs in Lucian. (Dialog. Meretr. 3.) [L. S.]

LAMPRIIDIUS AELIUS, one of the six "Scriptores Historiae Augustae" [CAPITOLINUS]. His name is prefixed to the biographies of, 1. Commodus; 2. Antoninus Diadumenus; 3. Elagabalus, and 4. Alexander Severus; of which the first and third are inscribed to Diocletian, the second to no one, the fourth to Constantine. In the Palatine MS. all the lives from Hadrianus down to Alexander Severus inclusive are attributed to Aelius Spartianus, and hence Salmasius has conjectured, with great plausibility, that he is one and the same with Lamprius, and that the name of the author in full was Aelius Lamprius Spartianus, a supposition in some degree confirmed by the circumstance that Vopiscus, in referring to the writers who had preceded him, makes special mention of Trebellius Pollio, Julius Capitolinus, and Aelius Lamprius; but says not a word of Spartianus. Be that as it may, if we examine carefully the lives of Commodus and Diadumenus, we can scarcely avoid the conclusion that they are from the same pen with those of M. Aurelius and Macrinus, both of which are ascribed to Capitolinus. Again, the dedication of the Elagabalus to Diocletian is manifestly erroneous, for in two places (c. 2, 84) Constantine is directly addressed, and in the latter passage the author announces an intention, which he repeats in Alexander Severus (c. 64), of continuing his undertaking down to the time of Constantine. We have in a former article [CAPITOLINUS] remarked that it is impossible, in the absence of all trustworthy evidence, to assign the pieces which form this collection with any certainty to their real owners. For the editions, translations, &c., of Lamprius, see CAPITOLINUS. [W. R.]

LAMPROCLES (Λαμπροκλής). 1. The eldest son of Socrates. (Xen. Mem. ii. 2; Cobet. Protop. Xenoph. p. 57.)

2. An Athenian dithyrambic poet and musician, from whom Athenaeus quotes a few words (xi. p. 491, c.). Plutarch mentions an improvement which he made in the musical strain called Mixolydian (De Music. 16, p. 1136, e, f.). A scholiast on Plato makes him the pupil of Agathocles, and the teacher of Damon. (Schol. in Plat. Alcib. i. p. 387, Bekker.) The ode to Pallas, which is referred to by Aristophanes (Nub. 967), was ascribed to Lamprocles by Phrynichus, though Eratosthenes and others ascribed it to Phrynichus himself, while some made Stesichorus its author. (Schol. in Aristoph. l. c.) The scholiast who makes this statement calls Lamprocles the son or disciple of Midon. Thus much is evident from all accounts, that Lamprocles practised a severe style both of poetry and music, and that he belongs to a good period of those arts, probably the sixth, or, at the latest, the beginning of the fifth century B. C. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 127; Schmidt, Diatrib. in Dithyramb. pp. 138—143; Schneidewin, Delect. Poët. Græc. p. 462.) [P. S.]

LAMPRUS (Λαμπρός), the husband of Galateia. [GALATEIA, No. 2.] [L. S.]

LAMPURUS (Λαμπύρος). 1. A teacher of music at Athens in the youth of Socrates, who is made by Plato to mention him with a sort of ironical praise, as second only to Cœmus. (Menex. p. 236; comp. Ath. x. p. 506, f.) We learn from other sources that he was very celebrated as a musician. (Ath. ii. p. 44, d.; Plut. de Mus. 31, p. 1142; Nepos, Epam. 2.) He is said to have been the teacher of Sophocles in music and dancing. (Ath. i. p. 20, f.; Vit. Soph.) This statement, and the reference to his death by Phrynichus (ap. Ath. ii. p. 44, d.), fix his time to the former part of the fifth century B. C.

2. Of Erythræ, a Peripatetic philosopher, who is mentioned by Suidas as the teacher of Aristoxenus. (Suid. s. v. Ἀριστοτέλεως.)

3. A grammarian mentioned in the Magna Moralia ascribed to Aristotle, ii. 7. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 128.) [P. S.]

LAMPTER (Λαμπτήρ), i. e. the shining or torch-bearer, a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Pellene in Achaia, where a festival called Λαμπτήρια was celebrated in his honour. (Paus. vii. 27. § 2.) [L. S.]

LAMPUS (Λαμύρος). 1. One of the sons of Aegyptus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

2. A son of Laomedon, and father of Dolops, was one of the Trojan elders. (Hom. Il. iii. 147, xv. 536, xx. 238.)

3. The name of two horses, one belonging to Eos (Hom. Od. xxiii. 246; Fulgent. Myth. i. 11), the other to Hector. (Hom. Il. viii. 185.) [L. S.]

LAMUS (Λαμύρος), a son of Poseidon, was king of the Laestrygonæ. (Hom. Od. x. 81; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1649; Horat. Carm. iii. 17, 1; comp. LAMUS.) [L. S.]

LAMY'NTHIUS (Λαμύνθιος), of Miletus, a Greek poet of uncertain age, who celebrated in a lyric poem the praises of his mistress Lyde. (Athen. xiii. p. 597, a.)

LANASSA (Λανασσα), daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse, was married to Pyrrhus, king of Epeirus, to whom she brought as her dower the important island of Coreyra, which had been lately acquired by Agathocles. She became the mother of two sons, Alexander, the successor of Pyrrhus, and Helenus; but, indignant at finding herself neglected by her husband for his other two wives, who were both of barbarian origin [PYRRHUS], she withdrew to Coreyra, and sent to Demetrius, king of Macedonia, to offer him at once her hand and the possession of the island. Demetrius accepted her proposal, and sailing to Coreyra, celebrated his nuptials with her, left a garrison in the island, and returned to Macedonia. This was shortly before the war that terminated in his final overthrow, probably in 288 B. C. (Plut. Pyrrh. 9, 10; Diod. Exc. Hæsch. xxi. p. 490, xxii. p. 496; Justin. xxiii. 3.) [E. H. B.]

LANA'TUS, the name of a family of the Menenia gens, which was of great distinction in the earliest ages of the republic. Livy (ii. 32), speaking of Agrippa Menenius Lanatus [see below, No. 1], says that he was sprung from the plebs; but as this Agrippa had been consul, and this dignity was not yet open to the plebeians, it is certain that he must have been a patrician, and, consequently, if the statement of Livy is correct, the Lanati must have been made patricians, probably during the reign of one of the later Roman kings.

1. AGRIPPA MENENIUS C. F. LANATUS, consul, B. C. 503, with P. Postumius Tubertus, conquered the Sabines and obtained the honour of a triumph on account of his victory. In the struggles between the patricians and plebeians he is represented as a man of moderate views, who had the good fortune, rarely to be found in civil strife, of being beloved and trusted by both parties. It was owing to his mediation that the first great rupture between the patricians and plebeians, when the latter seceded to the Sacred Mount, was brought to a happy and peaceful termination in B. C. 493; and it was upon this occasion he is said to have related to the plebeians his well-known fable of the belly and its members. He died at the latter end of this year, and as he did not leave sufficient property for defraying the expenses of any but a most ordinary funeral, he was buried at the public expense in a most splendid manner: the plebeians had made voluntary contributions for the purpose, which were given to the children of Lanatus, after the senate had insisted that the expenses of the funeral should be paid from the treasury. (Liv. ii. 16, 32, 33; Dionys. v. 44—47, vi. 49—89, 96; Zonar. vii. 13, 14.)

2. T. MENENIUS AGRIPPÆ F. C. N. LANATUS, son of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 477 with C. Horatius Pulvillus. It was during this year that the Fabii were cut off by the Etruscans at Cremera, and T. Lanatus, who was encamped only a short way off at the time, allowed them to be destroyed in accordance with the wishes of the ruling party in the senate. He paid, however, dearly for this act of treachery. The Etruscans flushed with victory defeated his army, and took possession of the Janiculum; and in the following year the tribunes brought him to trial for having neglected to assist the Fabii. As they did not wish for the blood of the son of their great benefactor, the punishment was to be only a fine of 2000 asses. Lanatus was condemned; and he took his punishment so much to heart, that he shut himself up in his house and died of grief. (Liv. ii. 51, 52; Dionys. ix. 18—27; Diod. xi. 53; Gell. xvii. 21.)

3. T. MENENIUS AGRIPPÆ F. AGRIPPÆ N. LANATUS, called by Livy Titus, and by Dionysius Lucius, but by the other authorities Titus, was consul with P. Sestius Capitolinus Vaticanus, B. C. 452, the year before the first decemvirate. (Liv. iii. 32; Dionys. x. 54; Diod. xii. 22.) It appears from Festus (s. v. paculatus) that the consuls of this year had something to do with the lex Aternia Tarpeia, which had been passed two years previously, but the passage in Festus, as it stands at present, is not intelligible.

son of No. 2 and grandson of No. 1, was consul in a. c. 440, with Proculus Geganius Macerinus. During their consulship there was a great famine at Rome; and a praefectus annonae was for the first time appointed, in the person of L. Minucius Augurinus [AUGURINUS, No. 5], though it was not till the following year that the great struggle between the patricians and Sp. Maelius came to a head. (Liv. iv. 12; Diod. xii. 36.)

5. AGRIPPA MENENIUS T. F. AGRIPPÆ N. LANATUS, a brother of No. 4, was consul in B. C. 439, with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus; but they had little to do with the government, as T. Quintius was forced to nominate Cincinnatus as dictator, in order to crush Sp. Maelius. Lanatus was one of the consular tribunes in B. C. 419, and a second time in 417. (Liv. iv. 13, 44, 47; Diod. xii. 37, xiii. 7.)

6. L. MENENIUS LANATUS, was consular tribune four times, first in B. C. 387, secondly in 380, thirdly in 378, and fourthly in 376. (Liv. vi. 5, 27; Diod. xv. 24, 50, 71.)

LANGARUS, king of the Agriani, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, with whom he ingratiated himself even before the death of Philip. He rendered Alexander important services shortly after his accession, in his expedition against the Illyrians and Taulantians, when the Autariatae were preparing to attack him on his march. Langarus by an invasion of their territory prevented them from carrying their purpose into effect. Alexander conferred on him the most distinguished marks of his regard and favour, and promised him his half-sister Cynane in marriage; but Langarus died soon after his return home. (Arrian, i. 5.) [C. P. M.]

LANICE (Λανίκη), the nurse of Alexander the Great. She was the sister of Cleitus. [CLEITUS.] (Arrian, iv. 9; Athen. iv. p. 129.) By Curtius (viii. 1) she is called Hellenice. Her two sons accompanied Alexander on his Asiatic expedition, and had fallen in battle before the death of Cleitus. According to Curtius they fell at the storming of Miletus. One of her sons was named Proteas. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 26; Athen. i. α.) He is mentioned as having been greatly addicted to drinking, a propensity which his descendants seem to have inherited from him. A Proteas, son of Andronicus, is mentioned by Arrian (ii. 2); but the statement of Curtius, above referred to, is against our supposing him to be the son of Lanice, as the capture of Miletus took place before the occasion on which he is mentioned by Arrian. [C. P. M.]

LAOCOON (Λαοκόων), a Trojan hero, who plays a prominent part in the post-Homeric legends about Troy, especially in the Iliou péris, the substance of which is preserved in Proclus's Chrestomathia. He was a son of Antenor (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 347) or of Acoetes (Hygin. Fab. 135), and a priest of the Thymbræan Apollo, or, according to others, of Poseidon. (Tzet. l. c.; comp. Virg. Aen. ii. 201, with Serv. note.) His story runs as follows:—As the Greeks were unable to take Troy by force, they pretended to sail home, leaving behind the wooden horse. While the Trojans were assembled around the horse, deliberating whether they should draw it into their city or destroy it, Laocoon hastened to them from the city, and loudly cautioned them against the danger which it might bring upon them. While saying this he thrust his lance into the side of the horse.

(Virg. Aen. ii. 40, &c.) The Trojans, however, resolved to draw it into the city, and rejoiced at the peace which they thought they had gained at length, with sacrifices and feasting. In the meantime Sinon, who had been taken prisoner, was brought before the Trojans, and by his cunning treachery he contrived to remove every suspicion from himself and the wooden horse. When he had finished his speech, and Laocoon was preparing to sacrifice a bull to Poseidon, suddenly two fearful serpents were seen swimming towards the Trojan coast from Tenedos. They rushed towards Laocoon, who, while all the people took to flight, remained with his two sons standing by the altar of the god. (Virg. l. c. 229; Hygin. Fab. 135.) The serpents first entwined the two boys, and then the father, who went to the assistance of his children, and all three were killed. (Virg. Aen. ii. 199—227; comp. Q. Smyrn. xii. 398, &c.; Lycoph. 347.) The serpents then hastened to the acropolis of Troy, and disappeared behind the shield of Tritonia. The reason why Laocoon suffered this fearful death is differently stated. According to Virgil, the Trojans thought that it was because he had run his lance into the side of the horse, but according to others because, contrary to the will of Apollo, he had married and begotten children (Hygin. l. c.), or because Poseidon, being hostile to the Trojans, wanted to show to the Trojans in the person of Laocoon what fate all of them deserved.

The sublime story of the death of Laocoon was a fine subject for epic and lyric as well as tragic poets, and was therefore frequently treated by ancient poets, such as Bacchylides, Sophocles, Euphorion, Lysimachus, the Pseudo-Peisander, Virgil, Petronius, Quintus Smyrnaeus, and others. But Laocoon is equally celebrated in the history of ancient art, as in that of ancient poetry; and a magnificent group, representing the father with his two sons entwined by the two serpents, is still extant. It was discovered in 1506, in the time of pope Julius II., at Rome, in the Sette Sale, on the side of the Esquiline hill; and the pope, who knew how to appreciate its value, purchased it from the proprietor of the ground where it had been found, for an annual pension, which he granted to him and his family. This group excited the greatest admiration from the moment it was discovered, and may be seen at Rome in the Vatican. Good casts of it exist in all the museums of Europe. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 4, 11), who calls it the masterwork of all art, says that it adorned the palace of the emperor Titus, and that it is the work of the Rhodian artists Agesander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus. He further states that the whole group consists of one block of marble, but a more accurate observation shows that it consists of five pieces. Respecting the excellent taste and wisdom which the artists have displayed in this splendid work, see Lessing, Laocoon oder über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie; Heyne, Antiquarische Aufsätze, ii. p. 1—52; Thiersch, Epochen, p. 522; Welcker, das Academ. Kunstmuseum zu Bonn, p. 27, &c.

Another personage of the name of Laocoon is mentioned among the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 192.) [L. S.]

LAOCOOSA (Λαοκόωσα), the wife of Aphaereus, and mother of Idas. (Theocrit. xxii. 206; comp. Apollod. iii. 10. § 3, who, however, calls the mother of Idas Arene.) [L. S.]

LAO'DAMAS (Λαοδάμας) 1. A son of Alc-

nous, king of the Phaeacians, and Arete, was the favourite of his father. (Hom. Od. vii. 170, viii. 116, &c., 130, 370.)

2. A son of Antenor, was slain at Troy by the Telamonian Ajax. (Hom. Il. xv. 516.)

3. A son of Eteocles, and king of Thebes: in his youth he had been under the guardianship of Creon. (Paus. i. 39. § 2.) It was in his reign that the Epigoni marched against Thebes. Laodamas offered them a battle on the river Glisas, and slew their leader Aegialeus, but he himself was killed by Alcmaeon. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 3.) Others related, that after the battle was lost, Laodamas fled in the night with the remnant of his army, and took refuge in the territory of the Encheleians in Illyricum. (Paus. ix. 5. § 7; Herod. v. 61.) [L. S.]

LAODAMEIA (Λαοδάμεια). 1. A daughter of Bellerophon, became by Zeus the mother of Sarpedon, and was killed by Artemis while she was engaged in weaving. (Hom. Il. vi. 197—205.)

2. A daughter of Acastus, and wife of Proteusilaus. As the latter, shortly after his marriage, joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy, and was the first that was killed there, Laodameia sued for the favour of the gods to be allowed to converse with him only for three hours. The request was granted: Hermes led Proteusilaus back to the upper world, and when Proteusilaus died a second time, Laodameia died with him. (Ov. Heroid. xiii. Ep. ex Pont. iii. 1, 110; Catull. 64. 74, &c.; Lucian, Dial. Mort. xxiii. 1; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 447.) A later tradition states, that after the second death of Proteusilaus, Laodameia made an image of her husband, to which she paid divine honours; but as her father Acastus interfered, and commanded her to burn the image, she herself leaped into the fire. (Hygin. Fab. 103, 104.)

3. A daughter of Amyclaeus and Diomedes, and the mother of Triphylus by Arcas. (Paus. x. 9. § 3.) Some writers call her Leaneira. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1.)

4. The nurse of Orestes, is also called Arsinoe. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xi. 25; ad Aeschyl. Choeph. 731; comp. ARSINOE.)

5. A daughter of Alcmaeon, and wife of Peleus. (Schol. ad Hom. Il. ii. 684.) [L. S.]

LAODICE (Λαοδίκη). 1. A Hyperborean maiden, who, together with Hyperoche, and five companions, was sent from the country of the Hyperboreans to carry sacrifices to the island of Delos. (Herod. iv. 33.)

2. A nymph, by whom Phoroneus became the father of Apis and Niobe. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1.)

3. A daughter of Cinyrae, and the mother of Stymphalus and Pereus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1, 14. § 3.)

4. A daughter of Priam and Hecabe, and the wife of Helicaon. (Hom. Il. iii. 123; Paus. x. 26.) According to another tradition, she was the beloved of Acamas, the son of Theseus, who, with Diomedes, went as ambassador to Troy, and by whom she became the mother of Munitus. (Parthen. Erot. 16.) On the death of this son, Laodice, in her grief, leaped down a precipice (Lycoph. 497), or was swallowed up by the earth. (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 513, 547.) Pausanias (l. c.) saw her represented in the Lesche of Delphi, among the captive Trojan women. Hyginus (Fab. 101) calls her the wife of Telephus.

5. A daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaem-nestra (Hom. Il. ix. 146), but the tragic poets call her Electra. (Hesych. s. v.; ELECTRA.)

6. A daughter of Agapenor, who founded a sanctuary of the Paphian Aphrodite at Tegea, and sent to Athens Alea a peplos from Cyprus. (Paus. viii. 5. § 2, 53. § 2.) [L. S.]

LAODICE (Λαοδίκη). 1. Wife of Antiochus, a general of distinction in the service of Philip of Macedon, and mother of Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian monarchy. It was pretended, in consequence of a dream which she had, that Apollo was the real father of her child. (Justin. xv. 4.) No less than five cities were founded by Seleucus in different parts of his dominions, which bore in her honour the name of Laodicea. (Appian, Syr. 57.)

2. Wife of Antiochus II. Theos, king of Syria, and mother of Seleucus Callinicus. According to Eusebius (Euseb. Arm. p. 164), she was a daughter of Achaeus, probably the same as the father of Antiochia, who was mother of Attalus I. king of Pergamus. (See Clinton. P. H. iii. pp. 310, 401.) The statement of Polyaeus (viii. 50), that she was a daughter of Antiochus Soter, though followed by Froelich (Ann. Reg. Syriac. p. 26), is probably erroneous. (See Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. p. 257; Droysen, Hellenism. ii. p. 317.) By the peace concluded between Antiochus and Ptolemy Philadelphus (a. c. 248), it was agreed that the former should marry Berenice, the sister of the Egyptian monarch, and should not only put away Laodice, but declare her children illegitimate. Antiochus complied for a time, but as soon as he heard of the death of Ptolemy he hastened to recall Laodice and her children. The latter, however, either mistrusting her husband's constancy, and apprehensive of a second change, or in revenge for the slight already put upon her, took an early opportunity to put an end to his life by poison (a. c. 246); at the same time artfully concealing his death until she had taken all necessary measures, and was able to establish her son Seleucus at once upon the throne. Her next step was to order the execution of her rival Berenice and her infant son, who were put to death in the sacred grove of Daphne, where they had taken refuge. An incidental notice, preserved to us by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 593), shows that these were far from being the only victims sacrificed to her vengeance. But she did not long retain the power acquired by so many crimes. The people of Syria broke out into revolt; and Ptolemy Evergetes having invaded the kingdom, to avenge his sister's fate, overran almost the whole country. According to Appian, Laodice herself fell into his hands, and was put to death; Plutarch, on the contrary (De Fratrum. Amor. 18, p. 489), represents her as surviving this war, and afterwards stimulating her youngest son, Antiochus Hierax, to make war on his brother Seleucus. (Appian, Syr. 63, 66; Justin. xxvii. 1; Polyaeus. xiii. 50; Hieronym. ad Daniel. xi.; Val. Max. ix. 14, ext. 91; Plin. H. N. vii. 10.) Besides these two sons, Laodice had two daughters, one of whom was married to Mithridates IV., king of Pontus, the other to Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia. (Euseb. Arm. p. 164.) Both of these are called by different authors Stratonice; but Niebuhr has conjectured (Kl. Schrift. p. 261) that only one of them really bore that name, and the other that of Laodice.

3. Wife of Seleucus Callinicus, was, according to the express statement of Polybius (iv. 81, vii.

22), a sister of Andromachus, the father of Achæus. It seems not improbable that she was a niece of the preceding, but Niebuhr (KL Schrift. p. 263), who calls her so, has erroneously made her daughter of Andromachus, instead of his sister, and Droysen (Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 347) has fallen into the same mistake. Great confusion certainly exists concerning the two, but there seems no reason to doubt the authority of Polybius; and we have no evidence that the Achæus who is mentioned by Eusebius as father of No. 2, was the same as the father of Andromachus. She was the mother of Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great.

4. Wife of Antiochus the Great, was a daughter of Mithridates IV., king of Pontus, and granddaughter of No. 2. She was married to Antiochus soon after his accession, about B. C. 222, and proclaimed queen by him at Antioch before he set out on his expedition against Molon. The birth of her eldest son, Antiochus, took place during the absence of the king on that expedition. (Polyb. v. 43, 55.) She was the mother of four other sons, and four daughters, who will be found enumerated under ANTIOCHUS III.

5. Wife of Achæus, the cousin and adversary of Antiochus the Great, was a sister of the preceding, being also a daughter of Mithridates IV., king of Pontus. (Polyb. viii. 22.) When Achæus fell into the power of Antiochus (A. C. 214) Laodice was left in possession of the citadel of Sardis, in which she held out for a time, but was quickly compelled by the dissensions among her own troops to surrender to Antiochus. (Id. viii. 23.) Polybius incidentally mentions that this princess was brought up before her marriage at Selge, in Pisidia, under the care of Loghasia, a citizen of that place. (Id. v. 74.)

6. Daughter of Antiochus the Great by his wife Laodice [No. 4]. She was married to her eldest brother Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime, A. C. 195. (Appian, Syr. 4; Liv. xxxv. 15.) Froelich supposes her to have been afterwards married to her younger brother Seleucus IV., and to have been the mother of Demetrius Soter, but there appears to be no authority for this statement.

7. Daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was married to Perseus, king of Macedonia. (Polyb. xvi. 7; Liv. xliii. 12; Inscr. Del. op. Marm. Arandel. No. 41.) The marriage is spoken of by Polybius in the year B. C. 177, as having then lately taken place.

8. Daughter of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, and therefore first cousin of the preceding. She is first mentioned as being taken to Rome by Heracleides, when he determined to set up the claim of the impostor Alexander Balas against Demetrius Soter, who at that time occupied the throne of Syria. In the decree of the senate in their favour Laodice is associated with her supposed brother Alexander, and it is probable that she was proclaimed queen together with him after the defeat of Demetrius. (Polyb. xxxiii. 14, 16.) It seems much more likely, therefore, that the "Laodice regina," mentioned in the epitome of Livy (lib. l.) as being subsequently put to death by Alexander's minister Ammonius, is the person in question, than the wife of Demetrius (as supposed by Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, tom. ii. p. 324, and Millingen, Ancient Coins of Cities and Kings, p. 76), of whom we have otherwise no knowledge.

9 and 10. Two daughters of Antiochus Sidetes, otherwise unknown, both bore the name of Laodice. (Euseb. Arm. p. 167.)

11. Wife of Ariarathes V., king of Cappadocia, by whom she had six sons, all of whom, except the youngest, she successively put to death, in order that she herself might continue to exercise the supreme power in their name without interference. At length the people revolted by her cruelties, rose in insurrection against her, and put an end to her life. (Justin. xxxvii. 1.)

12. Wife and also sister of Mithridates Eupator (commonly called the Great), king of Pontus. During the absence of her husband, and deceived by a report of his death, she gave free scope to her amours; and, alarmed for the consequences, on his return attempted his life by poison. Her designs were, however, betrayed to Mithridates, who immediately put her to death. (Justin. xxxvii. 3.)

13. Another sister of Mithridates Eupator, married to Ariarathes VI., king of Cappadocia. After the death of her husband, who was assassinated by Gordius, at the instigation of Mithridates, in order to avoid a similar fate for herself and her two sons, she threw herself into the arms of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, whom she married, and put in possession of Cappadocia. The revolutions that followed are related under ARIARATHES. After the death of her two sons, she joined with Nicomedes in the attempt to establish an impostor upon the throne of Cappadocia, and even went to Rome to bear witness in person that she had had three sons by Ariarathes; notwithstanding which, the claim of the pretender was rejected by the senate. (Justin. xxxviii. 1, 2.)

14. A queen of the Galadeni, mentioned by Josephus as being engaged in war with the Parthians, when Antiochus X., king of Syria, came to her assistance, but was killed in battle. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13, § 4.) [E. H. B.]

LAO'DICUS (Λαοδικός), a Hyperborean hero, who, together with Hyperochus and Pyrrhus, came to assist the Delphians against the Gauls. (Paus. i. 4. § 4, x. 23. § 3; comp. Herod. viii. 39.) It should, however, be remarked, that in Pausanias the common reading is 'Λαοδόκος or Λαοδόκος, where Müller writes Λαοδικός. [L. S.]

LAO'DOCUS (Λαοδόκος). 1. A son of Apollo and Phthia, a brother of Dorus and Polypoetes, in Curetis, was killed by Atolus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 6.)

2. A son of Bias and Pera, and a brother of Talans, took part in the expedition of the Argonauts, and in that of the Seven against Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 4; Apollon. Rhod. i. 119; Val. Flacc. i. 358; Orph. Argon. 146.)

3. A son of Antenor. (Hom. Il. iv. 87.)

4. The friend and charioteer of Antilochus. (Hom. Il. xvii. 699.) [L. S.]

LAO'GORAS (Λαογόρας), a king of the Dryopes, was allied with the Lapithæ against Aegimius, but was slain by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7.) [L. S.]

LAO'MEDON (Λαομέδων), a king of Troy, the son of Ilus and Eurydice, and the father of Priam, Tithonus, Lampus, Clytius, Hicetaon, and Bucolion. (Hom. Il. xx. 236, &c., vi. 23; Apollod. iii. 12. § 3.) His wife is called Strymo, or Rheo, Placia, Thoos, Zeuxippe, or Leucippe. (Apollod. l. c. 2 Schol. ad Hom. Il. iii. 250; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 18.) Apollodorus further mentions three daughters of his, viz., Hesione or Theansira, Cilla and Astyoche, instead of whom others mention Aethylla, Medesicate, and Procleia. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 232, 467, 921.) When Laomedon built Troy, Poseidon and Apollo, who had revolted against Zeus, were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages, and accordingly Poseidon built the walls of Troy, while Apollo attended to the king's flocks on Mount Ida. (Hom. Il. xxi. 446, comp. vii. 432.) According to some, Poseidon was assisted in the building of the walls by Aeacus; and the part constructed by the latter was the weakest, where the wall might be destroyed. (Pind. Ol. viii. 41, with the Schol., and Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1373.) Apollodorus (ii. 59) states that Poseidon and Apollo came to Laomedon of their own accord, in order to try him. When the two gods had done their work, Laomedon refused them the reward he had promised them, and expelled them from his dominions. (Hon. Il. xxi. 441, &c.; Horat. Carm. iii. 3, 21.) According to a tradition not mentioned by Homer, Poseidon punished the breach of promise by sending a marine monster into the territory of Troy, which ravaged the whole country. By the command of an oracle, the Trojans were obliged, from time to time, to sacrifice a maiden to the monster; and on one occasion it was decided by lot that Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. But it happened that Hercules was just returning from his expedition against the Amazons, and he promised to save the maiden, if Laomedon would give him the horses which Tros had once received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. Laomedon promised to give them to Hercules, but again broke his word when Hercules had killed the monster and saved Hesione. Hereupon Hercules sailed with a squadron of six ships against Troy, and killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Podarces (Priam), and gave Hesione to Telamon. Hesione ransomed her brother Priam with her veil. (Hom. Il. v. 265, 640, &c., xxiii. 348; Schol. ad Il. xx. 145, xxi. 442; Apollod. ii. 5. § 9, 6. § 4; Diod. iv. 32, 49; Hygin. Fab. 89.) His tomb existed in the neighbourhood of the Scæan gate; and it was believed that Troy would be safe so long as the tomb remained uninjured. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 241; Ov. Met. xi. 696.)

There is another mythical person of the name of Laomedon (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8). [L. S.]

LAOMEDON (Λαομέδων) of Mytilene, son of Larichus, was one of Alexander's generals, and appears to have enjoyed a high place in his confidence even before the death of Philip, as he was one of those banished by that monarch (together with his brother Erigyius, Ptolemy, Nearchus, and others) for taking part in the intrigues of the young prince. (Arrian. Anab. iii. 6.) After the death of Philip, Laomedon, in common with the others who had suffered on this occasion, was held by Alexander in the highest honour: he accompanied him to Asia, where, on account of his acquaintance with the Persian language, he was appointed to the charge of the captives. (Arrian. l. c.) Though his name is not afterwards mentioned during the wars of Alexander, the high consideration he enjoyed is sufficiently attested by his obtaining in the division of the provinces, after the king's death, the important government of Syria. (Diod. xviii. 3; Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 69, a; Dexipp. ap. Phot. p. 64, a; Justin. xiii. 4; Curt. x. 10; Appian. Syr.

52.) This he was still allowed to retain on the second partition at Triparadeisus, but it was not long before the provinces of Phœnicia and Coele Syria excited the cupidity of his powerful neighbour Ptolemy. The Egyptian king at first offered Laomedon a large sum of money in exchange for his government; but the latter having rejected his overtures, he sent Nicanor with an army to invade Syria. Laomedon was unable to offer any effectual resistance: he was made prisoner by Nicanor, and sent into Egypt, from whence, however, he managed to effect his escape, and join Alcetas in Pisidia. (Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 71, b; Diod. xviii. 39, 43; Appian, Syr. 52.) There can be no doubt that he took part in the subsequent contest of Alcetas, Attalus, and the other surviving partisans of Perdiccas against Antigonus, and shared in the final overthrow of that party (B. C. 320), but his individual fate is not mentioned. [E. H. B.]

LAON (Λαών), an Athenian comic poet, who is mentioned by Stobæus (Flor. cxviii. 5), and of whose works a single line is preserved by Diacarchus. (Vit. Græc. p. 28, ed. Buttman.) It is doubtful whether he belongs to the old or to the middle comedy. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 492, 493; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 452.) [P. S.]

LAONICUS CHALCOCONDYLES. [CHALCOCONDYLES.]

LAONOME (Λαονόμη), the wife of Alcaeus, and mother of Amphitryo. (Pana. viii. 14; Amphitryo.) [L. S.]

LAOPHONTE (Λαοφόντη), a daughter of Pleuron, and wife of Thestius, by whom she had Althæa and Leto. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 146.) [L. S.]

LAOTHOE (Λαοθήη), a daughter of Altes, king of the Leleges: she became by Priam the mother of Lycæon and Polydorus. (Hom. Il. xxi. 85.) [L. S.]

LAPERSAE (Λαπέρσαι or Λαπέρσαι), a surname of the Dioscuri, which they derived from the Attic demus of Lapersæ (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 511, 1369), or, according to others, from a mountain in Laconia. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Λαπέρσαι; Estiath. ad Hom. pp. 230, 295.) [L. S.]

LAPERSIUS (Λαπέρσιος), a surname of Zeus, derived from the Attic demus of Lapersæ. (Lycoph. 1369, with the Schol.) [L. S.]

LAPHAES (Λαφαῖς), of Philina, a statuery of the early period of Greek art. His wooden statue of Hercules at Sicyon is mentioned by Pausanias (ii. 10. § 1), who also conjectured that the colossal wooden statue of Apollo, at Aegæira in Achaia, was the work of the same artist, from the resemblance in style between it and the Hercules (ii. 26. § 3, or 6). [P. S.]

LAPHRAEUS (Λαφραῖος), a surname of Apollo at Calydon. (Strab. x. p. 459, where, however, some read Λαφραῖος.) [L. S.]

LAPHRIA (Λαφρία), a surname of Artemis among the Calydonians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced at Naupactus and Patrae, in Achaia. At the latter place it was not established till the time of Augustus, but it became the occasion of a great annual festival. (Paus. iv. 31. § 6, vii. 18. § 6, &c.; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1087.) The name Laphria was traced back to a hero, Laphria, son of Castalia, who was said to have instituted her worship at Calydon. Laphria was also a surname of Athena. (Lycoph. 356.) [L. S.]

LAPHYSTIUS (Λαφύστιος). 1. A surname of Zeus, which was derived either from Mount Laphystius in Boeotia, or from the verb λαφύσκειν, to flee, so that it would be synonymous with φεύγειν: a third opinion is, that it signified "the voracious," in reference to the human sacrifices which were offered to him in early time. (Paus. i. 24. § 2, ix. 34. § 4.)

2. A surname of Dionysus, from the Boeotian mountain Laphystius, whence the female Bacchantes were called, in the Macedonian dialect, Laphystiae. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 1236; Müller, Orkum. p. 168, 2d edit.) [L. S.]

LAPIS, the stone, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, as we see from the expression Jovem Lapidem jurare. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 12; Gell. i. 21; Polyb. iii. 26.) It was formerly believed that Jupiter Lapis was a stone statue of the god, or originally a rude stone serving as a symbol, around which people assembled for the purpose of worshipping Jupiter. But it is now generally acknowledged that the pebble or flint stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, and that, therefore, in some representations of Jupiter, he held a stone in his hand instead of the thunderbolt. (Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 25.) Such a stone (lapis Capitolinus, August. De Civ. Dei. ii. 29) was even set up as a symbolic representation of the god himself. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 641.) When a treaty was to be concluded, the sacred symbols of Jupiter were taken from his temple, viz. his sceptre, the pebble and grass from the district of the temple, for the purpose of swearing by them (per Jovem Lapidem jurare; Liv. i. 24, xxx. 43; Fest. s. v. Feretrius). A pebble or flint stone was also used by the Romans in killing the animal, when an oath was to be accompanied by a sacrifice; and this custom was probably a remnant of very early times, when metal instruments were not yet used for such purposes. (Fest. s. v. Lapidem Siliocum; comp. Liv. i. 24, ix. 5; Polyb. iii. 26; Plut. Sull. 10.) [L. S.]

LAPITHES (Λαπίθης), a son of Apollo and Stilbe, the brother of Centaurus, and husband of Orinome, the daughter of Eurynomus, by whom he became the father of Phorbas, Triopas, and Periphas. He was regarded as the ancestor of the Lapithae in the mountains of Thessaly. (Hom. Il. xii. 128; Diod. iv. 69, v. 61.) They were governed by Peirithous, who being a son of Ixion, was a half-brother of the Centaurs. The latter, therefore, demanded their share in their father's kingdom, and, as their claims were not satisfied, a war arose between the Lapithae and Centaurs, which, however, was terminated by a peace. But when Peirithous married Hippodameia, and invited the Centaurs to the solemnity, a bloody war, stirred by Ares, broke out between the Lapithae and Centaurs, in which the latter were defeated; but the Lapithae were afterwards humbled by Heracles. (Hom. Od. xxi. 295, Il. xii. 128, 181; Orph. Argon. 113; Diod. iv. 70; Paus. i. 7. § 2, v. 10. § 8; Strab. ix. p. 439; Ov. Met. xii. 210, &c.; Horat. Serm. i. 18. 5; Plin. H. N. iv. 8, 15, xxxvi. i. 4.) [L. S.]

LARA. [LARUNDA.]

LARENTIA. [ACCA LARENTIA.]

LAR or LARS (Adaps, Plut. Poplic. 16, Adops, Nonys. v. 21), was an Etruscan praenomen, borne in instance by Porcena and Tolumnius, and from the Etruscans passed over to the Romans; hence

vol. II.

we read of Lar Herminius, who was consul B. C. 448. This word is supposed by many to have signified "Lord" in the Etruscan. (Val. Max. De Nomin. ad Praenom.; Liv. ii. 9, iv. 17, iii. 65.)

LARES. The worship of the Lares at Rome was closely connected with that of the Manes, and that of both was analogous to the hero worship of the Greeks. The name Lar is Etruscan, and signifies lord, king, or hero. The Lares may be divided into two classes, the Lares domestici and Lares publici, and the former were the Manes of a house raised to the dignity of heroes. So long as the house was the place where the dead were buried (Serv. ad Aen. v. 64, vi. 182), the Manes and Lares must have been more nearly identical than afterwards, although the Manes were more closely connected with the place of burial, while the Lares were more particularly the divinities presiding over the hearth and the whole house. According to what has here been said, it was not the spirits of all the dead that were honoured as Lares, but only the spirits of good men. It is not certain whether the spirits of women could become Lares; but from the sugrum-daria in Fulgentius (De Priac. Serm. p. xi. ed. Lersch.), it has been inferred that children dying before they were 40 days old might become Lares. (Comp. Nonius, p. 114; Diomed. i. p. 379.) All the domestic Lares were headed by the Lar familiaris, who was regarded as the first originator of the family, corresponding in some measure with the Greek ἄσπας δαίμων, whence Dionysius (iv. 2) calls him ὁ κατ' οἰκίαν ἄσπας. (Comp. Plut. De Fort. Rom. 10; and more especially Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 70; Plaut. Aulul. Prolog.) The Lar familiaris was inseparable from the family; and when the latter changed their abode, the Lar went with them. (Plaut. Trin. 39, &c.)

The public Lares are expressly distinguished by Pliny (H. N. xxi. 8) from the domestic or private ones, and they were worshipped not only at Rome, but in all the towns regulated according to a Roman or Latin model. (Hertzberg, De Div. Rom. Patr. p. 47.) Among the Lares publici we have mention of Lares praestites and Lares compitales, who are in reality the same, and differ only in regard to the place or occasion of their worship. Servius Tullius is said to have instituted their worship (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 70); and when Augustus improved the regulations of the city made by that king, he also renewed the worship of the public Lares. Their name, Lares praestites, characterises them as the protecting spirits of the city (Ov. Fast. v. 134), in which they had a temple in the uppermost part of the Via Sacra, that is, near a compitum, whence they might be called compitales. (Solin. 1; Ov. Fast. v. 128; Tacit. Ann. xii. 24.) This temple (Sacellum Larum or aedes Larum) contained two images, which were probably those of Romulus and Remus, and before them stood a stone figure of a dog, either the symbol of watchfulness, or because a dog was the ordinary sacrifice offered to the Lares. Now, while these Lares were the general protectors of the whole city, the Lares compitales must be regarded as those who presided over the several divisions of the city, which were marked by the compita or the points where two or more streets crossed each other, and where small chapels (aediculae) were erected to those Lares, the number of which must have been very great at Rome. As Augustus wished to be regarded as the second founder of the city, the genius Augusti was added to the Lares praestites, just as among the Lares of a family the genius of the paterfamilias also was worshipped.

But besides the Lares praestites and compitalia, there are some other Lares which must be reckoned among the public ones, viz., the Lares rurales, who were worshipped in the country, and whose origin was probably traced to certain heroes who had at one time benefitted the republic. (Cic. De Leg. ii. 11; Tibull. i. 1. 24.) The Lares arvales probably belonged to the same class. (Klausen, De Cerm. Frat. Arval. p. 62.) We have also mention of Lares viales, who were worshipped on the high-roads by travellers (Plaut. Merc. v. 2, 22; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 302); and of the Lares marini or permarini, to whom P. Aemilius dedicated a sanctuary in remembrance of his naval victory over Antiochus. (Liv. xl. 52.)

The worship of the Lares was likewise partly public and partly private. The domestic Lares, like the Penates, formed the religious elements of the Roman household (Cic. De Repub. iv. in fin., ad Fam. i. 9, in Verr. iii. 24; Cat. De Re Rust. 143); and their worship, together with that of the Penates and Manes, constituted what are called the sacra privata. The images of the Lares, in great houses, were usually in a separate compartment, called aediculae or lararia. (Juven. viii. 110; Tibull. i. 10. 22; Petron. 29; Ael. Lamprid. Alex. Sec. 28; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Lararium.) The Lares were generally represented in the cinctus Gabinus (Pers. v. 31; Ov. Fast. ii. 634), and their worship was very simple, especially in the early times and in the country. The offerings were set before them in patellae, whence they themselves are called patellarii (Plaut. Cistell. ii. 2. 55), and pious people made offerings to them every day (Plaut. Aulul. Prolog.); but they were more especially worshipped on the calenda, nones, and ides of every month. (Cat. De Re Rust. 143; Horat. Carm. iii. 23. 2; Tibull. i. 3. 33; Virg. Ecol. i. 43.) When the inhabitants of the house took their meals, some portion was offered to the Lares, and on joyful family occasions they were adorned with wreaths, and the lararia were thrown open. (Plaut. Aulul. ii. 8. 15; Ov. Fast. ii. 633; Pers. iii. 24, &c., v. 31; Propert. i. 1. 132; Petron. 38.) When the young bride entered the house of her husband, her first duty was to offer a sacrifice to the Lares. (Macrob. Sat. i. 15.) Respecting the public worship of the Lares, and the festival of the Larentalia, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Larentalia, Compitalia. (Comp. Hempel, De Diis Laribus, Zwickau, 1797; Müller, De Diis Romanorum Laribus et Penatibus, Hafniae, 1811; Schömann, De Diis Manibus, Laribus et Geniis, Greifswald, 1840; Hertzberg, De Diis Romanorum Patriis, sive de Larum atque Penatum tam publicorum quam privatorum Religione et Cultu, Halae, 1840.) L'ARGIUS LICINIUS. [LARTIUS LICINIUS.]

LARGUS, CAECINA. [CAECINA, Nos. 6 and 7.]

LARGUS, SCRIBONIUS, a Roman physician, whose praenomen is unknown, and who sometimes bears the agnomen Designianus. He lived at Rome in the first century after Christ, and is said to have been physician to the emperor Claudius, and to have accompanied him in his expedition to Britain. He himself mentions Messalina, the wife "Dei nostri Caesaris" (c. xi. § 60, p. 203). He was a pupil of Tryphon (c. xiv. § 175, p. 222) and Apuleius Celsus (c. xiii. § 94, p. 208, c. xiv. § 171, p. 221). He appears to have written several medical works in Latin (Præf. p. 188), of which only one remains, entitled "Compositiones Medicæ," or "De Compositione Medicamentorum." It is dedicated to C. Julius Calpurnius, at whose request it was written, at a time when Largus was away from home (perhaps in Britain), and deprived of the greater part of his library (Præf.). It consists of nearly three hundred medical formulæ, several of which are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. Sec. Loc. vol. xii. pp. 683, 738, 764, vol. xiii. pp. 67, 280, 284, &c.), and is interesting, as tending to illustrate the Materia Medica of the ancients, but in no other point of view. It has been supposed that the work was originally written in Greek, and translated into Latin by some later author, and that it is this version only that we now possess; but there does not seem to be any sufficient reason for this conjecture. It was first published at Paris, 1529, fol. appended by J. Ruellius to his edition of Celsus. Another edition was published in the same year at Basel, 8vo. The best edition is that of J. Rhodius, Patav. 1655, 4to., containing an improved text, copious and learned notes, and a "Lexicon Scribonianum." The last edition is that by J. Mich. Bernhold, Argent. 1786, 8vo., containing the text of Rhodius, but omitting his notes and "Lexicon Scribon." The work of Scribonius Largus is also contained in the collections of medical authors published by Aldus, Venet. 1547, fol. and H. Stephens, Paris, 1667, fol. C. G. Kühn published in 1825, 4to. Lipsa., a specimen of Otto Sperling's "Observationes in Scribonium," from a MS. at Copenhagen. See Haller's Biblioth. Medic. Pract., and Biblioth. Botan.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Fabric. Biblioth. Lat.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin. [W.A.G.]

LARGUS, VALE'RIUS, had been a friend of Cornelius Gallus, but accused him before the emperor Augustus. Largus was in consequence treated with marked contempt at Rome. (Dion Cass. lvi. 23, 24.)

LA'RICIUS (Λάρικος), one of Sappho's brothers, was cup-bearer in the prytaneum of the Mytilenæans, and was praised in his sister's poems. (Athen. x. p. 425, a.; Eustath. ad Il. xx. p. 1280; Schol. Victorin. ad Il. xx. 234.) [P. S.]

LARI SCOLUS, ACCOLEIUS. [ACCOLIA GENA.]

LARISSA (Λάρισα), a daughter of Pelasgus, from whom the ark of Argos and two Thessalian towns are believed to have derived their name. (Paus. ii. 24. § 1; Strab. xiv. p. 621, who calls her a daughter of Piasus, a Pelasgian prince.) [L.S.]

LARISSAEUS and LARISSAEA (Λαρίσσαιος and Λαρίσσαια), surnames of Zeus and Apollo, derived from the ark Larissa at Argos (Paus. ii. 24. § 4; Strab. ix. p. 440, xiv. 649; Steph. Byz. c. v. Λάρισσα), and of Athena, who derived it from the river Larissus, between Elis and Achaia, where the goddess had a sanctuary. (Paus. vii. 17. § 3.) [L.S.]

LARO'NIUS, an officer of Augustus in the Sicilian war with Sext. Pompey, A.C. 36. He was despatched with three legions by M. Agrippa to relieve L. Cornificius from his perilous situation at Tauromenium, in Sicily [L. CORNICIUS, No. 5]. (Appian, B.C. v. 12, 15.) [W. B. D.]

LARS TOLUMNIUS, [TOLUMNIUS.]

LARTIA GENS, patrician, distinguished at the beginning of the republic through two of its members, T. Lartius, the first dictator, and Sp. Lartius, the companion of Horatius on the wooden bridge. The name soon after disappears entirely from the annals. The Lartii were of Etruscan origin, as their name clearly shows. The Etruscan word Lars means Lord, with which it is perhaps etymologically connected. It is spelt on Etruscan sepulchral inscriptions either Larth, Lart, Laris, or else Larce (Müller, Etrusco. vol. i. pp. 408, 409). Hence the various ways of spelling the name. Liry has it always Lartius, Dionysius has Λάρκιος and Λάρυιος; all three spellings occur on Latin inscriptions (comp. Index Rom. of Gruter's Thesaurus Insar.). The Lartii, according to Dionysius, bore the surname FLAVUS. [W. I.]

LARTIUS LICINIUS, a contemporary of the elder Pliny, was praetor in Spain, and subsequently the governor (legatus) of one of the imperial provinces. He died before Pliny. (Plin. H. N. xix. 2. § 11, xxxi. 2. s. 18.) This must be the same person as the Largius Licinius, spoken of by the younger Pliny (Ep. ii. 14, iii. 5), who says that his uncle, when he was in Spain, could have sold his common place-book (Electorum Commentarii) to Licinius, for 400,000 sesterces. If an inscription in Gruter (p. 186) be genuine, Lartius must be the correct form of the name.

LARVAE. [LEMURES.]

LARUNDA, or LARA, a daughter of Almon, was a nymph who denounced to Juno that there was some connexion between Jupiter and Juturna; hence her name is connected with λαλέω. Jupiter punished her by depriving her of her tongue, and condemning her to be conducted into the lower world by Mercury; but on the way thither Mercury fell in love with her, and afterwards she gave birth to two LARES. (Ov. Fast. ii. 599, &c.; Auson. Monast. de Dia, 9.) Hartung (Die Relig. der Rom. ii. p. 204) infers from Lactantius (i. 20) that arunda is identical with Muta and Tacita. [L. S.]

LARYMNA (Λάρυμνα), a daughter of Cynus, on whom the Boeotian town of Lary is said to have derived its name. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7.) [L. S.]

LA'SCARIS, THEODORUS [THEODORUS.]

LASSUS. [LASUS.]

LASTHENEIA (Λασθένεια), a native of Mantinea, in Arcadia, mentioned by Iamblichus (Vit. p. 36) as a follower of Pythagoras. Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 46, iv. 2), on the other hand, speaks of her as a disciple of the Platonic philosophy, which is confirmed by other authorities. (Clemens ex. Strom. iv. p. 619; Athen. xii. p. 546, vii. 279.) [C. P. M.]

LA'STHENES (Λασθένης). 1. An Olynthian, a, together with Euthykrates, is accused by Demosthenes of having betrayed his country to Philip of Macedon, by whom he had been bribed. It appears that he was appointed to command the army belonging to Olynthus in B. C. 348, when Philip directed his arms against the city; but he did himself of the opportunity to betray into the hands of the king a body of 500 horse, which he made prisoners without resistance. After the fall of Olynthus, Philip naturally treated with neglect the traitors, of whom he had no longer any use; but it seems to have been erroneously inferred from an expression of Demosthenes, that they were positively ill treated, or even put to death, by that monarch. An anecdote related by Plutarch shows that Lasthenes was resident at the court of Philip at a subsequent period. (Dem. de Chers. p. 99, Philipp. iii. p. 128, De Cor. p. 241, De Fals. Legg. pp. 425, 426, 451; Diod. xvi. 53; Plut. Apophth. p. 178. See also Thirlwall's Greece vol. v. p. 315.)

2. A Cretan, who furnished Demetrius Nicator with the body of mercenaries with which he landed in Syria to wrest that kingdom from the hands of the usurper Alexander Balas. It appears that Lasthenes himself accompanied the young prince; and when Demetrius was established on the throne was appointed by him his chief minister, and the supreme direction of all affairs placed in his hands. Hence the blame of the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct by which Demetrius speedily alienated the affections of his subjects is imputed in great measure to the minister. It was Lasthenes also who, by persuading the king to disband the greater part of his troops, and retain only a body of Cretan mercenaries, lost him the attachment of the army, and thus unintentionally paved the way for his overthrow by Tryphon. (Joseph. xiii. 4. § § 3, 9; 1 Macc. xi.; Diod. Erc. Vales. xxxiii. p. 593, and Vales. ad loc.)

3. A Cretan who took a prominent part in urging his countrymen to resist the attack of M. Antonius in B. C. 70. On this account, when the Cretans, after the defeat of Antonius, sent an embassy to Rome to excuse their past conduct, and sue for peace, one of the conditions imposed by the senate was the surrender of Lasthenes and Panares, as the authors of their offence. (Diod. Erc. Legat. xl. pp. 631, 632; Appian, Sic. 6; Dion Cass. Fragm. 177.) These terms were rejected by the Cretans; and in the war that followed against Q. Metellus (B. C. 68) Lasthenes was one of the principal leaders. Together with Panares, he assembled an army of 24,000 men, with which they maintained the contest against the Roman army for near three years: the excellence of the Cretans as archers, and their great personal activity, giving them many advantages in desultory warfare. At length, however, Lasthenes was defeated by Metellus near Cydonia, and fled for refuge to Cnossus, where, finding himself closely pressed by the Roman general, he is said to have set fire to his own house, and consumed it with all his valuables. After this he made his escape from the city, and took refuge in Lyttus, but was ultimately compelled to surrender, stipulating only that his life should be spared. Metellus intended to retain both Lasthenes and Panares as prisoners, to adorn his triumph, but was compelled to give them up by Pompey, under whose protection the Cretans had placed themselves. (Diod. l. c.; Appian, Sic. 6. § § 1, 2; Phlegon, ap. Phot. p. 84, a; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 34.) [E. H. B.]

LASUS (Λάσος), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of Hermione, in Argolis, and the son of Chabrias or (according to Schneidewin's emendation) Charminus. He is celebrated as the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and as the teacher of Pindar. He was contemporary with Simonides (Aristoph. Vesp. 1410, and Schol.), like whom, and other great poets of the time, he lived at Athens, under the patronage of Hipparchus. Herodotus mentions his detection of Onomacritus in a forgery of oracles under the name of Musaeus, in consequence of which Hipparchus expelled Onomacritus from Athens (vii. 6). There also appears to have been a strong rivalry between Lasus and Simonides. (Aristoph. l. c.; Schol. ad loc.; Dindorf, Annot. ad Schol.) The time when he instructed Pindar in lyric poetry must have been about a. c. 506 (Thom. Mag. Vid. Pind.); and it must be to this date that Suidas refers, when he places Lasus in the time of Darius, the son of Hyastaspes. (Suid. s. v. where, accordingly,  $\pi\lambda$  should be corrected into  $\xi\lambda$ .) Nothing further is known of his life, and the notices of his poetry are very defective. Tzetzes mentions him after Arion, as the second great dithyrambic poet. (Proleg. in Lycoph. p. 252, ed. Müller; comp. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 25.) According to a scholiast on Aristophanes (Ac. 1403), some ancient writers ascribed to him, instead of Arion, the invention of the cyclic choruses. (Comp. Suid. s. v.  $\kappa\upsilon\kappa\lambda\omicron\delta\omicron\delta\iota\sigma\kappa\alpha\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ .) A better account is given by another scholiast (Vesp. 1410) and Suidas (s. v.  $\Lambda\delta\alpha\varsigma$ ), that Lasus was the first who introduced dithyrambic contests, like those of the dramatic choruses. This seems to have been in Ol. 68, 1, b. c. 508. (Marm. Par. Ep. 46.) Putarch states (De Mus. p. 1141, b. c.) that Lasus invented various new adaptations of music to dithyrambic poetry, giving it an accompaniment of several flutes, and using more numerous and more varied voices (or musical sounds,  $\phi\theta\acute{\omicron}\gamma\gamma\omicron\iota\varsigma$ ). The change of form was naturally accompanied by a change in the subjects of the dithyramb. Suidas (s. v.) and the scholiast on Aristophanes (Vesp. 1410) tell us that Lasus introduced  $\theta\rho\alpha\iota\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$   $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ . From these statements, compared with what we know of the earlier dithyramb on the one hand, and on the other with the works of Lasus's great pupil, Pindar, we may infer that Lasus introduced a greater freedom, both of rhythm and of music, into the dithyrambic Ode; that he gave it a more artificial and more mimetic character; and that the subjects of his poetry embraced a far wider range than had been customary. It is difficult, however, to say what the scholiast means by  $\theta\rho\alpha\iota\kappa\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$   $\lambda\acute{o}\gamma\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ . Some writers explain them as jocose altercations among the Satyrs, who formed the chorus; but this is scarcely consistent with the dignity of dithyrambic poetry. Another explanation is that Lasus, like the dramatic poets, introduced into his poetry subjects which afforded occasion for the display of dialectic skill. It is something in confirmation of this view, that, according to some accounts, he was reckoned among the seven wise men of Greece. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 1410; Suid. s. v.; Diog. Laërt. i. 42; comp. the note of Menagius.)

Lasus wrote a hymn to Demeter, who was worshipped at Hermione, in the Doric dialect, with the Aeolic harmony, of which there are three lines extant (Ath. xiv. p. 624, e.), and an ode, entitled  $\kappa\epsilon\tau\tau\alpha\upsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ , both of which pieces were remarkable for not containing the letter  $\Sigma$ . (Ath. x. p. 455, d.) He is also cited twice by Aelian (V. H. xii. 36; N. A. vii. 47).

Besides his poems, Lasus wrote on music, and he is said to have been the first who did so. (Suid. s. v.)

The grammarian, Chamaeleon of Heracleia, wrote a work upon Lasus. (Ath. viii. p. 338, b.)

His name is sometimes mis-spelt by the ancient writers. Tzetzes (Proleg. in Lycoph. l. c.) calls him  $\Lambda\delta\alpha\varsigma\omicron\varsigma$ , and Stobaeus (Serm. xxvii) writes

$\Lambda\delta\alpha\varsigma\omicron\varsigma$ . (Burette, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscri. tom. xv. p. 324; Forkel, Geschichte d. Musik. vol. i. p. 358; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 128; Böckh, de Metr. Pind. p. 2; Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Greece, pp. 214, 215; Bode, Geschichte d. lyrischen Dichtkunst. pass.; Ulrici, Geach. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pass.; Schneidewin, Comment. de Laio Hermionensi, Götting. 1842.) [P. S.]

LATERANUS, was, according to Arnobius (adv. Gent. iv. 6), a divinity protecting the hearths built of bricks (lateres), whence some consider him to be identical with Vulcan. (Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. ii. p. 109.) [L. S.]

LATERANUS, APP. CLAUDIUS, was one of the lieutenants of the emperor Septimius Severus in the expedition against the Arabians and Parthians, A. D. 195, and two years afterwards appears in the Fasti as consul. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 2; Victor, Epit. 20; Gruter, Corp. Inscript. xli. 3, li. 1, ccc.) [W. R.]

LATERANUS, L. SEXTIUS SEXTINUS, was the friend and supporter of the celebrated C. Licinius Calvus Stolo in his attempts to throw open the consulship to the plebeians. He was the colleague of Licinius in the tribunate of the plebs from A. C. 376 to 367; and upon the passing of the Licinian laws in the latter of these years, he was elected to the consulship for the year A. C. 366, being the first plebeian who had obtained that dignity. (Liv. vi. 35—42, vii. 1.) For an account of the Licinian laws, see Vol. I. p. 586, b, and the authorities there referred to.

The name of Sextius Lateranus does not occur again under the republic, but re-appears in the times of the empire. Thus we find in the Fasti a T. Sextius Magius Lateranus consul in A. D. 94, and a T. Sextius Lateranus consul in A. D. 154.

LATERANUS, PLAUTIUS, was one of the lovers of Messallina, the wife of the emperor Claudius, and was in consequence condemned to death by the emperor in A. D. 48; but pardoned, says Tacitus, on account of the brilliant services of his uncle, by whom the historian probably means A. Plautius, the conqueror of Britain. Lateranus was deprived of his rank as a senator, to which, however, he was restored on the accession of Nero, in A. D. 56. Ten years afterwards (A. D. 66), although consul elect, he took part in the celebrated conspiracy of Piso against Nero, actuated, says the historian, by no private wrongs, but by love for the state. He met death with the greatest firmness, refusing to disclose the names of any of the conspirators, and not even upbraiding the tribune, who executed him in the place where slaves were put to death, with being privy to the conspiracy, though such was the case. The first blow not severing his head from his body, he calmly stretched it out again. (Tac. Ann. xi. 30, 36, xiii. 11, iv. 49, 60; Arrian, Epictet. Dissert. i. 1.)

LATERENSIS, the name of a noble plebeian family of the Julia gens [JUVENTIA GENS], but not patrician, as has been erroneously stated by a scholiast on Cicero. (Schol. Bob. pro Planc. p. 253, ed. Orelli.)

1. M. JUVENTIUS LATERENSIS, appears to have served in early life in the Mithridatic war. (Cic. pro Planc. 34. § 84, with Wunder's note, p. 207.) As he was descended both on his father's and mother's side from consular ancestors, he naturally became a candidate for the public offices. The year of his quaestorship is not stated and we only know that, while holding this office, he gave an exhibition of games at Praeneste; and subsequently proceeded, perhaps as pro-quaestor, to Cyrene. In B.C. 59 (the year of the consulship of Caesar and Bibulus) he became a candidate for the tribunate of the plebs; but as he would have been obliged, if elected, to have sworn to maintain the agrarian law of Caesar, which was passed in that year, he retired voluntarily from the contest. It was probably owing to his political sentiments that Laterensis became one of Cicero's personal friends; and it was doubtless his opposition to Caesar which led L. Vettius to denounce him as one of the conspirators in the pretended plot against Pompey's life in B.C. 58.

In B.C. 55, in the second consulship of Pompey and Crassus, Laterensis became a candidate for the curule aedileship, with Cn. Plancius, A. Plotius, and Q. Pedius. The elections were put off this year; but in the summer of the following year (B.C. 54) Plancius and Plotius were elected; but before they could enter upon their office Laterensis, in conjunction with L. Cassius Longinus, accused Plancius of the crime of sodalitiū, or the bribery of the tribes by means of illegal associations, in accordance with the lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ambitus.) This contest between Laterensis and Plancius placed Cicero in an awkward position, since both of them were his personal friends. Plancius, however, had much stronger claims upon him, for being quaestor in Macedonia in the year of Cicero's banishment, he had afforded him shelter and protection in his province, at a time when Cicero believed that his life was in danger. Cicero had therefore warmly exerted himself in canvassing for Plancius, and came forward to defend him when he was accused by Laterensis. He avoids, however, personal attacks upon Laterensis, and attributes his loss of the election to his relying too much upon the nobility of his family, and to his neglecting a personal canvassing of the voters, and likewise to his opposition to Caesar a few years before. Through Cicero's exertions, Plancius was probably acquitted. [PLANIUS.]

Laterensis obtained the praetorship in B.C. 51, and is spoken of by Cicero's correspondent, Caelius, as ignorant of the laws. In the civil wars between Caesar and the Pompeians his name does not occur, and he is not mentioned again till B.C. 45, in which year we learn from Cicero that he was one of the angurs.

Laterensis appears again in history as a legate in the army of M. Aemilius Lepidus, who was governor of the provinces of Nearer Spain and Southern Gaul, B.C. 43. When Antony, after the battle of Mutina, fled across the Alps, and was drawing near to Lepidus in Gaul, Laterensis used every possible exertion to confirm Lepidus in his allegiance to the senate. In this object he was warmly seconded by Munatius Plancius, who commanded in Northern Gaul. But all their efforts were vain, for as soon as Antony appeared, the adherents of Lepidus threw open the gates of the camp to him; and Laterensis, in despair, cast himself upon his sword, and thus perished. The senate decreed to him the honour of a public funeral and the erection of his statue. From his first entrance upon public life Laterensis was always a warm supporter of the senatorial party, to which he sealed his devotion with his blood. (Cic. pro Planc. passim, ad Att. ii. 18, 24, in Vatm. 11, ad Fam. viii. 8, ad Att. xii. 17, ad Fam. x. 11, 15, 18, 21, 23; Dion. Cass. xlv. 51; Vell. Pat. ii. 63; Appian, B. C. iii. 84.)

2. L. (JUVENTUS) LATERENSIS, was a legate in the army of Q. Cassius Longinus in Further Spain B.C. 49, and was proclaimed praetor by the soldiers in the conspiracy against the life of Cassius, whom they believed to have been put to death. Cassius, however, escaped the hands of the assassins, and immediately executed Laterensis and the ringleaders of the conspiracy. (Hirt, B. Alex. 53—55.) It is not known what relation this Laterensis was to the preceding.

LATHRIA. [ANAXANDRA.]

LATHIA' LIS or LATHIA' RIS, a surname of Jupiter as the protecting divinity of Latium. The Latin towns and Rome celebrated to him every year the feriae Latinae, on the Alban mount, which were proclaimed and conducted by one of the Roman consuls. (Liv. xxi. 63, xxii. 1; Dionys. iv. 49; Serv. ad Aen. xii. 135; Suet. Calig. 22; comp. LATINUS.) [L. S.]

LATHIA' RIS, LATI'NIUS, in the earlier part of the reign of Tiberius had been praetor, but in what year is unknown. He was a creature of Sejanus, and aspired to the consulship. But at that time delation was the readiest road to preferment. Titius Sabinus had offended Sejanus by his steady friendship to the widow and children of Germanicus. Him, therefore, in A.D. 28, Latharis singled out as his victim and stepping-stone to the consular fasces. He wormed himself into the confidence of Sabinus, and encouraged him to speak of Agrippina's wrongs and Sejanus' tyranny in a room where three confederates lay hid between the ceiling and the roof. After the fall of Sejanus, Latharis was soon marked for destruction by Tiberius. The senate gladly condemned him, and Latharis died without a murmur in his favour. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, 69, vi. 4.) [W. B. D.]

LATI'NUS (Λατῖνος), a king of Latium, is described in the common tradition as a son of Faunus and the nymph Marica, as a brother of Lavinius, and the husband of Amata, by whom he became the father of Lavinia, whom he gave in marriage to Aeneas. (Virg. Aen. vii. 47, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 6; Arnob. ii. 71.) But along with this there are a variety of other traditions. Hesiod (Theog. 1015) calls him a son of Odysseus and Circe, and brother of Agrius, king of the Tyrrhenians, and Hyginus (Fab. 127) calls him a son of Telemachus and Circe, while others describe him as a son of Heracles, by an Hyperborean woman, who was afterwards married to Faunus (Dionys. i. 43), or as a son of Heracles by a daughter of Faunus. (Justin. xliii. 1.) Conon (Narr. 3) relates that Latinus was the father of Laurina, whom he gave in marriage to Locrus, and that Latinus was slain by Heracles for having taken away from him the oxen of Geryones. According to Festus (s. v. Oscillum) Jupiter Latharis once lived upon the earth under the name of Latinus, or Latinus after the fight with Mezentius suddenly disappeared, and was changed into Jupiter Latharis. Hence the relation between Jupiter Latharis and Latinus is perfectly analogous to that between Quirinus and Romulus, and Latinus may be conceived as an incarnation of the supreme god. [L. S.]

called mimes (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was a great favourite, and whom he served as a delator. It seems probable that the Latinus spoken of by Juvenal (i. 35, vi. 44), was the same person, though the scholiast on Juvenal (ll. cc.) says that this Latinus was put to death by Nero on account of his being privy to the adulteries of Messallina. The Latinus of the time of Domitian is frequently mentioned by Martial, who gives his epitaph (ix. 29), and speaks of his private character in favourable terms. Latinus frequently acted as mimus in conjunction with Thymeles as mima. (Juv. l. c.; Suet. Dom. 16; Mart. i. 5, ii. 72, iii. 86, v. 61, ix. 29.)

LATINUS, literary. 1. A Greek grammarian of uncertain age, who wrote a work in six books, entitled Περὶ τῶν οὐκ ἰδιῶν Μενδᾶδρου. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 466.)

2. LATINUS ALCIMUS AVITUS ALETHES, the full name of the Alcimius spoken of in Vol. I. p. 102, b.

3. LATINUS PACATUS DREPANIUS. [DREPANIUS.]

LATONNA. [LETO.]

LATRO, M. PORCIUS, a celebrated Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, was a Spaniard by birth, and a friend and contemporary of the elder Seneca, with whom he studied under Marilius, and by whom he is frequently mentioned. He flourished about the year B. C. 17, in which year he declaimed before Augustus and M. Agrippa. (Senec. Controv. ii. 12. p. 177, ed. Bipont. Comp. Clinton, F. H. ad ann.) His school was one of the most frequented at Rome, and he numbered among his pupils the poet Ovid. He possessed an astonishing memory, and displayed the greatest energy and vehemence, not only in declamation, but also in his studies and other pursuits. In his school he was accustomed to declaim himself, and seldom set his pupils to declaim, whence they received the name of auditores, which word came gradually into use as synonymous with discipuli. But great as was the reputation of Latro, he did not escape severe criticism on the part of his contemporaries: his language was censured by Messalla, and the arrangement of his orations by other rhetoricians. Though eminent as a rhetorician, he did not excel as a practical orator; and it is related of him that, when he had on one occasion in Spain to plead in the forum the cause of a relation, he felt so embarrassed by the novelty of speaking in the open air, that he could not proceed till he had induced the judges to remove from the forum into the basilica. Latro died in B. C. 4, as we learn from the Chronicle of Eusebius. Many modern writers suppose that Latro was the author of the Declamations of Sallust against Cicero, and of Cicero against Sallust. (Senec. Controv. i. Praef. p. 63, &c., ii. 10, p. 157, ii. 13. p. 178, iv. 25, p. 291, iv. Praef. p. 273, ed. Bipont.; comp. Quintil. x. 5. § 18; Plin. H. N. xx. 14. s. 57; Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 194, 1; Westermann, Gesch. d. Römischen Beredsamkeit, § 86; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 539, &c., 2d ed.)

LAVERNA, the protecting divinity of thieves and impostors; a grove was sacred to her on the via Salaria, and she had an altar near the porta Lavernalis, which derived its name from her. (Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 26; Nonius, viii. 6; Acron, ad Horat. Ep. i. 16, 60; Varro, De L. L. v. 163; Fest. s. v. Laverniones.) The name of this divinity, which is said to be a contraction of Lativernus, is, according to some, connected with the verb latere, or with the Greek λατῆναι and the Sanscrit labh, but it is more probably derived from levaris and levator (a thief). See Petron. 140; Obbarius, ad Horat. Ep. i. 16. 60. [L. S.]

LAVINIA, a daughter of Latinus and Amata, and the wife of Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Ascanius or Silvius. (Liv. i. 1; Virg. Aen. vii. 62, &c., vi. 761; Dionys. i. 70.) Some traditions describe her as the daughter of the priest Anius, in Delos. (Dionys. i. 50; Aur. Vict. Orig. Gent. Rom. 9.) [L. S.]

P. LAVINIUS, a Latin grammarian, who wrote a work, De Verbis Sordidis, which is referred to by A. Gellius (xx. 11), but of whom we know nothing more. It has been conjectured that he may be the same as the Laevinus mentioned by Macrobius (Saturn. iii. 8.)

LAURENTIA. [ACCA LAURENTIA.]

LAURENTIUS JOANNES. [JOANNES, No. 79.]

LAUSUS. 1. A son of Mesentius, who was slain while defending his father against Aeneas. (Virg. Aen. vii. 649, x. 790.) According to the author of the De Orig. Gent. Rom. (15), Lausus fell at a later time, during the siege of Lavinium, by the hand of Ascanius.

2. A son of Numitor and brother of Ilia, was fraudulently killed by Amulius. (Ov. Fast. iv. 55.) [L. S.]

LEADES (Λαῖδης), a son of Astacus, who, according to Apollodorus (iii. 6, § 8), fought in the defence of Thebes against the Seven, and slew Eteocles; but Aeschylus (Sept. 474) represents Megareus as the person who killed Eteocles. [L. S.]

LEAENA (Λαίνα). 1. An Athenian hetæra, beloved by Aristogeiton, or, according to Athenæus, by Harmodius. On the murder of Hipparchus she was put to the torture, as she was supposed to have been privy to the conspiracy; but she died under her sufferings without making any disclosure, and, if we may believe one account, she bit off her tongue, that no secret might be wrung from her. The Athenians honoured her memory greatly, and in particular by a bronze statue of a lioness (Λαίνα) without a tongue, in the vestibule of the Acropolis. (Paus. i. 23; Athen. xiii. p. 596, e; Plut. de Garr. 8; Polyæn. viii. 45.) Pausanias tells us (l. c.) that the account of her constancy was preserved at Athens by tradition.

2. An hetæra, one of the favourites of Demetrius Poliorcetes, at Athens. (Mach. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 577, d; comp. Plut. Dem. 26.) [E. E.]

LEAGRUS (Λαγρός), son of Glaucou, in conjunction with Sophanes the athlete, of Decelia, commanded the Athenians who fell in the first attempt to colonise Amphipolia, B. C. 463, at Drabescus or Datus (Herod. ix. 75; Paus. i. 29. § 4; comp. Thuc. i. 100). His son, a second Glaucou, commanded, with the orator Andocides, the reinforcements sent to the aid of the Coreymæans, B. C. 432; and his grandson, another Leagrus, is ridiculed in a passage of the comic poet Plato (ap. Athen. ii. p. 68, c.), as a highborn fool.

οὗτος ὁρᾷς ὅτι
ὁ μὲν Λαγρός Γλαυκῶνος μετὰ τοῦ γένους καὶ καὶ ἡλείδιος περιέρχεται.

A sister of his was married to Callias III, son of Ripponicus (Andoc. Myst. p. 126, Bekk.), so that the genealogy stands thus,

LEANDER (Λεάνδρος), the famous youth of Abydos, who, from love of Hero, the priestess of Aphrodite, in Sestos, swam every night across the Hellespont, being guided by the light of the lighthouse of Sestos. Once during a very stormy night the light was extinguished, and he perished in the waves. On the next morning his corpse was washed on the coast of Sestos, and Hero, on seeing it, threw herself into the sea. This story is the subject of the epic poem of Musaeus, entitled De Amore Herois et Leandri, and is also mentioned by Ovid (Her. xiii. 19), Statius (Theb. vi. 535), and Virgil (Georg. iii. 258, &c.) [L. S.]

LEANDER or LEANDRIUS (Λεάνδρος or Λεάνδριος), of Miletus, seems to have been the author of a work on the history of his native city. A few quotations from it are still extant, but we have no means of determining the age at which Leander lived. (Diog. Laert. i. 28, 41; Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 13, Strom. i. p. 129, vi. p. 267; Euseb. Præp. Ev. ii. p. 45; Theodoret. Therop. i. p. 700, viii. p. 909; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 706.) [L. S.]

LEANEIRA. [APHREIDAR.]

LEARCHUS. [ATHAMAS.]

LEARCHUS (Λεάρχης). 1. Of Rhegium, is one of those Daedalian artists who stand on the confines of the mythical and historical periods, and about whom we have extremely uncertain information. One account made him a pupil of Daedalus, another of Dipoenus and Scyllia. (Paus. iii. 17. § 6.) Pausanias saw, in the Brazen House at Sparta, a statue of Zeus by him, which was made of separate pieces of hammered bronze, fastened together with nails. Pausanias adds, that this was the most ancient of all existing statues in bronze. It evidently belonged to a period when the art of casting in bronze was not yet known. But this is inconsistent with the account which made Learchus the pupil of Dipoenus and Scyllia, for these artists are said to have been the inventors of sculpture in marble, an art which is generally admitted to have had a later origin than that of casting in bronze. Moreover, Rhœceus and Theodorus, the inventors of casting in bronze, are placed about the beginning of the Olympiads. Learchus must, therefore, have flourished still earlier; but the date of Dipoenus and Scyllia is, according to the only account we have of it, about 200 years later. [DIPŌENUS.]

The difficulty is rather increased than diminished if we substitute for Λεάρχης, in the passage of Pausanias, Κλεάρχης, which is probably the true reading. (See the editions of Schubart and Walz, and Bekker.) In another passage, Pausanias mentions (vi. 4. § 2) Clearchus of Rhegium as the instructor of Pythagoras of Rhegium, and the pupil of Encheirus of Corinth. This Clearchus must therefore have lived about a.c. 500, eighty years later than Dipoenus and Scyllia. We must therefore either assume the existence of two Clearchi of Rhegium, one near the beginning, and the other at the end of the Daedalian period, or else we must account for the statement of Pausanias by supposing that, as often happens, a vague tradition affixed the name of a well-known ancient artist to a work whose true origin was lost in remote antiquity.

2. Some recently discovered painted vases, in the collection of the Prince of Canino at Rome, bear the name of Learchus of Rhegium. It is inferred from the inscriptions that there were two vase painters of this name. (Nagler, Neues Allgemeines Künstler Lexicon, s. v.) [P. S.]

LECA'NIUS, 1. C. One of the consuls in A. D. 65 (Tac. Ann. xv. 3; Fasti), and probably the same person with Q. Lecanius Bassus, a contemporary of the elder Pliny, who died from puncturing a carbuncle on his left hand. (Plin. H. N. xxvi. 1 (4); comp. Ryckius ad Tac. Ann. xv. 3.)

2. A soldier, one of the several persons to whom Galba's death-blow was attributed, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 41.) [W. B. D.]

LECA'NIUS AREIUS. [AREIUS.]

LECAPENUS, GEORGIUS. [GEORGIUS, No. 30.]

LECHEA'TES (Λεχεάτης) i. e. the protector of childbed, a surname of Zeus, who, as the father of Athena, was worshipped under this name at Aliphera. (Paus. viii. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

LECHES (Λέχης), a son of Poseidon and Peirene, and brother of Cenchrias. (Paus. ii. 2. § 3, 24. § 7.) [L. S.]

LEDA (Λήδα), a daughter of Thestius, whence she is called Thestias (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; Paus. iii. 13. § 8; Eurip. Iph. Aul. 49); but others call her a daughter of Thespius, Thyestes, or Glaucus, by Laophonte, Deidamia, Leucippe, Eurythemis, or Paneidyia. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 146, 201; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 130; Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollod. i. 7. § 10.) She was the wife of Tyndareus, by whom she became the mother of Timandra, Clytemnestra, and Philonoe. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6; Hom. Od. xxiv. 199.) One night she was embraced both by her husband and by Zeus, and by the former she became the mother of Castor and Clytemnestra, and by the latter of Polydeuces and Helena. (Hygin. Fab. 77.) According to Homer (Od. xi. 298, &c.) both Castor and Polydeuces were sons of Tyndareus and Leda, while Helena is described as a daughter of Zeus. (Il. iii. 426; comp. Ov. Fast. i. 706; Horat. Carm. i. 12, 25; Martial, i. 37.) Other traditions reverse the story, making Castor and Polydeuces the sons of Zeus, and Helena the daughter of Tyndareus. (Eurip. Helena. 254, 1497, 1680; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 808; Herod. ii. 112.) According to the common legend Zeus visited Leda in the disguise of a swan, and she produced two eggs, from the one of which issued Helena, and from the other Castor and Polydeuces. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 453; Ov. Her. xvii. 55; Paus. iii. 16. § 1; Horat. Ars Poet. 147; Athen. ii. p. 57, &c., ix. p. 373; Lucian, Dial. Deor. ii. 2, xxiv. 2, xxvi.; comp. Virgil, Cir. 489; Tzet. ad Lycophr. 88.) The visit of Zeus to Leda in the form of a swan was frequently represented by ancient artists. It should be observed that Phoebe is also mentioned as a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda (Eurip. Iph. Aul. 50), and that, according to Lactantius (i. 21.), Leda was after her death raised to the rank of a divinity, under the name of Nemesis. (Comp. TYNDARÆUS.) [L. S.]

LEIO'DES (Λειώδης), one of the suitors of Penelope, was slain by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xxi. 144, xxii. 328.) [L. S.]

LEITUS (Λήϊτος), a son of Alector or Electryon, by Cleobule, and father of Peneleus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Diod. iv. 67.) He is mentioned among the Argonauts (Apollod. i. 9. § 16), and commanded the Boeotians in the war against Troy (Hom. Il. ii. 494, xvii. 602; Paus. ix. 4. § 3), from whence he took with him the remains of Arceilaus. (Paus. ix. 39. § 3.) His tomb was shown in later times at Plataeae. (Paus. ix. 4. § 3; comp. Hygin. Fab. 97.) [L. S.]

LELEX (Λέλεξ). 1. One of the original inhabitants of Laconia which was called after him, its first king. Lelegia. He was married to the Naiad Cleochareia, by whom he became the father of Myles, Polycæon, and Eurotas. He had a heroum at Sparta. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Paus. iii. 1. § 1. 12. § 4, iv. 1. § 2.) Some call his wife Peridia, and his children Myles, Polyclon, Bomolochus, and Therapne; while Eurotas is represented as a son of Myles and a grandson of Lelex. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 615.) In other traditions, again, Lelex is described as a son of Spartus, and as the father of Amyclæ. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Λακεδαιμόνιον.)

2. A son of Poseidon and Libya, the daughter of Epaphus. He was regarded as the ancestor of the Leleges, and is said to have immigrated from Egypt into Greece, where he became king of Megara; and his tomb was shown below Nisæa, the acropolis of Megara. (Paus. i. 44. § 5, 39. § 5; Ov. Met. vii. 443, viii. 567, 617.)

LEMURES, i. e., spectres or spirits of the dead, which were believed by the Romans to return to the upper world and injure the living. Some writers describe Lemures as the common name for all the spirits of the dead (Apul. de Deo Socer. p. 237, ed. Bip.; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 63; Mart. Capella, ii. § 162; Ov. Fast. v. 483), and divide all Lemures into two classes; viz. the souls of those who have been good men are said to become Lares, while those of the wicked become Larvæ. But the common idea was that the Lemures and Larvæ were the same (August. De Civ. Dei. ix. 11); and the Lemures are said to wander about at night as spectres, and to torment and frighten the living. (Horat. Epist. ii. 2. 209; Pers. v. 185.) In order to propitiate them, and to purify the human habitations, certain ceremonies were performed on the three nights of the 9th, 11th, and 13th of May every year. The pater familias rose at midnight, and went outside the door making certain signs with his hand to keep the spectre at a distance. He then washed his hand thrice in spring water, turned round, and took black beans into his mouth, which he afterwards threw behind him. The spectres were believed to collect these beans. After having spoken certain words without looking around, he again washed his hands, made a noise with brass basins, and called out to the spectres nine times: "be gone, you spectres of the house!" This being done, he was allowed to look round, for the spectres were rendered harmless. The days on which these rites were performed were considered unlucky, and the temples remained closed during that period. (Varro, ap. Non. p. 135; Fest. s. v. Fabam; Ov. Fast. v.

LENAEUS (Ληναῖος), a surname of Dionysus, derived from ληνός, the wine-press or the vintage. (Hesych. s. v.; Virg. Georg. ii. 4. 529; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Lenaos.) [L. S.]

LENAEUS, a freedman of Pompey the Great, whence he is sometimes called Pompeius Lenaeus. He was a native of Athens, possessed great knowledge of natural history, and was acquainted with several languages, in consequence of which Pompey restored him to freedom. (Sueton. De Illust. Grammat. 2, 15; Plin. H. N. xxv. 2, 3.) He accompanied his patron in nearly all his expeditions (Suet. l. c. 15), and by his command he translated into Latin the work of Mithridates on poisons. (Plin. l. c., comp. xv. 30, 39, xxiv. 9, 41, xxv. 6, 27, and Elench. lib. xiv. xv. xx. xxiii. xxvii.) After the death of Pompey and his sons, Lenaeus maintained himself by keeping a school at Rome, in the Carinae, near the temple of Tellus, the district in which the house of Pompey had been. This fact is a proof not only of his great attachment to the memory of his late master, but also of his not having made use of his friendship with Pompey for the purpose of enriching himself. His affection for Pompey also led him to write a very bitter satire against the historian Sallust, who had spoken of Pompey in an unjust and slanderous manner. Suetonius (l. c. 15) has preserved some of the opprobrious terms in which Lenaeus spoke of Sallust. (O. M. Müller, Histor. Krit. Darstellung der Nachricht vom Leben, &c., des Sallust, p. 10; Drumann, Gesch. Roms, vol. iv. p. 556.) [L. S.]

LENIUS. [LARNIUS.]

LENTICULA, LICINIUS, called in some manuscripts of Cicero Denticula, was one of Antony's dissolute companions, who had been condemned for gambling, but was restored by Antony to his former status. Dion Cassius falsely states that he was recalled from banishment by Antony; but it would seem that infamia was a consequence of being condemned for gambling, and that he was restored by Antony to his full rights as a citizen. (Cic. Phil. ii. 23; Abram. and Garaton. ad loc.; Dion Cass. xlv. 47.)

LENTIDIUS, one of the leaders of the Clodian mob of slaves and gladiators in January, b. c. 57, when P. Sextius, tribune of the plebs, was assailed and left for dead in the temple of Castor in the forum. (Cic. pro Dom. 53, pro Sext. 37.) [W. B. D.]

LENTO, CAESE'NNIUS, a follower of M. Antony; and unless Cicero is speaking ironically, originally a stage player. (Phil. xi. 6.) Lentus was one of Antony's seven agrarian commissioners—septemvirs (Cic. Phil. ii. 38, xii. 9, xiii. 12)—in b. c. 44, for apportioning the Campanian and Leontine lands, whence Cicero terms him "divisor Italiae." During the siege of Mutina in the spring of b. c. 43, Lentus was stationed in Etruria to watch the communications with Rome by the Via Cassia, which circumstance furnished one among Cicero's various reasons for declining the legation to Antony in Cisalpine Gaul. (Phil. xii. 9, xiii. 2.) [W. B. D.]

LENTULUS, the name of one of the haughtiest patrician families of the Cornelian Gens [CORNELII GENS]; so that Cicero coins the words Appatus and Lentulus to express the qualities of the high patrician party (ad Fam. iii. 7. § 5). When we find plebeians bearing the name (as a tribune of the plebs, Cic. pro Lago Manil. 19), they were no doubt descendants of freedmen. The name was evidently derived from leas, like Cicero from cicor, &c. (Cic. ad Att. i. 19. § 2; Plin. H. N. xviii. 3.)

For the Lentuli Marcellini, see MARCELLUS.

2. L. CORNELIUS L. F. LENTULUS, son of the last (Liv. l. c.), consul in B. C. 327. He commanded an army of observation against the Samnites just before the second Samnite war, B. C. 324. (Liv.

viii. 22, 23.) He was legate in the Caudine campaign, five years after, and advised the consuls to accept the terms offered by the enemy. (Liv. ix. 4.) Next year he was dictator, and he probably was the officer who avenged the disgrace of the Furculae Caudinae. This was indeed disputed (Liv. ix. 15); but his descendants at least claimed the honour for him, by assuming the agnomen of Caudinus. [See No. 6.]

3. SERV. CORNELIUS CN. F. CN. N. LENTULUS, consul in B. C. 303. (Liv. x. 1; Fasti Cap.)

4. TIB. CORNELIUS SERV. F. CN. N. LENTULUS, son of the last. [See the next.]

5. L. CORNELIUS TIB. F. SERV. N. LENTULUS, son of the last, consul B. C. 275. (Fasti Cap.)

6. L. CORNELIUS L. F. TIB. N. LENTULUS CAUDINUS, son of the last. (Fasti Cap. A. U. 516.) He is the first who is expressly recorded with the agnomen Caudinus; but as the Fasti are mutilated, it may have been assumed by his father. He was curule aedile (Vaillant, Cornelii No. 18, Papiri No. 1); Pontifex Maximus (Liv. xxii. 10); and as consul in B. C. 237, he triumphed over the Ligurians. (Fasti Cap.; Entrop. iii. 2.) He died B. C. 213. (Liv. xxv. 2.)

7. P. CORNELIUS L. F. TIB. N. LENTULUS CAUDINUS, brother of the last, consul in B. C. 236. (Fasti, A. U. 517; Vaill. Cornelii, No. 19; Spanh. Num. vol. ii. p. 220.)

9. P. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. LENTULUS CAUDINUS, brother of the last; with P. Scipio in Spain, B. C. 210 (Liv. xxvi. 48); praetor B. C. 204 (Id. xxix. 38); one of the ten ambassadors sent to Philip of Macedon in B. C. 196. (Id. xxxiii. 35, 39.)

10. P. CORNELIUS P. F. L. N. LENTULUS, son of No. 7, praetor in Sicily B. C. 214, and continued in his province for the two following years. (Liv. xxiv. 9, 10, 44, xxv. 3, xxvi. 1.) In B. C. 189 he was one of ten ambassadors sent into Asia after the submission of Antiochus. (Id. xxxvii. 55.)

11. CN. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. LENTULUS (Fasti Cap. A. U. 552); perhaps son of No. 8, since we find him designated as L. f. L. n.; though, on the other hand, his praenomen Cneius, and the absence of the agnomen Caudinus, are opposed to this connection. He was quaestor in B. C. 212; curule aedile with his brother (No. 12) in 204; consul in 201 (Liv. xxv. 17, xxix. 11, xxx. 40, 44). He wished for the province of Africa, that he might conclude the war with Carthage; but this well-earned glory was reserved for Scipio by the senate. Lentulus had the command of the fleet on the coast of Sicily, with orders to pass over to Africa if necessary. Scipio used to say, that but for Lentulus's greediness he should have destroyed Carthage. (Liv. xxx. 40—44.) Cn. Lentulus was proconsul in Hither Spain in B. C. 199, and had an ovation for his services. (Id. xxxi. 50, xxxiii. 27.)

12. L. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. LENTULUS, brother of the last (Vaill. Cornelii, No. 28), praetor in Sardinia B. C. 211 (Liv. xxv. 41, xxvi. 1), succeeded Scipio as proconsul in Spain, where he remained for eleven years, and on his return was not allowed more than an ovation, because he only held proconsular rank. (Liv. xviii. 38, xxix. 2, 11, 13, xxx. 41, xxxi. 20, 30.) During his absence in Spain he was curule aedile with his brother Cneius [No. 11], though he had been already praetor. (Liv. xxix. 11.) This might be to further his designs upon the consulship, which he obtained the year after his return, B. C. 199; and the year after that he was proconsul in Gaul. (Liv. xxxi. 49, xxxii. 1, 2, 8, 9.) He is perhaps the Lentulus that was decemvir sacrorum in B. C. 213, and died in 173. (Id. xxv. 2, xlii. 10.)

13. L. CORNELIUS CN. F. L. N. LENTULUS LUPUS, son of No. 11, nephew to the last (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 302); curule aedile in B. C. 163; consul in 156; censor in 147. (Titul. Terentii Hostil.; Fasti, A. U. 597, 606; Cic. Brut. 20; Val. Max. vi. 9. § 10.)

14. CORNELIUS LENTULUS was praetor in Sicily, and was defeated in the Servile war about B. C. 134. (Florus, iii. 19, 7.)

15. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, consul in B. C. 97. (Fasti; Plin. H. N. x. 2, xxx. 3 (1); Cassiod.) He was probably father by adoption of No. 24.

16. P. CORNELIUS L. F. L. N. LENTULUS, probably son of No. 12. He was curule aedile with Scipio Nasica in B. C. 169: in their Circensian games they exhibited elephants and bears. (Liv. xlv. 18.) Next year he went with two others to negotiate with Perseus of Macedon, but without effect. (Liv. xlv. 4.) He was consul suffectus, with C. Domitius, in B. C. 162, the election of the former consuls being declared informal. (Fasti, A. U. 591; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 4, de Divin. ii. 35; Val. Max. i. 1. § 3.) He became princeps senatus (Cic. Brut. 28, Divin. in Caecil. 21, de Orat. i. 48); and must have lived to a good old age, since he was wounded in the contest with C. Gracchus in B. C. 121. (Cic. in Cat. iv. 6, Philipp. viii. 4.)

17. P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, only known from Fasti, son of No. 16, and father of No. 18.

18. P. CORNELIUS P. F. P. N. LENTULUS, surnamed SURA, son of the last, the man of chief note in Catiline's crew. (Cic. in Cat. iii. 5, iv. 6; Ascon. ad Divin. 21.) He was quaestor to Sulla in B. C. 81 (Plut. Cic. 17); before him and L. Triarius, Verres had to give an account of the monies he had received as quaestor in Cisalpine Gaul. (Cic. in Verr. i. 14.) He was soon after himself called to account for the same matter, but was acquitted. It is said that he got his cognomen of Sura from his conduct on this occasion; for when Sulla called him to account, he answered by scornfully putting out his leg, "like boys," says Plutarch, "when they make a blunder in playing at ball." (Cic. 17.) Other persons, however, had borne the name before, one perhaps of the Lentulus family. (Liv. xxii. 31; comp. Suet. Domit. 13; Dion Cass. lxxviii. 9, 15.) In B. C. 75 he was praetor; and Hortensius, pleading before such a judge, had no difficulty in procuring the acquittal of Terentius Varro, when accused of extortion. (Ascon. ad Divin. 7; Plut. Cic. 17; Acron. ad Horat. Serm. ii. 1. 49.) In B. C. 71 he was consul. (Fasti, A. U. 682; Consularis in Vell. Pat. ii. 34; Dion Cass. xxvii. 30.) But in the next year he was ejected from the senate, with sixty-three others, for infamous life and manners. (Gell. v. 6; Plut. L. C.; Dion Cass. &c.; see No. 25.) It was this, probably, that led him to join Catiline and his crew. From his distinguished birth and high rank, he calculated on becoming chief of the conspiracy; and a prophecy of the Sibylline books was applied by flattering haruspices to him. Three Cornelli were to rule Rome, and he was the third after Sulla and Cinna; the twentieth year after the burning of the capitol, &c., was to be fatal to the city. (Cic. in Cat. iii. 4, iv. 1, 6; Sal. Cat. 47.) * To gain power, and recover his place in the senate, he became praetor again in A. C. 63. (Sal. B. C. 17, 46, &c.) When Catiline left the city for Etruria, Lentulus remained as chief of the home-conspirators, and his irresolution probably saved the city from being fired. (Sal. Cat. 32, 43; Cic. in Cat. iii. 4, 7, iv. 6, Brut. 66, &c.; comp. Cathecus, 8.) For it was by his over-caution that the negotiation with the ambassadors of the Allobroges was entered into; and these unstable allies revealed the secret to the consul Cicero, who directed them to feign compliance with the conspirators' wishes, and thus to obtain written documents which might be brought in evidence against them. The well-known sequel will be found under the life of Catiline [p. 632]. Lentulus was deposed from the praetorship; given to be kept in libera custodia by the aedile P. Lentulus Spintner (No. 20; comp. Cic. in Cat. iii. 6, iv. 3, p. Red. ad Quir. 6; Sal. Cat. 50, &c.); and was strangled in the Capitoline prison on the 5th of December. (Cic. pro Flacc. 40, &c., Philipp. ii. 7 (8); Sal. Cat. 55, &c.) His step-son Antony pretended that Cicero refused to deliver up his corpse for burial. (Cic. Philipp. l. c.; Plut. Anton. 2.) Lentulus was slow in thought and speech, but this was disguised by the dignity of his person, the expressiveness and grace of his action, the sweetness and power of his voice. (Cic. Brut. 64.) His impudence was excessive, his morals infamous, so that there was nothing so bad but he dared say or do it; but when danger showed itself he was slow and irresolute. The former qualities made him join the gang of Catiline; the latter were in great part the ruin of their cause. (Comp. Senec. de Ira, iii. 38; Cic. pro Sull. 25.)

19. P. CORNELIUS L. F. LENTULUS, father of the next.

20. P. CORNELIUS P. F. L. N. LENTULUS, surnamed SPINTNER. (Fasti, A. U. 696; comp. Gell. A. U. 698; Eckhel, vol. v. p. 182.) He received this nickname from his resemblance to the actor Spintner, and it was remarked as curious, that his colleague in the consulship, Metellus Nepos, was like Pamphilus, another actor. (Plin. H. N. vii. 10; Val. Max. ix. 14. § 4.) Caesar commonly calls him by this name (B. C. i. 15, &c.); not so Cicero; but there could be no harm in it, for he used it on his coins when pro-praetor in Spain, simply to distinguish himself from the many of the same family (Eckhel, l. c.); and his son bore it after him. He was curule aedile in B. C. 63, the year of Cicero's consulship, and was entrusted with the care of the apprehended conspirator, P. Lent. Sura (No. 18). His games were long remembered for their splendour; but his toga, edged with Tyrian purple, gave offence. (Sal. Cat. 47; Cic. de Off. ii. 16; Plut. H. N. ix. 63, xxxvi. 12, (7).) He was praetor in B. C. 60: at the Apollinarian games he, for the first time, drew an awning over the theatre (carbasia vela, Plin. H. N. xix. 6), and ornamented the scenes with silver. (Val. Max. ii. 4. § 6.) By Caesar's interest he obtained Hither Spain for his next year's province, where he remained into part of 58. (Caes. B. C. i. 22; Cic. ad Fam. i. 9. § 4, &c.)

He returned to become candidate for the consulship, when he was elected again, by Caesar's support. (Caes. l. c.) But on the very day of his entering office, 1 Jan. a. c. 57, he moved for the immediate recall of Cicero (Cic. in Pis. 15); brought over his colleague Metellus Nepos to the same views; and his services were gratefully acknowledged by Cicero. (Pro Sext. 40, 69, Brut. 77, ad Att. iii. 22, &c.; and comp. the letters to Lentulus himself, ad Fam. i. 1—9.) Now, therefore, notwithstanding his obligations to Caesar, he had openly taken part with the aristocracy. Yet he opposed them in promoting Pompey's appointment to the supreme superintendence of the corn market. His secret motive was to occupy Pompey at home, and thus prevent him from being charged with the office of restoring Ptolemy Auletes, the exiled king of Egypt; for then he hoped that this would fall to his share, as proconsul of Cilicia. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 1, ad Fam. i. 1. § 7; Plut. Pomp. 49. For the life and fortunes of this king, see PROLEMAEUS AULETES.) Lentulus obtained a decree in his favour; and intended to depart at the close of his consulship. But in December, a statue of Jupiter on the Alban hill was struck by lightning: the Sibylline books were consulted, and an oracle found which forbade the restoration of a king of Egypt by armed force. Cato, who had just become tribune, was an enemy of Lentulus: he availed himself of this oracle (which had probably been forged to use against Pompey), and ordered the quindecimviri to read it publicly. (Fenestella, ap. Non. Marcell. p. 385, ed. Lips. 1826.) The matter was then brought before the senate, and gave rise to long and intricate debates. The pretensions of Pompey were supported by several tribunes: Lentulus was backed by Hortensius and Lucullus. The high aristocratic party, led by Bibulus, leaned to a middle course, to send three ambassadors to Egypt. Cicero was bound by gratitude to Lentulus; by fear of another exile to Pompey; and seems to have taken little active part in the matter. The proposition of Bibulus being rejected, the new consul, Marcellinus, exerted himself to procure the adjournment of the question sine die, and it rested till the year 55 a. c., when Gabinius got a law passed, without the authority of the senate, entrusting the coveted office to Pompey. (See Cic. to Lentulus, ad Fam. i., ad Q. Fr. ii. 2 and 6; Plut. Pomp. 49; Dion Cass. xxxix. 15, 16.) Lentulus remained as proconsul in Cilicia from b. c. 56 till July, 53, though Cato proposed to recall him. We hear little of his doings. He was saluted Imperator for a campaign in the Amanus, and Cicero warmly supported his claims to a triumph, which, however, he did not obtain till a. c. 51, when Cicero was himself in Cilicia. The orator praises his justice, but recommends him to make friends of the equites (publicani). (Cic. ad Fam. i. 5, &c., iii. 7, 3, pro Sext. 69; comp. Eckhel, vol. iv. p. 360, vol. v. p. 184.) That Cicero's praise was deserved appears from the fact that Lentulus was obliged to sell his villa at Tusculum soon after. (Ad Att. vi. 1. 20.)

In a. c. 49, when the civil wars began, Lentulus took part against Caesar, and had the command of 10 cohorts in Picenum. At the approach of the enemy, he fled and joined Domitius Ahenobarbus at Corfinium. When Caesar invested the place, and Pompey refused to come to their relief, Lentulus was allowed by the garrison to open negotiations with Caesar. The general received him favourably, dismissed him with his friends, and took the troops into his own service. (Caes. B. C. i. 15—23.) Lentulus retired to Puteoli and probably joined Pompey in Greece not long after. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 11, 13, 15.) He shared in the presumption of his party, for we find him disputing with Metellus, Scipio, and Domitius, who had the best right to succeed Caesar as pontifex maximus. (Caes. B. C. iii. 83.) After Pharsalia, he followed Pompey to Egypt, and got safe to Rhodes. (Ad Fam. xii. 14; comp. Caes. B. C. iii. 102.) Of his subsequent fate we are not informed.

Lentulus Spinther owes his importance chiefly to his high birth and his connection with Cicero. He was a common-place sort of man, of tolerable honesty. As an orator, he made up, by pains and industry, for the gifts that had been denied him by nature. (Cic. Brut. 77.)

21. P. CORNELIUS P. F. P. N. LENTULUS SPINTHER, son of the last. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 7, xii. 15, ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, &c.) He assumed the toga virilis in b. c. 57, and therefore was born in 74. In the same year he was elected in the college of augurs, having been first received (by a sham adoption) into the Manlian gens; because two of the same gens could not at once be in the college, and Faustus Sulla of the Cornelian was already a member. (Cic. pro Sext. 69; Dion Cass. xxxix. 17; comp. Vaill. Cornel. No. 48—51, Eckhel, vol. v. p. 184, &c.) In 56, when Cato endeavoured to recal his father from Cilicia, he appeared publicly in mourning. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, init.) He followed Pompey's fortunes with his father, and was supposed to have gone to Alexandria after the murder of their chief—perhaps to intercede with Caesar. (Ad Att. xi. 13.) The dictator pardoned him, and he returned to Italy. In b. c. 45 he was divorced from his abandoned wife, Metella. (Horat. Serm. ii. 3. 339; Cic. ad Att. xi. 15, 23, xii. 52, xiii. 7.) Soon after we find him visiting Cicero, and in close connection with M. Brutus. After the murder of the dictator, he openly joined the conspirators. (Ad Att. xiii. 10, ad Fam. xii. 14, 4; Plut. Caes. 67, &c.) The senate sent him as proquaestor to C. Trebonius, who held Asia as proconsul for the conspirators. When the latter was slain by Dolabella, Lentulus assumed the title of praepetor, and sent home a despatch containing an exaggerated account of his own services; and he certainly was of use in supplying Cassius with money, and harassing Dolabella. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 14, 15.) When Brutus and Cassius took the field, he joined them, and coined money in their name, with the figure and title of Libertas. (See the annexed coin.) He served with Cassius against

Rhodes; with Brutus in Lycia. (App. B. C. iv. 72, 82.) After Philippi, he escaped death, for his name appears with the augurs' insignia on denaries of Augustus, which proves that he was alive in B. C. 27, when Octavius assumed this name.

23. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, consul with Mummius in B. C. 146. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 33. § 3; Vell. Pat. i. 12. § 5, compared with the Fasti, A. U. 607.)

24. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CLODIANUS (Cic. ad Att. i. 19. § 2; Gell. xviii. 4), a Claudius adopted into the Lentulus family—perhaps by No. 15. He was consul in B. C. 72, with L. Gellius. They brought forward several important laws; one, that all who had been presented with the freedom of the city by Pompey (after the Sertorian war) should be Roman citizens (Cic. pro Balb. 8, 14; see Vol. I. p. 456); another, that persons absent in the provinces should not be indictable for capital offences. This was intended to protect Sthenius of Thermae in Sicily against the machinations of Verres; and by the influence of this person it was frustrated. (Cic. in Verr. ii. 34, 39, &c.) Lentulus also passed a law to exact payment from those who had received grants of public land from Sulla. (Sall. ap. Gell. xviii. 4.) In the war with Spartacus both he and his colleague were defeated—but after their consulship. (Liv. Epit. 96; Plut. Crass. 9, &c.) With the same colleague he held the censorship in B. C. 70, and ejected 64 members from the senate for infamous life, among whom were Lentulus Sura [See No. 18] and C. Antonius, afterwards Cicero's colleague in the consulship. Yet the majority of those expelled were acquitted by the courts, and restored (Cic. pro Cluent. 42, in Verr. v. 7, pro Flacc. 19; Gell. v. 6; Val. Max. v. 9. § 1.) They held a lustrum, in which the number of citizens was returned at 450,000 (Liv. Epit. 98; Ascon. ad Verr. Act. i. 18; comp. Plut. Pomp. 22.) The same officers served as Pompey's legates against the pirates in B. C. 67, 66; and Lentulus supported the Manilian law, appointing Pompey to the command against Mithridates. (Appian, Mithr. 95; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 23.) As an orator, he concealed his want of talent by great skill and art, and by a good voice. (Cic. Brut. 66.)

25. CN. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CLODIANUS, son of the last. In B. C. 60, he was sent with Metellus Creticus and L. Flaccus, to check the apprehended inroad of the Swiss into the province of Gaul; but their services were not required. (Cic. ad Att. i. 19, 20.)

26. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS CRUS. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4, init.) Who he was, and whence he derived his agnomen of Crus, is unknown.

In B. C. 61, he appeared as the chief accuser of P. Clodius, for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea (Arym. ad Cic. in Clod., de Harusp. Resp. 17). In 58 he was praetor, and Cicero calculated on his aid against Clodius (ad Q. Fr. i. 2, fin.); and he did attempt to rouse Pompey to protect the orator, but in vain (in Pison. 81). He was not raised to the consular dignity till B. C. 50, when he obtained this post, with C. Marcellus M. f., as being a known enemy to Caesar (Caes. B. G. 8, 50); though in the year before, P. Dolabella had beaten him in the contest for a place among the xv. viri (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4). In the year of his consulship, B. C. 49, the storm burst. Lentulus did all he could to excite his wavering party to take arms and meet Caesar: he called Cicero cowardly; blamed him for seeking a triumph at such a time (ad Fam. vi. 21, xvi. 11); urged war at any price, in the hope, says Caesar (B. C. i. 4), of retrieving his ruined fortunes, and becoming another Sulla; and Cicero seems to justify this accusation (ad Fam. vi. 6, ad Att. xi. 6). It was mainly at Lentulus' instigation that the violent measures passed the senate early in the year, which gave the tribunes a pretence for flying to Caesar at Ravenna (Caes. B. C. i. 5; Plut. Caes. 33). He himself fled from the city at the approach of Caesar; and Cicero saw him at Formiae in January 23rd, quite dispirited (ad Att. vii. 12). On the 27th, at Capua, Lentulus with others agreed to accept Caesar's offers (ib. 15). He was summoned by Cassius the tribune to return to Rome, to bring the money from the sacred treasury, but did not go (ib. 21, comp. viii. 11). Pompey had meantime collected forces in Apulia, and ordered the consuls to join him there, leaving a garrison in Capua (ad Att. viii. 13 a—d.). While Pompey was retiring on Brundisium, Balbus the younger was sent by Caesar to persuade Lentulus to return to Rome, with offers of a province. The consul, instead, went with his colleague and some troops over to Illyria, though Cicero tried to detain him in Italy (ad Att. viii. 9, 15, ix. 6); and, soon after, we hear of his raising two legions for Pompey in Asia (Caes. B. C. iii. 4). When both armies were encamped at Dyrrhachium, Balbus again attempted to seduce the consul, boldly entering Pompey's camp; but Lentulus asked too high a price (Vell. Pat. ii. 51; comp. Cic. ad Fam. x. 32); and probably, like others of his party, thought Caesar's cause desperate (Caes. B. C. iii. 82). After Pharsalia, he fled with Pompey; but was refused admittance at Rhodes (Caes. B. C. iii. 102; Vell. Pat. ii. 53). With some others, he determined to make for Egypt, and arrived there the day after Pompey's murder. He saw the funeral pyre on Mt. Casius, but landed, was apprehended by young Ptolemy's ministers, and put to death in prison. (Caes. B. C. iii. 104; Val. Max. i. 8. § 9; Oros. vi. 15; Plut. Pomp. 80.) Notwithstanding his prodigality and selfishness, Cicero always regarded him with some favour, in memory of the part he had taken against Clodius (Brut. 77, de Harusp. Resp. 17).

27. SERV. CORNELIUS LENTULUS, curule aedile in B. C. 207; military tribune in Spain, two years after (Liv. xxviii. 10, xxix. 2).

28. SERV. CORNELIUS SERV. F. LENTULUS, son of the last. In B. C. 171, he went with his brother Publius and three others on an embassy to Greece (Liv. xlii. 37, 47, 49, 56). In 169, he was praetor in Sicily (Id. xliiii. 15).

29. P. CORNELIUS SERV. F. LENTULUS. [See the last.]

30. L. CORNELIUS SERV. F. SERV. N. LENTULUS, son of No. 28, praetor in B. C. 140 (Frontin. de Aquaed. 7).

31. L. LENTULUS, in B. C. 168 was one of three who carried home the despatches of the consul Aemilius Paullus, after the defeat of Perseus (Liv. xlv. 1).

32. CN. LENTULUS VATIA, mentioned by Cicero, B. C. 56 (ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. § 5).

33. L. CORNELIUS LENTULUS NIGER, flamen of Mars (Cic. ad Att. xii. 7, in Vatina. 10; comp. Ascon. ad Cic. Scaur. sub fin.). At his dedication by the augur L. Caesar, he gave a sumptuous dinner (Macrob. Sat. ii. 9). In B. C. 58, he stood for the consulship, though Caesar tried to put him down by implicating him in an attempt on Pompey's life (Cic. in Vat. 10; comp. ad Att. ii. 24). In 57, he was one of the priests to whom was referred the question whether the site of Cicero's house was consecrated ground (De Harusp. Resp. 6, comp. pro Dom. 49, 52). He is also mentioned as one of the judges in the case of P. Sextius, B. C. 56 (in Vat. l. c., ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, 5). He died in the same year, much praised by Cicero (ad Att. iv. 6).

34. L. CORNELIUS L. F. LENTULUS, son of the last, and also flamen of Mars (ad Att. iv. 16, 9, xii. 7, ad Q. Fr. iii. 1, 15). He defended M. Scaurus, in B. C. 54, when accused of extortion (Acron. ad Cic. Scaur. c. 1): he accused Gabinius of high treason, about the same time, but was suspected of collusion (ad Q. Fr. l. c., ad Att. iv. 16, 9). In the Philippics he is mentioned as a friend of Antony's; and he was appointed by the latter to a province, but made no use of the appointment, in B. C. 44 (Philipp. iii. 10). He struck coins as priest of Mars (Uitor), B. C. 20, to commemorate the recovery of the standards from the Parthians, by Augustus (Dion Cass. liv. 8; Vail. Cornel. No. 38).

35. LENTULUS CRUSCELLIO, of unknown origin, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43; he escaped, and joined Sext. Pompeius in Sicily, where his wife Sulpicia joined him, against the will of her mother Julia. (Val. Max. vi. 7. § 3; Appian, B. C. iv. 39.) [H. G. L.]

37. CN. CORNELIUS CN. F. LENTULUS AUGUR, consul B. C. 14, with M. Licinius Crassus. He was a man of immense wealth, but of a mean and possonian spirit. His wealth excited the avarice of Tiberius, who caused him so much fear that at length he put an end to his life, leaving his fortune to the emperor (Dion Cass. liv. 12; Senec. de Benef. ii. 27; Suet. Tyb. 49). This Cn. Lentulus, who is always spoken of as Augur, must not be confounded with Cn. Lentulus Gaetulicus [No. 39]. (See Lipsius, ad Tac. Ann. iv. 44.) The Augur Lentulus spoken of by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 59) in A. D. 22, must, therefore, be the same as the preceding.

38. L. CORNELIUS L. F. LENTULUS, consul B. C. 3, with M. Valerius Messallinus. (Index, ad Dion Cass. iv.; Suet. Galb. 4.) By some authorities he is called Cneius, but Lucius seems to be the correct phenomenon (see Pighius, ad Ann.). He would seem to have been a brother of No. 36, and may possibly have been the same as No. 34, the son of L. Lentulus Niger [No. 33].

39. COSSUS CORNELIUS CN. F. LENTULUS GAETULICUS, son probably of No. 37, is sometimes called Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Cossus. The former, however, is more usual; but as we find on coins both COSSUS CN. F. LENTVLVS, and CN. LENTVLVS COSSVS, it would seem that he might be called indifferently either Cneius or Cossus (Pighius, vol. iii. p. 531). Cossus was originally a family name in the Cornelia gens, and was first assumed as a phenomenon by this Lentulus. [COSSUS.]

Lentulus was consul B. C. 1, with L. Calpurnius Piso, and in A. D. 6 was sent into Africa, where he defeated the Gaetuli, who had invaded the kingdom of Juba. In consequence of this success he received the surname of Gaetulicus and the ornam- enta triumphalia. (Dion Cass. iv. 28; Vell. Pat. ii. 116; Flor. iv. 12. § 40; Oro. vi. 21; Tac. Ann. iv. 44.) On the accession of Tiberius in A. D. 14, he accompanied Drusus, who was sent to quell the mutiny of the legions in Pannonia. The mutineers were especially incensed against Lentulus, because they thought that from his age and military glory he would judge their offences most severely; and on one occasion he narrowly escaped death at their hands. Cn. Lentulus is again mentioned in A. D. 16, in the debate in the senate respecting Libo, also in A. D. 22 in the debate respecting Silanus, and again in A. D. 24, when he was falsely accused of majestas, but Tiberius would not allow the charge to be prosecuted. He died A. D. 25, at a very great age, leaving behind him an honourable reputation. He had endured poverty, says Tacitus, with patience, acquired a great fortune by honest means, and enjoyed it with moderation. (Tac. Ann. i. 27, ii. 32, iii. 68, iv. 29, 44; Dion Cass. lvii. 24.)

40. COSSUS CORNELIUS COSSI F. CN. N. LENTULUS, was consul A. D. 25, with M. Asinius Agrippa. According to the Faati, he would appear to be a son of the preceding. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Faati Cons.)

41. CN. CORNELIUS COSSI F. CN. N. LENTULUS GAETULICUS, a son of No. 39, was consul A. D. 26, with C. Calvisius Sabinus. He afterwards had the command of the legions of Upper Germany for ten years, and was very popular among the troops, by the mildness of his punishments and his merciful rule. He was also a favourite with the army in Lower Germany, which was commanded by L. Apronius, his father-in-law. His influence with the soldiers is said to have saved him on the fall of Sejanus, to whose son he had promised his daughter. He was the only one of the relations and connections of Sejanus whom Tiberius did not put to death; and Tacitus is disposed to believe the report, that Lentulus sent to the emperor to assure him of his allegiance, as long as he was allowed to retain the command of the army, but intimating that he would raise the standard of revolt, if he were deprived of his province. Tiberius thought it more prudent to leave him alone; but Calpula, thinking his influence with the soldiers too dangerous, put him to death in A. D. 39, apparently without exciting any commotion. Lentulus was succeeded in the command of the army in Upper Germany by Galba, who was subsequently emperor. (Vell. Pat. ii. 116; Tac. Ann. iv. 42, 46, vi. 30; Dion Cass. lix. 22; Suet. Galb. 6, Claud. 9.)

Lentulus Gaetulicus was an historian and a poet. Of his historical writings, which are quoted by Suetonius (Calig. 8), no fragments even are extant; and of his poems we have only three lines, which appear to have belonged to an astronomical poem, and which are preserved by Probus in his scholia on Virgil's Georgics (i. 227); they are given by Meyer in the Anthologia Latina (Ep. 113). The poems of Lentulus seem to have been for the most part epigrams, and to have been distinguished by their lascivious character (Mart. Præf. i.; Plin. Ep. v. 3. § 5; Sidon. Apoll. Ep. ii. 10, p. 148, Carm. ix. p. 256). There are nine epigrams in the Greek Anthology, inscribed with the name of Gaetulicus, who is supposed by many modern writers to have been the same as the Lentulus Gaetulicus mentioned above; but on this point see GAETULICUS.

42. COSSUS (COSSI F.) CORNELIUS LENTULUS, probably son of No. 40, was consul A. D. 60, with the emperor Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 20; Frontin. Aquaed. 102.)

43. LENTULUS, an actor in mimes, and also a writer of mimes, which must have been of considerable celebrity, as they are referred to several times by subsequent writers. He is said to have been a man of high rank; but his age is quite uncertain, except that he must have lived before the end of the first century of the Christian era. (Schol. ad Juv. Sat. viii. 187; Tertull. Apolog. 15, de Pallio, 4; Bothe, Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragm. vol. ii. pp. 269, 270.)

LEO or LEON (Λεων), historical. 1. Son of Eurycrates, 14th king of the Agid line at Sparta. In his time the Spartans were worsted in their war with Tegea. His son was Anaxandrides, the contemporary of Croesus (Herod. i. 65; Paus. iii. 3. § 5). [A.H.C.]

2. An Athenian, was sent out with ten ships, in a.c. 412, to act with the squadron under Diomedon, and we find the two commanders associated, both in naval operations and in political movements, down to the declaration of the Athenian army at Samos against the revolutionary government of the Four Hundred, a.c. 411 [DIOMEDEON]. According to the common reading in Xenophon, Leon was one of the ten generals appointed to supersede Alcibiades in a.c. 407, and, as well as ERASINIDES, was with Conon when Callicratidas chased him into Mytilene (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16, 6. 16). Xenophon, however, in two other passages (Hell. i. 6. § 30, 7. § 2), omits Leon's name and mentions Lysias instead; and Diodorus has Lysanias (an error probably of the copyists, for Lysias) in his list of the generals, saying nothing of Leon, and afterwards speaks of Lysias as one of those who returned to Athens after the battle of Arginusæ (Diod. xiii. 74, 101). Schneider, accordingly, would reject the name of Leon, from Xenophon substituting for it that of Lysias, in Hell. i. 5. § 16, and that of Archestratus, in Hell. i. 6. § 16 (see Palm. and Wess. ad Diod. xiii. 74). But these alterations are unnecessary, if we adopt bishop Thirlwall's conjecture (Greece, vol. iv. p. 110, note 2), that Leon was originally elected among the ten, but that he fell into the hands of Callicratidas, in one of the galleys which Conon sent out from Mytilene, and that Lysias was appointed to fill his place (comp. Xen. Hell. i. 6. §§ 19—21).

3. A Spartan, one of the three leaders of the colony founded at Heracleia, in a.c. 426. (Thuc. iii. 92; Diod. xii. 59.)

4. One of the three ambassadors sent from Sparta to dissuade the Athenians from the alliance with Argos, in a.c. 420. (Thuc. v. 44.) It seems doubtful whether we should identify him with the father of Antalcidas (Plut. Artax. 21), and again with the ephor ἑξάρχης in the fourteenth year of the Peloponnesian war, a.c. 418 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 10), and also with the Leon who was sent out with Antisthenes, in a.c. 412, as ἑξάρχης (whatever that may mean), and was appointed on the death of Pedaritus to succeed him in the command. (Thuc. viii. 39, 61; comp. Arnold and Goeller, ad loc.) The father of Pedaritus (Thuc. viii. 28) was probably a different person, though Krueger thinks he was the same with the officer of Antisthenes and was appointed to succeed his son.

5. A native of Salamis and a citizen of Athens, was put to death by the thirty tyrants, who ordered Socrates, with four others, among whom was Meletus, to bring him from Salamis, whither he seems to have retired to escape the cruelty and rapacity of the new government. Socrates would not execute the command, which was, however, carried into effect by the remaining four. From the speech of Theramenes, in Xenophon, we learn that Leon was a man of worth and respectability (ἰκανὸς ἀνὴρ), and chargeable with no crime; and Andocides tells us that he was condemned without a trial. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 39; Plat. Apol. p. 32, c, d; Stallb. ad loc.; Lys. c. Erat. p. 125, c. Agorat. p. 133; Andoc. de Myst. § 94.)

6. An Athenian, was joined with Timagoras, in a.c. 367, as ambassador to the Persian court, where envoys also from Thebes, Sparta, and other Grecian states presented themselves at the same time. Pelopidas obtained for Thebes, from Artaxerxes, all that he asked, and Leon protested in vain against the article in the royal decree which required the Athenians to lay up their ships. Timagoras, however, had gained the king's favour by taking part with the Thebans, and had studiously separated himself from his colleague during the embassy. For this conduct he was impeached by Leon on their return home, and put to death. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 33, &c.; Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 383, 400, ad fin.; Plut. Pelop. 30, Artax. 22; Val. Max. vi. 3, Ext. 2.)

7. An Athenian of the Roman party, who, in a.c. 192, accused Apollodorus of fomenting a revolt from Rome to Antiochia, and caused him to be sent into exile. (Liv. xxxv. 50.) We may perhaps identify him with Leon, son of Icesias, who, in a.c. 189, supported before the Roman senate the prayer of the Aetolians for peace. (Liv. xxxviii. 10; Polyb. xxii. 14.) [DAMIS, No. 2.] [E.E.]

LEO I., FLAVIUS, surnamed the GREAT, and THRAX, emperor of Constantinople (a.d. 457—474), was of barbarian origin, and was born about a.d. 400, in the country of the Bessi, in Thrace, whence he received the surname of "the Thracian." At the death of the emperor Marcian (457) he was an obscure tribune militum, and held the command of Selymbria. The powerful patrician, Aspar, despairing to seize the crown without creating a civil and religious war, which might have proved his downfall, resolved upon remaining in power by proclaiming emperor a man whom he thought equally weak and obedient; and he consequently contrived the election of Leo, who was recognised by the senate on the 7th of February, 457. Leo was crowned by Anatolius, patriarch of Constantinople; and this is the first instance of a Christian sovereign having received his crown from the hands of a priest, a ceremony which was afterwards adopted by all other Christian princes, and from which the clergy, as Gibbon justly observes, have deduced the most formidable consequences. Shortly after Leo's accession, religious troubles broke out in Egypt, which afforded the new emperor an opportunity of showing that he did not intend to be a tool of his minister. The Eutychians of Alexandria slew the orthodox bishop Proterius, and chose one of their own creed, Elurus, in his stead, who was protected by the Arian Aspar, in spite of the emperor's authority. Leo, however, did not give way, and in 460 he had Elurus deposed, and superseded by an orthodox bishop, to the great annoyance of Aspar. This minister, finding himself checked in many other instances by the man whom he had raised from the dust, once had the impudence to reproach the emperor with faithless conduct towards his benefactor; upon which Leo calmly replied, that no prince should be compelled to resign his own judgment and the interest of his subjects to the will of his servants.

In 466 the Huns threatened at once the northern provinces of Persia and the Eastern empire. Hormizd, one of their chiefs, crossed the Danube on the ice, but Leo had assembled a sufficient force to check them. His general, Anthemius, afterwards emperor of Rome, defeated them at Sardica, and some time afterwards Anastasius routed them in another pitched battle. Their principal chief, Dengiz, who was a son of Attila, was killed, and his head was sent to Constantinople, where it was exposed to the public. The Huns now sought for peace, and desisted from further hostilities. About this time also Leo made serious preparations for restoring peace to the western empire, where the ambition of Ricimer and Genseric, the king of the Vandals in Africa, had caused interminable troubles and bloodshed. Ricimer entered with him into negotiations, which were not without beneficial effects for Italy, since they led to the election of Anthemius, mentioned above, as emperor of Rome; but Genseric was rather obstinate, though he tried to avoid war by sending back to Constantinople Eudoxia, the widow of the Western emperor, Valentinian III., and her daughter, Placidia, whom he had kept as captives during seven years. No sooner, however, was Anthemius proclaimed in Rome, than the two emperors concerted a joint attack upon Carthage, the deplorable issue of which is told in the life of Basiliscus, who had the chief command in this unfortunate expedition. The defeat of Basiliscus gave Leo an opportunity of getting rid of Aspar and his three haughty sons, Ardaburius, Patricius, and Ermenaric, for public opinion pointed out Aspar as the secret contriver of the failure of the expedition; and the people, especially the orthodox, declared themselves against him in most violent language. In order to exasperate the people still more against the minister, Leo treacherously proposed to him to give his daughter, Ariadne, in marriage to Aspar's son, Patricius, or Patriciolus. When the news of the intended marriage spread abroad, the inhabitants of Constantinople rose in arms, and stormed the palace of Aspar, who escaped assassination by flying, with his sons, into the church of St. Euphemia. They left it on the promise of Leo that no harm should be done to them; but they had scarcely arrived within the precincts of the imperial palace, when Trasliscus rushed upon them with a band of the emperor's body guard, and assassinated Aspar and Ardaburius. This foul deed was perpetrated at the command of Leo, on whose memory it is an indelible stain. Trasliscus, the staunch adherent of Leo, was rewarded with the hand of his daughter, Ariadne, adopted the Greek name of Zeno, and thus finally filled the imperial throne. Aspar had left many friends among his fellow-believers, the Arians, who, in revenge of his death, excited Ricimer to fresh intrigues in the West, and persuaded the Goths to invade Thrace. They came accordingly, and during two years the very environs of Constantinople were rendered unsafe till they yielded to the superior skill of the Roman generals, and sued for peace. The end of Leo's reign was thus disturbed by a calamity which was the immediate consequence and the deserved punishment of the murder of Aspar, although the emperor suffered less from it than his innocent subjects. Feeling his strength decline, and having no son, Leo chose in 473 his grandson Leo, the infant son of Zeno and Ariadne, his future successor, and proclaimed him Augustus. He died in less than a year afterwards, after a long and painful illness, in the month of January, 474, and was buried in the mausoleum of Constantine.

Although Leo does not deserve the name of the Great, he was distinguished by remarkable talents and moral qualities; his mind was enlightened; he was active, wise, and always knew how to attain his ends. His piety was sincere; he showed great respect to the clergy, and sincerely admired the famous Daniel Stylites, who passed his life on the top of a column in Constantinople. He is reproached with want of firmness in his conduct towards Aspar and Basiliscus. Leo was illiterate, but appreciated literature and science. On one occasion one of his courtiers reproached him with having given a pension to the philosopher Eulogius: — "Would God," answered the emperor, "that I had to pay no other people than scholars." Theodor the Great was educated at the court of Leo. The reign of this emperor is signalled by some extraordinary events. In 458 Antioch was destroyed by an earthquake; in 465 a fire broke out in Constantinople, and destroyed the public and private buildings on a space 1750 paces long, from east to west, and 500 wide from north to south. In 469 inundations caused an immense loss of life and property in various parts of the empire; and in 572 there was an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which was not only felt in Constantinople, but all the historians agree that there were such showers of ashes that the roofs of the houses were covered with a coat three inches thick. Whether this is true or not is another question.

The wife of Leo, Verina, was renowned for her virtues. He had a son by her who died young, and two daughters, Ariadne, married to Zeno, and Leontia, who married Marcian, the son of Anthemius. (Cedren. p. 346, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 49, &c.; Theophan. p. 95, &c.; Suidas, s. v. Λέων and Ζήνων.) [W. P.]

LEO II., emperor, succeeded his grandfather, Leo I., in A. D. 474, at four years of age, and died in the same year, after having reigned under the guardianship of his mother, Verina, and his father, Zeno, by whom he was succeeded. [VERINA; ZENO.] [W. P.]

LEO III., FLAVIUS, surnamed ISAUROS, or the Isaurian, emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 718—741), and one of the most remarkable of the emperors of the East, was a native of Isauria, and the son of a respectable farmer, who settled in Thrace, taking his son with him. Young Conon, which was Leo's original name, obtained the place of a spatharius in the army of the emperor Justinian II. Rhinotmetus, and soon rose to eminence through his military talents. Anastasius II., who reigned from A. D. 713—716, gave him the supreme command in Asia, which he was still holding when Theodosius III. deposed that emperor, and seized the crown in January, 716. Summoned to acknowledge Theodosius, the gallant general called him an usurper, and immediately took up arms against him, alleging that he would restore the deposed Anastasius to the throne, but really intending to make himself master of the empire. Artabazes, the commander of the Armenian legions, supported Leo, who had besides many friends in the army. Leo was then holding the field against the Arabs, who had laid siege to Armorium in Galatia. After outwitting Muslima, the general of the Arabs, he set out for Cappadocia, where he found the inhabitants willing to submit to him, but was closely followed by Muslima. Leo would ere long have been pressed by two enemies, had he not anticipated the attack of the weaker of them, the emperor Theodosius. He accordingly left Cappadocia, and his rapid marches afforded him at once the double advantage of leaving the Arabs far behind him, while he daily came nearer to the imperial troops, who were far from being strong enough to resist him in the field. At Nicomedeia he was stopped by a son of Theodosius, who was defeated and taken prisoner. Leo now marched upon Constantinople; and Theodosius, despairing of success, resigned his crown (March 718), and retired to a convent at Ephesus, where he lived peacefully during more than thirty years. Scarcely had Leo received the homage of the people, when the khalif Soliman appeared before Constantinople with a powerful army and a numerous fleet. He considered the trick played by Leo upon Muslima at Armorium as a personal insult, and now came to take revenge. This siege of Constantinople, the third by the Arabs, and one of the most memorable of all, lasted just two years, from the 15th of August, 718, to the 15th of the same month in 720. Soliman died soon after its commencement, and was succeeded by the khalif Omar, who swore by his beard that he would take revenge upon Leo. But Leo sallied out from the Golden Horn with his galleys, the Greek fire consumed the Arabian ships, and the emperor returned laden with booty and captives. In two other naval engagements the Arabs were beaten with still greater losses; and in the beginning of August, 720, their land forces were routed in a pitched battle, with a loss of 28,000 men. Unable to continue the siege any longer, the khalif raised it on the 15th of August, but only a small portion of his fleet—the third he had built for the conquest of Constantinople—reached the harbours of Syria, the greater portion having been destroyed by a storm. So close was the siege, so enormous the preparations of the Arabs, that even the splendid victories of Leo could not prevent the inhabitants of the provinces from thinking Constantinople was lost, since the very news of those victories could not reach them on account of the watchfulness of the besiegers. The whole empire was in consternation, and in the western kingdoms rumours were afloat that the khalif had ascended the throne of the Byzantine emperors. Among those who believed these rumours was Sergius, governor of Sicily, who took measures to make himself independent, and to that effect proclaimed his lieutenant, Basil, king of Sicily and Calabria. Basil accepted the dignity, and adopted the name of Tiberius; while Sergius took proper steps to secure the crown for himself in case of complete success. Meanwhile, however, Leo had bettered his condition so much that he could despatch his general, Paulus, with a few loyal veterans, to Sicily; and through the exertions of this energetic man, the rebellion was soon quelled. Basil was taken prisoner and lost his head; but Sergius escaped to the Lombards in Italy. He was subsequently pardoned, and finally succeeded in obtaining again the same government in Italy, which he intended to wrest from the emperor. Another conspiracy that took place in consequence of the critical position of Leo, was that of the deposed emperor, Anastasius II. The plot was not discovered till 721, after the termination of the siege of Constantinople, and Anastasius paid for his temerity with his head.

In spite of his defeats before Constantinople, the khalif Omar continued the war, and in 726 took Caesarea in Cappadocia, and Neo-Caesarea in Pontus. Leo, however, had not only sufficient forces to make the Arabs feel that he was still more powerful than they, but his authority was so well established, that he undertook to carry out his favourite design, the abolition of the worship of images in the Catholic church. To this effect he issued a general edict, which is one of the most important acts of legislation in the Eastern empire, and perhaps in the whole Christian world. The question of the images was not only a matter of religion, but concerned as much the political state of the empire. The abuse of the images on one side, and the horror in which they were held by the numerous Mohammedans and Jews in the East on the other, gave origin at last to the iconoclasts, or image-breakers. In declaring for them, Leo certainly intended to purify the Catholic creed; but there seems to be no doubt that by removing the images from the churches, he hoped to make the Jews and Mohammedans more favourably inclined to the Christians and a Christian government; and although the adherents of images were very numerous, it cannot be doubted that they would have lost all power if Leo had succeeded in rallying the Iconoclasts, the Jews, the Mohammedans, and the numerous worshippers of fire in Asia, round the throne of an energetic and enlightened emperor. Indeed it seems that the protectors of the Iconoclasts in those earlier times entertained some hope of making them the medium through which the unbelievers would be led to Christ, and the Eastern empire restored to its ancient splendour; and this explains at once the religious and the political importance of the question. In the West the question of the images produced scarcely any effect upon the people, though more upon the Frankish clergy, and still more upon the conduct of the bishops of Rome, who, by declaring in favour of the Iconoclasts, would have been abandoned by the last of their followers. In short, the question of the images, like so many others connected with the domestic history of the Byzantine empire, was at once religious and political; and while, among the modern writers, Le Beau is but too often influenced by religious opinions, and Gibbon treats the history of that empire too much as a philosopher and an orator, we are entitled to hope that time will bring us another historian who, starting from a mere historical and political point of view, will satisfactorily explain the overwhelming influence of religious controversies upon the social development of the Eastern empire.

The edict of Leo through which the images were condemned caused a general revolution throughout the whole empire, and was the immediate cause of the loss of Ravenna, Rome, and several other possessions of the Greeks in Italy, which were taken by the Lombards, and of the final separation of the Latin from the Greek church. Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, Joannes Damascenus, and the violent Joannes Chrysorrhoeas, in the East, and pope Gregory II. in the West, were the principal leaders of those who opposed that edict, either by words, writings, or deeds. The pope became so troublesome, that Paulus, exarch of Ravenna, was ordered to make an expedition against Rome. But the ardour of the Romans, who were assisted by the Lombards of Spoleto and Tuscia, and the failure of a plot to assassinate the pope, compelled Paulus to return to Ravenna, where he had trouble enough to maintain his authority over the inhabitants who worshipped images. In the East a rebellion broke out in the Peloponnesus and the Cyclades, and the inhabitants besieged Constantinople by sea, but Leo compelled them to sail back and to submit to his government. A revolt in Constantinople was not so easily quelled, till, after much bloodshed, Leo felt himself strong enough to depose and banish the patriarch Germanus, and to appoint the iconoclast Anastasius in his place (730). The majority of the professors in the numerous schools and academies of Constantinople declared for the images, which enraged Leo so much, that it is said he gave orders to burn the library of St. Sophia, hoping thereby to prevent the doctors from strengthening their opinions by historical arguments. But this is decidedly an idle story, invented by some ignorant monk, and repeated by fanatics: the library, which contained 36,000 volumes, became probably the prey of some conflagration. Upon this Gregory III., the successor of Gregory II., assembled in 731 a council at Rome, by which the Iconoclasts were condemned; and now the opposition against the emperor became so great as to induce him to send a powerful expedition against Italy, with a special command to reduce Ravenna (734). The expedition failed, and Ravenna and the exarchate fell into the hands of the Lombards, who, after having lost it and gained it again, kept it till 756, when king Aistulph was compelled by Pipin of France to cede it to pope Stephen II., and ever since that province has continued to belong to the papal states. This check in Italy induced Leo to detach Greece, Illyria, and Macedonia from the spiritual authority of the popes, and to submit them to that of the patriarchs of Constantinople; and this is the real, effective cause of the fatal division of the Latin and Greek churches (734).

During the seven following years the history of Leo offers little more than the horrible details of a protracted war with the Arabs. The khalif Hesham endeavoured to produce an effect upon the minds of the Syrians by supporting an adventurer, who pretended to be Tiberius, the son of Justinian II., and who was sent by the khalif to Jerusalem, where he made his entrance, in the dress of a Roman emperor. But this was a mere farce. Things were more serious when, in 739, the Arab general Soliman invaded the Roman territories with an army of 90,000 men, who were divided into three separate bodies. The first entered Cappadocia, and ravaged it with fire and sword; the second, commanded by Malek and Batak, penetrated into Phrygia; and the third, under Soliman, covered the rear. Leo, though surprised, had assembled sufficient forces, and his general Acroninus defeated the second body in Phrygia in a pitched battle, in which Malek and Batak were both killed. Soliman withdrew in haste into Syria. In October, 740, an awful earthquake caused great calamities throughout the empire. In Constantinople many of the principal buildings were levelled to the ground; the statues of Constantine the Great, Theodosius the Great, and Arcadius, were thrown from their pedestals; and the wall along the Propontia, together with all its towers, fell at once into the sea. Thrace was covered with ruins. In Bithynia, Nicomedia and Prenetus were thrown down, and of the entire town of Nicæa, only one building, a church, remained standing. In Egypt several towns disappeared, as it were, with all their inhabitants. On the 18th of June, 741, the emperor Leo died, after long sufferings, and was interred in the church of the Apostles: he was succeeded by his son Constantine V., surnamed Copronymus.

Leo III., the founder of the Isaurian dynasty, may be charged with cruelty and obstinacy, and he had only received a soldier's education; but he was prudent, active, energetic, just, and decidedly the kind of king whom the corrupted Greeks required. Moreover, he acted upon principles, and never abandoned one of them during the whole course of his life. The orthodox writers have outraged his name because he protected the Iconoclasts, but we know too well the degree of impartiality which they can claim. (Theophan. p. 327, &c.; Cedren. p. 450, &c.; Niceph. p. 34, &c.; Glyc. p. 180, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 101, &c.; Paul. Diacon., De Gest. Long. vi. 47, &c.) [W. P.]

LEO IV. FLAVIUS, surnamed CHAZARUS, emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 775—780), belonged to the Isaurian dynasty, and was the eldest son of the emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, whom he succeeded on the 14th of September, 775. He was born on the 25th of January, 750, and received his surname Chazarus on account of his mother Irene, who was a Chazarian princess. Leo, being in weak health, had his infant son Constantine (VI.) crowned in the year after his accession, and his five brothers, Nicephorus Caesar, Christophorus Caesar, Nicetas, Anthemus, and Eudoxas, took a sacred oath to acknowledge the young Augustus as their future master. This oath, however, they broke repeatedly, formed conspiracies, and were punished with mutilation and exile. After some fruitless attempts at recovering freedom and power, they finally disappeared from the world at Athens, which was their last place of exile. In 777 Teleric, king of the Bulgarians, fled to Constantinople, in consequence of some domestic commotions, and was well received by Leo, although he had behaved very treacherously against Leo's father. In 778 the Arabs invaded the empire. Leo sent against them an army of 100,000 men, commanded by Lachano Draco, who routed them, after they had gained various successes in Syria, in 780: in this battle Othman, the son of the khalif Mahadi or Modi, lost his life. When the news of this victory arrived at Constantinople the emperor was no more among the living: his death took place on the 8th of September, 780. He was succeeded by his infant son Constantine VI., who reigned under the guardianship of his mother Irene. Leo IV. was an honest man, much better than his profligate father, but weak in body and mind. (Theophan. p. 378, &c.; Cedren. p. 468, &c.; Const. Manass. p. 89; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 113, &c.; Glycas, 285, in the Paris editions.) [W. P.]

LEO V. FLAVIUS ARMENIUS, emperor of

Constantinople (A. D. 813—820), succeeded Michael I. Rhangabe, on the 11th of July, 813: he was of noble Armenian descent, and the son of the celebrated Bardas Patricius. Leo enjoyed great renown as a skilful and intrepid general, and was highly esteemed by the emperor Nicephorus I. (802—811), whom he rewarded, however, with treachery. He was punished with exile, from which he was recalled in 811 by his friend Michael I., who succeeded Nicephorus in that year. Michael appointed him dux Orientis, and was served in the same way as his predecessor. The wife of Michael, Procopia, having obtained great influence over her husband, was the cause of a wide-spread disaffection of the army, and Leo availed himself of this circumstance to seize the crown. There is a story of an old woman at Constantinople, a prophetess, who predicted the speedy downfall of Michael and the elevation of Leo, who seems to have turned the superstition of the Greeks to his own advantage. While Leo carried on a successful war against the Arabs in Asia, the emperor fought with great disadvantage against Crum, king of the Bulgarians, who in 812 took Mesembria, and threatened Constantinople. His defeats obliged Michael to recall Leo from Asia, and in the spring of 813 the emperor and Leo set out from Constantinople, at the head of one of the finest and most numerous armies that the Greeks had ever seen. Michael intended to harass the Bulgarians by manoeuvres, avoiding any decisive conflict. His wise delay was secretly approved of by Leo and his confederates, but they persuaded the army that the emperor was a coward, who followed the advice of his wife rather than that of his generals, and the poor emperor was forsaken before he had any idea how and by whom. The Greeks met the Bulgarians in the environs of Adrianople; but Michael, seeing the strong position of the enemy, declined again to risk a pitched battle. Now Leo and his friends urged him with all their might to attack Crum; and the Greek soldiers showed such violent anger at being again disappointed in coming to close quarters with the barbarians, that on the 22d of June the emperor gave orders for the attack. The conflict took a favourable turn for the Greeks, and every body prognosticated a complete victory, when Leo, with his Cappadocians and Armenians, suddenly took to flight, and caused a total rout of the imperial army. Michael saved himself within the walls of Adrianople, and in the evening Leo arrived with his troops. Nobody ventured to acquaint the emperor with the real cause of Leo's flight; and the remnants of the army being too much disorganised to risk a second battle, he followed the council of the treacherous general, and withdrew to Constantinople. There Joannes Hexabulus, the honest governor of the capital, mentioned to him his suspicions of Leo, but met with disbelief, till Leo appeared with his troops under the walls of Constantinople, and made his entrance into the city, without meeting with any opposition. After the departure of Michael from Adrianople, the friends of Leo induced the soldiers to proclaim as emperor the gallant Armenian, instead of the coward who was still their master; but Leo refused to accept the crown till, with feigned indignation, his friend and subsequent successor, Michael the Stammerer, rushed upon him with his drawn sword, crying with the accents of rage, "With this sword I will open the gates of Constantinople, or plunge it into thy heart, if thou refusest any longer to comply with the just wishes of thy comrades." Upon this Leo threw off the mask, marched upon Constantinople, and seated himself on the throne, from which Michael descended without murmuring, and retired into a convent, where he lived during upwards of thirty years.

No sooner was Leo crowned than Crum appeared before Constantinople. He burnt its suburbs, with all its magnificent buildings, withdrew to take Adrianople, and send its inhabitants into slavery, appeared again near the capital, and continued his devastations till Thrace was a desert. Having no army, Leo showed the greatest activity in forming one, and his efforts were already crowned with success, when Crum suddenly died in one of the gardens of Constantinople (814), and was succeeded by king Deucom. Now Leo sallied out. At Mesembria he brought the Bulgarians to a stand, and took bloody revenge for the calamities they had brought upon Greece: the barbarian army was annihilated. In 815 Deucom appeared again, and met with a similar fate, whereupon Leo invaded Bulgaria, defeated the barbarians wherever he met them, and ravaged the country in a manner still worse than the Bulgarians had done in Thrace. Such was the consternation of the barbarians, that Mortagom, the successor of Deucom, deemed himself fortunate in obtaining a peace for thirty years; and such was the impression made upon the minds of his unruly subjects by the fierce onsets of Leo, that they remained quiet during seventy-four years. Thus Leo crushed the hereditary and most dangerous enemy of the Byzantine empire.

The empire now enjoyed peace, and Leo was active in restoring the happiness of his subjects. He protected the Iconoclasts, and showed himself a firm, though often cruel, opponent of the worshippers of images; hence arose many conspiracies, which he quelled with ease. He reformed the whole system of administration. Before his reign all the civil and military offices were sold to the highest bidder; he, on the contrary, gave them to the worthiest, and punished severely all those that were found guilty of peculation. He often presided in the courts of justice; and woe to those judges who had acted unfairly or unjustly. In his punishments, however, he observed no just proportion; decapitation, mutilation, or banishment, being as often inflicted for slight offences as for capital crimes. Pleasure was unknown to him, but that which arises from the satisfaction of having done one's duty. Day and night he was at work. Most of the provinces he visited, and his occasional visits had a still more beneficial effect, since he always arrived without being announced. His conduct towards the adorers of images, however, created him many enemies; and at last his best friend became the cause of his ruin. Michael the Stammerer, though a staunch adherent of Leo, could not help blaming him for many actions; and being no master of his sharp tongue, his words produced more effect than he intended. This annoyed Leo, who ordered Michael to inspect the troops in Asia, as the best means of getting rid of him at court. Michael refused to comply with the order, and was soon surrounded by a crowd of the secret enemies of Leo, who persuaded him to enter into their plans. The honest Hexabulus was informed of the plot, and Michael was seized, tried, and sentenced to be burnt alive in a furnace. It was just Christmas eve 820, and he was to be executed on the same day. Leo left his palace to witness the execution, and the unhappy man, loaded with chains, was dragged along, when the empress besought her husband not to carry out his bloody verdict on that sacred day, but to wait till after Christmas. Leo, moved by her entreaties, ordered Michael to be taken back to his prison. On the following day the emperor and his whole court went in procession to church, and according to a custom established at the Byzantine court, the emperor himself began the sacred chant. This was the signal of his death. During the night the friends of Michael had resolved to risk every thing in order to save his and their own lives; and dressed in the garb of priests, with arms hid under their floating garments, they entered the church without creating any suspicion. At the moment they heard Leo's voice they rushed upon him. He escaped to the altar, and defended himself with the great cross; but in vain—nobody came to his rescue. Exhausted by an heroic resistance, he saw one of his murderers, of gigantic stature, aim a fatal blow at him. "Have mercy!" cried the fainting emperor. "This is not the hour of mercy," replied the giant, "but the hour of revenge!" and with one blow he felled him to the ground. Michael was now dragged from his prison, and, as Gibbon says, he was snatched from the fiery furnace to the sovereignty of an empire. Leo left four sons, the eldest of whom, Sarbatius or Symbatius, was crowned as his father's future successor shortly after the deposition of Michael Rhangabe. They were all castrated by order of Michael the Stammerer, and confined in a convent. Sarbatius died in consequence of the operation. (Theoph. p. 424, &c.; Theoph. Contin. p. 428, &c.; Cedren. p. 483, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 127, &c.; Leo Gram. p. 445, &c.; Const. Manass. p. 94; Joel, p. 287; Glycas, p. 287, &c.; Geneisius, p. 2, &c.) [W. P.]

LEO VI., FLAVIUS, surnamed SAPIENS and PHILO'SOPHUS, emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 886—911), second son of Basil I., the Macedonian, by his second wife, Eudoxia, was born in A. D. 865, and succeeded his father on the 1st of March, 886, after having previously been created Augustus. A short time before the death of Basil, young Leo narrowly escaped the punishment of a parricide, a crime, however, of which he was not guilty, but of which he was accused by the minister, Santabaren, the knavish favourite of the emperor. As soon as Leo ascended the throne he prepared for revenge. He began by deposing the notorious patriarch Photius, who was the chief support of Santabaren; and having got rid of that dangerous intriguer, he had the minister arrested, deprived him of his eyes, and banished him to one of the remotest corners of Asia Minor. The reign of Leo presents an uninterrupted series of wars and conspiracies. In 887 and 888 the Arabs invaded Asia Minor, landed in Italy and Sicily, and plundered Samos and other islands in the Archipelago: it was only in 891 that the emperor's authority was re-established in his Italian dominions. Stylianus, Leo's father-in-law, and prime minister, gave occasion to a bloody war with the Bulgarians. At that period these people were no longer so barbarous as in former centuries, and they carried on a considerable trade with the Byzantine empire, having their principal factories at Thessalonica, where they enjoyed great privileges. These privileges Stylianus disregarded, and exposed the Bulgarian merchants to vexations and ill-treatment. Thence arose a war with the Bulgarian king, Simeon, who ravaged Macedonia, and routed the Greek army, commanded by Leo Catacalon and Theodosius, the latter of whom was killed in the action, to the great regret of the nation and the emperor. The credit of Stylianus ceased with the death of his daughter, the empress; and his disgrace grieved him so much that he died of sorrow and disappointed ambition (894). Leo got rid of the Bulgarians by involving them, through intrigues, in a war with the Hungarians. The following years were rendered remarkable by several conspiracies. That of 895 proved nearly fatal to the emperor, but it was discovered in time, and quelled by one Samonas, who, in reward, was created patricius, and soon rose to great wealth and power. A few years afterwards Leo was attacked in a church during service by a ruffian, who felled him to the ground with a club; but on this occasion also the emperor escaped, and the assassin met with the fate he deserved. The inactivity of Leo induced the Arabs and northern neighbours of the empire to attack it at their convenience. The former once more invaded Sicily, and took Tauromenium; and in 904 appeared with a numerous fleet in the harbour of Thessalonica. This splendid city, the second in wealth and population after Constantinople, was ill fortified and still worse garrisoned, so that in spite of the efforts of the inhabitants, the Arabs soon made themselves master of it. They destroyed a great portion of it; and after having plundered it during ten days, left the harbour with their fleet laden with booty and captives. The history of this conquest was described by Joannes Cameniata in his valuable work, The Capture of Thessalonica (Ἡ λείψυς τῆς Θεσσαλονίκης). [CAMENIATA.] About this time the last remains of the authority of the senate were finally abolished by a constitution of Leo. In 910 Samonas was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment for having abused the confidence the emperors had never ceased to bestow upon him since he had crushed the conspiracy of 895. In 911 the Arabs defeated the Greek fleet off Samos. In this action the Greeks were commanded by Romanus Lecapenus, who became emperor during the minority of Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus. Leo died in the same year, 911, either on the 11th of May or on the 11th of July, of a chronic dysentery. His successor was his infant son, Constantine Porphyrogenitus, whom he had by his fourth wife, Zoe; and his younger brother, Alexander, who had nominally reigned with Leo since the death of their father, Basil, but who, preferring luxury and idleness to business, had abandoned his share in the government to his elder brother Leo. Leo was married four times; in consequence of which he was excluded from the communion with the faithful by the patriarch Nicolaus, as the Greek church only tolerated a second marriage: it censured a third, and it condemned a fourth as an atrocious sin. The first wife of Leo was Theophano, the daughter of Constantine Martinacius; the second Zoe, the widow of Theodorus Gunitzita, and the daughter of the minister Stylianus, who, after the marriage of Zoe, received from his son-in-law the unusual title of baileopator, or father of the emperor; the third was Eudoxia, a woman of rare beauty; and the fourth was Zoe Carbonopsina, who survived her husband.

It is difficult to understand how the exalted name of Philosophus could be given to a man like Leo, and one would feel inclined to take it ironically, were it not for the impudent flattery of the later Greeks. Gibbon, with a few striking words, gives the following character of this emperor:—"The name of Leo VI. has been dignified with the title of philosopher; and the union of the prince and the sage, of the active and speculative virtues, would indeed constitute the perfection of human nature. But the claims of Leo are far short of this ideal excellence. Did he reduce his passions and appetites under the dominion of reason? His life was spent in the pomp of the palace, in the society of his wives and concubines; and even the clemency which he showed, and the peace which he strove to preserve, must be imputed to the softness and indolence of his character. Did he subdue his prejudices, and those of his subjects? His mind was tinged with the most puerile superstition; the influence of the clergy, and the errors of the people, were consecrated by his laws; and the oracles of Leo, which reveal in prophetic style the fates of the empire, are founded on the arts of astrology and divination. If we still inquire the reason of his sage appellation, it can only be replied, that the son of Basil was less ignorant than the greater part of his contemporaries in church and state; that his education had been directed by the learned Photius; and that several books of profane and ecclesiastical science were composed by the pen, or in the name of the imperial philosopher."

In speaking of Leo's literary merits, we must first say a few words of his legislation.

In his time the Latin language had long since ceased to be the official language of the Eastern empire, and had gradually fallen into such disuse as to be only known to a few scholars, merchants, or navigators. The earlier laws being all written in Latin, opposed a serious obstacle to a fair and quick administration of justice; and the emperor Basil I., the father of Leo, formed and partly executed the plan of issuing an authorised version of the Code and Digest. This plan was carried out by Leo, who was ably assisted by Sabathius, the commander of the imperial lifeguards. The new Greek version is known under the title of Βασιλικὴ Διατάξεις, or shortly, Βασιλική; in Latin, Basilica, which means "Imperial Constitutions," or "Laws." It is divided into sixty books, subdivided into titles, and contains the whole of Justinian's legislation, viz., the Institutes, the Digest, the Codex, and the Novellæ; as also such constitutions as were issued by the successors of Justinian down to Leo VI. There are, however, many laws of the Digest omitted in the Basilica, which contain, on the other hand, a considerable number of laws or extracts from ancient jurists which are not in the Digest. The Basilica likewise give many early constitutions which are not contained in Justinian's Codex. They were afterwards revised by the son of Leo, Constantine Porphyrogenitus. Editions:—Hervet published a Latin translation of the books 28—30, 45—48, Paris, 1557, fol. Cujacius, who made the Basilica a special subject of his studies, and published the criminal part of them at Lyon, 1566, fol., estimated the translation of Hervet but little, and accordingly published a revised edition under the title "Libri VIII. Βασιλικῶν Διατάξεων, id est, Imperialium Constitutionum in quibus continentur totum Jus

Civile, a Constantino Porphyrogenito in LX. libros redactum, G. Hervet interprete. Accessit Liber LX., Jacobo Cujacio interprete. Cum Præfatione D. Gothofredi," Hanoviae, 1606, fol. Previous to this edition, Joannes Leunclavius published, with notes and commentary, "LX. Libri Basilicæ, id est, Universi Juris Romani, &c., Eclogæ sive Synopses; accessit Novellarum antehac ineditarum Liber," Basel, 1575, fol. All these are incomplete editions of Latin versions. The Greek text, with a revised Latin version, of 36 complete, 6 incomplete books, and fragments of the remaining 18 books, was first published by Fabrot, Paris, 1647, 7 vols. fol. Four of the deficient books, viz. 49—52, were afterwards discovered in MS., and published, with a Latin version by G. O. Reitz, by the Dutch jurist Meermann, in the 5th vol. of his Nov. Thesaur. Juris Civ. et Can. A separate reprint of these four books was published in London 1765, fol., as a supplement to Fabrot's edition. As long ago as 1830 the brothers Heimbach, in Germany, began a new critical edition of the whole collection, of which the first volume appeared in 1833, but which is not yet finished. The law of the Basilica is by no means a mere matter of antiquity: it is the groundwork of the legislation of the modern Greeks in Turkey as well as in the kingdom of Greece, and also that of the legislation of the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia; and a closer investigation of the laws of Russia would perhaps trace the influence of the Basilica upon the history of the civilisation of that country also. (Montreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin; C. W. E. Heimbach, De Basilicorum Origine, Leipzig, 1825, 8vo.; Haubold, Manuale Basilicorum, Leipzig, 1819, 4to.)

The principal works written, or supposed to be written, by the emperor Leo VI. are:—

1. Τὸν ἐν πολέμοις τακτικῶν σύντομος περίδοσις, commonly called "Tactica," an essay on the art of warfare in the author's time, which is celebrated in military history. Leo pursued freely the works of earlier writers on the subject, but it would be unjust to charge him with plagiarism: there is a great deal of his own in the work, especially as the policy to be observed in warfare, but it betrays no genius. The editio princeps, but only in a Latin version, is by Joannes Checus (John Cheke), of Cambridge, and was published at Basel, 1554, 12mo.: it is dedicated to king Henry VIII., and was consequently composed previously to the death of that king, in 1547. The Greek text, together with the translation of Cheke, revised by Jo. Meursius, was first published at Leyden, 1612, 4to.; the same in the 6th vol. of Meursii Opera, edited by Lami, Florence, 1745, fol.; the same, together with Aelian's Tactica, Leyden, 1613, 4to. The importance of the work caused it to be translated into several modern languages. The best version is the one in French, entitled, "Institutions Militaires de l'Empereur Léon le Philosophe, traduites du Grec par M. Joly de Mesnery," Paris, 1771, 2 vols. 8vo., with engravings. The best German translation is entitled "Kaiser Leo's des Philosophen Strategie und Taktik, übersetzt von einem MS. in der Kaiserlichen Bibliothek zu Wien bei J. W. von Bourscheid," Vienna, 1771—1781, 5 vols. 8vo. with notes and engravings. The notes are very good, but the version resembles much more the French translation by Mesnery than the Greek text.

2. Neuaxuá. Some passages extracted from the Tactica, and given by Fabricius, led to the supposition that they are quotations from, and consequently fragments of, a separate work of Leo on naval warfare.

3. XVII. Oracula, written in Greek iambic verse, and accompanied by marginal drawings, on the fate of the future emperors and patriarchs of Constantinople, showing the superstition of Leo if he believed in his divination, and that of the people if they had faith in the absurd predictions. The 17th Oracle, on the Restoration of Constantinople, was published in Greek and Latin by Joan. Leunclavius ad Calcem Const. Manassae, Basel, 1573, 8vo. Janus Rutgersius edited the other sixteen, with a Latin version by Georg. Dousa, Leyden, 1618, 4to. Other editions: "Expositiones delli Oracoli di Leone imperatore," by T. Patricius, Brixen, 1596; by Petrus Lambecius, with a revised text from an Amsterdam Codex, with notes and a new translation, Paris, 1655, fol. ad Calcem Codini. A German translation by John and Theodore de Bry appeared in "Vita, &c. Muhammedia," quoted above; and a Latin one by the same translators, Frankfurt, 1597, 4to.; the same year in which the German version was published. It is doubtful whether Leo is or not the author of the Oracles. Fabricius gives a learned disquisition on the subject.

4. Orationes XXXIII., mostly on theological subjects. One of them appeared in a Latin version by F. Metius, in Baronius, Annales; nine others by Gretserus, in the 14th vol. of his Opera, Ingolstadt, 1600, 4to.; three others, together with seven of those published by Gretserus, by Combéfis, in the first vol. of his Biblioth. PP. Graeco-Lat. Aclar. Nov., Paris, 1648, fol.; Oratio de Sto. Nicola, Greek and Latin, by Petrus Possinus, Toulouse, 1654, 4to.; Oratio de Sto. Chrysostomo, restored from the life of that father by Georgius Alexandrinus, in the 8th vol. of the Savilian ed. of St. Chrysostomus, Antwerp, 1614, fol.; some others in Combéfis, Biblioth. Concionatoria, in the Biblioth. Patrum Lugdun., and dispersed in other works; Leonis Imp. Homilia nunc primum vulgata Graece et Latine, ejusdemque quae Photiana est, Confutatio, a Scipione Maffei, Padua, 1751, 8vo.

5. Epistola ad Omarum Saracenum de Fidei Christianae Veritate et Saracenorum Erroribus, in Latin, Lyon, 1509, by Chamberius, who translated a Chaldean version of the Greek original, which seems to be lost; the same in the different Biblioth. Patrum, and separately by Professor Schwarz, in the Program of the University of Leipzig, of the year 1786.

6. Constitutum Compunctionis ex Meditatione carceris Iudicii, Greek and Latin, by Jac. Pontanus, Ingolstadt, 1603, 4to.; and in the various Biblioth. Patr.

7. Carmen iambicum de misero Graecias Statu, with a Latin version by F. Lucidus, edited by Leo Allatus in his "De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae."

8. XXII. Versus Retrogradi (Καρνικολ), published by Leo Allatus in Excerpt. Graec. Rhetor., Rome, 1641, 8vo. Different hymns of Leo are extant in MS. in various libraries.

9. Ἡ γερωνία διατύποις κατὰ τοῦ βασιλέως ἔχοντες τοῦ ἱεροῦ, ὅπως ἔχουν τὰς αἰτίας τοῦ θρόνου τῶν ἑκκλησιῶν, τῶν ἀποκεκλιμένων τῇ Πατριάρχῃ ἑκκοινωνησάντων Dispositio facta per Impera-

tozem Leonem Sapientem quem ordinem habeant throni Ecclesiarum Patriarchas Constantinopolitano subiectarum, Greek and Latin, by J. Leunclavius, in Jus Graeco-Romanum; by Jac. Goar, ad Calcem Codini, Paris, 1648, fol.

10. Εἰς τὰ Μορμυσσίου, In Spectaculum Unius Dei, an epigram of little value, with notes by Brodaeus and Opsopaeus, in Epigram. Libri VII., ed. Wechel, Frankfurt, 1600. Among other productions ascribed to Leo, and of which the reader will find an account in the sources cited below, we mention only two books on falconry, extant in MS. in a Munich MS., which seems to be different from a Turin MS. entitled Ὀρνέοσοφιστικόν, since the first treats on falconry exclusively, and the latter on various birds, though on falcons more than others: the first may be an extract of the second. (Zonar. vol. ii. p. 174, &c.; Cedren. p. 591, &c.; Joel, p. 179; Manass. p. 108, &c.; Glycas, p. 296, &c.; Genes. p. 61, &c.; Codin. p. 63, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 693, &c.; Hamberger. Nachrichten von Gelehrten Männern; Cave, Hist. Lit.; Hankius, Script. Byzant.; Oudin, Comment. de SS. Eccl. vol. ii. p. 394, &c.) [W. P.]

LEO, or LEON (Λέων), Greek writers. 1. ACADEMICUS, called by Justin the historian and Suidas LEONIDES (Λεωνίδης), was apparently a native of Heracleia in Pontus, and a disciple of Plato. He was one of the conspirators who, with their leader, Chion, in the reign of Ochus, king of Persia, B. C. 353, or, according to Orelli, B. C. 351, assassinated Clearchus, tyrant of Heracleia. [CHION, CLEARCHUS.] The greater part of the conspirators were killed on the spot by the tyrant's guards; others were afterwards taken and put to a cruel death; but which fate befel Leo is not mentioned. Nicias of Nicaea (apud Athen. xi. p. 506, ed. Casaubon), and Favorinus (Diog. Laert. iii. 37) ascribed to a certain Leo the Academic the dialogue Alcyon (Ἀλκυών), which was, in the time of Athenaeus, by some ascribed to Plato; and has in modern times been printed among the works of Lucian, by whom it was certainly not written; and from the general character of whose writings the subject (the power of God displayed in his works) is altogether alien. Fabricius identifies the author of the Dialogue with the accomplice of Chion; but we know not on what ground. (Memnon, opud Phot. Bibl. cod. 224, sub init.; Justin. xvi. 5; Suidas, s. v. Κλέαρχος; Athen. l. c.; Diog. Laert. l. c.; Lucian, Opera, vol. i. p. 128, ed. Bipont; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. pp. 108, 173, 178.)

2. Of ACHRIS (Ἀχρίς), or ACHRIDIA (now Okhrida in Albania), was so called because he held the dignity of archbishop of the Greek church among the Bulgarians; and the seat of the archbishopric was commonly fixed at Achris. He joined about A. D. 1053 with Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, in writing a very bitter letter against the pope, which they sent to Joannes, archbishop of Trani in Apulia, to be distributed among the members of the Latin church, prelates, monks, and laity. A translation of this letter is given by Baronius, Annal. Eccles. ad Ann. 1053, xxii. &c.) The pope, Leo IX., replied in a long letter, which is given in the Concilii, vol. ix. col. 949, &c., ed. Labbe; vol. vi. col. 927, ed. Hardouin; vol. xix. col. 635, ed. Mansi; and the following year both Cerularius and Leo of Achris were excommunicated by cardinal Humbert, the papal legate. (Baronius, ad Ann. 1054, xxv.) Leo wrote many other letters, which are extant in MS. in various European libraries, and are cited by Allatius in his De Consensu Eccles. Orient. et Occident.; by Beveridge in his Codes Canonum; by Alexis Aristenus in his Synopsis Epistolarum Canonicarum; and by Nic. Comnenus Papadopoli in his Promotiones Mystagogicae. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 715; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 138, ed. Oxon, 1740; Oudin, De Scriptorib. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. col. 603.)

3. AEGYPTIUS, or the EGYPTIAN. The early Christian writers, in their controversy with the heathens, refer not unfrequently to a Leo or Leon as having admitted that the deities of the ancient gentile world had been originally men, agreeing in this respect with Etemerus (ΕΒΕΜΕΡΗΣ), with whom he was contemporary, or perhaps rather earlier. Augustin (De Consensu Evangel. i. 33, and De Civ. Dei, viii. 5), who is most explicit in his notice of him, says he was an Egyptian priest of high rank, "magnus antistes," and expounded the popular mythology to Alexander the Great, in a manner which, though differing from those rationalistic explanations received in Greece, accorded with them in making the gods (including even the dii majorum gentium) to have been originally men. Augustin refers to an account of the statements of Leo contained in a letter of Alexander to his mother. It is to be observed, that although Leon was high in his priestly rank at the time when Alexander was in Egypt (A. C. 332—331), his name is Greek; and Arnobius (Adv. Gent., iv. 29) calls him Leo Pellaeus, Leo of Pella, an epithet which Fabricius does not satisfactorily explain. Worth (Not. ad Tatian. p. 96, ed. Oxford, 1700) would identify our Leo with Leo of Lampascus, the husband of Themista or Themisto, the female Epicurean (Diog. Laert. x. 5. 25). But the husband of Themista was more correctly called Leonteus, while the Egyptian is never called by any other name than Leo. Arnobius speaks in such a way as to lead us to think that in his days the writings of Leon on the human origin of the gods were extant and accessible; but it is possible that he refers, like Augustin, to Alexander's letter. The reference to Leon in Clemens Alexandrinus is not more explicit. (Stromata, i. 21. § 106. p. 139, ed. Sylburg. p. 382, ed. Pott. vol. ii. p. 75, ed. Klotz, 12mo. Lipsiae, 1831.) But Tatian's distinct mention of the Ἱεροπλάστης, or Commentarius of Leo, shows that his system had been committed to writing by himself; and Tertullian (De Corona, c. 7) directs his readers to "unroll the writings of Leo the Egyptian." Hyginus (Poeticon Astronomicon, c. 20) refers to Leon in terms which seem to intimate that he wrote a history of Egypt, "Qui res Aegyptiacas scripsit;" and the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 262) gives a reference here to what Leon had said respecting the antiquity of the Egyptians, "in the first (of the books or letters?) to his mother." But we suspect the last reference is to the statements of Leon already mentioned, as given by Alexander the Great in his letter to his mother; and perhaps the reference of Hyginus is to the same document, for the subject of it belongs to the mythic period of history. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. pp. 713, 719, vol. xi. p. 664; Voss, De Hist. Græc. lib. iii. p. 179, ed. Amsterdam, 1699.)

4. Of ALABANDA, in Caria, a rhetorical and historical writer of uncertain date. He wrote the following works, now lost: 1. Καριαὶν Βιβλῶν 8 De rebus Carias Libri quatuor; 2. Λυκαίων 8 Βιβλῶν 8 De rebus Lycias, Libri duo; 3. Ὁ ἑπὶ πόλεως Φωκίας καὶ Βουστῶν, Bellum Sacrum inter Phocenses et Boeotios; 4. Τέχνη, Ars (sc. Rhetorica); and 5. Περὶ στάσεων, De Stasiis, or De Seditiosis. In Villosion's edition of Eudocia the last two works are mentioned as one, the title of which is Τέχνη καὶ στάσεις, Ars de Stasiis. If the above list of the works of Leo be correct, we may conjecture that he lived not far from the time of Alexander the Great, that is, after the close of the Sacred War, of which he wrote the history; and before the local history of Caria and Lycia had lost its interest by the absorption of those provinces in the Syrian and Pergamenean kingdoms, and subsequently in the Roman empire. It is to be observed, however, that the authority of the Sacred War and of the work De Stasiis is doubtful, as Suidas and Eudocia enumerate works under those titles among those of Leo of Byzantium. [No. 7.] Vossius supposes that either Leo of Alabanda or Leo of Byzantium is the writer referred to by Hyginus (Astron. Poetic. c. 20), as having written a work on the history of Egypt. [See No. 3.] (Suidas, s. v. Ἰεροπλάστης; Eudocia, Violetum, s. v. Ἰεροπλάστης; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 132, vol. vii. p. 713; Voss, De Hist. Græc. lib. iii. p. 179.)

5. ASINUS (Ἀσύν). [No. 15.]

6. Of BULGARIA. [See No. 2.]

7. Of BYZANTIUM, a rhetorician and historical writer of the age of Philip, and perhaps of Alexander the Great. Philostratus says he was a disciple of Plato; but according to Suidas and Eudocia some statements made him the disciple of Aristotle; and both Suidas and Eudocia call him a Peripatetic. He appears to have occupied a leading position in the Byzantine commonwealth at the time it was attacked by Philip of Macedonia. According to Hecataeus of Miletus, he was strategos or general of the Byzantines. Philostratus has recorded a curious anecdote in reference to this invasion. Leo sent to demand of Philip the reason of the invasion; and when Philip replied that the beauty of the city had made him fall in love with it, and that he came as a suitor, Leo retorted, that weapons of war were not the usual instruments employed by lovers. The city was almost taken by Philip; but the obstinate resistance of the citizens, and the arrival of succours from Athens, under Chares (B. C. 340), and subsequently under Phocion, compelled him to withdraw. Leo was sent as ambassador to Athens, whether during the siege or at some other time is not clear; and an anecdote recorded by Philostratus and Suidas in connection with this embassy shows the same ready wit as his reply to Philip. The dissensions of the Athenians retarded their movements; and when Leo, on his appearance in their assembly, was received with shouts of laughter, on account of his corpulence, "What do you laugh at, Athenians?" said he; "Is it because I am fat, and of such a size? I have a wife fatter than myself; yet when we agree the bed will hold us; but when we disagree, the whole house will not." Plutarch (Procorpus Politica. Opera, vol. ix. p. 207, ed. Reisk.) relates the anecdote with a variation, which makes Leo remarkable, not for his corpulence, but for his diminutive stature: and Athenæus (xii. pp. 550, 551) relates the story of another Byzantine, Pythe, and that professedly on the authority of Leo himself. Toup (see note to Gaisford's Suidas, s. v. Δίω) suspects that the passage in Athenæus is corrupt. Of the death of Leo there are two accounts. According to Heyschius of Miletus he died during the war, and before the arrival of Chares with the Athenian fleet. According to Suidas, Philip, after his repulse, charged Leo with having offered to betray the city to him for a sum of money; and the Byzantines, believing the charge, assailed the house of Leo, who, fearful of being stoned to death by them, hung himself. Both these accounts are, however, inconsistent with the statement of Suidas himself, that Leo wrote a history of Alexander, at least if by that name we are to understand Alexander the Great; and are hardly consistent with the ascription to him of a history of Philip's attack on Byzantium, unless we suppose this to have been a contemporary record or journal of the events of the siege. The writings of Leo are thus enumerated by Suidas and Eudocia: 1. Τὰ κατὰ Φιλίππον καὶ τὸ Βυζάντιον, βιβλίοις ζ', Res Philippicæ et Byzantinæ, Libri cii.; 2. Τεθρανικόν, Teuthranicum, or Teuthraniticum; a history apparently of Teuthrania, or of Teuthras, king of Mysia; 3. Περὶ Βησάλου, or Besalou, De Besulo, or Besulo, probably on the oracle of Besa; 4. Ὁ λερὸς πόλεμος, Bellum Sacrum; 5. Περὶ στάσεων, which some render De Seditionibus, but others De Statibus, i. e. a rhetorical treatise on the statement of questions or propositions; 6. Τὰ κατ' Ἀλέξανδρον, Res Gestæ Alexandri. These works are not extant, and are known to us only through the authors above mentioned. It has been already observed that Nos. 4 and 5, at least works under the same or nearly the same titles, are also ascribed both by Suidas and Eudocia to Leo of Alabanda. [No. 4.] This leads us to doubt the correctness of the list in other particulars; and if the accounts given above of the death of Leo be correct, No. 6 and probably No. 1 are incorrectly ascribed to him. Plutarch, in his De Fluvio (de Iameno), quotes from a work of Leo of Byzantium, which he calls Τὰ Βοιωτικὰ, De Rebus Boeoticis; and again, in the same treatise (de Tigride), he quotes from the third book of a work of Leo, Περὶ ποταμῶν, De Fluvio. Some, with probability, identify Leo (supposing that the name has been corrupted) with the Cleon mentioned by Plutarch (Vita Phocion, c. 14) as an eminent Byzantine at the time of Philip's invasion, who had been a fellow student of Phocion under Plato. Whether Leo of Byzantium was the Leo, father of Melantes and Pancreon, the legatees of Theophrastus (Diog. Laert. v. 51, &c. de Theophrasto) is doubtful. (Plut. Opera, vol. x. pp. 714, 801, ed. Reisk.; Suidas, s. v. Δίω; Eudocia, Violatum, s. v. Δίω; Heysch. Miles. Origines (a. Res Patriæ) Constantinop. c. 26—28, Opuscula, pp. 66, &c., ed. Orelli.; Philostr. Vitæ Sophisti, i. 2, ed. Kayser; Voss. De Hist. Græc. i. 3.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 715.)

8. OF BYZANTIUM. [Nos. 28 and 29.]

9. OF CALOE. [No. 13.]

10. OF CARIA. [Nos. 4 and 15.]

11. OF CHALCEDON. Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 665), inaccurately states that a synodical letter of Leo, who was archbishop of Chalcedon in the time of Alexius I. Comnenus (A. D. 1081—1118), was published by Montfaucon. (Biblioth. Cælestina. Catalog. p. 103, &c.) The document, as Fabricius elsewhere more accurately describes it (Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. 716), is the record of a synod held to determine some questions relating to the worship of images, on which Leo in a letter (which Montfaucon does not give) had used some heterodox language.

12. OF CONSTANTINOPLE. [Nos. 28 and 29.]

13. DIACONUS or the DEACON, a Byzantine historian of the tenth century. What little is known of his personal history is to be gleaned from incidental notices in his principal work, and has been collected by C. B. Hase in the Prefatio to his edition of Leo. Leo was born at Caloe, a town of Asia, beautifully situated on the side or at the foot of Mount Tmolus, near the sources of the Cæystrus, in Asia Minor. He was the son of Basilus, but his father's condition or calling is not known. (Leo Diac. Historiæ, i. 1.) The young Leo was at Constantinople, pursuing his studies, A. D. 966, when he was an admiring spectator of the firmness of the emperor, Nicephorus II. Phocas, in the midst of a popular tumult (iv. 7.) As he describes himself as a youth (μετρίκιον) at the time of this incident, Hase places his birth in or about A. D. 950. He was in Asia about the time of the deposition of Basilus I., patriarch of Constantinople, and the election of his successor Antonius III., A. D. 973 or 974, and relates that at that time he frequently saw two Cappadocians, twins, of thirty years old, whose bodies were united from the armpits to the flanks (x. 3). Having been ordained deacon, he accompanied the emperor Basilus II. in his unfortunate campaign against the Bulgarians, A. D. 981; and when the emperor raised the siege of Tralitzæ or Triaditza (the ancient Sardica), Leo narrowly escaped death or captivity in the headlong flight of his countrymen (x. 8). Of his history after this nothing is known; but Hase observes that he must have written his history after A. D. 989, as he adverts to the rebellion and death of Phocas Bardas (x. 9), which occurred in that year. Both this event and the Bulgarian campaign are noticed by him by anticipation, in a digression respecting the evils which he supposed were portended by a comet which appeared just before the death of Joannes I. Tzimisceas. He must have lived later than Hase has remarked, and at least till A. D. 993, as he notices (x. 10) that the emperor Basilus II. restored "in six years" the cupola of the great church (St. Sophia) at Constantinople which had been overthrown by the earthquake (comp. Cedren. Compend. vol. ii. p. 438, ed. Bonn) A. D. 987.

The works of Leo Diaconus comprehend 1. Ἱστορία βιβλίοις v', Historia Libri decem; and 2. Oratio ad Basilium Imperatorem; and 3. (unless it be the work of another Leo Diaconus) Homilia in Michaelen Archangelum. The two last are extant only in MS.

The history of Leo includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of the emperor Romanus II., A. D. 959, to the death of Joannes I. Tzimisceas, A. D. 975. It relates the victories of the emperors Nicephorus and Tzimisceas over the Mohammedans in Cilicia and Syria, and the recovery of those countries, or the greater part of them, to the Byzantine empire; and the wars of the same emperors with the Bulgarians and Rumanians. The style of Leo is described by Hase as vicious: he employs unusual and inappropriate words (many of them borrowed from Homer, Agathias, the historian, and the Septuagint), in the place of simple and common ones; and abounds in tautological phrases. His knowledge of geography and ancient history is slight; but with these defects his history is a valuable contemporary record of a stirring time, honestly and fearlessly written. Scylitzes, and through him Cedrenus, are much indebted to Leo; and Hase considers Zonaras also to have used his work.

The Historia was first published, at the cost of count Nicolas Romanzof, chancellor of Russia, by Car. Bened. Hase, Paris, 1818. Combéfis had intended to publish it in the Parisian edition of the Corpus Historiæ Byzantinæ with the Historia of Michael Psellus, but was prevented by death, A. D. 1679. The Latin version which he had prepared was communicated by Montfaucon to Pagi, who inserted some portions in his Critice in Baronium (ad ann. 960, No. ix). The papers of Combéfis were, many years after, committed to Michael Le Quien, that he might publish an edition of Psellus and Leo, and part of the latter author's work was actually printed; but the breaking out of the war of the succession (A. D. 1702) prevented its completion, and Hase could find no trace of the part printed. In the disorders of the French revolution the papers of Combéfis were finally lost or destroyed. Hase in his edition added a Latin version and notes to the text of Leo, and illustrated it by engravings from ancient gems. His edition is, however, scarce and dear, the greater part of the copies having been lost by shipwreck; but his text, preface, version, and notes (not the engravings), have been reprinted in the Bonn edition of the Corpus Historiæ Byzantinæ. 8vo. 1828. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 684, note 1; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 106; Hase, Prefatio ad Leonem Diaconem Historium.)

14. The EPICURAN of Lampsacus [No. 3].

15. GRAMMATICUS, one of the continuators of Byzantine history from the period when Theophanes leaves off. Nothing certain is known of him. A note, subjoined by the transcriber, to the Parisian MS. of Georgius Syncellus, Theophanes, and Leo Grammaticus states that "the chronography of the recent emperors, completed (πληρωθεῖσα) by Leo Grammaticus, was finished on the 8th of the month of July, on the feast of the holy martyr Procopius, in the year 6521 (of the Mundane era of Constantinople), in the 11th Indiction," A. D. 1013 common era; but there can be little doubt that this date refers to the completion, not of the original work, but of the transcript. Cave indeed understands the date as being that of the original work. A postscript to the same MS., but by a different hand, gives to Leo the surname of Tzicandalus (Τζικανδάλος), and states that he was civil and military governor (πρόεδρος δὲ δουξ) of the Cibyraeans, and one of the household (or perhaps the intimate friend, for the expression οἰκίος ἀνθρώπου is ambiguous) of our mighty and supreme (or chief, πρώτον) emperor. Combéfis (Notæ ad Leonem Grammat. ad initium) understands the emperor to be Constantine Porphyrogenitus [CONSTANTINUS VII.], which is probable; and though there are some difficulties about this inscription, which prevent our giving entire credit to it, we do not participate in the doubt of Combéfis whether it refers to Leo Grammaticus or the anonymous continuator of Theophanes. The town of Cibra is by Pliny included in Caria, and this furnishes Combéfis with one reason for identifying Leo Grammaticus with Leo the Carian mentioned by Cedrenus. (Compend. Historiæ, sub init.) That the two are identical is very probable; but the epithet "Carian" is probably given rather from Leo's birthplace than from his government, which appears to have included not merely the town of Cibra, but the whole thema of the Cibyraeans or Cibyrrhæans (θέμα Κυβυρραίων, Constant. Porphyrog. De Thematis. i. Th. 14), comprehending all the S.W. part of Asia Minor, and, of course, Caria. Leo Grammaticus is perhaps identical with the Leo Asinus, δ' Ἀσινός, mentioned by Joannes Scylitzis (apud Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 209).

The work of Leo Grammaticus is entitled Χρονογραφία, τὰ τῶν πρὸς βασιλέων περιέχονσα, Chronographia Res a Recentioribus Imperatoribus Gæcis Complectens, and extends from the accession of Leo V. the Armenian, A. D. 813, to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, A. D. 948 or 949, not, as Cave inaccurately states, to A. D. 1013. It was prepared for publication by Goar, but actually published with Theophanes, under the care of Combéfis, fol. Paris, 1655, in the Parisian edition of the Corpus Historiæ Byzantinæ, and was reprinted at Venice, fol. 1729. Leo has little in common with the anonymous continuator of Theophanes [LEONTIUS, No. 6] in that part of his work which comprehends the period before Basil the Macedonian; but in the latter part the two authors have many passages either identical or varying but little from each other: but the uncertainty attaching to the date of Leo's work makes it doubtful which was the first written. The anonymous continuation of Theophanes comes down to a later period than the work of Leo, and may therefore be inferred to have been written later. The somewhat abrupt termination of Leo's history soon after the recovery of the sole possession of the imperial power by the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus would lead to the conclusion that the writer lived at that period, and brought down his narrative to the time of its composition, had he not elsewhere (sub init. imperii Constant. Porphyrog. p. 488, ed. Paris, p. 387, ed. Ven.) given a statement of the whole length of Constantine's reign, which shows that he must have written after its close. Possibly he wrote during the reign of his son and successor Romanus II., and broke off where he did in order to avoid the necessity of adverting to Constantine's unhappy death and the periclude of Romanus. Some verses, probably by Leo of Thessalonica [No. 29], are in some MSS. ascribed to Leo Grammaticus. (Comp. Cedrenus, p. 641, ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 337, ed. Bonn.) Cotelierus (Museum. Eccles. Græc., vol. iii. 463, &c.) has given a letter on a question of canon law from a presbyter Joannes to "his guide and spiritual father, Leo Grammaticus, archbishop of Calabria," with Leo's answer. But this Leo cannot be the historian, unless we reject the account of the latter being governor of Cibra, or suppose him to have exchanged his secular for an ecclesiastical life. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 713; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 128; Hankins, De Byzantin. Rerum Scriptoris, pt. ii. c. vii.; Voss, De Hist. Græc. iv. 21.)

16. OF LAMPSACUS. [No. 3.]

17. MAGENTENUS (Μαγεντινός) or MAGESTINUS (Μαγεστινός), a commentator on Aristotle, flourished during the first half of the fourteenth century. His first name, Leo, is frequently omitted in the MSS. of his works. He was a monk, and afterwards archbishop of Mytilene. He wrote: 1. Ἐξηγησις εἰς τὰ περὶ ἑρμηνείας Ἀριστοτέλους, Commentarius in Aristotelis De Interpretatione Librum. This commentary was published by Aldus, fol. Venice, 1503, with the commentary of Ammonius, from which Leo borrowed very largely, and the paraphrase of Psellus on the same book of Aristotle, and the commentary of Ammonius on Aristotle's Categorizæ & Prædicamenta. In the Latin title of this edition the author is called by a misprint, Margentinus. A Latin version of Leo's commentary, by J. B. Rasarius, has been repeatedly printed with the Latin version of Ammonius. Another Latin version by Hieronymus Leunsius has also been printed. 2. Ἐξηγησις εἰς τὰ πρότερα βιβλία τοῦ Ἀριστοτέλους, Commentarius in Priora Analytica Aristotelis. This was printed with the commentary of Joannes Philoponus on the same work, by Trincavellus, fol. Venice, 1536; and a Latin version of it by Rasarius has been repeatedly printed, either separately, or with other commentaries on Aristotle. The following works in MS. are ascribed, but with doubtful correctness, to Leo Magentenus: 3. Commentarius in Categorizæ Aristotelis, is extant in the King's Library at Paris. 4. Ἀριστοτέλους σοφιστικῶν ἐλέγχων ἐκτίσις, Expositio Aristotelis De Sophisticis Elenchis; and 5. Ἀριστοτέλους περὶ εὐτοπίας προτάσεων. These two works are mentioned by Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin. p. 225). The latter is, perhaps, not a distinct work, but a portion of No. 1. In the MS. the author is called Leontius Magentenus. 6. Commentarius in Isagogæ. s. Quinque Voces Porphyrii. Buhle doubts if this work, which is in the Medicean library at Florence (Bandini, Catalog. Cod. Laur. Medic. vol. iii. p. 239), is correctly ascribed to Magentenus. In the catalogue of the MSS. in the king's library at Paris (vol. ii. pp. 410, 421), two MSS. Nos. mdcccxv. and mcmxxviii., contain Scholias on the Categorizæ, the Analytica Priora et Posteriora, and the Topica of Aristotle, and on the Isagoge of Porphyry, by MAGNENTIUS. Buhle conjectures, with probability, that Magnentius is a corruption of Magentenus or Magentinus: if so, and the works are assigned to their real author, we must add the commentaries on the Topica and the Analytica Posteriora to the works already mentioned. Nicolaus Comnenus Papadopolis speaks of many other works of Leo, but his authority is of little value. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. pp. 210, 213, 215, 218, 498, vii. 717, viii. 143, xii. 208; Montfaucon, l. c. and p. 219; Buhle, Opera Aristotelis, vol. i. pp. 165, 305, 306, ed. Bipont; Catalog. MSor. Biblioth. Regiæ, fol. Paris, 1740, l. c.)

18. ΜΑΛΕΪΝΟΣ (Μαλεῖνος), governor of the towns of Hierax, Stylus and others, in the middle of the twelfth century. A decree of his with a Latin version is given by Montfaucon, Palaeographia Græca, p. 410, &c.

19. ΜΕΔΕΥΣ. [No. 29.]

20. ΟΦ ΜΕΤΑΠΟΝΤΙΟΥ. Iamblichus (Pythag. Vit. c. 36) mentions a Pythagorean philosopher of this name and place, but without giving any further particulars, or assigning to him any date. It is conjectured that he is the Leo to whom Alcmæon of Crotona (ALCMÆON) dedicated his Ἀδύος φωναὶς, or work on natural philosophy (Diog. Laërt. viii. 83). Fabricius also proposes to identify him with the Leo, son of Neoclis, whose Ἐρωτήσεις, Elementa &c. Geometrica are mentioned by Proclus (Comment. in Euclid. Lib. ii. c. 4. p.

38 of the Latin version of Fr. Barocius, fol. Padua, 1560), and who gave considerably greater accuracy to geometrical science, especially by showing how to distinguish problems which admit of solution from those which cannot be solved. There is, however, a chronological objection to the identification of Leo, the friend of Alcmæon, who lived in the sixth century B. C., with Leo the Geometrician, who was later than Leodamas of Thasos, and Archytas of Tarentum (Proclus, l. c.), who belonged to the end of the fifth century B. C.: and it is uncertain whether Leo of Metapontum is not different from both. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 850, vol. vii. p. 718.)

21. ΟΦ ΜΥΤΙΛΕΝ. [No. 17.]

22. ΦΙΛΟΣΟΦΟΥΣ. [No. 29.]

23. ΠΕΡΙΠΑΤΗΤΙΚΟΥΣ. [No. 17.]

24. ΟΦ ΠΕΛΛΑ. [No. 3.]

25. ΠΥΘΑΓΟΡΙΚΟΥΣ. [No. 20.]

26. ΡΗΤΟΡΟΥ. [Nos. 4 and 7.]

27. ΣΑΠΙΕΝΣ. [LEO VI. emperor.]

28. ΣΤΥΡΙΑΤΑ ΟΦ ΣΤΥΡΡΑ (Στυρρίης), or ΣΤΥΡΑ (Στυρῆς), patriarch of Constantinople in the twelfth century. His patriarchate extended from A. D. 1134 to 1143 (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 721, vol. xi. p. 666). He died just about the time of the accession of the Byzantine emperor Manuel Comnenus, who appointed as Leo's successor Michael Curcuas, a monk of Oxeia, by whom he was himself crowned. (Nicetas Choniates. De Manuele Commeno, l. 2.) A decree of Leo on the lawfulness of certain marriages, is given in the Jus Orientale of Bonafidius (Œconomus 'Αρχιεπισκοπ. Sanction. Pontific. p. 59) and in the Jus Græco-Romanum of Leunclavius (Lib. iii. vol. i. p. 217). He is often cited by Nicolaus Comnenus Papadopolis. (Fabric. l. c.)

29. ΟΦ ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΝΙΚΑ, an eminent Byzantine philosopher and ecclesiastic of the ninth century. Of the time or place of his birth nothing is known. He was the kinsman of the iconoclast Joannes (or as his enemies called him, on account of his obnoxious sentiments, Jaanes), who was of the illustrious family of the Morcharianii or Morchardianii, tutor of the emperor Theophilus, and patriarch of Constantinople, from about A. D. 832—842. (Theoph. Contin. iv. 26, comp. c. 6; and Symeon Magister, De Michaelis et Theodora, c. 2.) Leo was characterized by his devotion to learning: he studied grammar and poetry "while staying (διερπίζων) at Constantinople," an expression which seems to indicate that he was not a native of that city; and rhetoric, philosophy, and arithmetic, under Michael Psellus, in the island of Andros. He visited the monasteries in the adjacent parts of continental Greece, examining and using their libraries, and studying and meditating upon the volumes obtained from them, amid the solitude of the mountains. Having thus acquired a great store of knowledge, not only in the sciences above mentioned, but in geometry, astronomy, including astrology, and music, he again visited Constantinople, and imparted his intellectual stores to those who resorted to him for instruction. (Theophan. Continuat. iv. 29; Cedrenus, Compendium, p. 547, &c., ed. Paris, vol. ii. p. 165, &c., ed. Bonn.) Neither his learning, however, nor his connexions sufficed to raise him from obscurity, until he became, by a remarkable accident, known to the emperor Theophilus. A pupil of Leo, whom he had instructed in geometry, accepted the office of secretary to a military officer, during the war between the emperor and the caliph Al-Mamoun; and, falling into the hands of the Moslems, or treacherously deserting to them, at the fall of Amorium (A. D. 839), became known to the caliph, who was a liberal patron of science. The young man, though he excited the admiration of the caliph and his court, by his geometrical attainments, professed himself to be "not a master, but only a learner," and so highly extolled the knowledge of Leo, that he was forthwith despatched to Constantinople, with a letter to him, inviting him to leave that city and resort to Bagdad. Fearful of being suspected of a treasonable correspondence with the enemy, Leo showed the letter to the logothete Theoctistus, by whom the matter was reported to the emperor. Leo was thus made known to Theophilus. The emperor first appointed him public teacher or professor, assigning him the church of the Forty Martyrs as a school, and soon after ordered the patriarch Joannes, who appears hitherto to have neglected his learned kinsman, to ordain him archbishop of Thessalonica (Theoph. Continuât. iv. 27; comp. Symeon Magister, De Theophilo. c. 18—20; Georg. Monach. De Theophilo. c. 22, 23; Cedrenus, Compendium, l. c.; Zonar. xvi. 4). After three years, when Theophilus died (A. D. 342), and the government came into the hands of his widow Theodora, as the guardian of her son Michael, the iconoclastic party was overthrown, and Leo and Joannes were deposed from their sees: but Leo, whose worth appears to have secured respect, escaped the sufferings which fell to his kinsman's lot (Theoph. Cont. iv. 9, 26; Sym. Mag. De Theoph. c. 20, De Michaelis, c. 1); and when the Caesar Bardas, anxious for the revival of learning, established the Mathematical school at the palace of Magnaura, in Constantinople, Leo was placed at its head, with one, if not more of his former pupils for his fellow-teachers. (Theoph. Contin. iv. 26; Cedrenus and Zonaras, l. c.) Leo was faithful to the interests of Bardas, whom he warned of the insidious designs of Basilus the Macedonian, afterwards emperor (Sym. Mag. De Michaelis et Theodora, c. 40; Georg. Monach. De Mich. et Theodora, c. 25, 26). An anecdote recorded both by Symeon (De Basilio Maced. c. 5) and George (De Basil. Maced. c. 4), shews that Leo was living in A. D. 869: how much later is not known.

Symeon (De Mich. et Theodora, c. 46) has described a remarkable method of telegraphic communication, invented by Leo, and practised in the reigns of Theophilus and his son Michael. Fires kindled at certain hours of the day conveyed intelligence of hostile incursions, battles, conflagrations, and the other incidents of war, from the confines of Syria to Constantinople; the hour of kindling indicating the nature of the incident, according to an arranged plan, marked on the dial plate of a clock kept in the castle of Lulus, near Tarsus, and of a corresponding one in the palace at Constantinople.

Leo Allatius, in his Excerpta Variis Graecor. Sophistarum, has given (p. 398) Λόγος τοῦ Φιλοσόφου Καρκίνου, Versus Carcini Leonis Philosophi, i. e. verses which may be read either backward or forward. They are probably the same which are in some MSS. or catalogues ascribed to Leo Grammaticus [see above, No. 15], but may be more probably ascribed to our Leo, among whose early studies poetry is mentioned. Several astrological collectanea extant in MS. in different European libraries, contain portions by Leo Philosophus, by which name the subject of the present article, who appears to have practised astrology (Theoph. Contin. iv. 28, v. 14), is probably meant (Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 148, Graec. De Marci Biblioth. p. 153; Catalog. Codd. MStorum Bibl. Regiae, Paris, fol. 1740, vol. ii. pp. 499, 500); but the Μέθοδος προγνωστική, Methodus Prognostica or instructions for divining by the Gospel or the Psalter, by Leo Sapiens, in the Medicean library at Florence (Bardini, Catalog. Codd. Laur. Medic. vol. iii. p. 339), is perhaps by another Leo. Combéfis was disposed to claim for Leo of Thessalonica the authorship of the celebrated Χρησμοί, Oracula, which are commonly ascribed to the emperor Leo VI. Sapiens, or the wise, and have been repeatedly published. But Leo of Thessalonica is generally designated in the Byzantine writers the philosopher (Φιλόσοφος), not the wise (σόφος), and if the published Oracula are a part of the series mentioned by Zonaras (xv. 21), they must be older than either the emperor or Leo of Thessalonica. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 148, 158, vol. vii. p. 697, vol. xi. p. 665; Allatius, De Paulis, c. 3—6; Labbe, De Byzant. Hidor. Scriptoris. Προφρητικόν, pars secunda, p. 45.) [J.C.M.]

LEO, Latin ecclesiastics. 1. The first of that name who occupied the papal throne, is usually styled the GREAT. He was a native of Rome, and must have been born towards the close of the fourth century, although the precise year is unknown. Nothing has been recorded concerning his parents, except that his father was called Quintianus, nor with regard to his early training; but when we remark the erudition and polished accuracy displayed in his writings, and the early age at which he rose to offices of high trust, it becomes manifest that his great natural talents must have been cultivated with uncommon assiduity and skill. While yet an acolyte he was despatched, in A. D. 418, to Carthage, for the purpose of conveying to Aurelius and the other African bishops the sentiments of Zosimus concerning the Pelagian doctrines of Coelestinus. [COELESTINUS.] Under Coelestinus [COELESTINUS] he discharged the duties of a deacon; and the reputation even then (431) enjoyed by him is clearly indicated by the terms of the epistle prefixed to the seven books, De Incarnatione Christi, of Cassianus, who at his request had undertaken this work against the Nestorian heresy. Having obtained the full confidence of Sixtus III., to whom he rendered much good service, he attracted the notice of Valentinian III., and by the orders of the emperor undertook a mission to Gaul, in order to soothe the formidable dissensions of Aëtius and Albinus. [AETIUS.] While Leo was engaged in this delicate negotiation, which was conducted with singular prudence and perfect success, the chief pontiff died, and by the unanimous voice of the clergy and laity the absent deacon was chosen to fill the vacant seat, and on his return was solemnly installed, A. D. 440.

From the earliest ages until this epoch no man who combined lofty ambition with commanding intellect and political dexterity had presided over the Roman see: and although its influence had gradually increased, and many popes had sought to extend and confirm that influence, yet they had merely availed themselves of accidental circumstances to augment their own personal authority, without acting upon any distinct and well devised scheme. But Leo, while he sedulously watched over the purity of his own peculiar flock, concentrated all the powers of his energetic mind upon one great design, which he seems to have formed at a very early period, which he kept steadfastly in view during a long and eventful life, and which he followed out with consummate boldness, perseverance, and talent. This was nothing less than to establish the "Apostolic Chair" in acknowledged spiritual supremacy over every branch of the Catholic church, and to appropriate to its occupant exclusively the title of Papa, or father of the whole Christian world. Nor were the evil days amid which his lot was cast unfavourable, as might at first sight be imagined, to such a project. The church, it is true, was every where distracted and torn by the strife of parties, and by innumerable heresies, while the character of its ministers had grievously degenerated. The empire in the West was pressed on every side by hordes of barbarians, who were threatening to pour down upon Italy itself. But in this season of confusion the contending factions among the orthodox clergy, terrified by the rapid progress of Arianism, were well disposed to refer their own minor disputes to arbitration, and to acquiesce in the decision of one pre-eminent in learning and dignity. Leo, who well knew, from the example of his predecessor Innocentius, that the transition is easy from instruction to command, in the numerous and elaborate replies which he addressed to inquiries proceeding from various quarters, while he conveyed the information sought, or resolved the doubts proposed, studiously adopted a tone of absolute infallibility, and assumed the right of enforcing obedience to his dictates as an unquestionable prerogative of his office. On the other hand, the barbarian chiefs whose power was not yet consolidated were eager to propitiate one who possessed such weight with the priesthood, and through them could either calm into submission or excite to rebellion an ignorant and fanatic multitude. Hence these also proved powerful, although unconscious, instruments in forwarding the great enterprise. But even after the minds of men were in some degree prepared and disposed to yield to such domination, it was scarcely to be expected that it could be firmly fixed without exciting jealousy and resistance. Accordingly, a strong opposition was speedily organised both in the West and in the East, which soon assumed the attitude of open defiance. In the West the contest was brought to an issue by the controversy with Hilarius of Arles concerning the deposition of Chelidonius. [HILARIUS Arelatensis.] The total defeat and severe punishment of the Gaulish bishop filled his supporters with terror, and the edict of Valentinian issued upon this occasion served as a sort of charter, in virtue of which the Roman bishops exercised for centuries undisputed jurisdiction over France, Spain, Germany, and Britain.

In the East the struggle was much more complicated, the result much less satisfactory. The Archimandrite Eutyches [EUTYCHES], in his vehement denunciation of Nestorius, having been betrayed into errors, very different indeed, but equally dangerous, was anathematised, deposed, and excommunicated, in A. D. 448, by the synod of Constantinople. Against this sentence he sought redress, by soliciting the interference of the bishops of Alexandria and Rome. By the former his cause was eagerly espoused; the latter, although at first disposed to listen favourably to a complaint which he chose to regard as an appeal from an inferior to a higher court, was eventually induced, either by policy or conviction, to reject the application, and drew up an elaborate epistle to the patriarch Flavianus, in which the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation was authoritatively expounded and defined. Meanwhile, a general council was summoned to be held on the 1st of August, 449, at Ephesus, and thither the ambassadors of Leo repaired, for the purpose of reading publicly the above letter. But a great majority of the congregated fathers acting under control of the president, Dioscurus of Alexandria, refused to listen to the document, passed tumultuously a series of resolutions favourable to Eutyches, excommunicated the most zealous of his opponents, and not only treated the Roman envoys with indignity, but even offered violence to their persons. Hence this assembly, whose acts were all subsequently annulled, is known in ecclesiastical history as the Synodus Latrocinialis. The vehement complaints addressed to Theodosius by the orthodox leaders proved fruitless, and the triumph of their opponents was for a time complete, when the sudden death of the emperor in 450 again awakened the hopes and called forth the exertions of Leo. In consequence of the pressing representations of his envoys, Anatolius, the successor of Flavianus, together with all the clergy of Constantinople, were induced to subscribe the Confession of Faith contained in the Epistle to Flavianus, and to transmit it for signature to all the dioceses of the East. Encouraged by this success, Leo solicited the new monarch Marcianus to summon a grand council, for the final adjustment of the questions concerning the nature of Christ, which still proved a source of discord, and strained every nerve to have it held in Italy, where his own adherents would necessarily have preponderated. In this, however, he failed. Nicaea was the place first fixed upon, but it eventually met at Chalcedon in October, 451. Although the Roman legates, whose language was of the most imperious description, did not fail broadly to assert the pretensions put forth by the representative of St. Peter, at first all went smoothly. The Epistle to Flavianus was admitted as a rule of faith for the guidance of the universal church, and no protest was entered against the spirit of arrogant assumption in which it was conceived. But when the whole of the special business was concluded, at the very last sitting, a formal resolution was proposed and passed, to the effect that while the Roman see was, in virtue of its antiquity, entitled to take formal precedence of every other, the see of Constantinople was to stand next in rank, was to be regarded as independent of every other, and to exercise full jurisdiction over the churches of Asia, Thrace, and Pontus. The resistance of Leo was all in vain. The obnoxious canons were fully confirmed, and thus one half of the sovereignty at which he aimed was for ever lost, at the very moment when victory seemed no longer doubtful.

Two other events in the active life of this remarkable man must not be passed over in silence. In 452, when Attila was advancing in full career upon Rome, Leo was selected as the chief of an embassy, sent forth in the forlorn hope of propitiating the fierce conqueror. What the arguments employed by the eloquent suppliant may have been history has failed to record. The result is well known. The Hun not only spared the metropolis, but evacuated Italy, and returned with his army to the Danube. Again in 455, when the city lay at the mercy of the Vandals, Genserich was persuaded by the entreaties of Leo to forego his purpose of general conflagration and massacre, and to be content with pillage—a concession which, when we consider the circumstances of the case and the temper of the chief, indicates the influence of the pontiff not less forcibly than his success with Attila.

His last anxiety arose from the tumults excited in the church at Alexandria about 457 by the disorderly proceedings of Timotheus Aelurus. Having united with the emperor of the East and with the patriarch of Constantinople in restoring order and discipline, and having written a congratulatory letter to the clergy of Alexandria upon the happy termination of their troubles, he soon after died, on the 10th of November, 461.

The works of Leo consist of discourses delivered on the great festivals of the church or other solemn occasions, and of letters.

I. Sermones. Of these we possess ninety-six. There are five De Natali ipsius, preached on anniversaries of his ordination, six De Collectis, nine De Jejunio Decimi Mensis, ten De Nativitate Domini, eight In Epiphania Domini, twelve De Quadragesima, one De Transfiguratione Domini, nineteen De Passione Domini, two De Resurrectione Domini, two De Ascensione Domini, three De Pentecoste, four De Jejunio Pentecostes, one In Natali Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, one In Natali S. Petri Apostoli, one In Octavis Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, one In Natali S. Laurentii Martyris, nine De Jejunio Septimi Mensis, one De Gradibus Ascensionis ad Beatitudinem, one Tractatus contra Huerem Eutychia.

II. Epistolae. These, extending to the number of 173, are addressed to the reigning emperors and their consorts, to synods, to religious communities, to bishops and other dignitaries, and to sundry influential personages connected with the ecclesiastical history of the times. They afford an immense mass of most valuable information on the prevailing heresies, controversies, and doubts, with regard to matters of doctrine, discipline, and church government.

Besides the ninety-six Sermones and 173 Epistolae mentioned above, a considerable number of tracts have from time to time been ascribed to the same author; but their authenticity is either so doubtful, or their spuriousness so evident, that they are now universally set aside. A list of these, and an investigation of their origin, will be found in the edition of the brothers Ballerini, more particularly described below.

In consequence of the reputation deservedly enjoyed by Leo, his writings have always been eagerly studied. But, although a vast number of MSS. are still in existence, none of these exhibit his works in a complete form, and no attempt seems to have been made to bring together any portion of them for many hundred years after his death. The Sermones were dispersed in the Lectionaria or select discourses of distinguished divines, employed in places of public worship until the eleventh century, when they first began to be picked out of these cumbrous storehouses, and transcribed separately, while the Epistolae were gradually gathered into imperfect groups, or remained embodied in the general collections of papal constitutions and canons.

Of the numerous printed editions, which commence with that which issued from the press of Sweynghem and Pannarts (Rom. fol. 1470), under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria, comprising ninety-two Sermones and five Epistolae, it is unnecessary to give any detailed account, since two are decidedly superior to all others.

The first is that published at Paris in 1675, in two large quarto tomes, by Pasquier Queanel, who by the aid of a large number of MSS., preserved chiefly in the libraries of France, was enabled to introduce such essential improvements into the text, and by his erudite industry illustrated so clearly the obscurities in which many of the documents were involved, that the works of Leo now for the first time assumed an unmutated, intelligible, and satisfactory aspect. But the admiration excited by the skill with which the arduous task had been executed soon received a check. Upon attentive perusal, the notes and dissertations were found to contain such free remarks upon many of the opinions and usages of the primitive church, and, above all, to manifest such unequivocal hostility to the despotism of the Roman see, that the volumes fell under the ban of the Inquisition within a year after their publication, and were included in the "Index Librorum Prohibitorum" of 1682. Notwithstanding these denunciations, the book enjoyed great popularity, and was reprinted, without any suppression or modification of the obnoxious passages, at Lyons in 1700. Hence the heads of the Romish church became anxious to supply an antidote to the poison so extensively circulated. This undertaking was first attempted by Peter Cacciari, a Carmelite monk of the Propaganda, whose labours (S. Leonis Magni Opera omnia, Rom. 1753—1755, 2 vols. fol.; Exercitationes in Universa S. Leonis Magni Opera, Rom. fol. 1751), might have attracted attention and praise had they not been, at the very moment when they were brought to a close, entirely thrown into the shade by those of the brothers Peter and Jerome Ballerini, presbyters of Verona, whose edition appeared at Verona in three volumes folio in the course of the years 1755—1757, and is entitled to take the first place both in purity of the text, corrected from a great number of MSS., chiefly Roman, not before collated, in the arrangement of the different parts, and in the notes and disquisitions. A full description of these volumes, as well as of those of Queanel and Cacciari, is to be found in Schönmann, who has bestowed more than usual care upon this section.

(Maimbourg, Histoire du Pontificat de Léon, Paris, 4to. 1687; the dissertations of Queanel and the Ballerini; Schönmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 42; Arendt, Leo der Grosse, Mainz, 8vo. 1835; Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Literat. Suppl. Band. II<sup>e</sup> Abtheil. § 159—162.)

2. Distinguished by the epithet BITURNENSIS, was bishop of Bourges in the middle of the fifth century, and took an active part in various important Gaulish councils, such as those of Angers (C. Andegavense, A. D. 453), and of Tours (C. Turonense, A. D. 461), held about that epoch.

We possess a letter written by this prelate in 454, jointly with the bishops Victorius and Eustochius, entitled Epistola ad Episcopos et Presbyteros Ecclesiarum Provinciae Turonicæ, which was long ascribed to Leo the Great, inserted in all the earlier editions of the works of that pope, and in various collections of councils, the epithet Turonensis appearing under the corrupt form of Thracias. Simond first detected the real author of the piece, and restored the true title—Provincias tertias Lugdunensis & Thracicae.

It will be found in Labbe, Council. vol. iii. col. 142b, fol. Par. 1672, and was placed by the brothers Ballerini in the Appendix Epistolarum Leonis Magni, vol. i. col. 1469-72. See also Simond, Council Gall. vol. i. pp. 119, 599, vol. iv. p. 667. (Schönmann, Biblioth. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 52.) [W. R.]

LEO or LEON, jurista. 1. A jurist, who lived about the time of Theodosius II. or shortly afterwards. He is mentioned by Sidonius Apollinaris in the following lines (Narbo, v. 448—551), which are remarkable from showing at how late a period the laws of the twelve tables formed a part of legal instruction:—

* Sive ad doctiloqui Leonis aedes,
Quo his sex tabulas docente juris,
Utro Claudius Appius lateret,
Claro obscurior in decemviratu."

2. A praefectus praetorio of the East, under Anastasius. (Cod. 7. tit. 39. a. 6). He was probably the author of the Edictum cited by Theodorus. (Basil. vol. iv. p. 414, ed. Fabrot.) He was different from the praefectus praetorio of Italy, to whom the 143rd Novell was addressed in Latin by Justinian in A. D. 563. (Biener, Geschichte der Novellen, p. 532; C. E. Zachariae, Anecdota, p. 261, n. 43.)

3. A Graeco-Roman jurist, probably contemporary with Justinian. A legal question of Leo is cited in Basil. 29. tit. 1. schol. (vol. iv. p. 610, ed. Fabrot.) In Basil. 21. tit. 2. schol. (vol. ii. p. 633), occurs another legal question of Leo, with the corrupt heading, Adoris 'Avapafeds' (or 'Avapafeds) 'Ipatris. Leo, in the latter passage, inquires whether a woman, who, while she was a slave, had exercised the trade of prostitution, was infamous after manumission; and Stephanus, who answers in the negative, gives a curious reason for the rule.

A Leo Sebastianus, monk and jurist, is often cited by the untrustworthy Nic. Comnenus Papadopolis, in his Prænotiones Mystagogaes. His Echthesis Canonum is mentioned, pp. 143, 216, 219, 249, 278; and his scholia on Balsamo, p. 325. [J. T. G.]

LEO or LEON, a physician, called φιλόσοφος καὶ ιατρός, the author of a short Greek medical work, in seven books, entitled Σύνopsis τῆς ἱατρικῆς, Conspectus Medicinæ, dedicated to a person named Georgias, at whose request it was written. It consists of a very brief account of about two hundred diseases, taken in a great measure from Galen. It is uncertain at what time Leo lived, but it may have been about the eighth or ninth century after Christ. The work is to be found in Greek and Latin, in F. Z. Ernerina, Anecdota Medica Graeca, 8vo. Lond. Bat., 1840. [W. A. G.]

LEO or LEON, artists. 1. A painter, of unknown date, whose picture of Sappho is mentioned by Pliny (xxxv. 11. a. 40. § 35).

2. One of those statuarys who made "athletas, et armatos, et venatores sacrificantesque." (Plin. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 34.) [P. S.]

LEOBOTES (Λεοβότης or Λεοβότης), the Ionic form of LABOTAS (Λαβότας). 1. King of Sparta. [LABOTAS.]

2. A Spartan harpastor at the unfortunate colony of Heracleia, was slain in battle by the Oetaeans, together with 700 of the settlers, through the treachery of his Achaean allies, B. C. 409. (Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 18; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 95, note 1.) He is perhaps the same who is called Labotus in Plutarch. (Apoph. Lac. p. 140, ed. Tauchn.) [E. E.]

LEOCEDES (Λεοκίδης), son of the tyrant Pheidon. (Herod. vi. 127.) [PHEIDON.]

LEOCHARES (Λεοχαρής). 1. An Athenian statuary and sculptor, was one of the great artists of the later Athenian school, at the head of which were Scopas and Praxiteles. He is placed by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19) with Polyctes I., Cephisodotus I., and Hypatodorus, at the 102d Olympiad (B. C. 372). We have several other indications of his time. From the end of the 106th Olympiad (B. C. 352) and onwards he was employed upon the tomb of Mausolus (Plin. xxvi. 5. a. 4. § 9; Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 13: ΣΑΥΡΑΥΣ); and he was one of the artists employed by Philip to celebrate his victory at Chaeroneia, Ol. 110, 3, B. C. 338. The statement, that he made a statue of Autolycus, who conquered in the boys' pancration at the Panathenaea in Ol. 89 or 90, and whose victory was the occasion of the Symposium of Xenophon (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 17; comp. Schneider, Quaest. de Conviv. Xenoph.), seems at first sight to be inconsistent with the other dates; but the obvious explanation is, that the statue was not a dedicatory one in honour of the victory, but a subject chosen by the artist on account of the beauty of Autolycus, and of the same class as his Ganymede, in connection with which it is mentioned by Pliny; and that, therefore, it may have been made long after the victory of Autolycus. In one of the Pseudo-Platonic epistles (13, p. 361), the supposed date of which must be about Ol. 104, Leochares is mentioned as a young and excellent artist.

The masterpiece of Leochares seems to have been his statue of the rape of Ganymede, in which, according to the description of Pliny (l. c.), the eagle appeared to be sensible of what he was carrying, and to whom he was bearing the treasure, taking care not to hurt the boy through his dress with his talons. (Comp. Tatian, Orat. ad Graec. 56, p. 121, ed. Worth.) The original work was pretty certainly in bronze; but it was frequently copied both in marble and on gems. Of the extant copies in marble, the best is one, half the size of life, in the Museo Pio-Clementino. (Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vol. iii. pl. 49; Abbildungen zu Winckelmann, No. 86; Müller, Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. i. pl. 36.) Another, in the library of S. Mark at Venice, is larger and perhaps better executed, but in a much worse state of preservation. (Zanetti, Statue, vol. ii. tav. 7.) Another, in alto-relievo, among the ruins of Thessalonica, is figured in Stuart's Athens, vol. iii. c. 9, pl. 2 and 9. (Comp. Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. ii. pp. 97, 98.) These copies, though evidently very imperfect, give some idea of the mingled dignity and grace, and refined sensuality, which were the characteristics of the later Athenian school. Winckelmann mentions a marble base found in the Villa Medici at Rome, and now in the gallery at Florence, which bears the inscription ΓΑΝΥΜΗΔΗC ΛΕΟΧΑΡΟΥC ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΥ. (Gesch. d. Kunst, b. ix. c. 3. § 12, note.) Though, as Winckelmann shows (comp. R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 341, 2d edit.)

this base is almost certainly of a much later date than the original statue, it is useful as proving the fact, that Leochares was an Athenian. His name also appears on an inscription recently discovered at Athens. (Schöll, Archäologische Mittheilungen aus Griechenland, nach C. O. Müller's hinterlassenen Papieren, pt. i. p. 127.)

Of his other mythological works, Pausanias mentions Zeus and a personification of the Athenian people (Zeus kai Æthnos) in the long portico at the Peiræus, and another Zeus in the acropolis of Athens (i. 24. § 4), as well as an Apollo in the Cerameicus, opposite to that of Calamia. Pliny (xxiv. 8. s. 19. § 17) speaks of his Jupiter Iovans in the Capitol as "ante cuncta laudabilem," and of his Apollo with a diadem; and Vitruvius (ii. 8. § 11) refers to his colossal statue of Mars, in the acropolis of Halicarnassus, which some ascribed to Timotheus, and which was an ἀγάλιστος. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v.)

Of his portrait-statues, the most celebrated were those of Philip, Alexander, Amyntas, Olympias, and Eurydice, which were made of ivory and gold, and were placed in the Philippæion, a circular building in the Allis at Olympia, erected by Philip of Macedon in celebration of his victory at Chaeroneia. (Paus. v. 20 § 5, or §§ 9—10.) A bronze statue of Isocrates, by Leochares, was dedicated by Timotheus, the son of Conon, at Eleusis. (Pseud.-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 838, d.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 260, p. 488, a, Bekker, who reads Κλεοχάρους ἑργων, instead of Λεοχάρους.) His statue of Autolyceus has been already mentioned.

2. Another Athenian sculptor of this name, and probably of the same family, but of the Roman period, has lately been brought to light by the researches of Ottfried Müller, who saw at Athens a block of marble bearing an inscription which shows it to be the base of a statue of a certain M. Antonius (not improbably the triumvir), made by Leochares. (Schöll, Archäol. Mittheil. pp. 128, 129; Stephani, in Rhein. Mus. 1845, p. 30; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 342.) [P. S.]

LEOCRATES (Λεοκράτης), son of Stroeus, commanded in the great sea-fight off Aegina (B. C. 457), in which the Athenians gave a final defeat to their ancient rivals. Seventy ships were taken, and Leocrates landed and laid siege to the town; while the Corinthian forces, which, by invading Attica, hoped to relieve it, were defeated by Myronides. (Thuc. i. 105.) Plutarch relates that these two commanders were both of them colleagues of Aristides in the campaign of Plataea (Plut. Arist. 20.) [A. H. C.]

LEOCRITUS (Λεοκρίτος), a son of Evenor, and one of the suitors of Penelope, was slain by Telemachus. (Hom. Od. ii. 242, &c., xxii. 294.) [L. S.]

LEOCRITUS (Λεοκρίτος). 1. A son of Polydamas, was slain by Odysseus. He was represented as dead in a painting in the Λέορχη at Delphi. (Paus. x. 27.)

2. An Athenian, son of Protarchus, distinguished himself greatly in the storming of the Museum at Athens, under Olympiodorus, when the Athenians threw off the yoke of Demetrius Poliorcetes and drove out his garrison, B. C. 287. Leocritus was the first to break into the place, and was slain in the struggle. His memory was held in high honour by the Athenians, and his shield was suspended in the temple of Zeus ἐλευθέριος, with his name and his exploit inscribed upon it. (Paus. i. 25, 26; Plut. Demetr. 46.)

3. A general of Pharnaces, king of Pontus, in his war with Fumenes II. of Pergama, was sent by his master to invade Galatia in B. C. 181. (Pol. xxv. 4.) On one occasion the garrison of Tium or Teium, a town in Paphlagonia, surrendered to him on a promise of safety, in spite of which he treacherously put the whole of it to death. (Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vit. p. 576; comp. Pol. xxvi. 6.)

4. A Pythagorean philosopher of Carthage. (Iambl. Vit. Pyth. ad fin.) [F. E.]

LEOCYDES (Λεοκυδης). 1. A Pythagorean philosopher of Metapontum. (Iambl. Vit. Pyth. 36.)

2. A general of Megalopolis, and a descendant of Arceilaus. (Paus. viii. 10. §§ 6, 10.)

LEODAMAS (Λεωδάμας). 1. Of Acharnae, an Attic orator of great distinction. He was educated in the school of Isocrates; and Aeschines (c. Ctesiph. § 138), who, however, cannot in this case be regarded as an impartial critic, says that he excelled Demosthenes in the gracefulness of his orations. Some writers call him the teacher of Aeschines; but this seems to be no more than an unfounded inference drawn from the passage of Aeschines just referred to. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 840; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 264, p. 490, ed. Bekk.; comp. Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Graec. p. lxiii. &c.) None of the orations of Leodamas have come down to us, but we know that he delivered one in accusing Callistratus (Aristot. Rhetor. i. 7, 13), and another in accusing Chabrias (Demosth. in Lept. p. 501), and that he defended himself against a charge brought against him by Thrasylbulus. (Aristot. Rhetor. ii. 23, 25.) He is also said to have been sent by the Athenians on an embassy to Thebes. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 837.)

2. Of Thasus, a Pythagorean philosopher. (Proclus, in Euclid. ii. p. 19, iii. p. 58; Diog. Laert. iii. 24.) [L. S.]

LEOGORAS (Λεωγόρας), the son of one Andocides, and the father of Andocides the orator, is said to have taken part in the conclusion of a peace between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, probably the peace of B. C. 445. He was one of the parties apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the mutilation of the Hermae at Athens, in B. C. 415. Plutarch says that Leogoras was accused by his own son, Andocides, as one of the guilty parties, but that the latter saved his father by stating that Leogoras was able to give important information to the state; and he further states that Leogoras, taking the hint, forthwith accused numerous persons of various crimes, and was, in consequence, set free. Andocides, however, stoutly denies the truth of this story. (Thuc. i. 51; Plut. Vitae X. Orat. p. 834; Andoc. De Myst. pp. 3, 4, ed. Steph.) Leogoras seems to have borne no better character than his notorious son, Andocides. He was frequently attacked by the comic poets for his extravagance and luxurious mode of living. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1269, Nub. 109, with Schol.; Athen. ix. p. 387, a.)

LEON. [ΛΕΩ.]

LEONIDAS I. (Λεωνίδας), king of Sparta, 17th of the Agids, was one of the sons of ANAKANDRIDES by his first wife, and, according to some accounts, was twin-brother to Cleombrotus (Hesiod. v. 39—41; Paus. iii. 3). He succeeded on the throne his half-brother Cleomenes I., about B. C. 491, his elder brother Dorieus also having previously died [Doximus]. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, the Greek congress, which was held at the Isthmus of Corinth, determined that a stand should be made against the enemy at the pass of Thermopylae, and Leonidas had the command of the force destined for this service. The number of his army is variously stated: according to Herodotus, it amounted to somewhat more than 5000 men, of whom 300 were Spartans; in all probability, the regular band of (so called) hoplites, selected by the Hippagretae, τοὺς κατεσσεύρας ὑπασπασίας, as Herodotus calls them (comp. Müller, Dor. book iii. 12. § 5). The remainder of the Lacedaemonian force was to follow after the celebration of the festival of the Carneia. Plutarch affirms that funeral games were celebrated in honour of Leonidas and his comrades, before their departure from Sparta; according also to him and Diodorus, it was said at the same time by the self-devoting hero, that the men he took with him were indeed few to fight, but enough to die; and, when his wife, Gorgo, asked him what his last wishes were, he answered, "Marry a brave husband and bear brave sons." All this, however, has very much the air of a late and rhetorical addition to the story; nor is it certain that Leonidas and his band looked forward to their own death as the inevitable result of their expedition, though Herodotus tells us that he selected for it such only as had sons to leave behind them, and mentions an oracle besides, which declared that Sparta could not be saved from ruin but by the death of her king. When the Greek army was assembled at Thermopylae, there was a prevalent desire on the part of the Peloponnesians to fall back on the Isthmus, and make their stand against the Persians there; and it was mainly through the influence of Leonidas that the scheme, selfish at once and impolitic, was abandoned. The sayings ascribed to him before the battle by Plutarch are well-known and characteristic enough of a Spartan, but are probably the rhetorical inventions of a later age. When it was known that the treachery of the Malian Epialtes had betrayed the mountain path of the Anopaea to the Persians, after their vain attempts to force their way through the pass of Thermopylae, Leonidas, declaring that he and the Spartans under his command must needs remain in the post they had been sent to guard, dismissed all the other Greeks, except the Theban and Theban forces. Then, before the body of Persians, who were crossing the mountain under Hydarnes, could arrive to attack him in the rear, he advanced from the narrow pass and charged the myriads of the enemy with his handful of troops, hopeless now of preserving their lives, and anxious only to sell them dearly. In the desperate battle which ensued, Leonidas himself fell soon. His body was rescued by the Greeks, after a violent struggle. On the hillock in the pass, where the remnant of the Greeks made their last stand, a lion of stone (so Herodotus tells us) was set up in his honour; and Pausanias says that his bones were brought to Sparta forty years after, by one named Pansanias; but if he was the same who commanded at the battle of Plataea, "forty" must be an erroneous reading for "four" (see Larcher, ad Herod. vii. 225). The later story of Leonidas and his followers perishing in a night-attack on the Persian camp is unworthy of credit. (Herod. vii. 175, 202—225; Paus. iii. 4, 14, vii. 15; Diod. xi. 4—11; Plut. de Herod. Mal. 32, Apoph. Lac.;

Strab. i. p. 10, ix. p. 429; Ael. V.H. iii. 25; Just. ii. 11; C. Nep. Them. 3; Val. Max. iii. 2, Ext. 3; Cic. de Fin. ii. 19, 30, Tusc. Disp. i. 42, 49; Simon. xv. Anthol. Graec. vol. i. p. 61, ed. Jacobs.) In the reign of Leonidas we arrive at an exact chronology (says Clinton, F.H. vol. ii. p. 209), which we have gradually approached in the two preceding reigns of Anaxandrides and Cleomenes I. [E.E.]

LEONIDAS II. (Λεωνίδας), king of Sparta, was son of the traitor, Cleonymus, and 28th of the Agids. He acted as guardian to his infant relative, Areus II., on whose death, at the age of eight years, he ascended the throne, about B.C. 256, being by this time considerably advanced in life. A great part of his earlier years he had spent in the courts of Seleucus Nicator and his satraps, and had even married an Asiatic wife, by whom he had two children. From this it is reasonable to suppose that he reversed the policy of his predecessors, who had cultivated a connection with Egypt; and it is at least an ingenious conjecture of Droysen's, that the adventurer, Xanthippus, who entered at this period into the Carthaginian service, and whom he identifies with the general of Ptolemy Euergetes in his war with Seleucus Callinicus, may have been one of those who, as favourers of the Egyptian alliance, were driven from Sparta by the party of Leonidas. (Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. pp. 296, 347; comp. Arnold's Rome, vol. ii. p. 589.) The habits which Leonidas had contracted abroad, very different from the old Spartan simplicity, caused him to regard with strong dislike the projected reforms of Agis IV., and he laboured at first to counteract them by secret intrigues and by the slanderous insinuation that the object of Agis was to bribe the poor with the property of the rich, and thus to make himself tyrant of Sparta. When the measure of his colleague was actually brought forward, Leonidas opposed it with arguments ludicrously weak, but succeeded, nevertheless, in obtaining its rejection in the senate by a majority of one. It thus became necessary for the reformers to get rid of him, and accordingly the ephor Lysander revived an old law, which forbade a Hecleid to marry a foreigner, and affixed the penalty of death to a sojourn in a foreign land. There was also an ancient custom at Sparta, of which he took advantage to excite the stronger prejudice against Leonidas. Every ninth year the ephors sat in silence to observe the heavens on a clear and moonless night; and if a star was seen to shoot in a particular direction, it was interpreted as a sign of some offence against the gods on the part of the kings, who were therefore to be suspended from their office till an oracle from Delphi or Olympia should declare in their favour. Lysander professed to have seen the sign, and referred it to the displeasure of heaven at the illegal conduct of Leonidas. He also accused him, according to Pausanias, of having bound himself by an oath, while yet a boy, to his father Cleonymus, to work the downfall of Sparta. Leonidas, not venturing to abide his trial, took refuge in the temple of Athena Chalicioecus, where his daughter Chellonis joined him. Sentence of deposition having been passed against him in his absence, the throne was transferred to his son-in-law, Cleombrotus; and the ephors of the succeeding year having failed in their attempt to crush Lysander and his colleague, Mandrocleidas, by a prosecution [see Vol. I. p. 73], Leonidas went into exile to Tegea.* When the misconduct of Agesilanus, the uncle of Agis, had led, not long after, to his restoration (a. c. 240), he listened to the entreaties of Cheilonis, and spared the life of her husband, Cleombrotus, contenting himself with his banishment; but he caused Agis to be put to death, though he owed his own life to the protection he had afforded him in his flight to Tegea. Archidamus, the brother of Agis, fled from Sparta: Agiatia, his widow, was forced by Leonidas into a marriage with his son, Cleomenes; and it seems doubtful whether the child Eurydamidas, her son by Agis, was allowed to bear the name of king. At any rate the whole of the royal power (such as it was, in a selfish oligarchy, of which he was the tool) remained with Leonidas; and Plutarch tells us that he utterly neglected public affairs, caring for nothing but a life of ease and luxury. He died about a. c. 236, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III. (Plut. Agis, 3, 7, 10—12, 16—21, Cleom. 1—3; Paus. iii. 6; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 217; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. pp. 295, 296, 384, &c., 445.) [E. E.]

LEONIDAS or LEO/NIDES (Λεωνίδας, Λεωνίδης), historical. 1. A general of the Byzantines, who, when the citizens, during a siege of their town, flocked to the taverns instead of manning the walls, established a number of wine-shops on the ramparts themselves, and so kept his men, with some difficulty, at their posts (Ael. V. H. iii. 14; Athen. x. p. 442, c.). He may have been the same Leonides whom Athenaeus mentions as a writer on fishing (Athen. i. p. 13, c.).

2. A noble youth, a citizen of Heracleia on the Pontus, was one of those who put to death the tyrant Clearchus, a. c. 353. He is also called Leon. [LEON, No. 1, p. 741, b.]

3. A kinsman of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was entrusted with the main superintendence of Alexander's education in his earlier years, apparently before he became the pupil of Aristotle. Leonidas was a man of austere character, and trained the young prince in hardy and self-denying habits. Thus, he would even examine the chests which contained his pupil's bedding and clothes, to see whether Olympias had placed any thing there that might minister to luxury. There were two excellent cooks (said Alexander afterwards) with which Leonidas had furnished him,—a night's march to season his breakfast, and a scanty breakfast to season his dinner. On one occasion, when Alexander at a sacrifice was throwing large quantities of incense on the fire, "be more sparing of it," said Leonidas, "till you have conquered the country where it grows." Alexander sent him afterwards from Asia 600 talents' weight of incense and myrrh, "that he might no longer be penurious" (so ran the message) "in his offerings to the gods." (Plut. Alex. 22, 25, Reg. et Imp. Apoph. Alex. 4, 9.) It may be questioned whether the rough discipline of Leonidas was not carried further than was altogether beneficial to Alexander's character (see Plut. Alex. 7; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vi. p. 90, note 3).

4. A general of Antigonus, who, in a. c. 320, repressed by a skillful stratagem the revolt of 3000 Macedonians in Lycæonia (Polyæn. iv. 6). It is possible that he may have left the service of Antigonus for that of Ptolemy, in which case he may be identified with the one immediately below.

5. A general of Ptolemy Soter, who sent him in a. c. 310 to dislodge from the maritime towns of Cilicia the garrisons of Antigonus, which, it was alleged, the treaty of the preceding year required him to withdraw. Leonidas was successful at first, but Demetrius Poliocrates, arriving soon after, defeated him and regained the towns (Diod. ix. 19). Suidas tells us (s. v. Διονυσίου δ' Ἀρριδίου) that Ptolemy, after having restored freedom to the Greek cities, left Leonidas in Greece as governor. He may perhaps be referring to Ptolemy's expedition to Greece in a. c. 308, with the professed object of vindicating the liberty of the several states there (see Diod. xx. 37; Plut. Dem. 15), and the name Leonidas may be intended for Cleonidas. But the whole statement in Suidas is singularly confused. [E. E.]

LEO/NIDAS or LEO/NIDES, literary. 1. Of Tarentum, the author of upwards of a hundred epigrams in the Doric dialect. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager. In Brunck's Anthologia, some of the epigrams ascribed to Leonidas of Tarentum belong properly to Leonidas of Alexandria; and on the other hand, some, which are found in other parts of the Anthology, should be restored to Leonidas of Tarentum. Jacobs (Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. pp. 909, 910) points out the necessary corrections; and Meineke (Dellect. Poet. Anth. Græc. pp. 24—52) has re-edited and re-arranged the epigrams of this writer, the number of which he makes 108. The epigrams are chiefly inscriptions for dedicatory offerings and works of art, and though not of a very high order of poetry, are usually pleasing, ingenious, and in good taste. Bernhardt not unhappily characterises them as being "in a sharp lapidary style" (Græciv. d. Græc. Litt. vol. ii. p. 1055). All that we know of the poet's date is collected from his epigrams, and the indications are not very certain. He seems, however, to have lived in the time of Pylæus (Jacobs, l. c.). From one of the epigrams ascribed to him (No. 100, Br. and Jac., No. 98, Meineke), and which may either have been written after his death, or by himself for his own epitaph, we learn that he was born at Tarentum, and after many wanderings during which the Muses were his chief solace, he died and was buried at a distance from his native land.

2. Of Alexandria, was born, as he informs us (Ep. 8), on the banks of the Nile, whence he went to Rome (Ep. 27), and there taught grammar for a long time without attracting any notice, but ultimately he became very popular, and obtained the patronage of the imperial family. His epigrams show that he flourished under Nero, and probably down to the reign of Vespasian. In the Greek Anthology, forty-three epigrams are ascribed to him, but some of these belong to Leonidas of Tarentum. The epigrams of Leonidas of Alexandria are of a very low order of merit. Several of them are distinguished by the petty conceit of having an equal number of letters in each distich; these are called ισόψηφα ἐπιδίγματα. (Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. pp. 908—909; Meineke, Prolæsis ad Antholog. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 479—480.)

3. Of Byzantium, the son of Metrodorus, the

* It is erroneously stated, in Vol. I. p. 691, that his daughter Cheilonis accompanied him thither. See Plut. Agis, 17.

wrote a work, Aluevurud (Ath. i. p. 13, c.) which is often quoted by Aelian (N. A. ii. 6, 50, iii. 18, iii. 42).

4. A Stoic philosopher of Rhodes (Strab. xiv. p. 655), and perhaps the same as the author of a work on Italy, which is quoted by Tzetzes (Schol. ad Lycoph. 756).

5. The tutor of Cicero's son Marcus, at Athens. (Cic. ad Div. xvi. 21, ad Att. xiv. 16.) [P. S.]

LEONIDAS, a patronus causarum in the tribunal of the praefectus praetorio at Constantinople. He was one of the 16 commissioners appointed to compile the Digest under the presidency of Tribonian. (Const. Tanta, § 9; Const. Δέκυκεν, § 9.) [J. T. G.]

LEONIDAS (Λεωνίδας), a physician who was a native of Alexandria, and belonged to the sect of the Episyndeticis (Pseudo-Galen, Introd. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 684; Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Acut. ii. 1, p. 75). As he is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (l. c.), and himself quotes Galen (op. Al. iv. 2, 11, p. 688), he probably lived in the second and third centuries after Christ. Of his writings, which appear to have chiefly related to surgical subjects, nothing remains but some fragments preserved by Aëtius (pp. 241, 397, 686, 687, 688, 689, 691, 692, 736, 741, 743, 799, 800, 802) and Paulus Aegineta (iv. 59, p. 534, v. 32, 44, 64, 67, 78, pp. 562, 569, 578, 580, 585), from which we may judge that he was a skilful practitioner. [W. A. G.]

LEONIDAS, artista. 1. A painter, of Antioch, and a disciple of the great painter Euphranor. (Steph. Bys. s. v. Ἀντιόχειν; Eustath. ad Hom. ii. 508.)

2. An architect, of little note, who wrote upon proportions (Vitruv. vii. praef. § 14). [P. S.]

LEONNATUS (Λεωννάτος). 1. A Macedonian of Pella, one of Alexander's most distinguished officers. His father's name is variously given, as Antea, Anthes, Onasus, and Eunus. (Arrian. Anab. iii. 5, § 7, vi. 28, § 6, Ind. 18, ap. Phot. p. 69, s. ed. Bekker). According to Curtius he was descended from a royal house (Curt. x. 7), which may be the reason we find him early occupying a distinguished post about the person of Philip of Macedon; at the time of whose death (B.C. 336) he was one of the select officers called the king's body guards (σωματοφύλακες). In this capacity he is mentioned as one of those who avenged the death of Philip upon his assassin Pausanias. (Diod. xvi. 94.) Though he accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, he did not at first hold an equally distinguished position in the service of the young king; he was only an officer of the ordinary guards (τρίαινα) when he was sent by Alexander after the battle of Issus to announce to the wife of Darius the tidings of her husband's safety. (Arr. Anab. ii. 12, § 7; Curt. iii. 12; Diod. xvii. 37; Plut. Alex. 21.) Shortly after, however, during Alexander's stay in Egypt (B.C. 331), Leonnatus was appointed to succeed Arrhybas as one of the seven σωματοφύλακες (Arr. Anab. iii. 5, vi. 28), and from this time forward his name continually occurs, together with those of Hephaestion, Perdicaea, and Ptolemy, among the officers immediately about the king's person, or employed by him on occasions requiring the utmost confidence. Thus we find him making one of the secret council appointed to inquire into the guilt of Philotas; present at the quarrel between Alexander and Cleitus, and attempting in vain to check the fury of the king; vol. II.

keeping watch over Alexander's tent at the time of the conspiracy of the pages; and even venturing to excite his resentment by ridiculing the Persian custom of prostration. (Curt. vi. 8, § 17, viii. 1, § 46, 6, § 22; Arr. Anab. iv. 12, § 3.) Nor were his military services less conspicuous; in B.C. 327 he is mentioned as taking a prominent part in the attack on the hill fort of Chorieneia, and was wounded at the same time with Ptolemy and Alexander himself, in the first engagement with the barbarian tribes of the vale of the Choëis. On a subsequent occasion he led one division of the army to the attack of one of the strong positions which the Indian mountaineers had occupied; but his most distinguished exploit was in the assault on the city of the Malli, where Alexander's life was only saved by the personal courage and prowess of Leonnatus and Peucestas. (Arr. Anab. iv. 21, 23, 24, vi. 10; Curt. viii. 14, § 15, ix. 5.) We next find him commanding the division of cavalry and light-armed troops which accompanied the fleet of Alexander down the Indus, along the right bank of the river. During the subsequent march from thence back to Persia, he was left with a strong force in the country of the Oreitae, to enforce the submission of that tribe and maintain the communications with the fleet under Nearchus. These objects he successfully accomplished; and the Oreitae and neighbouring barbarians having assembled a large army, he totally defeated them with heavy loss. As a reward for these various services, he was selected by Alexander as one of those whom he honoured with crowns of gold during his stay at Susa, B.C. 325. (Arr. Anab. vi. 18, 20, 22, vii. 5, Ind. 23, 42; Curt. ix. 10.)

Leonnatus thus held so conspicuous a place among the Macedonian generals, that in the first deliberations which followed the death of Alexander, it was proposed to associate him with Perdicaea, as one of the guardians of the infant king, the expected child of Roxana. (Curt. x. 9, § 3; Justin. xiii. 2.) In the arrangements ultimately adopted however, he obtained only the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia (Arrian. ap. Phot. p. 69, b; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, a; Diod. xviii. 3; Curt. x. 10, § 2; Justin. xiii. 4.), a share which was far from contenting his ambition, though he thought fit to acquiesce for the time. But hardly had he arrived to take possession of his government, when he received an urgent message from Antipater, calling on him for assistance against the revolted Greeks. Nearly at the same time also arrived letters from Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, urging him to aid her against Antipater, and offering him her hand in marriage. Leonnatus immediately determined to avail himself of the double opportunity thus presented to his ambition; first to assist Antipater against the Greeks, and after having freed him from that danger, to expel him in his turn from Macedonia, marry Cleopatra, and seat himself upon the throne. With these views (for which he in vain endeavoured to obtain the support of Eumenes) he crossed over into Europe at the head of a considerable army, and advanced into Thessaly to the relief of Antipater, who was at this time blockaded in Lania by the combined forces of the Greeks (B.C. 322). He was met by the Athenians and their allies under Antiphus, and a pitched battle ensued, in which, though the main army of the Macedonians suffered but little, their cavalry, commanded by Leonnatus in person, was totally defeated, and he himself fell, covered with wounds, after displaying in the combat his accustomed valour. (Diod. xviii. 12, 14, 15; Plut. Eum. 3, Phoc. 25; Justin. xiii. 5.) The only personal traits recorded to us of Leonnatus are his excessive passion for hunting, and his love of magnificence and display, the latter a quality common to most of his brother captains in the service of Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 40; Aelian. V. H. ix. 3; Athen. xii. p. 539.)

2. Another officer in the service of Alexander, a native of Aegae, and son of Antipater. (Arr. Ind. 18.) The anecdote related by Arrian (Anab. iv. 12. § 3.) may perhaps refer to this Leonnatus, rather than the preceding.

3. A Macedonian officer in the service of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who saved the life of that monarch at the battle of Heraclea, B. C. 280. (Plut. Pyrrh. 16; Dionys. Ecc. xviii. 2, 3.) [E. H. B.]

LEONNORIUS, one of the leaders of the Gauls in their invasion of Macedonia and the adjoining countries. When the main body under Brennus marched southwards into Macedonia and Greece (B. C. 279), Leonnorus and Lutarius led a detachment, 20,000 strong, into Thrace, where they ravaged the country to the shores of the Hellespont, compelled the Byzantines to pay them tribute, and made themselves masters of Lysimachia. The rich Asiatic shores of the Hellespont afforded them a tempting prospect; and while Leonnorus returned to Byzantium, in order to compel the inhabitants of that city to give him the means of transporting his troops to Asia, Lutarius contrived to capture a few vessels, with which he conveyed all the force remaining under his command across the Hellespont. While Leonnorus was still before Byzantium, Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, being in want of support in his war with Antiochus, agreed to take him and his troops, as well as those of Lutarius, into his pay, and furnished them with the means of passing over into Asia (B. C. 278). They first assisted him against his rival, Zipoetes, in Bithynia; after which they made plundering excursions through various parts of Asia; and ultimately established themselves in the province, called thenceforth from the name of its barbarian conquerors, Galatia. No further mention is made of either of the leaders after they had crossed into Asia. (Memnon. c. 19, ed. Orell; Liv. xxxviii. 16; Strab. xii. p. 566.) [E. H. B.]

LEONTEUS (Λεοντεύς), a son of Coronus, and prince of the Lapithae. In conjunction with Polypoetes, he led the Lapithae, in 40 ships, against Troy, where he took part in the games at the funeral of Patroclus. (Hom. Il. ii. 745, &c., xii. 130, &c., xxiii. 837, &c.) [L. S.]

LEONTEUS (Λεοντεύς), of Argos, was a tragic poet and the slave of Juba, king of Mauritania, who ridiculed his Hypsipyle in an epigram preserved by Athenaeus (viii. p. 343, c. f.). [P. S.]

LEONTI'ADES (Λεοντιάδης). 1. A Theban, of noble family, commanded at Thermopylae the forces supplied by Thebes to the Grecian army. (Herod. vii. 205; comp. Diod. xi. 4.) They came unwillingly, according to Herodotus, and therefore were retained by Leonidas, rather as hostages than allies, when he sent away the main body of the Greeks. (Herod. vii. 220—222; but see Plut. de Herod. Mal. 31; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. ii. p. 287.) In the battle—a hopeless one for the Greeks—which was fought after the Persians had been conducted over Callidromus, Leontiades and the force under his command surrendered to the enemy and obtained quarter. Herodotus tells us, however, that some of them were nevertheless slain by the barbarians, and that most of the remainder, including Leontiades, were branded as slaves by the order of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 233.) Plutarch contradicts this (de Herod. Mal. 33),—if, indeed, the treatise be his,—and also says that Anaxander, and not Leontiades, commanded the Thebans at Thermopylae. [EURYMACHEUS.]

2. Son of Eurymachus, and grandson, apparently, of the above, was one of the polemarchs at Thebes, in B. C. 382, when the Spartan commander, Phoebidas, stopped there on his way against Olynthus. Unlike Ismenias, his democratic colleague, Leontiades courted Phoebidas from the period of his arrival, and, together with Archias and Philip, the other chiefs of the oligarchical party, instigated him to seize the Cadmeia with their aid. This enterprise having been effected on a day when the women were keeping the Theomophoria in the citadel, and the council therefore sat in or near the agora, Leontiades proceeded to the council and announced what had taken place, with an assurance that no violence was intended to such as remained quiet. Then, asserting that his office of polemarch gave him power to apprehend any one under suspicion of a capital offence, he caused Ismenias to be seized and thrown into prison. Archias was forthwith appointed to the office thus vacated, and Leontiades went to Sparta and persuaded the Lacedaemonians to sanction what had been done. Accordingly, they sent commissioners to Thebes, who condemned Ismenias to death, and fully established Leontiades and his faction in the government under the protection of the Spartan garrison. (Xen. Hell. v. ii. §§ 25—36; Diod. xv. 20; Plut. Ages. 23, Pelop. 5, de Gen. Soc. 2.) In this position, exposed to the hostility and machinations of some 400 democratic exiles, who had taken refuge at Athens (Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 31), Leontiades, watchful, cautious, and energetic, presented a marked contrast to Archias, his voluptuous colleague, whose reckless and insolent profligacy he discountenanced, as tending obviously to the overthrow of their joint power. His unscrupulousness, at the same time, was at least equal to his other qualifications for a party-leader; for we find him sending emissaries to Athens to remove the chief of the exiles by assassination, though Androcleidas was the only one who fell a victim to the plot. In B. C. 379, when the refugees, associated with Pelopidas, had entered on their enterprise for the deliverance of Thebes, Pelopidas himself, with Cephisodorus, Democleidas, and Phylidas, went to the house of Leontiades, while Mellon and others were dealing with Archias. The house was closed for the night, and it was with some difficulty that the conspirators gained admittance. Leontiades met them at the door of his chamber, and killed Cephisodorus, who was the first that entered; but, after an obstinate struggle, he was himself despatched by Pelopidas. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 1—7; Plut. Pol. 6, 11, Ages. 24, de Gen. Soc. 4, 6, 31; Diod. xv. 25.) It may be remarked that Plutarch calls him, throughout, Leontidas (Schn. ad Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 25). [E. E.]

LEONTISCUS (Λεοντίσκος), a son of Polioxy Soter, by the celebrated Athenian courtesan, Thais. He was taken prisoner by Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great sea fight off Cyprus (B. C.

366), together with his uncle, Menelaus, but was immediately restored to his father without ransom. (Athen. xiii. p. 576; Justin. xv. 2.) [E. H. B.]

LEONTISCUS, a painter of the Sicynian school, contemporary with Aratus, whose portrait he painted, with a trophy (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 35). It seems almost idle to inquire which of the victories of Aratus this picture was intended to celebrate. Harduin quotes Plutarch (Arat. 38, fol.), as making it probable that the victory referred to was that over Aristippus, the tyrant of Argos. This would place the painter's date about B. C. 235. [P. S.]

LEONTION, a Greek painter, contemporary with Aristides of Thebes (about A. C. 340), who painted his portrait. Nothing further is known of him (Plin. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 19). [P. S.]

LEONTIUM (Λεόντιον), an Athenian hetæra, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus. She wrote a treatise against Theophrastus, which Cicero characterises as written scito quidem sermone et Attico. According to Pliny (Præf.) the audacity of the attempt gave rise to the proverb suspensio arborem rigere. Pliny mentions a painting of her by Theodorus, in which she was represented in a meditative attitude. Among her numerous lovers we also find mentioned Metrodorus, the disciple of Epicurus, and Hermesianax of Colophon. She had a daughter, Danae, who was also an hetæra of some notoriety. (Diog. Laërt. x. 4; Athen. xiii. p. 588, a. b. 593, b. 597, a; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 33; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11.) [C. P. M.]

LEONTIUS I., a Syrian, and an officer of reputation, joined Illus in rebelling against Zeno, the emperor of Constantinople. Leontius was proclaimed emperor in A. D. 482, and was taken prisoner and put to death at Constantinople in A. D. 483. The history of this rebellion is given under ILLUS and ZENO.

LEONTIUS II. (Λεόντιος), emperor of Constantinople (A. D. 695–698), deposed and succeeded the emperor Justinian II. towards the end of A. D. 695. He appears first in history as commander of the imperial troops against the Maronites, in which capacity he gave cause for suspicion, and accordingly after his return to Constantinople, he was put into prison. His popularity, however, was so great, that the emperor did not dare to give him a fair trial, but kept him in confinement during three years, when, at last, he released him on condition of his leaving the capital, and taking the supreme civil and military command in Greece. Leontius was on the point of sailing from the Golden Horn, when the people, exasperated by the tyranny of Justinian, rose in rebellion, in consequence of which Justinian was deposed, and Leontius raised to the imperial dignity. The particulars of this revolution are given in the life of Justinian II. In the first year of the reign of Leontius the empire enjoyed universal peace, as Theophanes says, except, however, at Ravenna, where a frivolous riot caused much destruction and bloodshed. In the second year of his reign (697) an event occurred which is of the greatest importance in the history of Italy, as well as of all Europe and the East. Until that year Venice had belonged to the Byzantine empire, forming part of the government of Istria; but its advantageous position, and the independent and enterprising spirit of its inhabitants, had raised it to such importance and wealth, that its ruin was certain, if it remained any longer exposed to the consequences of the numerous court-revolutions at Constantinople. The Venetians, accordingly, resolved upon forming an independent government, and in 697 chose Paulus Lucas Anafestus, commonly called Paoluccio, their first sovereign duke or doge. It seems, however, that this change took place with the connivance of the Byzantine government, for during many years afterwards friendly relations were kept up between Venice and Constantinople. In the same year, 697, the Arabs set out for their fifth invasion of Africa; and, after having defeated the Greeks in many engagements, their commander, Hasan, took Carthage. He lost it again, but retook it in the following year, 698. In order to expel the Arabs from the capital of Africa, Leontius sent reinforcements to the Patrician Joannes, the commander-in-chief in Africa, who succeeded in forcing the entrance of the harbour, but was beaten back again, and compelled to a shameful flight. Carthage now was destroyed by the Arabs, and has since disappeared from among the cities of the world. Joannes sailed for Constantinople in order to obtain a re-inforcement, and try another chance. His land and sea forces were both equally mortified at the disgraceful result of the expedition; and Absimar, one of their leaders, persuaded them that they would suffer for a defeat of which the commander-in-chief was the only cause. His words took effect; a mutiny broke out when the fleet was off Crete; Joannes was put to death by the exasperated soldiers; and Absimar was proclaimed emperor. The surprise of Leontius was extreme when he saw his fleet return to the harbour of Constantinople, and, instead of saluting him, raise the standard of rebellion. Absimar, having bribed the guards on the water side, entered the city without resistance, and seized upon the person of Leontius, who was treated by the usurper as he had treated his predecessor Justinian Rhinotmetus, for the captive emperor had his nose and ears cut off, and was confined in a convent, where he finished his days. The deposition of Leontius and the accession of Absimar, who adopted the name of Tiberius, took place in 698. [TIBERIUS.] (Theoph. p. 309, &c.; Cedren. p. 443, &c.; Niceph. p. 26; Const. Manasses, p. 80; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 94, 95; Glycas, p. 279; Paul. Diacon. vi. 10–14.) [W. P.]

LEONTIUS (Λεόντιος), literary. 1. Of ANTIOCH. Leontius was born in Phrygia, and was a disciple of the martyr Lucianus; and having entered the church was ordained presbyter. In order to enjoy without scandal the society of a young female, Eustolius or Eustolia, to whom he was much attached, he mutilated himself; but, notwithstanding, did not escape suspicion, and was deposed from his office. On the deposition, however, of Stephanus or Stephen, bishop of Antioch, he was by the favour of the Emperor Constantius and the predominant Arian party appointed to that see, about 348 or 349. He was one of the instructors of the heresiarch Aëtius [ARTIUS], to whom, according to Philostorgius, he expounded the writings of the prophets, especially Ezekiel; but, after appointing him deacon, he was compelled by the opposite party under Diodorus [DIONORUS, No. 3] and Flavian [FLAVIANUS, No. 1] to silence and depose him. Leontius died about A. D. 358.

Of his writings, which were numerous, nothing remains except a fragment of what Cave describes, we know not on what authority, as Oratio in Passionem S. Babylae, which is cited in the Paschal Chronicle in the notice of the Decian persecution. In this fragment Leontius distinctly asserts that both the Emperor Philip, the Arabian, and his wife, were avowed Christians. (Socrat. H. E. ii. 26; Sozomen, H. E. iii. 20; Theodoret. H. E. ii. 10, 24; Philostorg. H. E. iii. 15, 17, 18; Athanas. Apolog. de Fuga sua, c. 26, Hist. Arianor. ad Monachos, c. 28, Chron. Pasch. vol. i. pp. 270, 289, ed. Paris, pp. 216, 231, ed. Venice, pp. 503, 535, ed. Bonn; Cave, Historia Litteraria, vol. i. p. 211, ed. Oxon. 1740—43; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. 324.)

2. Of ARABISSUS, in Cappadocia, of which town he was bishop, an ecclesiastical writer of uncertain date. Photius has noticed two of his works:—1. Εἰς τὴν κτίσιν λόγος, Sermo de Creatione; and 2. Εἰς τὸν Ἀδάμαν, De Lazaro; and gives a long extract from the former, and a shorter extract from the latter. (Photius, Cod. 272; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 551; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 324, vol. x. pp. 268, 771.)

3. Of ARELATE or ARLES, was bishop of that city about the middle of the fifth century. Several letters were written to him by Pope Hilarius (A. D. 461)—467) which are given in the Concilia: and a letter of Leontius to the pope (dated A. D. 462) is given in the Spicilegium of D'Achéry (vol. v. p. 578 of the original edition, or vol. iii. p. 302, in the edition of De La Barre, fol. Paris, 1723), and in the Concilia. Leontius presided in a council at Arles, held about A. D. 475, to condemn an error into which some bad fallen respecting the doctrine of predestination. He appears to have died in A. D. 484. He is mentioned by Sidonius Apollinarius. (Sidon. Apollin. Epist. vii. 6, Concilia, vol. iv. col. 1039, 1044, 1041*, 1828, ed. Labbe; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 449; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 324, vol. xii. p. 653, Bibl. Med. et Infim. Latinitatis, vol. v. p. 268, ed. Mansi; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xvi. p. 38.)

4. BURDEGALENSIS or OF BORDEAUX. [No. 16.]

5. Of BYZANTIUM or CONSTANTINOPLE, an ecclesiastical writer of the latter part of the sixth and the commencement of the seventh century, sometimes designated, from his original profession, SCHOLASTICUS, i. e. the pleader. Several works of about the same period bear the name of Leontius, distinguished by the surnames of BYZANTINUS, PRESBYTER CONSTANTINOPOLITANUS, CYPRIUS, HIROSOLYMITANUS, MONACHUS, NEAPOLITANUS, and PRESBYTER et ABBAS ST. SABAE; and as there is difficulty in determining how many individuals are designated by these various epithets, and which of the various works ascribed to them should be assigned to each, it will be desirable to compare the present article, which refers to the author of the work De Sectis, with Nos 20 and 26.

According to Cave, Leontius, having given up the exercise of his profession as a scholasticus, retired to the monastery which had been founded by St. Saba near Jerusalem, but was rejected by that saint for his adherence to the obnoxious tenets of Origen. But Cave is manifestly in error, and has confounded two different persons of the same name and place. The Leontius of Byzantium, who was excluded by St. Saba for Origenism, died in the reign of the emperor Justinian I. (Cyril. Seythopolit. Vita S. Sabae, c. 86, apud Coteler. Eccles.

Græc. Monum. vol. iii. p. 366), but the work De Sectis appears from internal evidence to have been written at least half a century after Justinian's death, and must therefore be the work of a later Leontius. Photius (cod. 231) and Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. xviii. 48) call the author of the De Sectis a monk, and do not notice his earlier profession. Galland (Bibl. Patrum, vol. xii. Prolog. c. 20) says that Leontius retired from the bar, and embraced a monastic life in Palestine; but we apprehend this is only a supposition, intended to account for the designation HIROSOLYMITANUS in the title of some of the works, which he ascribes to this Leontius. Oudin, who is disposed to identify several of the Leontii, supposes that the ex-scholasticus became a monk and abbot of St. Saba (comp. No. 26), near Jerusalem. (De Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. i. col. 1462, &c.)

The works which appear to be by this Leontius are as follows:—1. Σχόλια, Scholia, "taken down from the lips of Theodorus, the most godly abbot and wisest philosopher, accomplished alike in sacred and profane learning." This work, which is more commonly cited by the title De Sectis, consists of ten divisions called ὑπόθεσις, Actiones: it was first published with a Latin version by Leuclavius, in a volume containing several other pieces, 8vo. Basel, 1578, and was reprinted in the Auctarium Bibliothecae Patrum of Ducaeus, vol. i. fol. Paris, 1624; in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xi. fol. Paris, 1644; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. xii. p. 625, &c., fol. Venice, 1778. The Latin version alone is given in several other editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. 2. Contra Eutychianos et Nestorianos Lalri Tres. s. Consultatio utriusque Factionis inter se contrariae: some speak of the three books into which this treatise is divided as distinct works. 3. Liber adversus eos qui profertur nobis quaedam Apollinarii, fulao in scripta notus Sanctorum Patrum a. Adversus Fraudem Apollinariorum. 4. Solutiones Argumentationum Severi. 5. Dubitationes hypotheticæ et definicæ contra eos qui negant in Christo post Unionem duas esse Naturas. These pieces have not been printed in the original, but Latin versions from the paper of Franciscus Turrianus were published by Canisius in his Lectiones Antiquæ, vol. iv. (or vol. i. p. 525, &c. ed. Basnage), and were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. ix. fol. Lyon, 1677, and in the above mentioned volume of the Bibliotheca of Galland. 6. Apologia Concilii Chalcedonensis. This was printed with a Latin version and notes, by Antonio Bongiovanni, in the Concilia, vol. vii. p. 799, ed. Mansi, fol. Florence, 1762, and was reprinted by Galland, l. c. In the title Leontius is called Monachus Hierosolymitanus, but the word Hierosolymitanus is possibly an error of the transcriber. At any rate Galland identifies the writer with our Leontius; and the subject of the work makes it probable that he is right. 7. Adversus Eutychianos (s. Severianos) et Nestorianos, in octo libros distinctum. This work is described by Canisius as being extant in MS. at Munich, and by Fabricius as occurring in the catalogue of the Palatine library. 8. Liber de Duplici Nature in Christo contra Haeresin Monophysitarum. Labbe and Cave speak of this as extant in MS. at Vienna; and they add to it Disputatio contra Pseudo-phosphum Ariarum, but this last piece seems to be an extract from Gelasius of Cyzicus (GELASIVS No. 3), and is probably one of the discussions between the "holy bishops" of the orthodox party and the "philosophers" who embraced the opposite side. If so, the Leontius who took part in it was not our Leontius, but a much older person, bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, contemporary of Athanasius, by whom he is mentioned, and author of several works not now extant. 9. According to Nicephorus Callisti (l. c.), our Leontius wrote also "an admirable work" in thirty books, in which he entirely overthrew the tritheistic heresy of Joannes Philoponus, and firmly established the orthodox doctrine; but this work, if Nicephorus has correctly described it, is lost.

A homily, entitled Oratio in medium Pentecostem et in Caecum a Nativitate, necnon in illud: Nolite iudicare secundum faciem, by "Leontius presbyter Constantinopolitanus," was published by Combéfié, with a Latin version, in his Auctarium Novum, vol. i. fol. Paris, 1648. The editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. ix. fol. Lyon, 1677), by placing this piece among the works of our Leontius, appear to identify the writer with him; and Cave, though with hesitation, ascribes the homily to him. But it is not given by Galland; and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 321) ascribes the homily to Leontius of Neapolis. [No. 20.] A homily on the parable of the good Samaritan, printed among the supposititious works of Chrysostom (Opera, vol. vii. p. 506, ed. Savill), is ascribed by Allatius and Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. vol. viii. p. 326, vol. x. p. 304) to "Leontius of Jerusalem," who is perhaps the same as our Leontius. There are various homilies extant in MS. by "Leontius presbyter Constantinopolitanus." (Photius and Niceph. Callisti, ll. cc.; Canisius, Vita Leontii, apud Biblioth. Patrum, vol. ix. fol. Lyon, 1677, and Lectiones Antiquae, vol. i. pp. 527, &c., ed. Basnage; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 543; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, lib. iv. c. 18; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 309, &c., 318, vol. xii. p. 648; Oudin, de Scrip. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. i. col. 1462; Mansi, Councils, vol. vii. col. 797, &c.; Galland. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xii. Prolegom. c. 20.)

6. OF BYZANTIUM. According to Labbe (De Byzantinae Historiae Scriptoris Protrepticon; Catalogus Scriptorum, c. 28; and Delineatio Apparatus, Pars II., all prefixed to the Paris edition of the Byzantine historians), the name of Leontius has been given, but with very doubtful correctness, to the otherwise anonymous continuator of the Chronographia of Theophanes. This writer, whatever his name may have been, lived in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenitus [CONSTANTINUS VII.], with whom he was intimate, and who desired him to undertake the work, and supplied him with the materials. The continuation, in its present form, comes down to the second year of Romanus, son and successor of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and probably reached, or was designed to reach, to a later period, for it is imperfect, and breaks off abruptly. But the latter part of the history is an addition by a later hand. In fact the work which is entitled Χρονογραφία, Chronographia, is composed of three parts, by three distinct writers:

1. The History of the Emperors Leo V. the Armenian, Michael II. of Amorium, Theophilus the son of Michael, and Michael III. and Theodora, the son and widow of Theophilus, by the so-called Leontius, from the materials supplied by Constantine Porphyrogenitus; 2. The Life of Basil the Macedonian, by Constantine Porphyrogenitus himself

(though Labbe and Cave would assign this also to Leontius); and 3. The Lives of Leo VI. and Alexander, the sons of Basil, and of Constantine Porphyrogenitus and the commencement of the reign of Romanus II., by an unknown later hand. This third part is more succinct than the former parts, and is in a great degree borrowed, with little variation, from known and existing sources. The first edition of the Chronographia was in the Paris edition of the Byzantine historians. It was prepared for publication by Combéfié, and a Latin version was made by him; but the work was not actually published till 1685, some years after the editor's death. It forms part of the volume entitled ΟΙ ΜΕΡΕΣ ΘΕΟΦΑΝΟΥ, Scriptores post Theophanem, and is in folio. It was again published in the Venetian reprint of that series, fol. A. D. 1729, and again under the editorial care of Bekker, 8vo. Bonn, 1838, with the Latin version of Combéfié. The life of Basil, by Constantine Porphyrogenitus, was printed separately as early as 1653, in the Συμμυρία of Allatius, 8vo. Cologn. [CONSTANTINUS VII.] (Theophan. Continuat. Proem; Labbe, ll. cc.; Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, lib. iv. c. 21; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 681, vol. viii. p. 318; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 90.)

16. LASCIVUS. Ausonius commemorates (Professor. Burdigal. Epigram. vii.) among the teachers of Bordeaux, Leontius, a grammaticus or grammarian, surnamed LASCIVUS, "a name," adds Ausonius, "unworthy of the purity of his life," who had been his friend and companion from early youth. Fabricius is in one place (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 325) inclined to identify with this Leontius of Bordeaux a Leontius MYTHOGRAPHUS, or SCRIPTOR FABULARUM, a writer of some merit, whose works were discovered and designed for publication by Brassicanus; but the design was never executed, and the MS. has been either lost or destroyed. (Not. ad Petronii Arbitri Satyricon, c. 121, p. 572, ed. Burmann, prima, or vol. i. p. 741, ed. secunda.) Gesner also thought he had somewhere read the work of one Leontius in which some of the myths of the poets were related. Sidonius Apollinarius, a generation later than Ausonius, mentions a Pontius Leontius of Bordeaux or the neighbourhood (Epistol. lib. viii. 11, 12), whose castle at the confluence of the Garonne and Dordogne he describes in one of his poems. (Carmin. xxii. Burgus Pontii Leontii.) This Pontius Leontius is by Fabricius in another place (Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 94, note w.) identified with the fabulist of Brassicanus. But the Leontii of Ausonius and Sidonius, however doubtful it may be which (if either) of them is the fabulist, must be distinguished from each other, as well as from two other Leontii, bishops of Bordeaux, mentioned by Venantius Honorius Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers in the sixth century (Carmin. lib. iv. 9, 10); one of whom is especially commemorated by him for his pious care in the restoration of ruined churches, and the founding of new ones. (Carmin. lib. i. passim.) Burmann identifies, but without any apparent reason, this Leontius of Venantius with the Pontius Leontius of Sidonius, and supposes the works mentioned by Braconius to have been written by him; but we think the opinion that the fabulist was the Leontius Lascivus of Ausonius is the most probable. (Burmann, l. c.; Fabric. ll. cc., and Bibl. Med. et Infim. Latini. vol. iv. pp. 268, 269.)

17. Mechanicus, a Greek mathematical writer, whose period is not exactly known. He was later, probably much later, than Cladius Ptolemaeus. He wrote his only known work for the gratification of his friend Theodorus, whose fellow-workman in some mechanical pursuit he had been. It is doubted whether this Theodorus was the person of that name to whom Proclus inscribed his treatise De Providentia et Fato; or a later Theodorus, an engineer, who defended Dara in the war between the emperor Justinian I. and the Persian king, Chosroes I. (Procop. de Bell. Persico, ii. 13); more probably it was the latter. Leontius also states that he had constructed a sphere or celestial globe, after the description of Aratus, for an Elpidius, who was perhaps the Elpidius sent by the emperor Maurice (A. D. 583) on an embassy to the Chagan of the Avars. (Theophan. Chronog. p. 214, ed. Paris, p. 170, ed. Venice, vol. i. p. 390, ed. Bonn.) It may then be considered that Leontius lived in the reign of Justinian and his successors, in the latter part of the sixth century. Leontius wrote a dissertation, which has come down in an imperfect form, Περὶ παρασκευῆς Ἀπαραλῶ σφαίρας, De Constructione Sphaerae Arati, commonly prefixed to the Scholia on the Phaenomena of Aratus, which are, though incorrectly, ascribed to Theon. The dissertation of Leontius has been several times printed. It is included in the collection of ancient astronomical treatises published by Aldus, fol. Venice, 1499; and in the Astronomica Veterum Scripta Isagogica, 8vo. in Officina Sanctandrea, 1589; and in the following editions of Aratus, 4to. Basel, 1536, 4to. Paris, 1540 and 1559; and that of Buhle, 2 vols. 8vo. Leipzig, 1793—1801. (Buhle, Proleg. in Arati Opera; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 94, &c., vol. viii. p. 326.)

19. MYTHOGRAPHUS. [No. 16.]

20. OF NEAPOLIS (or of HAGIOPOLIS, according to his own authority, cited by Cave) in Cyprus. He was bishop of that city, which Le Quien (Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 1061) identifies with the Nova Lemissa, or Nemissus, or Nemosia, which rose out of the ruins of Amathus. Baronius, Possevino, and others, call Leontius bishop of Salamis or Constantia; but in the records of the Second Nicene, or Seventh General Council, held A. D. 787, Actio iv. (Concilia, vol. vii. col. 236, ed. Labbe; vol. iv. col. 193, ed. Hardouin, vol. viii. col. 884, ed. Coleti, and vol. xiii. col. 44, ed. Mansi), he is expressly described as bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus. His death is said to have occurred in A. D. 620 or 630. His principal works are as follows: 1. Λόγοι ὑπὲρ τῆς Χριστιανῶν ἀρακολίας κατὰ Ἰουδαίων καὶ περὶ εἰκόνων τῶν ἁγίων, Sermones pro Defensionem Christianorum contra Judaeos ac de Imaginibus Sanctis. A long extract from the fifth of these Sermones was read at the second Nicene Council (Concilia, l. c.), among the testimonies of the fathers in support of the use of images in worship; and several passages, most of them identical with those cited in the council, are given by Joannes Damascenus in his Oratio III. de Imaginibus (Opera, vol. i. p. 373, &c. ed. Le Quien). A Latin version of another portion of one of these discourses of Leontius is given in the Lectiones Antiquae of Canisius. (Vol. i. p. 793, ed. Bamae.) 2. Βίος τοῦ ἁγίου ἱεροῦ ἀρχιεπισκόπου Ἀλεξανδρείας τοῦ Ἐλεμωσίου, Vita Sancti Joannis Archiepiscopi Alexandriae Cognomento Eleemosii a. Eleemosynarii. This John of Alexandria died A. D. 616 [JOANNES, No. 55]; and his life by Leontius, which was mentioned in the second Nicene council (Concilia, vol. cit. col. 246, Labbe, 202, Hardouin, 896, Coleti, 53, Mansi), is extant in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna. An ancient Latin version by Anastasius Bibliothecarius is given by Rosweid (De Vita Patrum, part i). Surius (De Probatis Sanctorum Vita), and Bollandus (Acta Sanctorum. Januar. vol. ii. p. 498, &c.). The account of St. Vitalis or Vitalius given in the Acta Sanctorum of Bollandus (Januar. vol. i. p. 702) is a Latin version of a part of this life of Joannes Eleemosynarius. 3. Βίος τοῦ ἁγίου Συμεὼν τοῦ σαλοῦ, Vita Sancti Symeonis Simplici, or Bios καὶ πολιτεία τοῦ δεσπ. Συμεὼν τοῦ διὰ Χριστοῦ ἐπονομαζέμενος Ζαλοῦ, Vita et Conversatio Abbatis Symeonis qui cognominatus est Sitalis propter Christum, also mentioned in the Nicene council (l. c.), and published in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (Julii, vol. i. p. 136, &c.), with a Latin version different from that which had been previously published by Surius (De Probatis Sanctorum. Vita, A. D. 1. Julii), and by Lipomannus. The other published works of Leontius are homilies. 4. Sermo in Symeonem quando Dominus in Ulmas suscepit. 5. In Diem festum medice Pentecostes; both given, with a Latin version, in the Novum Auctarium of Combéfius, vol. i. fol. Paris, 1648. Fabricius adds to these, as given by Combéfius, another homily, In Diem festum medice Pentecostes et in Caecum a Nativitate; necnon in illud: Nolite iudicare secundum faciem; but this homily is said in the title to be by "Leontius presbyter CPolitianus," and has been already noticed. [No. 5.] Compare, however, Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 309. As Leontius of Neapolis is recorded to have written many homilies in honour of saints (ἑγκύμια), and for the festivals of the church (πανηγυρικοὶ λόγοι), especially one on the Transfiguration of our Saviour, it is not unlikely that some of those extant under the name of Leontius of Constantinople may be by him. He wrote also Παράλληλων λόγους β', Parallelorum, a Locorum communium Theologicorum Libri II.; the first book consisted τῶν δέκα, or the other τῶν ἀρδεύων. Turrianus possessed the second book; but whether that or the first is extant we know not: neither has been published. It has been thought that Joannes Damascenus, in his Parallela, made use of those of Leontius. Fabricius, on the authority of some MSS., inserts among the works of Leontius of Neapolis the homily Εἰς τὰ Βαΐα, In Festum (a Ramos) Palmarum, ascribed to Chrysostom, and printed among the doubtful or spurious works in the editions of that father. (Vol. vii. p. 334, ed. Savill, vol. x. p. 767, ed. Montfaucun, or vol. x. p. 915, and vol. xiii. p. 354, in the recent Parisian reprint of Montfaucun's edition.) Maldonatus (ed. Joan. vii.) mentions some MS. Commentarii de Joannem by Leontius; and an Oratio in laudem

S. Epiphani is mentioned by Theodore Studita in his Antirheticus Secundus, ap. Simond. Opera, vol. v. p. 130. (Concilia, II. cc.; Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. vol. viii. p. 320, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 550; Ondin, De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, vol. i. col. 1575, &c.; Vossius, de Historiis Græciæ, lib. ii. c. 23; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 1062; Acta Sanctor. Jul. vol. i. p. 131.)

21. PHILOSOPHUS, or SOPHISTA, father of Athanasia, afterwards called Eudocia, wife of the emperor Theodosius the younger. [EUDOCIA, No. 1.]

23. PILATUS, or PYLATUS, a Greek of Thessalonica, and a disciple of Barlaam. Boccacio met him at Venice and persuaded him to give up his intention of visiting Rome, and to go to Florence, where, through Boccacio's interest, he obtained the appointment of public teacher, with a salary. He was for some time (apparently for three years) the guest of Boccacio, to whom he gave private lessons in Homer. Boccacio has given a curious description of the person and manners of Leontius; he ascribes to him a thorough acquaintance with Greek literature, and an inexhaustible fund of information on Grecian history, mythology, and arts. He does not appear to have written anything; but Boccacio, in his Περί γενεαλογίας Δοκμών, has repeatedly cited the remarks which he had heard Leontius make. His wandering disposition led him to leave Florence; and his subsequent history appears to be unknown. (Boccacio, De Genealog. Doct. xv. 6, 7.)

24. PORTA. [No. 27.]

25. PRESBYTER. [Nos. 5 and 26.]

26. OF ST. SABA. Surius has given (De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis, a. d. 22 Nov.), professedly from Symeon Metaphrastes, an interpolated Latin version of a life of St. Gregory of Agrigentum, by Leontius, presbyter and abbot of St. Saba. The Greek original, which is extant in MS., bears the title *Ασκήσις πρεσβυτέρου καὶ ἡγουμένου τῆς μονῆς τοῦ ὁσίου Σάβα τῆς Ῥωμαίων πόλεως ἐκ βίου καὶ θαύματα τοῦ ὁσίου Πατρός ἡμῶν Γρηγορίου τοῦ Ἀκαργαυρίνου, Λεοντίου Πρεσβυτέρου καὶ Ἀββῶτος Κοσμοῦ Σ. Σάβας (utris Romæ, sc. Novæ a. CPolæ) Liber de Vita et Miraculis S. Patris nostri Gregorii Agrigentini. If the expression "Urbs Romæ" is correctly referred to Leontius, it furnishes an argument for identifying him with Leontius of Byzantium [No. 5], who, in that case, must have embraced a monastic life in the monastery of St. Saba, near Jerusalem. (Surius, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 322; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. 1. p. 12.)*

27. SCHOLASTICUS, a Greek of Constantinople, author of various epigrams contained in the Anthologia Græca, among which is one Εἰς εὐκλεῖα Γαβριὴλ ἐν ὁσίου ἐν Βυζαντίῳ (vol. ii. p. 634, ed. Jacobs), in honour of Gabriel, who was prefectus urbi under the emperor Justinian I. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 480, vol. vii. p. 309, note dd. and p. 327.)

28. SOPHISTA. [See No. 21.] There was a Leontius, a friend of Libanius, to whom many of his letters are addressed. See the Index in Wolf's edition of the Epistolæ of Libanius.

There were various other Leontii, but none of them of sufficient importance to claim notice. A list of them may be seen in Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 323, &c.; and vol. xi. p. 567. [J. C. M.]

LEONTIUS, jurists. 1. In a constitution of Theodosius II. of a. d. 425, Leontius, a jurist, was named among other professors at Constantinople, and was honoured with a comitatus primi ordinis, a dignity which thenceforth was only to be acquired by 20 years' service. (Cod. Theod. 6. tit. 21. a. un.) Perhaps he was the first legal professor at Constantinople, for in former constitutions no jurist is named among the professors (Cod. Theod. 13. tit. 3. a. 16, 17); but shortly after the appointment of Leontius, a second professorship of law was added (Cod. Just. 11. tit. 18. a. un. § 1.)

Of this Leontius we know no more, unless he be the same person who ten years afterwards is named in several constitutions prefect of Constantinople. (Cod. Theod. 14. tit. 16. a. 3; ib. 6. tit. 28. a. 8; ib. 16. tit. 5. a. ult.) this being a dignity to which we know that Themistius the sophist, and other professors of arts, sometimes aspired. (Jac. Gothofred ad Cod. Theod. 14. tit. 9. a. 8, and vol. ii. p. 114, ed. Ritter; Heineccius, Hist. Jur. Rom. § 380. a.; Zimmern, R. R. G. vol. i. § 69.)

2. A jurist, was the father of a jurist named Patricius, and succeeded another Patricius. All the three were probably professors of law at Berytus. (Const. Δέδοκεν, § 9.) From Cod. 1. tit. 17. a. 9, it appears that he preceded those distinguished ancestors of Anatolius, who "optimam sui memoriam in legibus reliquerunt," by which expression Justinian probably means to refer to useful commentaries on the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian Codes. In the passage cited from the Code he is mentioned with the titles "virum gloriosissimum prefectorium consularum."

3. A jurist, perhaps of the same family with No. 2, but of subsequent date. He was the son of the jurist Eudoxius, and the father of Anatolius, professor of law at Berytus, and one of the compilers of the Digest. This Leontius was one of that distinguished race to whom the expression of Justinian, explained in the preceding article, applies (Const. Tanta, § 9); and from Const. Δέδοκεν, § 9, it may be inferred that, like his father and his son, he was professor of law at Berytus.

4. A prefectus praetorio under the emperor Anastasius, the predecessor of Justinian. (Lydus, de Magist. iii. 17.) An edict of his appears in the collection of Edicta Praefectorum Praetorio, published by C. E. Zachariae. (Anecdota, p. 273, fol. Lips. 1843.)

5. Is the second person named in the commission of ten, who were appointed to compile the first Constitutionum Codex of Justinian. In Const. Summa Reipublicae, § 2, he appears with the titles "vir eminentissimus, magister militum, consularis atque patricius." He was not subsequently employed in the emperor's legal compilations.

6. A patronus causarum in the tribunal of the prefectus praetorio at Constantinople. He was one of the 16 commissioners appointed to compile the Digest, under the presidency of Tribonian. (Const. Tanta, § 9, Const. Δέδοκεν § 9.) Some of the different jurists named Leontius are confounded by Panciroli, de Clar. Interp. Jur. p. 63. [J. T. G.]

LEONTIUS, a physician, saint, and martyr, who was probably of Arabian origin, but born at Vicentia in Venetia, in the third century after Christ. He afterwards removed to Aquileia in Venetia, where, in company with St. Carpophorus, who was either his brother or intimate friend, he distinguished himself by his zeal in favour of (Christianity. For this offence they were brought before the governor Lysias, and after being tortured in various modes, and (according to the legend) miraculously delivered, they were at last beheaded, probably A. D. 300. Their memory is celebrated by the Romish church, on August 20th. See the Acta Sanctorum (in Aug. 20), where several difficulties are critically discussed at length. [W.A.G.]

LEONYMUS. [ΑΥΤΟΛΟΝ.]

LEOPHANES (Λεοφάνης), a Greek physician or physiologist, who must have lived in or before the fourth century, B. C., as he is quoted by Aristotle (De Gener. Anim. iv. 1. § 22) and Theophrastus (De Caus. Plant. ii. 4. § 12). The passage of Aristotle, which relates to the supposed method of generating male and female children, is alluded to by Plutarch (De Placit. Philos. v. 7) and Pseudo-Galen (Histor. Philos. c. 32, vol. xix. p. 324) in both of which places he is called Cleophanes. The same opinion (or rather, if the passage in Aristotle be correct, exactly the contrary) is to be found in the treatise "De Superfœtatione," which forms part of the Hippocratic collection (vol. i. p. 476), and this has made M. Littré attribute the work in question to Leophanes, though perhaps without sufficient reason. (Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 379, &c.) [W. A. G.]

LEOPHON, artist. [LOPHON.]

LEOPHRON (Λεόφρων), son of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Exc. xix. 4, p. 2359, ed. Reiske.), he succeeded his father in the sovereign power; it is therefore probable that he was the eldest of the two sons of Anaxilas, in whose name Micythus assumed the sovereignty, and who afterwards, at the instigation of Hieron of Syracuse, dispossessed the latter of his authority. Diodorus, from whom we learn these facts, does not mention the name of either of the young princes. According to the same author, their reign lasted six years (B. C. 467—461), when they were expelled by a popular insurrection both from Rhegium and Zancle. (Diod. xi. 48, 66, 76.) Leophron is elsewhere mentioned as carrying on war against the neighbouring city of Locri, and as displaying his magnificence at the Olympic games, by feasting the whole assembled multitude. His victory on that occasion was celebrated by Simonides. (Justin. xxi. 3; Athen. i. p. 3.) [E. H. B.]

LEOS (Λεός), one of the heroes eponymi of the Athenians. He is said to have been a son of Orpheus, and the phyle of Leontis derived its name from him. (Phot. s. v.; Suid. s. v.; Paus. i. 5, § 2, x. 10. § 1.) Once, it is said, when Athens was suffering from famine or plague, the Delphic oracle demanded that the daughters of Leos should be sacrificed, and the father's merit was that he complied with the command of the oracle. The maidens were afterwards honoured by the Athenians, who erected the Leocorium (from Λεός and κόρυς) to them. (Hieronym. in Jovin. p. 185, ed. Mart.; Aelian, V. H. xii. 28; Plut. Thes. 13; Paus. i. 5, § 2; Diod. xv. 17; Demosth. Epitaph. p. 1398; Schol. ad Thucyd. vi. 57.) Aelian calls the daughters of Leos Praxitheia, Theope, and Eubule; and Photius calls the first of them Phasi-thea; while Hieronymus, who mentions only one, states that she sacrificed herself for her country of her own accord. [L. S.]

LEOSTHENES (Λεοσθένης). 1. An Athenian, who commanded a fleet and armament in the Cyclades in B. C. 361. Having allowed himself to be surprised by Alexander, tyrant of Phœne, and defeated, with a loss of 5 triremes and 600 men, he was condemned to death by the Athenians, as a punishment for his ill success. (Diod. xv. 95.)

2. An Athenian, commander of the combined Greek army in the Læmian war. We know not by what means he had obtained the high reputation which we find him enjoying when he first makes his appearance in history: it has been generally inferred, from a passage in Strabo (ix. p. 433), that he had first served under Alexander in Asia; but there seems much reason to believe that this is a mistake, and that Leonnatus is the person there meant. (See Groakurd, Strab. l. c., and comp. Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii. p. 164.)

It is certain that when we first meet with any distinct mention of Leosthenes, he appears as an officer of acknowledged ability and established reputation in war, but a vehement opponent of the Macedonian interest. Shortly before the death of Alexander he had collected together and brought over to Tænarus a large body of the Greek mercenaries that had been disbanded by the different satraps in Asia, according to Alexander's orders. (Paus. i. 1. § 3, 25, § 5 viii. 52. § 5; Diod. xvii. 111.) As soon as the news of the king's death reached Athens, Leosthenes was despatched to Tænarus to engage the services of these troops, 8000 in number: from thence he hastened to Aetolia, and induced that people to join in the war against Macedonia. Their example was followed by the Locrians, Phocians, Dorians, and many of the Thessalians, as well as by several of the states of the Peloponnese; and Leosthenes, who was by common consent appointed commander-in-chief, assembled these combined forces in the neighbourhood of Thermopylae. The Boeotians, who, through fear of the restoration of Thebes, adhered to the Macedonian interest, collected a force to prevent the Athenian contingent from joining the allied army; but Leosthenes hastened with a part of his forces to assist the Athenians, and totally defeated the Boeotian army. Antipater now advanced from the north, but with a force very inferior to that of the confederates: he was defeated in the first action near Thermopylae, and compelled to throw himself into the small town of Lamia. Leosthenes, desirous to finish the war at a blow, pressed the siege with the utmost vigour; but his assaults were repulsed, and he was compelled to resort to the slower method of a blockade. While he was engaged in forming the lines of circumvallation, the besieged made a vigorous sally, in which Leosthenes himself received a blow on the head from a stone, of which he died three days after. (Diod. xviii. 8—13; Paus. i. 25. § 5; Plut. Phoc. 23; Justin. xiii. 5.) His death was felt as a great discouragement to the cause of the allied Greeks; and Pausanias is probably right in regarding it as the main cause of their ultimate failure. Phocion's remark, on the other hand, is well known, that "he was very well fitted for a short course, but not equal to a long one." (Plut. Phoc. 23, de Rep. gerend. 6.) It is certain that Leosthenes gave proofs of no common energy and ability during the short period of his command; and his loss was mourned by the Athenians as a public calamity. He was honoured with a public burial in the Cerameicus, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Hyperides. (Paus. i. 29, § 13; Diod. xviii. 13.) His death took place before the close of the year 323 B.C.: though still quite a young man, it appears that he left children, whose statues were set up by the side of his own in the Peiraena. (Paus. i. 1 § 3.) [E.H.B.]

LEOSTRATIDES, a silver-chaser, who lived at Rome in the time of Pompey the Great, and executed works representing battles and armed men (Plin. H.N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55). The name has been corrupted, in the common editions of Pliny, into Loetus Stratiotes, and the true reading is not quite certain. Thiersch proposes Lystratides (Epoch. pp. 297, 298; comp. Sillig. Catal. Artif. s. v.) [P.S.]

LEOTROPHIDES (Λεωτροφίδης), one of the Athenian dithyrambic poets, whom Aristophanes ridicules (Av. 1405, 6). The meagreness of his person, as well as of his poetry, made him a standing jest with the comic poets. (Schol. in Aristoph. l. c.; Suid. s. v.; Ath. xii. p. 551, a. b.) [P.S.]

LEOTYCHIDES (Λεωτυχίδης, Λευτυχίδης, Herod.). 1. Son of Anaxilaus, of the royal blood of the Eurypontida, and fourth progenitor of No. 2. (Herod. viii. 131.)

2. Son of Menares, and sixteenth of the Eurypontida. Having become king of Sparta, about A.C. 491, on the deposition of Demaratus, through the contrivance of Cleomenes and the collusion of the Delphic oracle [CLEOMENES; DEMARATUS], he accompanied Cleomenes to Aegina, and aided him in seizing the hostages, of whom he had previously attempted to possess himself in vain. (Herod. vi. 65, &c.; Paus. iii. 4.) On the death of Cleomenes, soon after, the Aeginetans complained at Sparta of the detention of their hostages by the Athenians, in whose hands they had been placed, and the Lacedaemonians thereupon decided that Leotychides should be given up, by way of satisfaction, to the complainants. On the proposal, however, of a Spartan named Theasides, it was agreed that Leotychides should proceed to Athens and recover the prisoners; but the men thus detained belonged, doubtless, to the oligarchical party at Aegina, and the Athenians refused to give them up, alleging that they had been placed with them by Cleomenes and Leotychides together, whereas the latter only had come to claim them. The remonstrances of Leotychides, backed though they were by the warning anecdote of the perjury and punishment of GLAUCUS [see above, p. 275, b.], were of no avail, and he returned to Sparta with the object of his mission unaccomplished. (Herod. vi. 85, 86.) In A.C. 479, after the flight of Xerxes, we find Leotychides in command of the Greek fleet at Aegina,—a most unusual appointment for a Spartan king (see Arist. Pol. ii. 9, ed. Bekk.), and hence he advanced as far as Delos; but, in spite of the entreaties of the Chians, fear of the Persians kept him from sailing further eastward, until an embassy from the Samians, and further information doubtless as to the condition and spirit of Ionia, induced him to proceed to Samos to aid the Ionians in their intended revolt. The Persians fled at his approach to Mycale, where their army was stationed. Here they disembarked, and drew up their ships on shore: the Greeks also landed, Leotychides having first called aloud on the Ionians in the enemy's army to aid in the attainment of their own freedom; and in the battle of Mycale, which ensued, the Persians were utterly defeated. (Herod. viii. 131, 132, ix. 90—92, 96—106; Diod. xi. 34; Paus. iii. 7.) Afterwards Leotychides was sent with an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the barbarians in the Persian war. He was uniformly successful in the field, and might have reduced the whole of Thessaly, had he not yielded to the bribes of the Aleuadae. For this he was brought to trial on his return home, and went into exile to Tegea, A.C. 469, where he died. His house at Sparta was razed to the ground. His son, Zeuxidamus, died before his banishment, and he was succeeded on the throne by his grandson, Archidamus II. By a second wife he had a daughter, named Lampito, whom he gave in marriage to Archidamus. (Herod. vi. 71, 72; Paus. iii. 7; Diod. xi. 48; Clinton, F.H. vol. ii. pp. 209, 210.)

3. Fourth in descent from No. 2, was grandson of Archidamus II., and son of Agis II. There was, however, some suspicion that he was in reality the fruit of an intrigue of Alcibiades with Timaea, the queen of Agia, a suspicion which was strengthened (so Pausanias says) by some angry expressions of Agis himself, and also by Timaea's own language, according to Duris and Plutarch. Agis indeed before his death repented of what he had said on the subject, and publicly owned Leotychides for his son. On his father's demise, however, he was excluded from the throne on the above grounds, mainly through the influence of Lysander, and his uncle, Agesilaus II., was substituted in his room. (Paus. iii. 8; Duris, ap. Plut. Ages. 3; Plut. Alc. 23, Lysand. 22; Xen. Ages. 1, Hell. iii. 3. §§ 1—4; Just. v. 2.) [E.E.]

LEPIDA, AEMI'LIA. 1. The daughter of Paulus Aemilius Lepidus, consul A.C. 34 [LEPIDUS, No. 19] and Cornelia, was born in the censorship of her father, A.C. 22. (Propert. iv. 11, 67.) Of her future history nothing is known.

2. The sister of M. Aemilius Lepidus, who was consul A.D. 11. [LEPIDUS, No. 25.] She was descended from L. Sulla and Cn. Pompey, and was at one time destined for the wife of L. Caesar, the grandson of Augustus. She was, however, subsequently married to P. Quirinus, who divorced her, and who, twenty years after the divorce, in A.D. 20, accused her of having falsely pretended to have had a son by him: at the same time she was charged with adultery, poisoning, and having consulted the Chaldaeans for the purpose of injuring the imperial family. Though she was a woman of abandoned character, her prosecution by her former husband excited much compassion among the people; but as Tiberius, notwithstanding his dissimulation, was evidently in favour of the prosecution, Lepida was condemned by the senate, and interdicted from fire and water. (Tac. Ann. iii. 22, 23; Suet. Tib. 49.)

3. The great grand-daughter of Augustus, being the daughter of L. Aemilius Paulus, consul in A.D. 1 [LEPIDUS, No. 22], and Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus. She was married to the emperor Claudius long before his accession to the throne, when he was quite young, but was either divorced or died soon after the marriage. (Suet. Claud. 26.)

4. The daughter of M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul A.D. 6 [LEPIDUS, No. 23], was married to Drusus, the son of Germanicus and Agrippina. [DRUSUS, No. 18.] She was a woman of abandoned character, and frequently made charges against her husband, doubtless with the view of pleasing Tiberius, who hated Drusus. During the lifetime of her father, who was always highly esteemed by Tiberius, she could do much as she pleased; but after she had lost this powerful protection, by his death, in A. D. 33, she was accused in A. D. 36 of having had adulterous intercourse with a slave; and as she could not deny the charge, she put an end to her life. (Tac. Ann. vi. 40.)

LEPIDUS, the name of a celebrated family of the Aemilia gens, which was one of the most ancient patrician gentes. [AEMILIA GENS.] This family first occurs in Roman history at the beginning of the third century before the Christian era, and from that time it became one of the most distinguished in the state. Finally, it became connected by marriage with the imperial house of the Caesars, but disappears towards the end of the first century of the Christian era. The following genealogical table is in some parts conjectural, but these are pointed out in the course of the article. (Comp. Perizonius, Animad. Hist. p. 131; Norinius, Conot. Pis. p. 257, &c.; Eckhel, vol. v. p. 123; Clement Cardinal. Memorie Romane di Antichità, vol. i. p. 182; Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 15; Drumann Gesch. Roms, vol. i. p. 1, &c.)

STEMMA LEPIDORUM.

1. M. Aemilius Lepidus, coa. B. C. 285.

(M. Aemilius Lepidus.)

1. M. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, consul B. C. 285, but whose name only occurs in the Fasti.

2. M. AEMILIUS M. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, probably a grandson of No. 1, was augur and twice consul. He died in the year of the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216; and his three sons exhibited in his honour funeral games which lasted for three days, and in which twenty-two pairs of gladiators fought in the forum. (Liv. xliii. 30.) His first consulship was in B. C. 232, when the agrarian law of C. Flaminius was passed (Polyb. ii. 21; Zonar. viii. p. 401, c); but the date of his second consulship is uncertain. Some have supposed that he was consul suffectus in B. C. 220. (Pighius, ad Ann.)

3. M. AEMILIUS M. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, eldest son of the preceding, was praetor in B. C. 218, when he commanded in Sicily; and in the following year he is spoken of by Livy as praetor in Rome; but we must suppose that in the latter year he was only propraetor. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for B. C. 216. (Liv. xxi. 49, 51, xlii. 9, 33, 35, xxliii. 30.)

4. L. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, brother of No. 3. (Liv. xxliii. 30.)

5. Q. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, brother of Nos. 3 and 4. (Liv. xxliii. 30.)

6. M. or M'. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, praetor B. C. 213. (Liv. xxiv. 43, 44.) In Livy the praenomen is Marcus; but instead of this we ought probably to read Manius; for we find that the M. Aemilius Lepidus who was consul in B. C. 158 is described in the Fastis as M'. f. M'. n.; and as there was another M. Lepidus praetor in B. C. 218 [see No. 3], it is probable that the praetor in 218 was M'. Lepidus, the father of the consul of 158. Marcus was such a well-known praenomen of the Lepidi, that we can easily understand why it should be substituted for the less common one of Manius.

7. M. AEMILIUS M. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, the son of No. 3, was perhaps the Lepidus who is said to have served in the army while still a boy (puer), and to have killed an enemy, and saved the life of a citizen. (Val. Max. iii. 1. § 1.) This event is referred to in the accompanying coin of the Aemilia gens: it bears on the obverse a woman's head, and on the reverse a horseman, with the legend M. LEPIDVS AN. XV. PR. H. O. C. S., that is, M. Lepidus aetatis xv. praetextatus hostem occidit, civem ser-

his province, and consul 187, after two unsuccessful attempts to obtain the latter dignity. In his consulship he was engaged, with his colleague C. Flaminius, in the conquest of the Ligurians; and after the reduction of this people, he continued the Via Flaminia from Ariminum by way of Bononia to Placentia, and from thence to Aquileia. (Comp. Strab. v. p. 217.) He was elected pontifex maximus B. C. 180, censor 179, with M. Fulvius Nobilior, and consul a second time 176. He was six times chosen by the censors principes senatus, and he died in B. C. 152, full of years and honours. Judging from the strict orders which he gave to his sons to bury him in a plain and simple manner (Liv. Epit. 48), we may conclude that he belonged to that party of the Roman nobles who set their faces against the refined but extravagant habits which the Scipios and their friends were introducing into the state. Lepidus the triumvir is called by Cicero (Phil. xiii. 7) the pronepos of this Lepidus; but he would seem more probably to have been his abnepos, or great-great-grandson. This Lepidus left several sons; but we can hardly suppose that either the M. Lepidus Porcina, who was consul B. C. 137, or the M. Lepidus who was consul B. C. 126, were his sons, more especially as Livy mentions one of his sons, M. Lepidus (xxvii. 43), as tribune of the soldiers in B. C. 190: the other two we may therefore look upon as his grandsons. (Polyb. xvi. 34; Liv. xxxi. 2, 18, xxxii. 7, xxxv. 10, 24, xxxvi. 2, xxxviii. 42, xxxix. 2, 56; Polyb. xxliii. 1; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 3; Liv. xl. 42, 45, 46; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 1; Cic. de Prov. Cons. 9; Liv. Epit. 48, comp. xl. 51, xli. 27, xliii. 15, Epit. 46, 47; Polyb. xxxii. 22.)

The following coin of Lepidus refers to his embassy to Egypt mentioned above, and to his acting as guardian of Ptolemy V. The obverse contains a female head, intended to represent the city of Alexandria, with the legend ALEXANDREA, and the reverse Lepidus placing the diadem on the head of the king, with the legend M. LEPIDVS PONT. MAX. TVTOR REG. A. C. From the fact that Lepidus is here described as pontifex maximus, and that Valerius Maximus (vi. 6. § 1), in relating his guardianship, speaks of him as pontifex maximus and twice consul, Pighius has supposed (Annal. vol. ii. p. 403) that Lepidus must have been guardian of the Ptolemies VI. and VII.; but Eckhel (vol. v. pp. 123—126) has very ably refuted this opinion, and has shown that this coin was struck by one of the descendants of Lepidus, who would naturally introduce in the legend of the coin one of the distinguished offices of his ancestor, though held at a period subsequent to the event commemorated on the coin.

COIN OF M. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS.

uic. He was one of three ambassadors sent by the Romans in B. C. 201 to the Egyptian court, which was then a firm ally of the republic, and had solicited them to send some one to administer the affairs of the kingdom for their infant sovereign Ptolemy V. Although Lepidus was the youngest of the three ambassadors, he seems to have enjoyed the most power and influence, and accordingly we find writers speaking of him alone as the tutor of the Egyptian king (Tac. Ann. ii. 67; Justin. xxx. 2, 3; Val. Max. vi. 6. § 1); and it is not improbable that he remained in Egypt in that capacity when his colleagues returned to Rome. His superior importance is also shown by his colleagues sending him alone to Philip III. of Macedonia, who had exhibited signs of hostility towards the Romans by the siege of Abydos, and who was not a little astonished at the haughty bearing of the young Roman noble on this occasion. How long Lepidus remained in Egypt is uncertain, but as he was chosen one of the pontiffs in B. C. 189, we must conclude that he was in Rome at that time, though he may have returned again to Egypt. He was elected aedile B. C. 192, praetor 191, with Sicily as

8. M. AEMILIUS M'. F. M'. N. LEPIDUS, son probably of No. 6, consul B. C. 158, is mentioned only by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 6), and in the Fastis. We learn from the Fastis Capitolini that he was M'. f. M'. n.; from which we perceive that he could not have been the son of No. 7, as Drumann alleges.

9. M. ARMILIUS LEPIDUS, the son of No. 7, tribune of the soldiers in the war against Antiochus the Great, a. c. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 43.)

10. M. ARMILIUS M. F. M. N. LEPIDUS PORCINA, son probably of No. 9, and grandson of No. 7, was consul b. c. 137. He was sent into Spain in his consulship to succeed his colleague C. Hostilius Mancinus, who had been defeated by the Numantines [MANCINUS]; and while he was waiting for reinforcements from home, as he was not yet in a condition to attack the Numantines, he resolved to make war upon the Vaccaei, under the pretence of their having assisted the Numantines. This he did merely from the desire of distinguishing himself; and the senate, immediately his intention became known, sent deputies to command him to desist from his design, as they deprecated a new war in Spain, after experiencing so many disasters. Lepidus, however, had commenced the war before the deputies arrived, and had summoned to his assistance his relation, D. Brutus, who commanded in Further Spain, and was a general of considerable experience and skill. [BRUTUS, No. 15, p. 509, b.] Notwithstanding his aid, Lepidus was unsuccessful. After laying waste the open country, the two generals laid siege to Palantia, the capital of the Vaccaei (the modern Palencia), but they suffered so dreadfully from want of provisions, that they were obliged to raise the siege; and a considerable part of their army was destroyed by the enemy in their retreat. This happened in the proconsulship of Lepidus, a. c. 136; and when the news reached Rome, Lepidus was deprived of his command, and condemned to pay a fine. (Appian, Hist. 80—83, who says that Lepidus was deprived of his consulship, by which we must understand proconsulship; Liv. Epit. 56; Oros. v. 5.) Lepidus was augur in a. c. 125, when he was summoned by the censors, Cn. Servilius Caepio and L. Cassius Longinus, to account for having built a house in too magnificent a style. (Veil. Pat. ii. 10; Val. Max. viii. 1, damn. 7.)

Lepidus was a man of education and refined taste. Cicero, who had read his speeches, speaks of him as the greatest orator of his age, and says that he was the first who introduced into Latin oratory the smooth and even flow of words and the artificial construction of sentences which distinguished the Greek. He helped to form the style of Tib. Gracchus and C. Carbo, who were accustomed to listen to him with great care. He was, however, very deficient in a knowledge of law and Roman institutions. (Cic. Brut. 25, 86, 97, de Orat. i. 10, Tuscul. i. 3; Auctor, ad Herenn. iv. 5.) In politics Lepidus seems to have belonged to the aristocratical party. He opposed in his consulship (a. c. 137) the law for introducing the ballot (lex tabellaria) proposed by L. Cassius Longinus (Cic. Brut. 25); and it appears from a fragment of Priscian (vol. i. p. 456), that Lepidus spoke in favour of a repeal of the lex Aemilia, which was probably the sumptuary law proposed by the consul, M. Aemilius Scaurus in b. c. 115. (Meyer, Orator. Rom. Fragm. p. 193, &c. 2d. ed.)

11. M. ARMILIUS M. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, consul b. c. 126 (Cic. Brut. 28; Obsequ. 39; Oros. v. 10.), and brother apparently of No. 10, though it is difficult to account for their both having the same praenomen.

12. Q. ARMILIUS LEPIDUS, the grandfather of Lepidus the triumvir, must have been either a son or grandson of No. 7. [See below, No. 17.] But the dates will hardly allow us to suppose that he was a son. He was therefore probably a son of No. 9, and a grandson of No. 7.

13. M. ARMILIUS Q. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, the son of No. 11, and the father of the triumvir, was praetor in Sicily in b. c. 81, where he earned a character by his oppressions only second to that of Verres. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 91.) In the civil war between Marius and Sulla he belonged at first to the party of the latter, and acquired considerable property by the purchase of confiscated estates; but he was afterwards seized with the ambition of becoming a leader of the popular party, to which post he might perhaps consider himself as in some degree entitled, by having married Appollia, the daughter of the celebrated tribune Appuleius Saturninus. He accordingly sued for the consulship in b. c. 79, in opposition to Sulla; but the latter, who had resigned his dictatorship in this year, felt that his power was too well established to be shaken by any thing that Lepidus could do, and accordingly made no efforts to oppose his election. Pompey, moreover, whose vanity was inflamed by the desire of returning a candidate against the wishes of the all-powerful Sulla, exerted himself warmly to secure the election of Lepidus, and not only succeeded, but brought him in by more votes than his colleague, Q. Lutatius Catulus, who belonged to the ruling party. Sulla viewed all these proceedings with great indifference, and contented himself with warning Pompey, when he met him returning in pride from the election, that he had strengthened one who would be his rival.

The death of Sulla in the following year, a. c. 78, soon after Lepidus and Catulus had entered upon their consulship, determined Lepidus to make the bold attempt to rescind the laws of Sulla and overthrow the aristocratical constitution which he had established. There were abundant materials of discontent in Italy, and it would not have been difficult to collect a numerous army; but the victory of the aristocratical party was too firmly secured by Sulla's military colonies to fear any attempts that Lepidus might make, since he did not possess either sufficient influence or sufficient talent to take the lead in a great revolution. He seems, moreover, to have reckoned upon the assistance of Pompey, who remained, on the contrary, firm to the aristocracy. The first movement of Lepidus was to endeavour to prevent the burial of Sulla in the Campus Martius, but he was obliged to relinquish this design through the opposition of Pompey. He next formally proposed several laws with the object of abolishing Sulla's constitution, but their exact provisions are not mentioned by the ancient writers. We know, however, that he proposed to recall all persons who had been proscribed, and to restore to them their property, which had passed into the hands of other parties. Such a measure would alone have thrown all Italy into confusion again. At Rome the most violent agitation prevailed. Catulus showed himself a firm and dauntless friend of the aristocracy, and appears to have obtained a tribune to put his veto upon the rogations of Lepidus. The exasperation between the two parties rose to its height, and the senate saw no other means of avoiding an immediate outbreak except by inducing the two consuls to swear that they would not take up arms against one another. To this they both consented, and Lepidus the more willingly, as the cask, according to his interpretation, only bound him during his consulship, and he had now time to collect resources for the coming contest. These the senate itself supplied him with. They had in the previous year voted Italy and Further Gaul as the consular provinces, and the latter had fallen to Lepidus. Anxious now to remove him from Italy, the senate ordered him to repair to his province, under the pretence of threatening dangers, and furnished him with money and supplies. Lepidus left the city; but instead of repairing to his province he stopped in Etruria and collected an army. The senate thereupon ordered him to return to the city in order to hold the comitia for the election of the consuls; but he would not trust himself in their hands. This year seems to have passed away without any decisive measures on either side. At the beginning of the following year, however, a. c. 77, Lepidus was declared a public enemy by the senate. Without waiting for the forces of M. Brutus, who had espoused his cause and commanded in Cisalpine Gaul, Lepidus marched straight against Rome. Here Pompey and Catulus were prepared to receive him; and in the battle which was fought under the walls of the city, in the Campus Martius, Lepidus was easily defeated and obliged to take to flight. While Pompey marched against Brutus in Cisalpine Gaul, whom he overcame and put to death [Bartus, No. 20], Catulus followed Lepidus into Etruria. Finding it impossible to hold his ground in Italy, Lepidus sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia; but repulsed even in this island by the propraetor, he died shortly afterwards of chagrin and sorrow, which is said to have been increased by the discovery of the infidelity of his wife. The aristocratical party used their victory with great moderation, probably from fear of driving their opponents to join Sertorius in Spain. (Sall. Hist. lib. 1, and Fragm. p. 190, in Gerlach's ed. min.; Appian, B. C. i. 105, 107; Plut. Sall. 34, 38, Pomp. 15, 16; Liv. Epit. 90; Flor. iii. 23; Oros. v. 22; Eutrop. vi. 5; Tac. Ann. iii. 27; Suet. Caes. 3, 5; Cic. in Cat. iii. 10; Plin. H. N. vii. 36, 54; Drumann's Rom. vol. iv. pp. 339—346.)

14. MAM. AEMILIUS MAM. F. M. N. LEPIDUS LIVIANUS, who appears to have been a grandson of No. 8, but only an adopted son, as his surname Livianus shows, was consul, a. c. 77, with D. Junius Brutus. He belonged to the aristocratical party, and is mentioned as one of the influential persons who prevailed upon Sulla to spare the life of the young Julius Caesar. He failed in obtaining the consulship at his first attempt, because he was supposed, though very rich, to have declined the office of aedile in order to avoid the expenses attending it. (Suet. Caes. 1; Cic. Brut. 47, de Off. ii. 17; Obsequ. 119; Val. Max. vii. 7. § 6.)

15. M'. AEMILIUS MAM. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, probably likewise a son of No. 8, was consul, a. c. 66, with L. Volcatius Tullus, the same year in which Cicero was praetor. He is mentioned several times by Cicero, but never attained much political importance. In a. c. 65, he is spoken of as one of the witnesses against C. Cornelius, whom Cicero defended. He belonged to the aristocratical party, but on the breaking out of the civil war in a. c. 49, he retired to his Formian villa to watch the progress of events. Here he was in almost daily intercourse with Cicero, from whose letters we learn that Lepidus was resolved not to cross the sea with Pompey, but to yield to Caesar if the latter was likely to be victorious. He eventually returned to Rome in March. (Sall. Cat. 18; Cic. in Cat. i. 6, pro Sull. 4; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 25; Acon. in Cornel. p. 66, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. vii. 12, 23. viii. 1, 6, 9, 15, ix. 1.)

16. L. AEMILIUS M. F. Q. N. PAULLUS, was a son of No. 13, and a brother of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. (Vell. Pat. ii. 67.) His surname Paullus instead of Lepidus has led many to suppose that he was only an adopted brother of the triumvir; but Drumann has shown that Paullus was own brother of the triumvir. (Drumann's Rom. vol. i. p. 5.) The surname of Paullus was probably given him by his father in honour of the celebrated Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia, which he might do with the less scruple, as Paullus appears to have left no descendants bearing his name. Lepidus might therefore naturally desire that this family should be, as it were, again revived by one of his sons; and to show the more honour to the name, he gave it to his eldest son; for that L. Paullus was older than his brother the triumvir appears almost certain from the respective dates at which they attained the offices of the state. Some writers have supposed that the triumvir must have been the elder from his bearing the praenomen of his father; but since Lucius was the praenomen of the conqueror of Macedonia, we can easily understand why the father should depart on this occasion from the usual Roman practice of giving his own praenomen to his eldest son.

Since Aemilius Paullus undoubtedly belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Paulli, he is inserted in this place and not under PAULLUS.

Aemilius Paullus did not follow the example of his father, but commenced his public career by warmly supporting the aristocratical party. His first public act was the accusation of Catiline in a. c. 63, according to the Lex Plautia de vi, an act which Cicero praised as one of great service to the state, and on account of which Paullus incurred the hatred of the popular party. He must then have been quite a young man, for he was not quaestor till three years afterwards; and it was during his quaestorship in Macedonia, in a. c. 59, under the propraetor C. Octavius, that he was accused by L. Vettius as one of the persons privy to the pretended conspiracy against the life of Pompey. He is mentioned in a. c. 57 as exerting himself to obtain the recall of Cicero from banishment.

In his aedileship, a. c. 55, Paullus restored one of the ancient basilicae in the middle of the forum, and likewise commenced a new one of extraordinary size and splendour. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16.) Respecting these basilicae, which have given rise to considerable dispute, a few remarks are made below, where a coin is given representing one of them.

In a. c. 53, Paullus obtained the praetorship, but not until the month of July, in consequence of the disturbances at Rome, which prevented the elections taking place till that month. He was chosen consul for the year a. c. 50, along with M. Claudius Marcellus, as one of the most determined enemies of Caesar. But he grievously disappointed the hopes of the aristocrats who had raised him to the consulship, for Caesar gained him over to his side by a bribe of 1500 talents, which he is said to have expended on the completion of his basilica. By accepting this bribe he lost the confidence of all parties, and accordingly seems to have taken no part in the civil war between Pompey and Caesar. After the murder of the latter, in B. C. 44, Paullus joined the senatorial party; and he was one of the senators who declared M. Lepidus a public enemy, on the 30th of June, A. C. 43, on account of his having joined Antony; and, accordingly, when the triumvirate was formed in the autumn of the same year, his name was set down first in the proscription list by his own brother. The soldiers, however, who were appointed to kill him, allowed him to escape, probably with the connivance of his brother. He passed over to Brutus in Asia, and after the death of the latter repaired to Miletus. Here he remained, and refused to go to Rome, although he was pardoned by the triumvirs. As he is not mentioned again, he probably died soon afterwards. (Sall. Cat. 31; Schol. Bob. in Vatin. p. 320, ed. Orelli; Cic. in Vatin. 10, ad Att. ii. 24, ad *Qu. COIN OF M. AEMILIUS PAULLUS.

The preceding coin contains on the obverse the head of Vesta, and on the reverse the Basilica Aemilia.

It has been already seen that Cicero says (ad Att. iv. 16) that Aemilius Paullus restored a basilica in the forum, and also commenced a new one. The former must have been the same as the one originally built by the censors M. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Fulvius Nobilior, in B. C. 179. As M. Fulvius seems to have had the principal share in its construction (Liv. xl. 51), it was generally called the Fulvia basilica (Plut. Caes. 29), sometimes the Aemilia et Fulvia (Varr. L. L. vi. 2), but after the restoration by Aemilius Paullus, it was always called the Basilica Paulli or Aemilia. The restoration of this basilica was almost completed in B. C. 54, the year in which Cicero (l. c.) was writing. But the question where the new one was built is a very difficult one to answer. Most modern writers have supposed that the two basilicae were built by the side of one another in the forum; but this seems hardly possible to have been the case, since we never find mention of more than one basilica Aemilia or Paulli in all the ancient writers. (Tac. Ann. iii. 72; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15, 24; Stat. Silv. i. l. 29; Plut. Caes. 29, Galb. 26; Dion Cass. xlix. 42, liv. 24; Appian, B. C. ii. 26.) Becker, therefore, supposes (Handb. der Rom. Alterthümer, vol. i. pp. 301—306) that the new building, which Paullus commenced, was the same as the one afterwards called the Basilica Julia, more especially as Paullus is expressly said to have received money from Caesar for the erection of one of these basilicae. Cicero's letter (l. c.) certainly speaks as if the new basilica were to be built by Paullus at Caesar's expense; and it may therefore be that the statement of Appian (B. C. ii. 26) and Plutarch (Caes. 29), that Paullus was bribed by Caesar in his consulship with a sum of 1500 talents, and that he expended this upon the basilica Aemilia, is not quite correct. The mistake, however, is a very natural one; for though the 1500 talents, might have been appropriated to the erection of the new basilica, subsequent writers would naturally suppose that the money had been expended upon the building which bore the name of Aemilius Paullus in their own time. For a further discussion of this subject, which hardly belongs to the present work, the reader is referred to Becker (l. c.)

The basilica Aemilia in the forum was rebuilt at his own expense by Paullus Aemilius Lepidus [No. 19], the son of the present article, and dedicated in his consulship, A. C. 34 (Dion Cass. xlix. 42). It was burnt down twenty years afterwards, A. C. 14, by a fire, which also destroyed the temple of Vesta, and was rebuilt nominally by Paullus Lepidus, but in reality by Augustus and the friends of Paullus (Dion Cass. liv. 24). The new building was a most magnificent one; its columns of Phrygian marble were especially celebrated (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15, 24). It was again repaired by Lepidus [No. 23] in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 23 (Tac. Ann. iii. 72).

17. M. AEMILIUS M. F. Q. N. LEPIDUS, the triumvir, was the brother of the preceding [No. 16], and the son of No. 13. He was a lineal descendant of the pontifex maximus, M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul in A. C. 187 and 175, though, as we have seen, it is doubtful whether he was the abnepos or great-grandson of the latter, as Cicero calls him [see No. 7].

M. Lepidus is first mentioned in the year A. C. 52, when the senate appointed him interrex, after the death of Clodius, for the purpose of holding the comitia. Rome was almost in a state of anarchy; and because Lepidus refused to hold the comitia for the election of the consuls, on the ground that it was not usual for the first interrex to do so, his house was attacked by the Clodian mobs, and he himself narrowly escaped with his life. On the breaking out of the civil war between Pompey and Caesar, A. C. 49, Lepidus, who was then praetor, joined the party of the latter; and as the consuls had fled with Pompey from Italy, Lepidus, as praetor, was the highest magistrate remaining in Italy. Caesar accordingly, when he set out for Spain, to carry on the war against Afranius and Petreius, left Lepidus nominally in charge of the city, though he really depended upon Antony for the preservation of peace in Italy. During Caesar's absence in Spain, Lepidus presided at the comitia, in which the former was appointed dictator, who was thus able to hold the consular comitia, which it would have been impossible for a praetor to have done.

In the following year, A. C. 48, Lepidus received the province of Nearer Spain, with the title of proconsul, and here displayed both the vanity and avarice which marked his character. Having compelled the proconsul Q. Cassius Longinus, in further Spain, and his quaestor M. Marcellus, who were making war upon one another, to lay down their arms, he assumed the title of imperator, though he had not struck a blow. On his return to Rome a. c. 47, Caesar gratified his vanity with a triumph, though the only trophies he could display, says Dion Cassius (xliii. 1), was the money of which he had robbed the province. In the course of the same year Caesar made him his magister equitum, and in the next year, b. c. 46, his colleague in the consulship. He was likewise nominated magister equitum by Caesar for the second and third times in a. c. 45 and 44.

In a. c. 44 Lepidus received from Caesar the government of Narbonese Gaul and Nearer Spain, but had not quitted the neighbourhood of Rome at the time of the dictator's death. He was then collecting troops for his provinces, and the conspirators had therefore proposed to murder him as well as Antony with the dictator; but this project was overruled. On the evening before the fatal 15th of March Caesar had supped with Lepidus (Appian, B. C. ii. 115), and he was present on the following day in the curia of Pompey, in the Campus Martius, and saw Caesar fall by the daggers of his assassins. (Plut. Cæsar. 67; the statement of Appian, B. C. ii. 118, and Dion Cassius xliv. 22, that Lepidus was not present, is less probable). Lepidus hastily stole away from the senate house with the other friends of Caesar, and after concealing himself for a few hours, repaired to his troops, the possession of which in the neighbourhood of Rome, seemed almost to place the supreme power in his hands. Accordingly, in the night of the 15th of March, he took possession of the forum with his soldiers, and on the following morning addressed the people to exasperate them against the murderers of the dictator. Antony, however, dissuaded him from resorting to violence, and in the negotiations which followed with the aristocracy Lepidus adopted all the views of the former. He was, therefore, a party to the hollow reconciliation which took place between the aristocracy and Caesar's friends. In return for the support which Antony had received from Lepidus, he allowed the latter to be chosen pontifex maximus, which dignity had become vacant by Caesar's death; and, to cement their union still more closely, Antony betrothed his daughter to the son of Lepidus. As Antony had no further occasion for Lepidus in Rome, he now repaired to his provinces of Gaul and Spain, with the special object of effecting a reconciliation between Sex. Pompey and the new rulers at Rome. This was proposed at Antony's suggestion, who was anxious to withdraw Pompey from Spain and induce him to come to Rome, that he might thus have deprived the senate of a considerable part of their forces, in case of the civil war breaking out again. The senate did not see through Antony's design; Lepidus succeeded in his mission, and accordingly received marks of honour from both parties; the senate on the 29th of November, on the proposition of Antony, voted him a supplicatio.

Shortly afterwards an open rupture occurred between Antony and the senate. Antony had obtained from the people the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which D. Brutus then held, and which he refused to surrender to him (Brutus, No. 17). Antony accordingly marched against him, and as he latter was unable to resist him in the field, he threw himself into Mutina, which was forthwith besieged by Antony. The senate espoused the side of Brutus, and were now exceedingly anxious to induce Lepidus to join them, as he had a powerful army on the other side of the Alps, and could easily crush Antony if he pleased. Under the pretence, therefore, of showing him additional marks of honour on account of his inducing Pompey to lay down his arms, the senate, on the proposition of Cicero, voted an equestrian statue of Lepidus, and conferred upon him the title of imperator. Lepidus, however, hesitated what part to take, and seems to have been anxious to wait the result of the contest between Antony and the senate, before committing himself irrevocably to either party. He did not even thank the senate for their decree in his honour; and when they requested him to march into Italy and assist the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, in raising the siege of Mutina, he only sent a detachment of his troops across the Alps under the command of M. Silvanus, and to him he gave such doubtful orders that Silvanus thought it would be more pleasing to his general that his soldiers should fight for rather than against Antony, and accordingly joined the latter. Meantime, Lepidus incurred the displeasure of Cicero and the aristocracy, by writing to the senate to recommend peace. Shortly afterwards, in the latter half of the month of April, the battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Mutina, which compelled Antony to raise the siege and take to flight. He crossed the Alps with the remains of his troops, and proceeded straight to Lepidus, who finding it impossible to maintain a neutral position any longer, united his army to that of Antony on the 28th of May. The senate, therefore, on the 30th of June, proclaimed Lepidus a public enemy, and ordered his statue to be thrown down. The young Octavian still continued to act nominally with the senate; but with his usual penetration he soon saw that the senate would be unable to resist the strong force that was collecting on the other side of the Alps, and therefore resolved to desert the falling side. For besides their own troops Lepidus and Antony were now joined by Asinius Pollio, the governor of Further Spain, and by L. Munatius Plancus, the governor of Further Gaul, and were preparing to cross the Alps with a most formidable army. In August Octavian compelled the senate to allow him to be elected consul, and likewise to repeal the decrees that had been made against Lepidus and Antony; and towards the latter end of October he had the celebrated interview at Bononia, between Lepidus and Antony, which resulted in the formation of the triumvirate. [AUGUSTUS, p. 425, b.] In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Lepidus obtained Spain and Narbonese Gaul, which he was to govern by means of a deputy, in order that he might remain in Italy next year as consul, while the two other triumvirs prosecuted the war against Brutus and Cassius. Of his large army he was only to retain three legions for the protection of Italy; the remaining seven were divided between Octavian and Antony. Thus Lepidus was to play only a secondary part in the impending struggle between the triumvirs and the senate; and with this he seems to have been contented, for he never displayed any love of enterprise. In the proscriptio-lists which were published on the return of the triumvirs to Rome, Lepidus placed the name of his own brother Paullus, as has been already related. [See above, p. 766, a.] Shortly afterwards, on the 31st of December, Lepidus celebrated a triumph as a consequence of the supplicatio which the senate had voted a year previously.

In B. C. 42 Lepidus remained in Rome as consul; and in the fresh division of the provinces, made between Octavian and Antony, after the battle of Philippi at the close of this year, Lepidus was deprived of his provinces, under the pretext of his having had treasonable intercourse with Sex. Pompey; but it was arranged that, in case he should be proved innocent of the crime laid to his charge, he should receive Africa as a compensation for the provinces taken from him: so soon did Octavian and Antony make him feel that he was their subject rather than their equal. The triumvirs were unable to prove anything against Lepidus, but it was not till after the Perusinian war in B. C. 40, that Octavian allowed Lepidus to take possession of his province, and he probably would not have obtained it even then, had not Octavian been anxious to attach Lepidus to his interests, in case of a rupture between himself and Antony. Lepidus remained in Africa till B. C. 36. On the renewal of the triumvirate in B. C. 37, for another five years, Lepidus had been included, though he had now lost all real power. In the following year, B. C. 36, Octavian summoned him to Sicily to assist him in the war against Sex. Pompey. Lepidus obeyed, but tired of being treated as a subordinate, he resolved to make an effort to acquire Sicily for himself and regain his lost power. He left Africa on the 1st of July, B. C. 36, and on his arrival in Sicily proceeded to act on his own account, without consulting Octavian. He first subdued Lilybæum and the neighbouring towns, and then marched against Messana, which he also conquered. The eight Pompeian legions, which formed the garrison of the latter town, joined him, so that his army now amounted to twenty legions. Lepidus, therefore, felt himself strong enough to assume a threatening position, and accordingly, on the arrival of Octavian, claimed Sicily for himself, and an equal share as triumvir in the government of the state. A civil war seemed inevitable. But Lepidus did not possess the confidence of his soldiers; Octavian found means to seduce them from their allegiance, and at length, feeling sure of support from a numerous body of them, adopted one day the bold resolution of riding into the very camp of Lepidus, and calling upon his troops to save their country from a civil war. Although this daring attempt did not immediately succeed, and Octavian was obliged to retire with a wound in his breast, yet it had eventually the desired effect. Detachment after detachment deserted Lepidus, who found himself at last obliged to surrender to Octavian. All his courage now forsook him. He put on mourning, and threw himself before the knees of Octavian, begging for his life. This Octavian granted him, but he deprived him of his triumvirate, his army, and his provinces, and commanded that he should live at Circæi, under strict surveillance. He allowed him, however, to retain his private fortune, and his dignity of pontifex maximus.

Thus ended the public life of Lepidus. After the conspiracy of his son against the life of Augustus at the time of the battle of Actium (see below), Lepidus was ordered to return to Rome; and, though he had not been privy to it, he was treated by Augustus with the utmost indignity. Still the loss of honour and rank, and the insults to which he was exposed, did not shorten his life, for he survived till B. C. 13. Augustus succeeded him as pontifex maximus.

Lepidus was one of those men who have no decided character, and who are incapable of committing great crimes for the same reason that they are incapable of performing any noble acts. He possessed great wealth, and, like almost all his contemporaries, was little scrupulous about the means of acquiring it. Neither in war nor in peace did he exhibit any distinguished abilities; but that he was not so contemptible a character, as he is drawn by Drumann, seems pretty certain from the respect with which he was always treated by that great judge of men, Julius Caesar. It seems clear that Lepidus was fond of ease and repose, and it is not improbable that he possessed abilities capable of effecting much more than he ever did.

His wife was Junia, the sister of the M. Brutus who killed Caesar. [JUNIA, No. 2.]

(The passages of Cicero referring to Lepidus are given in Orelli, Omos. Tull. vol. ii. pp. 14, 15; Appian, B. C. lib. ii. iii. v.; Dion Cass. lib. xlii-xlix.; Vell. Pat. ii. 64, 80; Flor. iv. 6, 7; Liv. Epit. 119, 120, 129; Suet. Octav. 16, 31; Sen. de Clem. i. 10.)

COIN OF M. LEPIDUS, THE TRIUMVIR.

18. SCIPIO, a brother of the two preceding [Nos. 16 and 17], and a son of No. 13, must have been adopted by one of the Scipios. He fell in battle in the war of his father against the aristocratical party, B. C. 77. (Oros. v. 22.)

19. PAULUS AEMILIUS L. F. M. N. LEPIDUS, the son of L. Aemilius Paullus [No. 16], with whom he is frequently confounded. His name is variously given by the ancient writers Aemilius Paullus, or Paullus Aemilius, or Aemilius Lepidus Paullus, but Paullus Aemilius Lepidus seems to be the more correct form. He probably fled with his father to Brutus, and seems to have been entrusted by the latter with the defence of Crete; for we find him after the death of Brutus joining the remnants of the republican party with the Cretan troops, and sailing with them into the Ionian sea. He must subsequently have made his peace with the triumvirs, as we find him accompanying Octavian in his campaign against Sex. Pompey in Sicily in B. C. 36. In B. C. 34 he obtained the consulship, but only as consul suffectus, on the 1st of July, and dedicated the basilica Aemilia, which had been originally erected by his father [see p. 766], but which he had rebuilt. In B. C. 22 he was censor with L. Munatius Plancus, with whom he could not agree, and died while holding this dignity. Dion Cassius seems to have confounded him with his father in saying that the censor had been formerly proscribed; it is not impossible, however, that the son may have been proscribed along with his father, although no other writer mentions the fact. (Appian, B. C. v. 2; Suet. Octav. 16. Dion Cass. xlix. 42, liv. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 93; Propert. iv. 11. 67.)

The wife of Paullus Aemilius Lepidus was Cornelia, the daughter of Cornelius Scipio and of Scribonia, who was subsequently the wife of Augustus. She was thus the step-daughter of Augustus, and her family became still more closely connected with the imperial house by the marriage of one of her sons, L. Aemilius Paulus [No. 22], to a daughter of Julia, who was her half-sister, being the daughter of Augustus and Scribonia. There is an elegy of Propertius (iv. 11), in which Cornelia is represented as consoling her husband Paullus on account of her death. She there speaks of having died in the consulship of her brother (iv. 11. 65), who is supposed to have been the P. Cornelius Scipio who was consul in B.C. 16. Thus a contradiction arises between Velleius Paterculus (ii. 95) and Dion Cassius (liv. 2) on the one hand, and Propertius on the other, as the two former writers say that Paullus died during his censorship. Perhaps, however, the brother of Cornelia may not have been the consul of B.C. 16, but one of the consules suffecti, not mentioned in the Fasti. Paullus had by Cornelia three children, two sons and a daughter [Nos. 22, 23, 24], to all of whom Propertius alludes. The daughter was born in the censorship of her father (Propert. iv. 11. 67), and if Paullus really died in his censorship there could have been only a very short interval between his wife's death and his own. The annexed coin probably has reference to this Paullus Aemilius Lepidus: it has on the obverse the head of Concordia with PAVLLVS LEPIDVS CONCORDIA, and on the reverse a trophy with several figures, and the words TER PAVLLVS. The reverse refers to the victory of the celebrated L. Aemilius Paullus over Perseus: on the right hand of the trophy stands Aemilius Paullus himself, and on the left Perseus and his two sons. Ter may refer to his triumph lasting three days, or to his having enjoyed three different triumphs. (Comp. Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 130, 131.)

COIN OF PAULLVS AEMILIVS LEPIDVS.

There is another coin of Paullus Aemilius Lepidus, with the same obverse as the one given above, but with the reverse representing the Scribonian puteal, which we find on the coins of the Scribonian gens [see LIBO], and with the legend PUTEAL SCRIBON. LIBO. This emblem of the Scribonian gens was used on account of the wife of Paullus being the daughter of Scribonia, who had then become the wife of Augustus, as is stated above.

20. M. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, the son of the triumvir [No. 17] and Junia, formed a conspiracy in A.C. 30, for the purpose of assassinating Octavian on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium; but Maecenas, who had charge of the city, became acquainted with the plot, seized Lepidus, without creating any disturbance, and sent him to Octavian in the East, who put him to death. His father was ignorant of the conspiracy, but his mother was privy to it. [JUNIA, No. 2.] Velleius Paterculus, who never speaks favourably of any of the enemies of Octavian, describes Lepidus as "juvenis forma quam mente melior." Lepidus was married twice: his first wife was Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir. [ANTONIA, No. 4], and his second Servilia, who put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals when the conspiracy of her husband was discovered. (Vell. Pat. ii. 88; Appian, B. C. iv. 50; Dion Cass. liv. 15; Suet. Octav. 19; Liv. Epit. 133; Senec. de Clem. 9, De Brev. Vitae, i. 9.)

21. Q. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, consul B.C. 21 with M. Lollius. (Dion Cass. liv. 6; Hor. Ep. i. 20. 28.) It appears from an inscription quoted under FABRICIUS [Vol. II. p. 132, b], that he and Lollius repaired the Fabrician bridge. The descent of this Lepidus is quite uncertain: the conjecture of Drumann (Geoch. Rome, vol. i. p. 24) that he was a son of the triumvir is in itself improbable; and we find besides that he is called in inscriptions M'. r., and not M. r.

22. L. AEMILIUS PAULLUS, the son of Paullus Aemilius Lepidus [No. 19] and Cornelia, married Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, being a daughter of M. Agrippa and Julia, who was the daughter of Augustus. Paullus is therefore called the progenitor of Augustus. As Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was the half-sister of Cornelia [see above, No. 19], Paullus married his first cousin. He was consul in A. D. 1 with C. Caesar, his wife's brother, and the grandson of Augustus; but, notwithstanding his close connection with the imperial family, he nevertheless entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, of the particulars of which we are not informed. (Propert. iv. 11. 63; Suet. Oct. 19, 64; Dion Cass. iv. Ind.) Respecting Julia, the wife of Paullus, see JULIA, No. 7.

23. M. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, the brother of No. 22, was consul A. D. 6 with L. Arruntius. (Propert. iv. 11. 63; Dion Cass. iv. 25.) Instead of conspiring against Augustus, like his brother, he seems always to have lived on the most intimate terms with him. He was employed by Augustus in the war against the Dalmatians in A. D. 9. (Vell. Pat. ii. 114, 115; Dion Cass. lvi. 12.) When Augustus shortly before his death was speaking of the Roman nobles, whose abilities would qualify them for the supreme power, or whose ambition would prompt them to aspire to it, he described Lepidus as "capax sed aspernans." (Tac. Ann. i. 13.) The high estimation in which he was held by Augustus he continued to enjoy even with the jealous and suspicious Tiberius; and although he took no part in the fulsome flatteries which the senate were continually presenting to the emperor, and used his influence in the cause of justice, yet such was his prudence, that he did not forfeit the favour of Tiberius. The praises bestowed upon him by Velleius Paterculus (l. c.), which would not of themselves be of much value, as this writer always speaks favourably of the friends of Augustus, are confirmed by the weightier authority of Tacitus, who bears the strongest testimony to the virtues and wisdom of Lepidus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 20.)

The name of M. Lepidus occurs several times in Tacitus, and must be carefully distinguished from that of M'. Lepidus [see No. 25], with which it is frequently confounded, both in the MSS. and editions of the historian. M. Lepidus is first mentioned in Tacitus at the accession of Tiberius, A. D. 14, next in A. D. 21, when he declined the proconsulate of Africa, and also in the debate in the senate in the same year respecting the punishment of C. Lutorius Priscus; again in A. D. 24; then in A. D. 26, when he was appointed governor of the province of Asia; and lastly in A. D. 33, which was the year of his death. (Tac. Ann. i. 13, iii. 35, 50, iv. 20, 56, vi. 27.) It was this M. Lepidus who repaired the Aemilia Basilica in A. D. 22 (Tac. Ann. iii. 72), as is mentioned above. [No. 16.]

25. M'. AEMILIUS Q. F. LEPIDUS, the son apparently of No. 21, was consul with T. Statilius Taurus in A. D. 11. (Dion Cass. lvi. 25.) He must be carefully distinguished from his contemporary M. Aemilius Lepidus, with whom he is frequently confounded. [See No. 23.] Though we cannot trace the descent of this M'. Lepidus [see No. 21], yet among his ancestors on the female side were L. Sulla and Cn. Pompey. (Tac. Ann. iii. 22.) It is perhaps this M'. Lepidus who defended Piso in A. D. 20; and it was undoubtedly this Lepidus who defended his sister later in the same year. [LEPIDA, No. 2.] In A. D. 21 he obtained the province of Asia, but Sex. Pompey declared in the senate that Lepidus ought to be deprived of it, because he was indolent, poor, and a disgrace to his ancestors, but the senate would not listen to Pompey, maintaining that Lepidus was of an easy rather than a slothful character, and that the manner in which he had lived on his small patrimony was to his honour rather than his disgrace. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11, 22, 32.)

26. AEMILIA LEPIDA, sister of No. 25. [LEPIDA, No. 2.]

27. AEMILIUS LEPIDUS, the son of L. Aemilius Paullus [No. 22] and Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus. He was consequently the great-grandson of Augustus. He was one of the minions of the emperor Caligula, with whom he had the most shameful connection. So great a favourite was he with Caligula, that the latter allowed him to hold the public offices of the state five years before the legal age, and promised him to make him his successor in the empire. He moreover gave him in marriage his favourite sister Drusilla [DRUSILLA, No. 2], and allowed him to have intercourse with his other sisters, Agrippina and Livilla. But, notwithstanding all these marks of favour, Caligula put him to death, A. D. 39, on the pretext of his conspiring against him. (Dion Cass. lix. 11, 22; Suet. Cal. 24, 36; comp. Tac. Ann. xiv. 2.)

28. AEMILIA LEPIDA, sister of No. 27, and wife of the emperor Claudius. [LEPIDA, No. 3.]

29. AEMILIA LEPIDA, daughter of No. 23, and wife of Drusus, son of Germanicus. [LEPIDA, No. 4.]

LEPIDUS, an author of unknown date, wrote in Greek an abridgement of history, of which Stephanus of Byzantium quotes the first and eighth books (s. rr. Τετάρτη, Βούρπερτος, Στρώτο).

LEPORIUS, by birth a Gaul, embraced the monastic life, under the auspices of Cassianus, in the early part of the fifth century, at Marseilles, where he enjoyed a high reputation for purity and holiness, until he became the advocate of the double heresy that man did not stand in need of Divine grace, and that Christ was born with a human nature only. Having been excommunicated, in consequence of these doctrines, he betook himself to Africa, where he became familiar with Aurelius and St. Augustine, by whose instructions he profited so much, that he not only became convinced of his errors, but drew up a solemn recantation addressed to Proculus, bishop of Marseilles, and Cyllinius, bishop of Aix, while four African prelates bore testimony to the sincerity of his conversion, and made intercession on his behalf. Although now reinstated in his ecclesiastical privileges, Leporius does not seem to have returned to his native country; but laying aside the profession of a monk, was ordained a presbyter by St. Augustine about A. D. 425, and appears to be the same Leporius so warmly praised in the discourse De Vita et Moribus Clericorum. We know nothing further regarding his career except that he was still alive in 430. (Cassianus, de Incarn. i. 4.)

The work, to which we have alluded above, and which is still extant, under the title Libellus Emendationis sive Satisfactionis ad Episcopos Gallicae, sometimes with the addition, Confessionem Fidei Catholicam continens de Mystero Incarnationis Christi, cum Erroris pristini Detestatione, was held in very high estimation among ancient divines, and its author was regarded as one of the firmest bulwarks of orthodoxy against the attacks of the Nestorians. Some scholars in modern times, especially Quessel, who has written an elaborate dissertation on the subject, have imagined that we ought to regard this as a tract composed and dictated by St. Augustine, founding their opinion partly upon the style, partly upon the terms in which it is quoted in the acts of the second council of Chalcedon and other early documents, and partly upon certain expressions in an epistle of Leo the Great (clxv. ed. Quessel); but their arguments are far from being conclusive, and the hypothesis is generally rejected.

Fragments of the Libellus were first collected by Sirmond, from Cassianus, and inserted in his collection of Gaulish councils, fol. Par. vol. i. p. 52. The entire work was soon after discovered and published by the same editor in his Opuscula Dogmatica Veterum quinque Scriptorum, 8vo. Par. 1630; together with the letter from the African bishops in favour of Leporius. It will be found also in the collection of Councils by Labbe, fol. Par. 1671; in Garnier's edition of Marius Mercator, fol. Par. 1673, tom. i. p. 224; in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. fol. Lugdun. 1677, tom. vii. p. 14; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venet. 1773, tom. ix. p. 396. (Gennad. de Viris Illustr. 59; Cassian. de Incarn. i. 4; consult the dissertation of Quessel in his ed. of the works of Leo, vol. ii. p. 906, ed. LEPREA (Λίπρεα), a daughter of Pyrrhus, from whom the town of Lepreum, in the south of Elis, was said to have derived its name. (Paus. v. 5 § 4.) Another tradition derived the name from Lepreus, a son of Caucon, Glaucou, or Pyrgus (Aelian, V. H. i. 24; Paus. v. 5 § 4), by Atydameia. He was a grandson of Poseidon (the Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Jon. 32, calls him a son of Poseidon), and a rival of Hercules both in his strength and his powers of eating, but he was conquered and slain by him. His name was believed to exist at Phigalia. (Athen. x. p. 411, &c.; Paus. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1523.) [L. S.]

LEPREUS. [LEPREA.]

Q. LEPTA, a native of Cales in Campania, and prefectus fabrum to Cicero in Cilicia a. c. 51. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 7, v. 10). Two of the letters which Cicero addressed to him are extant (ad Fam. vi. 18, 19), and show strict intimacy between the correspondents. Lepta was a Pompeian; and while Cicero, in a. c. 49, was hesitating whether to remain in Italy, or to repair to Pompey's camp, Lepta was one of his channels of communication with the Pompeians (ad Fam. vi. 18, xiv. 17, xvi. 4, ad Att. vi. 8, viii. 3, ix. 12, 14, xi. 8.); and at the close of the war, after the battle of Munda, Lepta, through his zeal for two of his fellow-townsmen of Cales, was hazarding his own interests with the Caesarians. (ad Fam. ix. 13.) In a. c. 45 he was, however, suing for a commission to supply the wine for Caesar's triumphal games, for which his connection with Cales in the vine district (agr. Falernus) of Campania probably afforded him facilities. (ad Att. xiii. 46.) Cicero dissuaded him from undertaking it, as likely to prove a laborious and thankless task (ad Fam. vi. 19). He was one of Cicero's debtors. (ad Att. x. 11.) Lepta had at least one son, to whom Cicero (ad Fam. vi. 18) recommends the reading of his treatise de Oratore, and a precept of Hesiod. (Op. et dies, 287.) [W. B. D.]

LEPTINES (Λεπτινός). 1. A Syracusan, son of Hemocrates, and brother of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He is first mentioned as commanding his brother's fleet at the siege of Motya (a. c. 397), and was for some time entrusted by Dionysius with the whole direction of the siege, while the latter was engaged in reducing the other towns still held by the Carthaginians. (Diod. xiv. 48.) After the fall of Motya he was stationed there with a fleet of 120 ships, to watch for and intercept the Carthaginian fleet under Himilco; but the latter eluded his vigilance, and effected his passage to Panormus in safety, with the greater part of his forces, though Leptines pursued them, and sunk fifty of his transports, containing 5000 troops. (Id. 53–55.) The face of affairs was now changed: Himilco was able to advance unopposed along the north coast of the island, and took and destroyed Messana; from whence he advanced upon Syracuse, his fleet, under Mago, supporting the operations of the army. Leptines, by his brother's orders, immediately advanced with the Syracusan fleet to engage that of Mago, and a great naval action ensued, in which Leptines displayed the utmost valour; but having imprudently advanced with 30 of his best ships into the midst of the enemy, he was cut off from the rest of his fleet, and only able to effect his escape by standing out to sea. The result was, that the Syracusans were defeated with great loss, many of their ships fell into the hands of the enemy, and Leptines himself retired with the rest to Syracuse. During the siege that followed, he continued to render important services, and commanded (together with the Lacedaemonian Pharacidas) the final attack upon the naval camp of the Carthaginians, which terminated in the complete destruction of their fleet. (Diod. xiv. 59, 60, 64, 72.) We hear no more of him until a. c. 390, when he was again despatched by Dionysius with a fleet to the assistance of the Lucanians against the Italian Greeks. He arrived just as the former had gained a great victory over the Thuriens; but instead of joining them to crush their enemies, he afforded a refuge to the Thurian fugitives, and succeeded in bringing about a peace between the contending parties. For this conduct, which was entirely opposed to the views of Dionysius, he was deprived of the command of the fleet, which was given to his younger brother, Thearidea. (Id. xiv. 102.) Some time afterwards he gave farther offence to the jealous temper of the tyrant, by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Philistus, without any previous intimation to Dionysius, and on this account he was banished from Syracuse, together with Philistus. He thereupon retired to Thurii, where the services rendered by him to that city during the late war with the Lucanians secured him a favourable reception; and he quickly rose to so much power and influence among the Greeks of Italy, that Dionysius judged it prudent to recal his sentence of banishment, and invite him again to Syracuse. Here he was completely reinstated in his former favour, and obtained one of the daughters of Dionysius in marriage. (Diod. xv. 7; Plut. Dion. 11.) In a. c. 383, war having again broken out with the Carthaginians, Leptines once more took an active part in the support of his brother, and commanded the right wing of the Syracusan army in the battle near Cronium: but after displaying the greatest personal prowess, he himself fell in the action, and the troops under his command immediately gave way. (Diod. xv. 17.)

2. A Syracusan, who joined with Callippus in expelling the garrison of the younger Dionysius from Rhegium, a. c. 351. Having effected this, they restored the city to nominal independence, but it appears that they continued to occupy it with their mercenaries: and not long afterwards Leptines took advantage of the discontent which had arisen among these, to remove Callippus by assassination. (Diod. xvi. 45; Plut. Dion. 58.) We know nothing of his subsequent proceedings, nor of the circumstances that led him to quit Rhegium, but it seems probable that he availed himself of the state of confusion in which Sicily then was to make himself master of the two cities of Apollonia and Engyum: at least there is little doubt that the Leptines whom we find established as the tyrant of those cities when Timoleon arrived in Sicily is the same with the associate of Callippus. He was expelled in common with all the other petty tyrants, by Timoleon; but his life was spared, and he was sent into exile at Corinth, B. c. 342. (Diod. xvi. 72; Plut. Timol. 24.)

3. One of the generals of Agathocles, who, during the absence of that monarch in Africa, defeated Xenodocus, the governor of Agrigentum, in a pitched battle, and with great slaughter. (Diod. xx. 56.) When Agathocles, after repairing for a short time to Sicily, returned once more to Africa, B. c. 307, he again left Leptines in command during his absence, who obtained a second victory over Xenodocus. (Id. xx. 61, 62.)

4. A Syracusan, whose daughter was married to Hieron, afterwards king of Syracuse. Leptines was at that time, we are told, unquestionably the man of the highest consideration among his fellow-citizens, which induced Hieron, who had just been appointed general of the republic, but was already aiming at higher objects, to court his alliance. (Polyb. i. 9.)

against which the celebrated oration of Demosthenes is directed, usually known as the oration against Leptines. This speech was delivered in a. c. 355: and the law must have been passed above a year before, as we are told that the lapse of more than that period had already exempted Leptines from all personal responsibility. Hence the efforts of Demosthenes were directed solely to the repeal of the law, not to the punishment of its proposer. It appears that his arguments were successful, and the law was in fact repealed. (See Wolf. Prolegom. ad Demosth. Orat. adv. Leptinem; Liban. Argum. p. 452; Dion. Hal. Ep. ad Amm. i. 4.)

6. A Syrian Greek, who assassinated with his own hand at Laodiceia, Cn. Octavius, the chief of the Roman deputies, who had been sent to examine into the state of affairs in Syria. This murder took place during the short reign of Antiochus Eupator (a. c. 162), and not without the connivance, as was supposed, of Lysias, the minister and governor of the young king. As soon as Demetrius had established himself on the throne, wishing to conciliate the favour of the Romans, he caused Leptines, who, far from denying the deed, had the audacity to boast of it publicly, to be seized, and sent as a prisoner to Rome: but the senate refused to receive him, being desirous, as we are told, to reserve this cause of complaint as a public grievance, instead of visiting it on the head of an individual. (Polyb. xxxi. 19, xxxii. 4, 6, 7; Appian, Syr. 46, 47; Diod. Exc. Legat. xxxi. p. 526; Cic. Philipp. ix. 2.) [E. H. B.]

LESBOCLES, a Greek rhetorician, who lived at Rome in the time of the emperor Tiberius. (Senec. Suasor. ii. p. 18.) He was a rival of Latron; and a short fragment of one of his speeches is preserved in Seneca. (Controv. i. 8, p. 130, &c.) [L. S.]

LESBOCLES, a celebrated statuary, none of whose works, however, were known to Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 25, where the name is differently spelt in the MSS. It is important also to observe, that instead of "Lesboeles, Prodonus, Pythodiceus, Polygnotus: idem pictores nobilissimi," the Bamberg MS. has "idem pictor e nobilissimis," which is evidently right. [P. S.]

LESBONAX (Λεσβώναξ). 1. A son of Potamon of Mytilene, a philosopher and sophist, who lived in the time of Augustus. He was a pupil of Timocrates, and the father of Polemon, who is known as the teacher and friend of the emperor Tiberius. (Suidas, s. v.; Eudoc. p. 283.) Suidas says that Lesbonax wrote several philosophical works, but does not mention that he was an orator or rhetorician, although there can be no doubt that he is the same person as the Lesbonax who wrote μελέται ῥητορικά and ῥητορικά ἐπιστολά (Schol. ad Luc. de Saltat. 69), and the one of whom, in the time of Photius (Bibl. Cod. 74, p. 52), there were extant sixteen political orations. Of these orations only two have come down to us, one entitled περὶ τοῦ πολέμου Κορυθαίου, and the other προσπετικὸς λόγος, both of which are not unsuccessful imitations of the Attic orators of the best times. They are printed in the collections of the Greek orators published by Aldus, H. Stephens, Reiske, Bekker, and Dobson: a separate edition was published by J. C. Orelli, Lipsiae, 1820, 8vo.

2. A Greek grammarian, whose age is unknown, but who must at any rate be assigned to a much later period than the rhetorician Lesbonax. He is the author of a little work on grammatical figures (περὶ σχημάτων), which was first published by Valckenaeus in his edition of Ammonius (p. 177, or in the Leipz. edit. p. 165, &c.; comp. p. xviii. &c.) This little treatise is not without some importance, since it contains things which are not mentioned anywhere else. [L. S.]

LESBOTHEMIS (Λεσβοθέμις), was a statuary of an ancient date, and probably a native of Lesbos. He is the only artist who is mentioned in connection with that island. His statue of one of the Muses holding a lyre of the ancient form (σαμβύκη) at Mytilene, was mentioned by Euphorion in his περὶ ἱερῶν (Athen. iv. p. 182, e, xiv. p. 635, a, b.; Meineke, Euphor. Fr. 31, Anal. Mus. p. 67, Fr. 32). [P. S.]

LESCHES or LESCHEUS (Λεσχες, Λεσχεις), one of the so-called cyclic poets, the son of Aechylinus, a native of Pyrrha, in the neighbourhood of Mytilene (Paus. x. 25, § 5), and thence also called a Mytilenean or a Lesbian. He flourished about the 18th Olympiad; and therefore the tale, which is related about a contest between him and Arctinus, who lived about the beginning of the Olympiads, is an anachronism. This tradition is explained by the fact that Lesches treated, at least to some extent, the same events in his Little Iliad (Ἰλίου ἥδυσαν or Ἰλίου μικρά), which were the subject of Arctinus's Aethiopia. The little Iliad, like all the other cyclic poems, was ascribed to various poets — to Homer himself, to Thestorides of Phocaea (Herod. Vit. Hom. 16), to the Lacedaemonian Cinaethon, and Diodorus of Erythrae. The poem consisted of four books, according to Proclus, who has preserved an extract from it. It was evidently intended as a supplement to the Homeric Iliad; consequently it related the events after the death of Hector, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, and Ulysses, and the final capture and destruction of Troy (Arist. Post. 23, Bekk.), which part of the poem was called The Destruction of Troy (Ἰλίου πέρος). There was no unity in the poem, except that of historical and chronological succession. Hence Aristotle remarks that the little Iliad furnished materials for eight tragedies, whilst only one could be based upon the Iliad or Odyssey of Homer. The extracts which Proclus gives of the poem of Lesches are interwoven with those from the Aethiopis of Arctinus. It is not to be presumed, as Müller shows (Hist. of Greek Lit. vi. § 3), that either poet should have broken off in the middle of an event, in order that the other might fill up the gap. The different times at which they lived is sufficient proof to the contrary, and there are fragments extant which show that Lesches had treated of those events also which in Proclus's extract are not taken from him, but from Arctinus. (Comp. Welcker, der Epische Cyclos, pp. 272, 358, 368.) [W. L.]

LETHE (Λήθη), the personification of oblivion, is called by Hesiod (Theog. 227) a daughter of Eris. A river in the lower world likewise bore the name of Lethe. [HADES.] [L. S.]

LETO (Λητώ), in Latin LATONA, according to Hesiod (Theog. 406, 921), a daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phoebe, a sister of Asteria, and the mother of Apollo and Artemis by Zeus, to whom she was married before Hera. Homer, who likewise calls her the mother of Apollo and Artemis by Zeus (Il. i. 9, xiv. 327, xxi. 499, Od. xi. 318, 346).

mentions her as the friend of the Trojans in the war with the Greeks, and in the story of Niobe, who paid so dearly for her conduct towards Leto. (Il. v. 447, xi. 40, 72, xxiv. 607; comp. xxi. 502, Od. xi. 580, Hymn. in Apoll. 45, &c., 89, &c.) In later writers these elements of her story are variously worked out and embellished, for they do not describe her as the lawful wife of Zeus, but merely as a concubine, who was persecuted during her pregnancy by Hera. (Apollod. i. 4, § 1; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 61, &c.; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 232, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 140.) All the world being afraid of receiving her on account of Hera, she wandered about till she came to the island of Delos, which was then a floating island, and bore the name Asteria (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 35, 37, 191); but when Leto touched it, it suddenly stood still upon four pillars. (Pind. Fragm. 38; Strab. xi. p. 485.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 93, 140), Delos was previously called Ortygia, while Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Κορυσσός) mentions a tradition, according to which Artemis was not born in Delos, but at Corissus. Servius (ad Aen. iii. 72) relates the following legends: Zeus changed Leto into a quail (σπυζή), and in this state she arrived in the floating island, which was hence called Ortygia; or, Zeus was enamoured with Asteria, but she being metamorphosed, through her prayers, into a bird, flew across the sea; she was then changed into a rock, which, for a long time, lay under the surface of the sea; but, at the request of Leto, it rose and received Leto, who was pursued by Python. Leto then gave birth to Apollo, who slew Python. (Comp. Anton. Lib. 35; Ov. Met. vi. 370; Aristot. Hist. Anim. vi. 35; Athen. xv. 701; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 707; Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 10; Strab. xiv. p. 639: in each of these passages we find the tradition modified in a particular way.) But notwithstanding the many discrepancies, especially in regard to the place where Leto gave birth to her children, most traditions agree in describing Delos as the place. (Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. init. 59, in Del. 206, 261; Aeschyl. Eum. 9; Herod. ii. 170.) After the birth of Apollo, his mother not being able to nurse him, Themis gave him uctar and ambrosia; and by his birth the island of Delos became sacred, so that henceforth it was not lawful for any human being to be born or to die on the island; and every pregnant woman was conveyed to the neighbouring island of Rheneia, in order not to pollute Delos. (Strab. x. p. 486.)

We shall pass over the various speculations of modern writers respecting the origin and nature of this divinity, and shall mention only the most probable, according to which Leto is "the obscure" or "concealed," not as a physical power, but as a divinity yet quiescent and invisible, from whom is issued the visible divinity with all his splendour and brilliancy. This view is supported by the account of her genealogy given by Hesiod; and her whole legend seems to indicate nothing else but the issuing from darkness to light, and a return from the latter to the former. Leto was generally worshipped only in conjunction with her children, as at Megara (Paus. i. 44. § 2), at Argos (ii. 21. § 10), at Amphigeneia (Strab. viii. p. 349), in Lycia (Ghid. xiv. p. 665), near Lete in Macedonia (Steph. Byz. s. v. Λετρή), in a grove near Calynda in Caria (Strab. xiv. p. 651), and other places. (Comp. Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. Tab. v. 4.) [L. S.]

LETREUS (Λετρεός), a son of Pelops, and the reputed founder of Letrini, on the western coast of Peloponnesus. (Paus. vi. 22. § 5.) [L. S.]

LEVANA, a Roman divinity, who derived her name from the custom that the father picked up his new-born child from the ground, by which symbolic act he declared his intention not to kill the child, but to bring it up. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 11.) [L. S.]

LEUCA'DIUS (Λευκάδιος), a son of Icarus and Polycaste, and a brother of Penelope and Alyzeu. Leucas was believed to have derived its name from him. (Strab. x. pp. 452, 461.) Leucadius or Leucates also occurs as a surname of Apollo, which he derived from a temple in Leucæa. (Strab. l. c.; Ov. Triad. iii. l. 42; Propert. iii. 11. 69; comp. Thuc. iii. 94; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 274.) [L. S.]

LEUCAEUS (Λευκαίος), a surname of Zeus, under which he was worshipped at Lepreus, in Elia. (Paus. v. 5. § 4.) [L. S.]

LEUCE (Λευκή), a nymph, a daughter of Oceanus, who was carried off by Pluto; and after her death, was changed into a white poplar in Elysium. (Serv. ad Virg. Ecol. vii. 61.) [L. S.]

LEUCIPPE (Λευκίππη). 1. One of the nymphs who was with Persephone at the time she was carried off. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 418; Paus. iv. 30. § 4.)

2. [ALCATHON.]

3. The wife of Ilus, and mother of Laomedon. (Hygin. Fab. 250.)

4. A daughter of Thestor. (Hygin. Fab. 190.)

5. The wife of Thestius. (Hygin. Fab. 14.)

6. A daughter of Minyas of Orchomenos. (Aelian, Var. Hist. iii. 42.) [L. S.]

LEUCIPPIDES (Λευκιππίδες), i. e. the daughters of the Messenian prince Leucippus. (Eurip. Helen. 1467.) Their names were Phoebe and Hilineira, and they were priestesses of Athena and Artemis, and betrothed to Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus; but Castor and Polydeuces being charmed with their beauty, carried them off and married them. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 8, 10. § 3; Paus. i. 18. § 1.) When the sons of Aphareus attempted to rescue their beloved brides, they were both slain by the Dioscuri. (Hygin. Fab. 80; Lactant. i. 10; Ov. Heroid. xvi. 327, Fast. v. 709; Theocrit. xxii. 137, &c.; Propert. i. 2. 15, &c.) [L. S.]

LEUCIPPUS (Λευκίππος). 1. A son of Oenomaus. (Paus. viii. 20. § 2; Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 212; comp. DAPHNE.)

2. A son of Perieres and Gorgophone, and brother of Aphareus. He was the father of Arincoe, Phoebe, and Hilineira, and prince of the Messenians. He is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters, and the Boeotian town of Leuctra is said to have derived its name from him. (Paus. iii. 26. § 3, iv. 2. § 3, 31. § 9; Ov. Met. viii. 306; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3, 11. § 2.)

3. A son of Thurimachus, and father of Calchinia, was king of Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 5. § 5.)

4. A son of Heracles and Eurytele. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

5. A son of Narxus, and father of Smerdus, was king of Naxos. (Diod. v. 51.)

6. The leader of a colony, which Macareus conducted from Lesbos to Rhodes. (Diod. v. 81.)

7. One of the Achaean settlers at Metapontum. (Strab. vi. p. 265.) [L. S.]

LEUCIPPUS (Λευκίππος), a Grecian philosopher, who is on all hands admitted to have been the founder of the atomic theory of the ancient philosophy. Where and when he was born we have no data for deciding. Miletus, Abdera, and Elis have been assigned as his birth-place; the first, apparently, for no other reason than that it was the birth-place of several natural philosophers; the second, because Democritus, who carried out his theory of atoms, came from that town; Elis, because he was looked upon as a disciple of the Eleatic school. The period when he lived is equally uncertain. He is called the teacher of Democritus (Diog. Laërt. ix. 34), the disciple of Parmenides (Simplic. Phys. fol. 7, a), or, according to other accounts, of Zeno, of Melissus, nay even of Pythagoras (Simplic. l. c.; Diog. Laërt. ix. 30; Tzet. Chil. ii. 930; Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 104). From the circumstance that Parmenides and Anaxagoras had objected to some doctrines which we find connected with the atomic theory, and from the obscurity that hangs over the personal history and doctrines of Leucippus, Ritter (Geschichte d. Phil. vol. i. book vi. c. 2) is inclined to believe that Leucippus lived at a time when intercourse between the learned of the different Grecian states was unfrequent. With regard to his philosophical system it is impossible to speak with precision or certainty, as Aristotle and the other writers who mention him, either speak of him in conjunction with Democritus, or attribute to him doctrines which are in like manner attributed to Democritus. Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 30—33) attempts an exposition of some of his leading doctrines. Some notices will also be found in Aristotle (De Anima, i. 2), Plutarch (De Placitis Phil. 17, p. 883), and Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 24). For an account of the general features of the atomic theory, as developed by Democritus, the reader is referred to that article.

[C. P. M.]
LEUCON (Λεύκων). 1. A son of Poseidon or Athamas and Themisto, was the father of Erythrus and Euippe. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7, ix. 34. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 157; Apollod. i. 9. § 2.)

2. One of the seven Archagetae, to whom the Plataeans, before the beginning of a battle, offered a sacrifice, by the command of an oracle. (Plut. Aristid. 11.) [L. S.]

LEUCON (Λεύκων), historical. 1. One of the seven commanders who were sacrificed by the Plataeans, the eve of the battle of Plataeae, in obedience to an oracle (Plut. Arist. 11; Müller, Orchom. p. 214).

2. A powerful king of Bosphorus, whose reign lasted nearly forty years, from 393 to 353 a.c. He was the son of Satyrus, and the fifth king of the dynasty of the Archæanactidae. He conquered Theodosia, at the siege of which his father had fallen. He was in close alliance with the Athenians, whom he supplied with corn in great abundance, and who, in return for his services, admitted him and his sons to the citizenship of Athens, and voted him three statues. Other incidents of his life, which are not of sufficient importance to be mentioned here, are related by the writers quoted. They all go to prove that he was a wise and powerful prince. (Diod. xiv. 93, xvi. 91, with Wesseling's notes; Dem. c. Leptin. pp. 466, 467; Strab. vii. p. 310, f.; Polyæn. vi. 9; Athen. vi. p. 257, c.; Aelian, V. H. vi. 13, with the note of Perizonius; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. App. No. 13.) [P. S.]

LEUCON (Λεύκων), the son of Hagnon, according to Toup's emendation of Suidas (s. v.), an Athenian comic poet, of the old comedy, was a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. In B. C. 422 he contended, with his Πρόδρομος, against the Ψάππος of Aristophanes, and in the following year, with his Ἐπιδρέπες, against the Ποσειδὸν of Aristophanes, and the Κόλακας of Eupolis; on both occasions he obtained the third place (Didasc. ad Vesp. d. Par.) Suidas also mentions his Ὅρος δεικνόμενος. The story on which this play was founded is explained by Böckh (Publ. Oecon. of Ath. p. 324, 2nd edit.).

No fragments of his plays survive. The title Ἐπιδρέπες is usually corrupted into Ἐπιδρέπες, but Meineke shows that the other is the true form. (Athen. viii. p. 343. c.; Suid. s. v. Ἀλέξανδρος; Hesych. s. v. Πάδωρις; Phot. s. v. Τίσιος; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 217, 218.) [P. S.]

LEUCON (Λεύκων), a sculptor of an unknown date. A dog by him is mentioned in an epigram by Macedonius (Brunck, Anac. vol. iii. p. 118, No. 27, Anth. Pal. vi. 173), in terms which imply that it was a first-rate work. Winckelmann (Gesch. d. Kunst, b. v. c. 6. § 23) conjectures that this is the dog, in a sitting posture, in marble, which was discovered at Rome, and brought to England. In Meyer's note on the passage of Winckelmann, it is stated that the statue was purchased by a gentleman named Duncombe, in Yorkshire. [P. S.]

2. One of the daughters of Minyas (Ov. Met. iv. 168), but she is elsewhere called Leucippe. [ALCATHOR.] [L. S.]

LEUCOPHRYNE (Λευκοφρόνη). 1. A surname of Artemis, derived from the town of Leocophrys in Phrygia, where, as well as at Magnesia on the Maeander, she had a splendid temple. (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 2 § 19; Strab. xiv. p. 647; Tac. Ann. iii. 62; Athen. xv. p. 683.) The sons of Themistocles dedicated a statue to her on the Acropolis at Athens, because Themistocles had once ruled at Magnesia. (Paus. i. 26. § 4; Thuc. i. 138; Plut. Themist. 29.) There was also a statue of her at Amyclæ, which had been dedicated by the Magnesians Bathyclæa. (Paus. iii. 18. § 6.) Her temple at Magnesia had been built by Hermogenes, who had also written a work upon it. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. 3, 1.)

2. A nymph or priestess of Artemis Leucophryne, whose tomb was shown in the temple of the goddess at Magnesia. (Theodoret. Serm. & p. 598; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 6.) [L. S.]

LEUCOTHEA. [INO and ATHAMAS.]

LEUCOTHOE, a daughter of the Balyrimian king Orchamus and Eurynome, was beloved by Apollo; but her amour was betrayed by the jealous Clytia to her father, who buried her alive; whereupon Apollo metamorphosed her into an increase shrub. (Ov. Met. iv. 208, &c.) Leucothoe is in some writers only another form for Leucothea. (Hygin. Fab. 125.) [L. S.]

LEXIPHANES (Λεξιφάνης), an Athenian comic poet, quoted by Alciphron (Epist. iii. 71). It is uncertain whether he belonged to the middle or to the new comedy. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 493.) [P. S.]

LIBANIUS (Λιβάνιος), the most distinguished among the Greek sophists and rhetoricians of the fourth century of our era. He was born at Antioch, on the Orontes, and belonged to an illustrious family of that place; but the year of his birth is uncertain, some assigning it to A. D. 314, and others two years later, according to a passage in one of the orations of Libanius (i. p. 94, ed. Reiske). He received his first education, which was probably not of a very high character, in his native place, but being urged on by an invincible desire of acquiring knowledge and cultivating his mind, he went to Athens. He himself mentions among his teachers Cleobulus, Didymus, and Zenobius (Epist. 50, 100, 321, 407, 1181). While at Athens, he became the object of a series of intrigues, against which he had to struggle throughout his subsequent life. The pedantry then prevalent at Athens, to which he was obliged to submit, made a bad impression upon him, so that he appears to have devoted himself more to private study than to the methodic but pedantic system adopted in the schools (Liban. De Fort. sua, p. 13, &c.; Eunap. Vit. Sop. p. 130). His favourite study was the classical writers of Greece, and the love he thus early imbibed for them, accompanied him through life (De Fort. sua, pp. 9, 100, 144; Eunap. p. 131). His talent and perseverance attracted general attention, and he had the certain prospect of obtaining the chair of rhetoric at Athens (De Fort. sua, p. 19, &c.), but he himself was not inclined to accept the office, and left Athens, accompanying his friend Crispinus to Heracleia in Pontus (De Fort. sua, p. 21, &c.). On his return, as he passed through Constantinople, he was prevailed upon by the rhetorician Nicocles, who held out to him the most brilliant prospects, to remain in that capital; but before he settled there, he went to Athens to settle some of his affairs. On his return to Constantinople, he found that a sophist from Cappadocia had in the meantime occupied the place which he had hoped to obtain (De Fort. sua, p. 25, &c.). He was accordingly obliged to set up a private school, and in a short time he obtained so large a number of pupils, that the classes of the public professors were completely deserted (l. c. p. 29). The latter, stimulated by envy and jealousy, devised means of revenge: they charged him with being a magician, and the prefect Limenius, who was a personal enemy of Libanius, supported them, and about A. D. 346 expelled him from the city of Constantinople (l. c. p. 50, &c.; Eunap. p. 131, &c.). He went to Nicomedeia, where he taught with equal success, but also drew upon himself an equal degree of malice from his opponents (De Fort. sua, p. 36, &c.). After a stay of five years, which he himself calls the happiest of his whole life (l. c. p. 38), he was called back to Constantinople. But he met with a cool reception there, and soon after returned to Nicomedeia, to which place he had formed a strong attachment. An epidemic disease, however, which raged there, obliged him again to go back to Constantinople (l. c. p. 54, &c.). Strategius, one of his friends, procured him an invitation to the chair of rhetoric at Athens, which however Libanius declined to accept (l. c. p. 58, &c.), and being tired of the annoyances to which he was exposed at Constantinople, he paid a visit to his native city of Antioch; and as on his return to Constantinople, he began to suffer from ill health, his medical attendants advised him to give up teaching, and he sued for and obtained from the emperor Gallus permission to settle at Antioch, where he spent the remainder of his life. The emperor Julian, who showed him great favour and admired his talent, corresponded with him (l. c. p. 57; Eunap. p. 135; Suidas, s. v. Λιβάνιος). In the reign of Valens he was at first persecuted, but he afterwards succeeded in winning the favour of that monarch also; Libanius wrote a eulogy upon him, and prevailed upon him to promulgate a law by which certain advantages were granted to natural children, in which Libanius himself was interested, because he himself was not married, but lived in concubinage (l. c. pp. 97, 125, 166; Eunap. p. 133). The emperor Theodosius likewise showed him esteem (De Fort. sua, p. 137), but notwithstanding the marks of distinction he received from high quarters, his enjoyment of life was disturbed by ill health (l. c. pp. 94, &c., 119, 146, &c.), by misfortunes in his family (l. c. pp. 67, &c., 126, &c., 165, &c.), and more especially by the disputes in which he was incessantly involved, partly with rival sophists, and partly with the prefects (l. c. pp. 76, 86, 69, &c., 92, &c., 98, &c., 112, &c.). It cannot, however, be denied, that he himself was as much to blame as his opponents, for he appears to have provoked them by his querulous disposition, and by the pride and vanity which everywhere appear in his orations, and which led him to interfere in political questions which it would have been wiser to have left alone (l. c. pp. 129, 132, 140). In other respects, however, his personal character seems to have been gentle and moderate, for although he was a pagan, and sympathized with the emperor Julian in all his views and plans, still he always showed a praiseworthy toleration towards the Christians. He was the teacher of St. Basil and John Chrysostom, with whom he always kept up a friendly relation. The year of his death is uncertain, but from one of his epistles it is evident that in A. D. 391 he must have been still alive (Epist. 941), but it is probable that he died a few years after, in the reign of Arcadius.

This account of the life of Libanius is mainly based upon an autobiography of the rhetorician which is prefixed to Reiske's of his works (vol. i. p. 1, &c.), under the title Bios ἡ λόγιος περὶ τῆς αὐτοῦ τύχης, or De Fortuna sua, the brief article of Suidas (s. v. Λιβάνιος), and on the information given by Eunapius in his Vitae Sophistarum (p. 139, &c.). We still possess a considerable number of the works of Libanius, but how many may have been lost is uncertain.

1. Προγυμνασμάτων παραδείγματα, i. e. model pieces for rhetorical exercises, in thirteen sections, to which, however, some more sections were added by F. Morellus in his edition (Paris, 1606). But modern criticism has shown pretty clearly that the additions of Morellus are the productions of two other rhetoricians, Nicolaus and Severus (Waltz, Rhet. Graec. i. pp. 394, &c., 546).

2. Λόγοι or orations, whose number, in Reiske's edition, amounts to sixty-five (vol. i.—iii.). Another oration of Libanius Περὶ Ὀλυμπίου, was discovered in a Barberini MS. by J. Ph. Siebenkees, who published it in his Anecdota Graeca (Nürnberg, 1798, pp. 75, 89). A sixty-seventh oration was first published by A. Mai in his second edition of Fronto (Rome, 1823, p. 421, &c.).

3. Μελέται or declamations, i. e. orations on fictitious subjects, and descriptions of various kinds. Their number in Reiske's edition is forty-eight, but two additional ones were published afterwards, one by F. Morellus (Venice, 1785, 8vo.), and the other by Boissonade, in his Anecdota Graeca (i. pp. 165—171).

4. A life of Demosthenes, and arguments to the speeches of the same orator. They are printed in Reiske's edition of Libanius (iv. p. 266, &c.), and also in most of the editions of Demosthenes.

5. Ἐπιστολαί, or letters, of which a very large number is still extant. In the edition of J. C. Wolf (Amsterdam, 1738, fol.) there are no less than 1605 epistles in Greek, in addition to which there are 397 epistles of which we only possess a Latin translation by Zambicarius, first published at Krakau, but reprinted with several others in Wolf's edition (p. 735, &c.). Two other letters in the Greek original were published by Bloch, in Munter's Miscellanea (Hafniae, i. 2, p. 139, &c.). Many of these letters are extremely interesting, being addressed to the most eminent men of his time, such as the emperor Julian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, John Chrysostom, and others. In this collection there are also many very short letters, being either letters of introduction, or formal notes of politeness and the like. The style in all of them is neat and elegant. Among the same class of literary compositions we may also reckon the ἑπιστολικαὶ χαρακτῆρες, or formulae of letters, which were first edited by W. Morellus (Paris, 1551, 1558, 8vo.), and afterwards at Lugdunum (1618, 12mo.). Many epistles as well as orations are still extant in MS. at Madrid, Venice, and other places, but have never been published, and others which are now and then alluded to by later writers seem to be lost.

As regards the style of Libanius as an orator, some modern critics have called him a real model of pure Attic Greek (Reiske, Præf. p. xvii.), but this is carrying praise too far, and even Photius entertained a much more correct opinion of him (Bibl. Cod. 90, p. 67, b.). There can be no doubt that Libanius is by far the most talented and most successful among the rhetoricians of the fourth century; he took the best orators of the classic age as his models, and we can often see in him the disciple and happy imitator of Demosthenes, and his animated descriptions are often full of power and elegance; but he is not able always to rise above the spirit of his age, and we rarely find in him that natural simplicity which constitutes the great charm of the best Attic orators. His diction is a curious mixture of the pure old Attic with what may be termed modern, and the latter would be more excusable, if he did not so often claim for himself the excellencies of the ancient orators. In addition to this, it is evident that, like all other rhetoricians, he is more concerned about the form than about the substance, whence Eunapius (p. 133) calls his orations weak, dead, and lifeless. This tendency not seldom renders his style obscure, notwithstanding his striving after purity, inasmuch as he sometimes sacrifices the logical connection of his sentences to his rhetorical mode of expressing them. As far as the history of Libanius's age is concerned, however, some of his orations, and still more his epistles are of great value, such as the oration in which he relates the events of his own life, the eulogies on Constantius and Constant, the orations to and on Julian, several orations describing the condition of Antioch, and those which he wrote against his professional and political opponents.

A complete edition of all the works of Libanius does not yet exist. The first edition of the Progygnasmata appeared under the name of Theon, together with a similar work by the latter author, at Basel, 1641, 8vo., edited by J. Cammerarius; a more complete edition is that of F. Morellus (Libanii Proœudia Orat. LXXII., Declam. XLV., et Dissertat. Moral., Paris, 1606, fol.), but some further additions were subsequently made by Les Allatius, and the whole is to be found in Reiske's edition (vol. iv. p. 853, &c.). The orations and declamations were first published, though very incomplete, at Ferrara, 1517, 4to., then in the above-mentioned edition of F. Morellus; and after several more had been published from MSS. by J. Gothofredus, Fabricius and A. Bongiovanni, a complete collection, with some fresh additions, was published by J. J. Reiske (Libanii Sophistae Orationes et Declamationes ad fidem codd. recens. et perpet. annotat. illustravit, Altenburg, 1791-97, 4 vols. 8vo.). The best edition of the epistles is that of J. Ch. Wolf (Libanii Epistolae, Graece et Latine edit. et notis illustr., Amsterdam, 1738, fol.). For further particulars see J. G. Berger, De Libanio Disputationes Sex, Vitebergae, 1696, &c., 4to.; Reiske, in the first vol. of his edition; F. C. Petersen, Commentat. de Libanio Sophista, part i. (containing an account of the life of Libanius); Hafniae, 1827, 4to.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. p. 750, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 103, and Beilage, xv. p. 330, &c.

Four other persons of the name of Libanius, none of whom is of any importance are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x. p. 106). [L.S.]

LIBENTINA, LUBENTINA, or LUBENTIA, a surname of Venus among the Romans, by which she is described as the goddess of sexual pleasure (dea libidinis, Varr. de Ling. Lat. v. 6; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 23; August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 8; Nonius, i. 324; Plant. Astia. ii. 2; Arnob. adv. Gent. i. p. 15, who however speaks of Libentini dii). [L.S.]

LIBER. This name, or Liber pater, is frequently applied by the Roman poets to the Greek Bacchus or Dionysus, who was accordingly regarded as identical with the Italian Liber. Cicero (de Nat. Deor. ii. 24), however, very justly distinguishes between Dionysus (the Greek Liber) and the Liber who was worshipped by the early Italians in conjunction with Ceres and Libera. Liber and the feminine Libera were ancient Italian divinities, presiding over the cultivation of the vine and fertility of the fields; and this seems to have given rise to the combination of their worship with that of Ceres. A temple of these three divinities was vowed by the dictator, A. Postumius, in B.C. 496, near the Circus Flaminius; it was afterwards restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius (Tac. Ann. ii. 49; Dionys. vi. 17). The most probable etymology of the name Liber is from liberare; Servius (ad Virg. Georg. i. 7) indeed states that the Sabine name for Liber was Leobisus, but this seems to have been only an obsolete form for Liber, just as we are told that the ancient Romans said leobesus and leobertas for the later forms liber(us) and libertas. (Paul. Diac. p. 121. ed. Müller.) Hence Seneca (de Tranq. Anim. 12) says, "Liber dictus est quia liberat servitium corpori animi;" while others, who were evidently thinking of the Greek Bacchus, found in the name an allusion to licentious drinking and spending (Macrob. Sat. i. 18; August. de Civ. Dei, vi. 9; Paul. Diac. p. 115.) Poets usually call him Liber pater, the latter word being very commonly added by the Italians to the names of gods. The female Libera was identified by the Romans with Ceres.

Persephone, the daughter of Demeter (Ceres), whence Cicero (de Nat. Deor. ii. 24) calls Liber and Libera children of Ceres; whereas Ovid (Fast. iii. 512) calls Ariadne Libera. The festival of the Liberalia was celebrated by the Romans every year on the 17th of March. (Dict. of Ant. & v. Liberalis; Hartung, Die Religi. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 133, &c.; Klansen, Aeneas und die Penaten, vol. ii. p. 750, &c.) [L. S.]

LIBERA. [LIBER.]

LIBERALIS, ANTONINUS. [ANTONINUS, p. 212, b.]

LIBERALIS, SALVIUS, an eloquent pleader at Rome, whom the younger Pliny characterises as a man "subtilis, dispositus, acer, disertus," is first mentioned in the reign of Vespasian, when he spoke of the emperor with great boldness, in pleading the cause of a wealthy person who had been accused. He was brought to trial in the reign of Domitian, but what was the result of this trial we are not informed: he had the good fortune, at all events, of escaping with his life (Plin. Ep. iii. 9. § 33). His name again occurs in the reign of Trajan. In a c. 100 he defended with great ability Marius Priscus, who was accused by the younger Pliny, and by the historian Tacitus; and in the same year he was again opposed to Pliny in the celebrated cause brought by the inhabitants of the province of Baetica against Caecilius Classicus, and his accomplices. (Suet. Vesp. 13; Plin. Ep. ii. 11, iii. 9. § 36.)

LIBERATUS, a deacon of the church of Carthage in the sixth century. He was at Rome in A. D. 533, when the pope, Joannes II., received the bishops sent by the emperor, Justinian I., to consult him on the heresies broached by the monks, designated Acemetae (or, as Liberatus terms them, Acumiei), who had imbibed Nestorian opinions. (Liberat. Breviar. c. 20, comp. Epistola Justiniani ad Joann. et Joannis ad Justinianum, apud Concilia, vol. iv. col. 1742, &c. ed. Labbe.) He was again at Rome in 535, having been sent the previous year, together with the bishops Caius and Petrus, by the synod held at Carthage, under Reparatus, bishop of that see, to consult pope Joannes II. on the reception of those Arians who recanted their heresies into the church. Joannes was dead before the arrival of the African delegates; but they were received by pope Agapetus, his successor. (Epistola Agapeti ad Reparatum apud Concilia, ed. Labbe, vol. iv. col. 1791, 1792.) When, in 552, Reparatus was banished by Justinian to Euchaida, or Escayda (Vict. Tun. Chron.), Liberatus accompanied him, and probably remained with him till the bishop's death, in 563. Nothing further is known of him.

Liberatus is the author of a valuable contribution to ecclesiastical history entitled Breviarium huius Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum. It comprehends the history of a century and a quarter, from the ordination of Nestorius, A. D. 428, to the end of the fifth oecumenical (or second Constantinopolitan) council, A. D. 553, and is divided into 1 chapters. It was compiled, as the author tells us in his preface, from "the ecclesiastical history lately translated from Greek into Latin," apparently that translated by Epiphanius Scholasticus [EPIPHANIUS, No. 11], from the Greek ecclesiastical histories; from the acts of the councils and the letters of the fathers, from a document written in Greek Alexandria, and from the communications, apparently oral, of men of character and weight. He made considerable use of the Breviculus Historiarum Eutychianitarum, and of other sources of information not particularly mentioned by him. His Latin style is generally clear, without ornament, but unequal, from the bad Latin into which passages from Greek writers have been rendered. He has been charged with partiality to the Nestorians, or with following Nestorian writers too implicitly. The Breviarium is contained in most editions of the Concilia (vol. v. ed. Labbe, vol. vi. ed. Coleti, vol. ix. ed. Mansi); in those of Crabbe (vol. ii. fol. Cologn. 1538 and 1551) are some subjoined passages derived from various extant sources illustrative of the history, which are omitted by subsequent editors; and Hardouin has in his edition omitted the Breviarium itself. It was separately published, with a revised text, and a learned preface and notes, and a dissertation, De Quinta Synodo, by the Jesuit Garnier, 8vo. Paris, 1675; and is reprinted from his edition, with the preface, notes, and dissertation, in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. xii. fol. Venice, 1778. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. 543; Bibl. Med. et Inf. Latinit. vol. iv. 272, ed. Mansi; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 553; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. xvi. p. 543; Garnier, Praef. in Liberat.) [J. C. M.]

LIBERATOR, a surname of Jupiter, answering to the Greek Ἐλευθέριος, to whom Augustus built a temple on the Aventine. (Tac. Ann. xv. 64, xvi. 35; comp. Becker, Handb. der Röm. Alterth. i. p. 457.) [L. S.]

LIBERIUS, the successor of Julius as bishop of Rome, was ordained on the twenty-second of May, A. D. 352, at a period when the downfall of the usurper Magnentius being no longer doubtful, the Arians were straining every nerve to excite Constantius against their orthodox antagonists. The conduct of Liberius when he first assumed the papal dignity is involved in much obscurity. If we believe that either of the letters found among the fragments of Hilarius (frag. iv. col. 1327, and 1335, ed. Bened. fol. Paris, 1693),—the first inscribed Epistola Liberii Episcopi Urbis Romae ad Orientales Episcopos, and written apparently in 352; the second, belonging to a much later date, but containing allusions to the same events, Delectissimis Fratribus Presbyteris et Coepiscopis Orientalibus,—is genuine, there can be no doubt that at the outset of his career he took a violent part against Athanasius, and even excommunicated him from the Roman church. On the other hand, Dupin employs no less than seven distinct arguments to prove that the first must be spurious, although he says nothing with regard to the second, and both are by many divines regarded as Arian forgeries. It is at all events certain that the pope soon after displayed the utmost devotion to the cause of the persecuted Catholics; for after the legates deputed by him to the council of Arles, (A. D. 353), Vincentius of Capua, and Marcellinus, another Campanian bishop, had been gained over, after his representatives at Milan (A. D. 354), Eusebius of Vercelli, and Lucifer of Cagliari, had been driven into exile, after nearly all the prelates of the West had yielded to the influence of the court, Liberius stood firm to the truth; and although violently hurried from Rome to the presence of the emperor, he chose rather to suffer banishment than to subscribe the condemnation of one, whom he believed innocent. But after two years spent at Beroea, this noble resolution began to fail. He made overtures of submission, probably through Demophilus, the heretic bishop of the city where he had been compelled to take up his abode, and, having been summoned to Sirmium, signed in the presence of the council there assembled (the third, A. D. 357), the Arian creed sanctioned by that concave [POTAMUS], and the decrees against Athanasius. Upon this he was permitted to return to Rome, there to exercise a divided power along with a certain Felix, who had been nominated his successor. But the zeal of the people in favour of their ancient pastor frustrated this amicable arrangement. Violent tumults arose, Constantius yielded to the vehement display of popular feeling, Felix resigned, and his departure from the city was signalled by an inhuman massacre of his adherents. Liberius passed the remainder of his life in tranquillity, dying in A. D. 366, not however, we are assured, until he had once more changed his profession, by recanting all his errors and becoming a Catholic.

I. The correspondence of Liberius as exhibited by Constant comprises twelve epistles. 1. Ad Osim. 2. Ad Casilianum. 3. Ad Eusebium Vercellensem. 4. Ad Constantium Augustum. 5. 6. Ad Eusebium Vercellensem. 7. Ad Eusebium, Dionysium, et Luciferum exules. 8. Ad Orientales. 9. Ad Ursacium, Valentem, et Germinium, bishops in the imperial court. 10. Ad Vincentium Capuanum. 11. Ad Catholicos Episcopos Italiae. 12. Ad universos Orientis orthodoxos Episcopos, in Greek.

We find also ascribed to him :—

II. Dicta ad Eusebium spadonem, dum ipsum ut in Athanasium subscibens Imperatori obtemperaret adhortabatur.

III. Dialogus Liberii et Constantii Imperatoris, triduo antequam in exilium deportaretur, habitus.

IV. Oratio Liberii Marcellinam S. Ambrosii sororem dato virginitatis velo consecrantis.

Of the letters, eight (1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11) have been transmitted to us among the fragments of St. Hilarius, three (3, 5, 6) were first extracted by Baronius from the archives of the church at Vercelli, and one (12) is preserved by Socrates, H. E. iv. 12. The Dicta is found in the treatise of Athanasius Ad Monachos, the Dialogus in Theodoret, H. E. ii. 16, the Oratio in Ambrosius de Virgin. iii. 1, 2, 3.

For full information with regard to the works of this father and discussions on the authenticity of the various pieces, see Constant, Epistolae Pontificum Rom. fol. Paris, 1721, p. 421, and Galland, Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. p. 65, fol. Venet. 1769, who rejects epistles 8, 9, 10, as fabrications. (Amm. Marc. xv. 7; Hieronym. Chron.; Sulp. Sever. ii.; Socrat. H. E. iv. 12; Sozomen. H. E. iv. 15; Theodoret, H. E. ii. 17.) [W. R.]

LIBERTAS, the personification of Liberty, was worshipped at Rome as a divinity. A temple was erected to her on the Aventine by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, the expenses of which were defrayed by fines which had been exacted. Another was built by Clodius on the spot where Cicero's house had stood (Liv. xxiv. 16; Paul. Diac. p. 121; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 17, xxxix. 11), which Cicero afterwards contemptuously called Templum Licentiae (pro Dom. 51, de Leg. ii. 17). After Caesar's victories in Spain, the senate decreed the erection of a temple to Libertas at the public expense (Dion Cass. xliii. 44); and after the murder of Sejanus, a statue of her was set up in the forum. (Dion Cass. lviii. 12.) From these temples we must distinguish the Atrium Libertatis, which was in the north of the forum, towards the Quirinal, probably on the elevated ground extending from the Quirinal to the Capitolina. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16; Liv. xliii. 16.) This building, which had been restored as early as a.c. 195 (Liv. xxxiv. 44), and was newly built by Asinius Pollio (Suet. Aug. 29), served as an office of the censors (Liv. l. c. xliii. 16, xlv. 15), and sometimes also criminal trials were held (Cic. p. Mil. 22), and hostages were kept in it. (Liv. xxv. 7.) It also contained tables with laws inscribed upon them, and seems, to some extent, to have been used as public archives. (Liv. xliii. 16; Fest. p. 241, ed. Müller.) After its rebuilding by Asinius Pollio, it became the repository of the first public library at Rome. Libertas is usually represented as a matron, with the pileus, the symbol of liberty, or a wreath of laurel. Sometimes she appears holding the Phrygian cap in her hand. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 25, lxiii. 29; Suet. Ner. 57; Hirt. Mythol. Bildert. p. 115, tab. 13, 14.) [L. S.]

LIBETHRIDES (Λιβητρίδες), or anphus Libethrides, a name of the Muses, which they derived from the well Libethra in Thrace; or, according to others, from the Thracian mountain Libethrus, where they had a grotto sacred to them. (Virg. Ecol. vii. 21; Mela. ii. 3; Strab. ix. p. 410, x. p. 471.) Servius (ad Ecol. l. c.) derives the name from a poet Libethrus, and Pausanias (ix. 34. § 4) connects it with mount Libethrus in Boeotia. (Comp. Lycoph. 275; Varro, de Ling. Lat. vii. 2.) [L. S.]

LIBITINA, an ancient Italian divinity, who was identified by the later Romans sometimes with Persephone (on account of her connection with the dead and their burial) and sometimes with Aphrodite. The latter was probably the consequence of etymological speculations on the name Libitina, which people connected with libida. (Plut. Num. 12, Quaest. Rom. 23.) Her temple at Rome was a repository of everything necessary for burials, and persons might there either buy or hire those things. It was owing to this circumstance, that a person undertaking the proper burial of a person (an undertaker) was called libitinarius, and his business libitina, whence the expressions libitinam exercere, or facere (Senec. de Benef. vi. 38; Val. Max. v. 2. § 10), and libitina funeribus non sufficiebat, i. e. they could not all be buried. (Liv. xl. 19, xli. 21.) Also the utensils kept in the temple, especially the bed on which corpses were burnt, were called libitina. (Plin. xxxvii. 3, Martial. x. 97; Ascon. Argum. ad Milon.) Dionysius (iv. 79) relates that king Servius Tullius, in order to ascertain the number of persons who died, ordained that for each person that had died, a piece of money should be deposited in the temple of Libitina. (Comp. Suet. Ner. 39.) Owing to this connection of Libitina with the dead, Roman poets frequently employ her name in the sense of death itself. (Horat. Carm. iii. 30. 6; Sat. ii. 6. 19, Epist. ii. 1. 49; Juvenal. xiv. 122.) [L. S.]

LIBIUS SEVERUS. [SEVERUS.]

LIBO DRUSUS. [LIBO, SCRIBONIUS, Nos 5 and 6.]

LIBO, L. JU'LIUS, was consul a.c. 267, with M. Atilius Regulus, three years before the first Punic war. The two consuls made war upon the Sallentini in Apulia, whom they conquered, and celebrated their victory by a triumph. (Eutrop. ii. 17; Fasti Triumph.)

LIBO, Q. MARCIUS. This name is found only on Roman aæae, semisses, and trientes. A specimen of one of these coins is annexed, containing on the obverse the head of Jupiter, with S (the sign of Semisses), and on the reverse the prow of a ship.

COIN OF Q. MARCIUS LIBO.

LIBO, POETELIUS, a plebeian family (Dionys. x. 58), most of the members of which likewise bear the agnomen Visolus.

1. Q. POETELIUS LIBO VISOLUS, a member of the second decemvirate, B. C. 450. (Liv. iii. 35; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23.)

2. C. POETELIUS, C. F. Q. N. LIBO VISOLUS, perhaps a grandson of No. 1, was consul B. C. 360, with M. Fabius Ambustus. He gained a victory over the Gauls and the inhabitants of Tibur, and celebrated a triumph over both nations. In the Fasti Capitolini the name of Poetelius occurs in the form which is given above. Livy calls him C. Poetelius Balbus, and Diodorus gives the name without any cognomen. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. vii. 11; Diod. xvi. 2.)

3. C. POETELIUS, C. F. C. N., LIBO VISOLUS, son of No. 2, is distinguished in the early legislation of the republic by two important laws which he proposed. He was tribune of the plebs B. C. 358, in which year he proposed the first law enacted at Rome against bribery. (Liv. vii. 12.) He was consul for the first time in B. C. 346, with M. Valerius Corvus; and it was in this year that the ludi sæculares were celebrated a second time. (Liv. vii. 27; Diod. xvi. 72; Censorin. de Die Nat. 17.) His second consulship is assigned by Pighius (Annal. vol. i. p. 329) to the year B. C. 333, though not on sufficient grounds; the consuls of this year it is impossible to ascertain. He was, however, undoubtedly consul again in B. C. 326, with L. Papirius Mugillanus, and dictator thirteen years afterwards, B. C. 313, when he gained some advantages over the Samnites, though some annals gave the credit of these victories to the consul Junius Bubulcius Brutus. (Liv. viii. 23, ix. 6; Diod. xvii. 113.) Libo was the proposer of the Poetelia lex, which abolished imprisonment for debt in the case of the nexi. (Dict. of Ant. & v. Num.) Livy places (viii. 28) this law in the consulship of Poetelius, B. C. 326; but Niebuhr thinks (Rom. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 155, &c. 293) more probable that it was brought forward in his dictatorship; and his opinion, which receives support from a corrupt passage of Varro (L. L. vii. 5, ed. Müller), is adopted also by K. O. Müller (Varro. l. c.).

4. M. POETELIUS, M. F. M. N. LIBO, consul B. C. 314, with C. Sulpicius Longus, and magister nuntium in the following year, 313, to the dictator, Poetelius Libo. In his consulship, Poetelius and his colleague gained a brilliant victory over the Samnites, near Caudium, and afterwards proceeded to lay siege to Beneventum; but, according to the triumphal Fasti, it was Sulpicius alone who obtained the honour of a triumph. (Liv. ix. 24—28; Diod. xix. 73.)

LIBO, SCRIBONIUS, a plebeian family, which afterwards became illustrious from its connection with Augustus. The name first occurs in the second Punic war.

1. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 216, in which year the fatal battle of Cannæ was fought, brought forward a motion for ransoming the Roman prisoners taken in that engagement, but it was rejected by the senate. A relation of his, L. Scribonius, was one of the prisoners, who was sent to Rome by Hannibal to negotiate the terms of the ransom. In the same year Libo was created one of the triumviri mensarii. (Liv. xxii. 61, xxiii. 21.)

2. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, probably son of the preceding, was praetor, B. C. 204, and received the peregrina jurisdictio and the province of Gaul. (Liv. xxix. 11, 13.)

3. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, curule aedile, B. C. 193, with C. Atilius Serranus. They were the first aediles who exhibited the Megalesia as ludi scenici; and it was also in their aedileship that the senators had seats assigned them in the theatre distinct from the rest of the people. In B. C. 192, Libo was consul, and obtained the peregrina jurisdictio, and in B. C. 185 he was appointed one of the triumviri to conduct colonists to Sipontum and Buxentum. (Liv. xxxiv. 54; Acon. in Cic. Cornel. p. 69, ed. Orelli; Liv. xxxv. 10, 20, xxxix. 23.)

4. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, probably son of No. 3, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 149, accused in that year Ser. Sulpicius Galba on account of the abominable outrages which he had committed against the Lusitani. [GALBA, No. 6.] This accusation was supported in a powerful speech by M. Cato, who was then 85 years old; but, notwithstanding the eloquence of the accusers and the guilt of the accused, Galba escaped punishment. Cicero was in doubt (ad Att. xii. 5, § 3) whether Libo was tribune in B. C. 150 or 149, but it must have been in the latter year that he held the office, as we are expressly told that Cato spoke against Galba in the year of his death, and this we know was B. C. 149. (Liv. Epit. 49; Val. Max. viii. 1, § 2; Cic. Brut. 23, de Orat. ii. 65; Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 120, &c., p. 166, &c., 2d ed.) It was, perhaps, this same Libo who wrote an historical work (liber annalis), referred to once or twice by Cicero, and which must have come down at least as late as B. C. 132. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 30, 32.) But Ernesti has remarked, with some justice, that supposing the accuser of Galba and the annalist were the same, it is rather strange that Cicero should have made no mention of Libo's historical compositions, when he was speaking of his style of oratory. (Comp. Krause, Vitas et Pragm. Histor. Roman. p. 138.)

It was perhaps this same Libo who consecrated the Puteal Scribonianum or Puteal Libonis, of which we so frequently read in ancient writers, and which is often exhibited on coins of the Scribonius gens. One of these is given below, the obverse representing a female head, with the legend LIBO BONA EVENTV. (that is, bonus eventus), and the reverse the puteal adorned with garlands and two lyres.

The Puteal Scribonianum was an enclosed place in the forum, near the Arcus Fabianus, and was so called from its being open at the top, like a puteal or well. C. F. Hermann, who has carefully examined all the passages in ancient writers relating to it (Ind. Lect. Marburg. 1840), comes to the conclusion that there was only such puteal at Rome, and not two, as was formerly believed, and that it was dedicated in very ancient times either on account of the whetstone of the augur Navius (comp. Liv. i. 36), or because the spot had been struck by lightning; that it was subsequently repaired and re-dedicated by Scribonius Libo, who had been commanded to examine the state of the sacred places (Festus, s. v. Scribonianum); and that Libo erected in its neighbourhood a tribunal for the praetor, in consequence of which the place was of course frequented by persons who had law-suits, such as money lenders and the like. (Comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 35, Epist. i. 19. 8; Ov. Remed. Amor. 561; Cic. pro Sex. 8.)

COIN OF L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO.

4. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, the father-in-law of Sex. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great, and consul B. C. 34, is first mentioned in B. C. 56, in which year he appears to have been tribune, as supporting Pompey's views in relation to the affairs of Egypt in the case of Ptolemy Auletes. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 1.) On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, Libo naturally sided with Pompey, and was associated with the command of Etruria. But the rapid approach of Caesar, and the enthusiasm with which he was every where received, obliged Libo to retire from Etruria and join the consuls in Campania, from whence he subsequently proceeded with the rest of the Pompeian party to Brundisium. While here Caesar sent to him Caninius Rebilus, who was an intimate friend of Libo, to persuade him to use his influence with Pompey to effect a reconciliation; but nothing came of this negotiation. (Flor. iv. 2. § 21; Lucan, ii. 461; Cic. ad Att. vii. 12, viii. 11, b; Caes. B. C. i. 26.)

Libo accompanied Pompey to Greece, and was actively engaged in the war that ensued. He and M. Octavius were placed over the Liburnian and Achaean fleets, serving as legates to Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. They were very successful against Caesar's generals in Dalmatia; Dolabella they drove out of the country, and C. Antonius they not only defeated but made prisoner. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5; Dion Cass. xli. 40; Florus, iv. 2. § 31; Oroon. vi. 15.) Libo subsequently joined Bibulus; and, on the death of the latter shortly afterwards, the chief authority in the fleet appears to have devolved upon him, although no one was expressly appointed to the supreme command. With fifty ships he appeared before Brundisium, in order to blockade the place strictly, as M. Antony was still there with part of Caesar's troops, waiting for an opportunity to cross over to Greece. But having suffered a repulse from Antony, and being prevented by the cavalry of the latter from obtaining any water, Libo was obliged to retire from the place, and Antony soon afterwards escaped his vigilance and joined Caesar in Greece. (Caes. B. C. iii. 15, 16, 18, 23, 24; Dion Cass. xli. 48.)

We hear nothing more of Libo for some time, but he probably did not make his submission to Caesar after the battle of Pharsalia, but united himself to those of his party who continued in arms. At the death of the dictator in B. C. 44, we find him in Spain with his son-in-law Sex. Pompey, on whose behalf he wrote to the ruling party at Rome. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 4.) He continued with Pompey in the civil wars which followed, and is especially mentioned, in B. C. 40, as one of the persons of high rank who was commissioned to conduct to Antony in the East his mother Julia, who had taken refuge with Sex. Pompey in Sicily after the Perusine war. This mission alarmed Octavian. He feared that Pompey, who was now decidedly master of the sea, should unite with Antony to crush him; and, in order to gain the favour of the former and of his father-in-law Libo, he proposed, on the advice of Maecenas, to marry Libo's sister, Scribonia, although she was much older than himself, and had been married twice before. The marriage shortly after took place, and paved the way for a peace between the triumvirs and Pompey. This was negotiated in the following year (B. C. 39) by Libo, who crossed over from Sicily to Italy for the purpose, and it was finally settled at Misenum. When the war was renewed in B. C. 36, Libo for a time continued faithful to Pompey, but, seeing his cause hopeless, he deserted him in the following year. In B. C. 34, he was consul with M. Antony, as had been agreed at the peace of Misenum. As his name does not occur again in history, he probably died soon afterwards. (Appian, B. C. v. 52, 53, 69—73, 139; Dion Cass. xlviii. 16, xlix. 38.)

5. The M. LIVIUS DRUSUS LIBO, who was consul B. C. 15, is supposed to have been a younger brother of No. 4, and to have been adopted by one of the Drusi. He is spoken of under DRUSUS, No. 8.

6. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO DRUSUS, or LIBO DRUSUS, as he is also called, the conspirator against Tiberius, A. D. 16, is supposed to have been a son of the preceding [No. 5]. For an account of him see DRUSUS, No. 10.

7. L. SCRIBONIUS LIBO, son, probably, of No. 4, was consul in A. D. 16, with T. Statilius Taurus. (Dion Cass. lvi. 15; Tac. Ann. ii. 1.)

LIBO, CN. STATILIUS, known only from coins, a specimen of which is given below. On the obverse is a head with CN. STATI LIBO, and on the reverse a patera or discus, and a vessel used apparently in sacrifices, with SACERDOS. On some specimens we find PRAEF. (i.e. Præfectus). The coin was certainly not struck in Italy; and it has been conjectured that it was struck in Spain, and that the head on the obverse represents that of M. Agrippa. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 316.)

COIN OF CN. STATILIUS LIBO.

LIBON (Λῖβων), an Eleian, was the architect of the great temple of Zeus in the Altis at Olympia, which was built by the Eleians out of the spoils of Pisa and other neighbouring cities, which had revolted from them, and had been again subdued. (Paus. v. 10. § 2 or 3.) This event is believed to have occurred about Ol. 50, B.C. 580 (ib. vi. 22, § 2 or 4); but there is no reason to suppose that the temple was commenced immediately, or even soon, after this date. It seems more probable that the temple had not been very long completed when Phidias began to make in it his gold and ivory statue of Zeus (Ol. 85. 4, B.C. 437). Allowing for the time which so magnificent a work as this temple would occupy, we may safely place the architect's date somewhat before the middle of the fifth century B.C. The temple itself is described by Pausanias (v. 10). A few ruins of it remain. (Stanhope, Olympia, p. 9; Cockerell, Bibl. Ital. 1831, No. 191, p. 205; Blouet, Expédition Scient. de la Morée, livr. 11, pl. 62, foll.) [P. S.]

LIBYA (Λιβύη). 1. A daughter of Epaphus and Memphis, from whom Libya (Africa) is said to have derived its name. By Poseidon she is said to have been the mother of Agenor, Belus, and Lelex. (Paus. i. 44. § 3; Apollod. ii. 1. § 4, iii. 1. § 1.)

2. A daughter of Palamedes, and by Hermes the mother of Libya. (Hygin. Fab. 160.)

3. A sister of Asia. (Tzets. ad Lycoph. 1277.) [L. S.]

LIBYS, the name of two mythical personages, one a son of Libya (Hygin. Fab. 160), and the other one of the Tyrrhenian pirates whom Bacchus changed into dolphins. (Ov. Met. iii. 617.) [L. S.]

LIBYSTINUS, that is, the Libyan, a surname under which Apollo was worshipped by the Sicilians, because he was believed to have destroyed by a pestilence a Libyan fleet which sailed against Sicily. (Macrob. Sat. i. 17.) [L. S.]

LICHAS (Λίχας), an attendant of Heracles. He brought to his master the deadly garment, and as a punishment, was thrown by him into the sea, where the Lichadian islands, between Euboea and the coast of Locris, were believed to have derived their name from him. (Ov. Met. ix. 155, 211, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 36; Strab. ix. p. 426, x. p. 447.) A Latin of the same name occurs in Virgil. (Æn. x. 315.) [L. S.]

LICHAS or LICHES (Λίχας, Λίχης). 1. One of the Spartan Agathoergi (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.), who, according to the story, enabled his countrymen to fulfil the oracle, which had made their conquest of Tegea conditional on their obtaining thence the bones of Orestes. Lichas, having gone to Tegea in the course of his mission, discovered the existence of a gigantic coffin under a blacksmith's shop, — a place answering remarkably to the enigmatical description of the oracle. He reported this at home, and, his countrymen having pretended to banish him, he came again to Tegea, persuaded the smith to let him his house, and having dug up the bones, returned with them to Sparta. From this time the Spartans were always victorious over the Tegeans. The date of the story, with which the above tale is connected, we do not know with accuracy; but they occurred early in the reign of Anaxandrides and Ariston, which began probably about B.C. 560. (Herod. i. 7. 68; Larcher, ad loc.; Paus. iii. 3, 11, viii. 7; comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. i. pp. 92, 102, 339, &c. ii. p. 207.)

2. A Spartan, son of Arcesilaus, was proxenus of Argos and one of the ambassadors who proposed to the Argives, without success, in B.C. 422, a renewal of the truce, then expiring, between Argos and Sparta. (Thuc. v. 14, 22.) In B.C. 420, when the Spartans had been excluded by the Eleians from the Olympic games because of their alleged breach of the sacred truce in the seizure of Lepreum, Lichas sent a chariot into the lists in the name of the Boeotian commonwealth; but, his horses having won the victory, he came forward and crowned the charioteer, by way of showing that he was himself the real conqueror. For this he was publicly beaten by the Eleian παῖδοῦχοι, and Sparta did not forget the insult, though no notice was taken of it at the time. (Thuc. v. 49, 50; Xen. Hell. iii. 2. § 21; Paus. vi. 2.) In B.C. 418, he succeeded in inducing the Argives to make peace with Lacedaemon after the battle of Mantinea. (Thuc. v. 76.) In B.C. 412, he was one of the eleven commissioners sent out to inquire into the conduct of Apsyochus, the Spartan admiral, and was foremost in protesting against the treaties which had been made with Persia by Chalcideus and Theramenes (the Lacedaemonian) respectively, — especially against that clause in them which acknowledged the king's right to all the territories that had been under the rule of his ancestors. We find him, however, in the following year, disapproving of the violence of the Milesians in rising on the Persian garrison in their town, as he thought it prudent to keep on good terms with the king as long as the war with Athens lasted; and his remonstrances so exasperated the Milesians, that, after his death (which was a natural one) in their country, they would not allow the Lacedaemonians there to bury him where they wished. (Thuc. viii. 18, 37, 39, 43, 52, 84.) We learn from Xenophon and Plutarch that he was famous throughout Greece for his hospitality, especially in his entertainment of strangers at the Gymnopaedia (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.); for there is no reason to suppose this Lichas a different person, unless, indeed, we press closely what Plutarch says, — that he was renowned among the Greeks for nothing but his hospitality. (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 61; Plut. Cim. 10; comp. Müller, Dor. iv. 9. § 5.) [E. E.]

LICINIA. 1. The wife of Claudius Aesellus [AESSELLUS, No. 3], lived about the middle of the second century B.C. When she and Publicia were accused of murdering their husbands, they gave bail to the praetor for their appearance, but were put to death by order of their relatives, consequently by a judicium domesticum. (Liv. Epit. 48; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 8; Rein, Criminalrecht der Römer, p. 407.)

2. A vestal virgin, and the daughter of C. Licinius Crassus, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 145 [CRASSUS, No. 3]. She dedicated in B.C. 123 a chapel in a public place; but the college of pontiffs declared, when the matter was laid before them by order of the senate, that the dedication was invalid, as it had been made in a public place, without the command of the people: the chapel was therefore removed. (Cic. pro Dom. 53.) The preceding Licinia appears to be the same vestal virgin who was accused of incest, together with two of her companions, in B.C. 114. It appears that a Roman knight of the name of L. Veturius had seduced Aemilia, one of the vestals, and that, anxious to have companions in her guilt, she had induced Marcia and Licinia to submit to the embraces of the friends of her seducer. Marcia confined her favours to her original lover; but Licinia and Aemilia had intercourse with numerous other persons; their guilt notwithstanding remained a secret for some time, till at length a slave, called Manius, who had assisted them in all their intrigues, disappointed in receiving neither his freedom nor the rewards which had been promised him, informed against them. All three were brought to trial; but as the college of pontiffs, of which the president at the time was L. Metellus, condemned (in December, see Macrob. Satur. i. 10) only Aemilia, but acquitted Licinia and Marcia, the subject was brought before the people by Sex. Peducaeus, the tribune of the plebs. The people adopted the unusual course of taking the matter out of the hands of the pontiffs, by appointing L. Cassius Longinus [LONGINUS, No. 4] to investigate the matter; and he condemned not only Licinia, who was defended by L. Crassus, the orator, and Marcia, but also many others. The severity with which he acted on this occasion was generally reprobated by public opinion. The orator M. Antonius was accused of being one of the paramours of these virgins, but was acquitted. [ANTONIUS, No. 8.]

Various measures were adopted to purify the state from the pollution which had been brought upon it by these crimes. A temple was built to the honour of Venus Verticordia, and four men were buried alive in the forum boarium, two Greeks and two Gauls, in accordance with the commands of the Sibylline books. This history of Licinia's crimes is of some importance, since it shows us that, even as early as this time, the Roman ladies of the higher orders had already begun to be infected with that licentious profligacy which was afterwards exhibited with such shamelessness by the Messallinas and Faustinas of the empire. (Dion Cass. Fr. 92; Oros. v. 15; Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 284, b.; Ascon. ad Cic. Mil. 12, p. 46, ed. Orelli; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 30, Brut. 43; Obsequ. 97; Liv. Epit. 63.)

The vestal virgin Licinia, with whom the triumvir M. Crassus was accused of having had intercourse (Plut. Crass. 1), must have been a different person from the preceding, as M. Crassus was not born before B.C. 114. She may perhaps have been the same as the vestal virgin Licinia, the relation of L. Murena, who was of assistance to the latter in his canvass for the consulship, in B.C. 63. (Cic. pro Mur. 35. § 73.)

3. A daughter of P. Licinius Crassus, consul B.C. 131, married C. Sulpicius Galba, who was condemned in B.C. 110, for having been bribed by Jugurtha [GALBA, No. 8]. (Cic. Brut. 26, 33, de Orat. i. 56; comp. Tac. Hist. i. 15.)

4. The sister of No. 3, was married to C. Sempronius Gracchus, the celebrated tribune of the plebs. (Plut. C. Gracch. 17; Dig. 24. tit. 3. a. 66.)

5. The daughter of L. Licinius Crassus the orator, consul B.C. 95, married P. Scipio Nasica, praetor B.C. 94, who was the son of P. Scipio Nasica, consul B.C. 111. Both she and her sister [No. 6] were distinguished for the purity and elegance with which they spoke the Latin language, an accomplishment which their mother Mucia, and their grandmother Laelia equally possessed. (Cic. Brut. 58.)

6. A sister of the preceding, was the wife of the younger Marius. Hence we find the elder Marius spoken of as the affinis of the orator Crassus (Cic. pro Balb. 21, de Orat. i. 15. § 66, iii. 2. § 8). An impostor of the name of Amatius or Herophilus, pretended to have sprung from this marriage. [AMATIUS.]

LICINIA GENS, a celebrated plebeian gens, to which belonged C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, whose exertions threw open the consulship to the plebeians, and which became one of the most illustrious gentes in the latter days of the republic, by the Crassi and Luculli, who were likewise members of it. The origin of the gens is uncertain. A bilingual inscription, published by Lanzi (Saggio di Lingua Etrusca. vol. ii. p. 342, Rom. 1789), shows that the name of Lece, which frequently occurs in Etruscan sepulchral monuments, corresponds to that of Licinius, and hence it would appear that the family was of Etruscan origin. This opinion is thought to be supported by the fact, that in the consulship of C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, B.C. 364, Etruscan players took part in the public games at Rome; but as it is recorded by Livy that scenic games were established in this year to avert the anger of the gods, and that Etruscan players were accordingly sent for (Liv. vii. 2), it is not necessary to imagine that this was done simply because Licinius kept up his connection with Etruria. We moreover find the name in the cities of Latium, both in the form of a cognomen (Licinus), and of the gentile name (Licinius). Thus we meet in Tusculum with the Porcii Licini [LICINUS], and in Lanuvium with the Licinii Murenæ [MURENA]. The name would therefore seem to have been originally spread both through Etruria and Latium.

The first member of this gens who obtained the consulship, was the celebrated C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, in B.C. 364; and from this period down to the later times of the empire, the Licinii constantly held some of the higher offices of the state, until eventually they obtained the imperial dignity. [See below, p. 783.]

The family-names of this gens are, CALVUS (with the agnomen Esquilinus and Stolo), CRASSUS (with the agnomen Dives), GETA, LOCUTUS, MACER, MURENA, NERVA, SACERDOS, VARUS. The other cognomens of this gens are personal surnames rather than family-names: they are ARCHIA, CAECINA [CAECINA, No. 10], DAMARIUPUS, INBREX, LARTIUS, LENTICULUS, NEPOS, PROCULUS, REGULUS, RUFINUS, SCQUILLUS, TAGULA. The only cognomens which occur on coins are Crassus, Macer, Murena, Nerva, Stolo. A few Licinii occur without a surname: they are, with one or two exceptions, freedmen, and are given under LICINIUS.

LICINIANUS, an agnomen of M. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, whom Galba associated in the empire A.D. 69. [PISO.]

LICINIANUS, GRANIUS, a Latin writer, who appears to have written a work entitled "Fasti," of which the second book is quoted by Macrobius (Satur. i. 16). As Licinianus in his work spoke of a sacrifice offered by the Flaminii, he is probably the same person as the Granii cited by Festus (s. v. Rices), to explain the meaning of the word Rices.

LICINIANUS, VALEIRIUS, a man of praetorian rank, was accused in the reign of Domitian of the crime of incest with Cornelia, the chief of the vestal virgins (virgo maxima). His guilt was doubtful, but as the tyrant was anxious to signalize his reign by the punishment of a vestal, Licinianus confessed that he was guilty, in order to save himself from certain death. In reward for this compliance, he was simply banished, and Nerva subsequently allowed him to reside in Sicily as the place of his banishment. Here he supported himself by teaching rhetoric, having been previously one of the most eloquent pleaders in the courts at Rome. (Plin. Ep. iv. 11; Suet. Dom. 8.)

LICINIUS. 1. C. LICINIUS, was, according to Livy (ii. 33), one of the first tribunes of the plebs, B.C. 493, who was elected with only one colleague, L. Albinus, and according to the same writer, these two immediately elected three others. According to other writers the number of two remained unchanged for a time; and, according to others again, among whom is Dionysius (vi. 89), five were originally elected by the people, and of them, two were Licinii, namely Caius and Publius. (Comp. Liv. ii. 58; Ascon. in Cic. Cornel. p. 76, with Orrelli's note; Plut. Coriol. 7.)

2. SP. LICINIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 481, according to Livy (ii. 43). Dionysius (ix. 1) gives the name Sp. Ictilius [ICILIUS, No. 1]; and in favour of the latter there is the fact, that in no other instance do we find the prænomen Spurius in the Licinia gens.

3. SEX. LICINIUS, a senator, whom Marius ordered to be buried down the Tarpeian rock, on the 1st of January, B.C. 86, the day on which he entered upon his seventh consulship. (Liv. Epit. 80; Plut. Mar. 45; Dion Cass. Fragm. 120.)

4. The name of three or four slaves or freedmen, mentioned by Cicero, of whom the only one deserving of notice is the LICINIUS, an educated slave belonging to C. Gracchus, who used, according to the well-known story, to stand behind his master with a musical instrument, when he was speaking, in order to moderate his tone. This slave became afterwards a client of Catulus. (Plut. Gracch. 2; Cic. de Or. iii. 60; Gell. i. 11.)

LICINIUS, Roman emperor (A.D. 307—324), whose full name was PUBLIUS FLAVIUS GALERIUS MAXIMIANUS LICINIANUS LICINIUS, was by birth a humble Dacian peasant, the early friend and companion in arms of the emperor Galerius, by whom, with the consent of Maximianus Herculeus and Constantine, after the death of Severus [SEVERUS, LAIVS VALERIUS] and the disastrous issue of the Italian campaign [MAXENTIUS], he was raised once to the rank of Augustus without passing through the inferior grade of Caesar, and was invested with the command of the Illyrian provinces, Carnuntum, on the 11th of November, A.D. 7. Upon the death of his patron, in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with Daza [MAXIMINUS II.], in terms of which he acknowledged the latter as sovereign of Asia, Syria, and Egypt, while he added Greece, Macedonia, and Rome to his own former dominions, the Hellespont, with the Bosphorus, forming the common boundary of the two empires. Feeling, however, the necessity of strengthening himself against a rival at once ambitious, unscrupulous, and powerful, he entered into a league with Constantine, and terminated the struggle with Maxentius, during which he had acted the part of a watch-spectator rather than of a sincere ally, received marriage (A.D. 313) Constantia, the sister of the conqueror, to whom he had been betrothed two years before. Meanwhile, Maximinus, taking advantage of the absence of his neighbour, who was enjoying the splendours of the nuptial festivities at Milan, placed himself at the head of a formidable army, and setting forth in the dead of winter succeeded, notwithstanding the obstacles offered to his progress by the season, in passing the straits, stormed Byzantium in April, and soon after captured Heracleia also. But scarcely had he gained possession of the last-named city when Licinius, who had hurried from Italy upon receiving intelligence of this treacherous invasion, appeared at the head of a small but resolute and well-disciplined force to resist his further progress. The battle which ensued was obstinately contested, and the result was long doubtful, but the bravery of the troops from the Danube, and the great military talents of their leader, at length prevailed. Maximinus fled in headlong haste, and died a few months afterwards at Tarsus, thus leaving his enemy undisputed master of one half of the Roman empire, while the remainder was under the sway of his brother-in-law Constantine. It was little likely that two such spirits could long be firmly united by such a tie, or that either would calmly brook the existence of an equal. Accordingly, scarce a year elapsed before preparations commenced for the grand contest, whose object was to unite once more the whole civilised world under a single ruler. The leading events are detailed elsewhere [CONSTANTINUS, p. 834], and therefore it will suffice briefly to state here that there were two distinct wars; in the first, which broke out A.D. 315, Licinius was compelled by the decisive defeats sustained at Cibalis in Pannonia, and in the plain of Mardia in Thrace, to submit and to cede to the victor Greece, Macedonia, and the whole lower valley of the Danube, with the exception of a part of Moesia. The peace which followed lasted for about eight years, when hostilities were renewed, but the precise circumstances which led to this fresh collision are as obscure as the causes which produced the first rupture. The great battle of Hadrianople (3rd July, A.D. 323) followed by the reduction of Byzantium, and a second great victory achieved near Chalcedon (18th September), placed the eastern Augustus absolutely at the mercy of his kinsman, who, although he spared his life for the moment, and merely sentenced him to an honourable imprisonment at Thessalonica, soon found a convenient pretext for commanding the death of one who had long been the sole impediment in his path to universal dominion.

However little we may respect the motives, and however deeply we may feel disgusted by the systematic hypocrisy of Constantine, we can feel no compassion for Licinius. His origin, education, and early habits might very naturally inspire him with a distaste for literature, although they could scarcely justify or excuse the rancour which he ever manifested towards all who were in any way distinguished by intellectual acquirements, and a life passed amidst a succession of scenes in which human nature was exhibited under its worst aspect, was by no means calculated to cherish any of the purer or softer feelings of the heart. But while he had all and more than all the vices which such a career might produce, he had none of the frank generosity of a bold soldier of fortune. He was not only totally indifferent to human life and suffering, and regardless of any principle of law or justice which might interfere with the gratification of his passions, but he was systematically treacherous and cruel, possessed of not one redeeming quality save physical courage and military skill. When he destroyed the helpless family of Maximinus he might plead that he only followed the ordinary usage of Oriental despots in extirpating the whole race of a rival; but the murders of the unoffending Severianus, of Candidianus the son of his friend and benefactor Galerius, who alone had made him what he was, of Prisca and of Valeria, the wife and daughter of Diocletian [VALERIA], form a climax of ingratitude and cold-blooded ferocity to which few parallels can be found even in the revolting annals of the Roman empire. (Zosim. ii. 7, 11, 17—28; Zonar. xiii. 1; Aurel. Vict. de Cæs. 40, 41, Epit. 40, 41; Eutrop. x. 3, 4; Oros. vii. 28.) [W. R.]

COIN OF LICINIUS, SENIOR.

LICINIUS, whose full name was FLAVIUS VALERIUS LICINIANUS LICINIUS, was a son of the emperor Licinius and Constantia [CONSTANTIA; THEODORA], and was born A. D. 315. On the first of March 317, when not yet twenty months old, he was proclaimed Caesar along with his cousins Crispus and Constantinus, and in 319 was the colleague in the consulship of his uncle Constantine the Great. But the poor boy was stripped of all his honours upon the downfall of his father in 323, and, according to Eutropius, whose account is corroborated by St. Jerome, was put to death in 323, at the same time with the ill-fated Crispus [CRISPUS]. It appears from medals that he enjoyed the haughty titles of Jovius and Dominus in common with his father; but although coins have been described on which he appears with the epithet Augustus we have no reason to believe that he had any formal claim to this designation, which was probably annexed to his name by moneyers in ignorance or flattery. (Aurel. Vict. de Cæs. 41, Epit. 41; Eutrop. x. 4; Zosim. ii. 20; Theophan. Chron. ad ann. 315.) [W. R.]

COIN OF LICINIUS, JUNIOR.

LICINIUS CAECINA. [CAECINA.]

LICINIUS GETA. [GETA.]

LICINIUS PROCULUS. [PROCULUS.]

LICINUS, a surname in several gentes, is frequently written Licinius; but in the Capitoline Fasti and on coins we always find Licinus, which is no doubt the correct form, the name of Licinius being substituted for it, on account of its much greater celebrity. (Comp. Madvig, Opuscula altera, p. 205.)

LICINUS. 1. A Gaul by birth, who was taken prisoner in war, and became a slave of Julius Caesar, whose confidence he gained so much as to be made his dispenser or steward. Caesar gave him his freedom, perhaps in his testament, as he is called by some writers the freedman of Augustus, who, we know, carried into execution the will of his uncle. Licinus gained the favour of Augustus, as well as of Julius Caesar, and was appointed by the former, in A. C. 15, governor of his native country, Gaul. He oppressed and plundered his countrymen so unmercifully, that they accused him before Augustus, who was at first disposed to treat his favourite with severity, but was mollified by Licinus exhibiting to him the immense wealth which he had accumulated in Gaul, and offering him the whole of it. Licinus thus escaped punishment, and seems, moreover, to have been permitted by Augustus to retain his property. His fortune was so great that his name was used proverbially to indicate a man of enormous wealth, and is frequently coupled with that of Crassus. To gratify his imperial master, Licinus, like many of his contemporaries, devoted part of his property to the erection of a public building, the "Basilica Julia," which he called after the name of his former master. He lived to see the reign of Tiberius. (Dion Cass. liv. 21; Suet. Aug. 67; Juv. i. 109, with Schol. xiv. 306; Pers. ii. 36, with Schol.; Macrobi. Sat. ii. 4; Senec. Ep. 119, § 10, 120 § 20; Sidon. Ep. v. 7.) There was a splendid marble tomb of Licinus on the Via Salaria, at the second milestone from the city; in reference to which the following pointed epigram is preserved:—

"Marmoreo Licinus tumulo jacet. At Cata parva, Pompeius nullo; quis putet esse deos?"

(Meyer, Anthol. Lat. vol. i. No. 77, with Meyer's note, p. 31). This tomb is also alluded to by Martial (viii. 8. 6). For an account of this Licinus, see Madvig, Opuscula altera, pp. 202—203.

2. The barber (tonsor) Licinus spoken of by Horace (Ars Poet. 301), must have been a different person from the preceding; and the scholiast has therefore made a mistake in referring to the barber in the epigram quoted above.

LICINUS, CLODIUS, a Roman annalist, who lived apparently about the beginning of the first century A. C., as Cicero (de Leg. i. 2. § 6), speaks of him as a successor of Caelius Antipater. [ANTIPATER, CAELIUS.] The work of Clodius Licinus, the title of which Plutarch (Nam. 1) gives in Greek, as Εαρχος ὑπόμνημα, appears to have extended from the taking of Rome by the Gauls to his own time. Plutarch quotes (l.c.) his authority for the destruction of the public records of the city when it was captured by the Gauls; and we learn from Livy (xxix. 22) that Licinus spoke, in the third book, of the second consulship of Scipio Africanus the elder; and from a fragment of Appian (Celt. 3), that he gave an account of the defeat of L. Cassius Longinus by the Tigurini, A. C. 107. This Clodius is called by Cicero and Plutarch simply Clodius, by Livy Clodius Licinus, and by Appian Κλωδίου τοῦ Λικινίου; instead of the last, which is evidently corrupt, we should perhaps read Publius Clodius, so that his full name would then be P. Clodius Licinus. This Clodius is frequently confounded with Q. Claudius Quadrigarius. [QUADRIGARIUS.] Niebuhr thinks (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 2) that the passage of Plutarch quoted above refers to Claudius Quadrigarius; but as Plutarch speaks of him as Κλωδίου τῷ, it seems more probable that he meant to refer to the less celebrated of the two writers. (Krause, Vitas et Fragm. vet. Hist. Rom. p. 213; Perizon. Animad. Lit. p. 349.)

LICINUS, PORCIUS. 1. L. PORCIUS LICINUS, lived in the second Punic war. He is first mentioned in a.c. 211, when he served with distinction as legate in the army that was besieging Capua. In the following year (a.c. 210) he was plebeian aedile, and with his colleague, Q. Cadius, celebrated the public games with great splendour. He was praetor in a.c. 207, and obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province. In co-operation with the consuls of the year, C. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator, he had a share in the glory of the defeat of Hasdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, at the battle of the Metaurus, in Umbria. (Liv. xxvi. 5, xxvii. 6, 35, 36, 39, 46—48.)

2. L. PORCIUS LICINUS, the son of the preceding, was praetor a.c. 193, and received Sardinia as his province. He sued unsuccessfully for the consulship at first, but at length obtained it, in a.c. 184; and in conjunction with his colleague, P. Claudius Pulcher, carried on the war against the Ligurians. (Liv. xxiv. 54, 55, xxxix. 32, 33, 45, xl. 34; Cic. Brut. 15.)

3. L. PORCIUS LICINUS, the son of No. 2, dedicated, as duumvir in a.c. 181, the temple to Venus Erycina, which his father had vowed in the Ligurian war. This temple, which was called after the celebrated temple of Venus at Eryx in Sicily, was situated outside the Colline gate, and is mentioned by Livy, by prolepsis, as in existence as early as the year a.c. 202. (Liv. xxx. 38.) Licinus was appointed in a.c. 172 to conduct to Brundisium from the docks at Rome the fleet which was to convey to Greece the troops destined for the war against Perseus. (Liv. xl. 34; Strab. vi. p. 272; Or. Fav. iv. 874; App. B. C. i. 93; Liv. xlii. 27.)

4. L. PORCIUS LICINUS, occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is given below. The obverse represents the head of Pallas, with L. PORCI LICINVS; the reverse the naked figure of Mars driving a chariot and hurling a spear, with the legend L. LICINVS DOM. We have coins of the Aurelia and Coconia gentes exactly the same as the preceding, with the sole exception of the difference of name, those of the former bearing the name of M. Aurelius Scaurus, and those of the latter L. Coconius. [COSCONIUS; SCAURUS.] Now, as all the three sets of coins have on the obverse L. LICINVS DOM., it is supposed that they were struck in the censorship of L. Licinius Crassus and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a.c. 92, and that L. Porcius Licinus, M. Aurelius Scaurus, and L. Coconius, were triumvirs of the Mint in that year. Eckhel (vol. v. p. 196), however, thinks that these coins must have been struck at an earlier time; but on this point see Drumann, Gesch. Roms, vol. v. p. 95.

COIN OF L. PORCIUS LICINUS.

whom A. Gellius places between Valerius Aedituus and Q. Lutatius Catulus, consul a.c. 104, and who, therefore, probably lived in the latter part of the second century, a.c. Gellius quotes an epigram of Licinus, which seems to be taken from the Greek, and likewise cites the commencement of a poem of his on the history of Roman poetry, written in trochaic tetrameters. He seems to be the same as the Porcius mentioned in the life of Terence, ascribed to Suetonius, but must not be confounded, as he has been by some modern writers, with the consul of this name. [No. 2.] (Gell. xix. 9, xvii. 2; Anthol. Lat. Nos. 25, 26, ed. Meyer; Madvig, de L. Attii Didascalica, p. 20.)

LICY'MNIA, spoken of by Horace (Carm. ii. 12, 13, &c.), is maintained at great length by Weichert (Poetar. Latine Reliquiae, p. 462, &c.) to be the same as Terentia, the wife of Maecenas; but it seems impossible that Horace could have used such amatory language as he employs in this ode in reference to the wife of Maecenas. (Comp. Teuffel, in Zeitschrift für die Alterth. wiss. p. 46, &c., 1845.)

LICY'MNIUS (Λικύμνιος), a son of Electryon and the Phrygian slave Mideia, and consequently a half-brother of Alcmena. (Paus. iii. 15. § 4.) He was married to Perimede, by whom he became the father of Oenon, Argeius, and Melas. He was a friend of Heracles, whose son Tlepolemus slew him, according to some unintentionally, and according to others in a fit of anger. (Pind. Ol. vii. 50, &c.; Apollod. ii. 8. § 2, ii. 4. § 5, comp. Hom. Il. ii. 663.) His tomb was shown in after-times at Argos. (Paus. ii. 22. § 8; Plut. Lycr. 34.) [L. S.]

LICY'MNIUS (Λικύμνιος). 1. Of Chios, a distinguished dithyrambic poet, of uncertain date. Some writers, on the authority of a passage of Sextus Empiricus (Adv. Math. 49, p. 447, xi. pp. 700, 701; Fabric. p. 447; Pacard, p. 556, Bekker), place him before Simonides; but this is not clearly made out, and it is perhaps more likely, from all we know of his poetry, that he belonged to the later Athenian dithyrambic school about the end of the fourth century B. C.; indeed Spengel and Schneidewin identify him with the rhetorician (No. 2). He is mentioned by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 12), in conjunction with Chaeremon, as among the poets whose works were rather fit for reading than for exhibition (dwaywotwot). Among the poems ascribed to him was one in praise of health; a pretty sure indication of a late date, if we could be certain that the poem was his. A fragment of this poem is preserved by Sextus Empiricus (l. c.), in which three lines out of six are identical with lines in the poem of Ariphron to health; and it seems likely that it was a mere mistake in Sextus to quote the poem as by Licymnius. A poem of his on the legend of Endymion is mentioned by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 564, c.), who also refers to one of his dithyrambs on the love of Argynnus for Hymenaeus (xiii. p. 603, d.). Parthenius (c. 22) quotes from him an account of the taking of Sardia, which has every mark of a late and fictitious embellishment of the event. Eustathius (ad Hom. Od. iii. 267) mentions Λικύμνιος Βορραριστία δοιδόν. (Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Graec. pp. 839, 840; Schmidt, Diatrib. in Dithyramb. pp. 84—86; Ulrich, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. p. 497; Bode, Gesch. d. Lyr. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 303, 304.)

2. Of Sicily, a rhetorician, the pupil of Gorgias, and the teacher of Polus, and the authority of a work on rhetoric, entitled ῥητορική. He is mentioned by Plato (Phædr. p. 267; comp. the scholia and Heindorf's note), and is quoted by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 2, 13) and by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Lys. p. 82, 36; De Thucyd. Idiom. p. 133, 31, 148, 1; Dem. 179, 31, ed. Sylburg. et alib.). Dionysius frequently mentions the characteristics of his style, which was smooth and elegant, but somewhat affected, abounding in exactly balanced antitheses. In grammar he gave much attention to the classification of nouns. (Spengel, Swavary. rexyr. pp. 88, &c.; Schneidewin, in the Götting. G. A. for 1845.) [P. S.]

LIG'ARIUS, the name of three brothers, who lived in the time of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. They were of Sabine origin. (Cic. pro Lig. 11.)

1. Q. LIGARIUS, is first mentioned in B. C. 50 as legate, in Africa, of C. Considius Longus, who left him in command of the province, while he went to Rome to become a candidate for the consulship. [CONSIDIUS, No. 9.] On the breaking out of the civil war in the following year, L. Attius Varus, who had commanded the Pompeian troops at Auximum, and had been obliged to fly before Caesar, arrived in Africa, of which province he had been formerly proprietor. Into his hands Ligarius resigned the government, although L. Aelius Tubero had been appointed to the province by the senate; and when Tubero made his appearance off Utica shortly afterwards, he was not permitted even to land. Ligarius fought under Varus against Curio in the course of the same year (B. C. 49), and against Caesar himself in B. C. 46. After the battle of Thapsus, in which the Pompeian army was defeated, Ligarius was taken prisoner at Adrumetum. His life was spared, but he was banished by Caesar. His friends at Rome exerted themselves to procure his pardon, but were unable to succeed at first, notwithstanding the intercession of his brothers, of his uncle, T. Broechus, and of Cicero himself, who had an audience with the dictator on the 23d of September, B. C. 46, for the purpose. Meantime, a public accusation was brought against Ligarius by Q. Aelius Tubero, the son of L. Tubero, whom Ligarius had united with Varus in preventing from landing in Africa. He was accused on account of his conduct in Africa, and his connection with the enemies of the dictator. The case was pleaded before Caesar himself in the forum. Cicero defended Ligarius in a speech still extant, in which he maintains that Ligarius had as much claims to the mercy of Caesar, as Tubero and Cicero himself. Ligarius was pardoned by Caesar, who was on the point of setting out for the Spanish war, and who probably was not sorry to have this public opportunity of exhibiting his usual mercy. The speech which Cicero delivered in his defence was subsequently published, and was much admired. Ligarius, however, felt no gratitude for the favour that had been shown him, and eagerly joined the conspirators, who assassinated Caesar in B. C. 44. (Cic. pro Ligario, passim, ad Fam. vi. 13, 14, ad Att. xiii. 12, 19, 20, 44; Auct. Bell. Afr. 89; Plut. Cic. 39, Brut. 11; Appian, B. C. ii. 113.) Appian speaks of two brothers of the name of Ligarius, who perished in the proscription of the triumvirs in B. C. 43 (B. C. iv. 22), and in the following chapter (c. 23) he mentions a third Ligarius, who met with the same fate. Now, as Cicero expressly mentions three brothers of this name (pro Lig. 12), Q. Ligarius must have been one of those who were put to death on this occasion.

2. T. LIGARIUS, brother of the preceding, was appointed quaestor by Caesar, and perished in the proscription of the triumvirs. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 44, pro Lig. 12; Appian, B. C. iv. 22, 23.)

3. LIGARIUS, a brother of the two preceding, whose praenomen is not mentioned, perished along with his brothers in the same proscription. (Appian, l. c.)

4. P. LIGARIUS, was taken prisoner by Caesar in the African war, B. C. 46, and was put to death by him, because he had been previously pardoned by Caesar in Spain in B. C. 49, on the condition that he should not serve against him. (Auct. Bell. Afr. 64.) This Publius may have been a brother of the three other Ligarii, but is nowhere mentioned as such.

LIGEIA or LIGEA (Λίγεια), i. e. the shrill sounding, occurs as the name of a seiren and of a nymph. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1709; Virg. Georg. iv. 336.) [L. S.]

LIGUR. The name Ligur or Ligus, without any nomen, occurs in Cicero, ad Att. xii. 23, where he is ironically congratulated with respect to a daughter called Gamala. [C. P. M.]

LIGUR, AELIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 57, endeavoured by his veto to prevent the passing of the decree of the senate for Cicero's recall. He seems to have been an obscure individual, and, according to Cicero, had assumed a surname to which he had no right. (Cic. pro Sext. 31, 32, 43, pro Dom. 19, de Harusp. Resp. 3.) [C. P. M.]

LIGUR, OCTAVIUS. 1. M. a Roman senator. During the praetorship of C. Sacerdos he had become possessed of an estate in Sicily by the will of one C. Sulpicius Olympus. When Verres became praetor, in accordance with one of his edicts the daughter of the patronus of Sulpicius sued Ligur for a sixth part of the estate. Ligur found himself compelled to come to Rome to assert and defend his rights. Verres afterwards demanded money from Ligur for trying the cause. M. Ligur and his brother are set down as tribunes of the plebs in the same year (B. C. 82) by Pighius (vol. iii. p. 266). (Cic. in Ferr. i. 48, ii. 7, 48.)

2. L. The brother of the preceding. During the absence of his brother he defended his interests against the unjust proceedings of Verres (B. C. 74). He is possibly the same who is mentioned by Cicero (ad Att. vii. 18, § 4). [C. P. M.]

LIGUR, VARIUS, a man mentioned once or twice by Tacitus. In Annal. iv. 42, he is spoken of as the paramour of Aquilia (A. D. 23). Some time after he escaped a prosecution by buying of the informers. (Annal. vi. 30.) [C. P. M.]

LIGYRON (Λιγύρων), i. e. the whining, is said to have been the original name of Achilles, and to have been changed into Achilles by Chiron (Apollod. iii. 13, § 6; comp. ACHILLES). [L. S.]

LILAEA (Λίλαία), a Naiad, a daughter of Crphissus, from whom the town of Lileae in Phocæ was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 33, § 2.) [L. S.]

LIMA, a Roman divinity protecting the thread-old (limen, Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 9); it is, however, not impossible that she may be the same as the dea Limentina. [LIMENTINA.] [L. S.]

LIMENIA, LIMENITES, LIMENITIS, and LIMENOSCOPIUS (Λιμνία, Λιμενίτης, Λιμενίτις, Λιμενίσκοπος), i. e. the protector or superintendent of the harbour, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Zeus (Callimach. Fragm. 114, 2d ed. Bentr.), Artemis (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 259), Aphrodite (Paus. ii. 34. § 11; Serv. ad Aen. i. 724), Priapus (Anthol. Palat. x. i. 7), and of Pan (Anthol. Palat. x. 10.) [L. S.]

LIMETANUS, C. MAMILIUS, tribune of the plebs. a. c. 110, carried a law for inquiring into the cases of all persons who had assisted Jugurtha in his opposition to the senate, and had received bribes from him to neglect their duty to the state. Three quaestores were appointed under this law, which was the first serious blow given to the power of the nobility since the death of C. Gracchus. Many men of the highest family were condemned under it, and among them four who had been consuls. (Sall. Jug. 40, 65; Cic. Brut. 33, 34.) The name of Limetanus occurs on a coin of the Mamilia gens. [MAMILIA GENS.]

LIMENTINUS, the god protecting the threshold (limen) of the house. (Arnob. adv. Gent. i. 15, iv. 9, 11; Tertull. Idol. 15; August. de Civ. Dei. iv. 8, vi. 7.) Much superstition was connected among the Romans with the threshold, and many persons were very scrupulous in always putting the right foot across it first. (Petron. Sat. 30.) [L. S.]

LIMNAEA, LIMNETES, LIMNEGENES (Λιμναία (ος), Λιμνητές (ος), Λιμνεγενής), i. e. inhabiting or born in a lake or marsh, is a surname of several divinities who were believed either to have sprung from a lake, or had their temples near a lake. Instances are, Dionysus at Athens (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 871; Callim. Fragm. 280, Bentr.; Thuc. ii. 15; Aristoph. Ran. 216; Athen. x. p. 437, xi. p. 465), and Artemis at Sicyon, near Epidaurus (Paus. ii. 7. § 6, iii. 23. § 10), on the frontiers between Laconia and Messenia (Paus. iii. 2. § 6, 7. § 4, iv. 4. § 2, 31. § 3, vii. 20. § 7, &c.; Strab. viii. p. 361; Tac. Ann. iv. 43), near Calamae (Paus. iv. 31. § 3), at Tegae (viii. 53. § 11, comp. iii. 14. § 2), Patrae (vii. 20. § 7); it is also used as a surname of nymphs (Theocrit. v. 17) that dwell in lakes or marshes. [L. S.]

LIMUS (Λιμύς), the Latin Fames, or personification of hunger. Hesiod (Theog. 227) describes hunger as the offspring of Eris or Discord. A poetical description of Fames occurs in Ovid (Met. viii. 800, &c.), and Virgil (Aen. vi. 276) places it, along with other monsters, at the entrance of Orcus. [L. S.]

LINAX, artist. [ZENAS.]

LINDIA (Λινδία), a surname of Athena, derived from the town of Lindus, in the island of Rhodes, where she had a celebrated temple. (Diod. v. 58; Herod. i. 182; Strab. xiv. p. 655.) [L. S.]

LINDINUS, a Latin poet, whose age is quite uncertain, but who probably lived at a late period, is the author of a short poem of twelve lines, "De Aetate," in which he assigns the different years of life to different occupations, such as the first ten to play, &c. It is printed in the Anthologia Latina (No. 541, ed. Meyer), and by Wernsdorf (Poetae Latini Minores, p. 415).

LINUS (Λίνος), the personification of a dirge or lamentation, and therefore described as a son of Apollo by a Muse (Calliope, or by Psamathe or Chalciope, Apollod. i. 3. § 2; Paus. i. 43. § 7, ii. 19. § 7; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1164), or of Amphinarus by Urania (Paus. ix. 29. § 3). Respecting his mother Psamathe, the story runs thus:—When she had given birth to Linus she exposed the child. He was found by shepherds, who brought him up, but the child was afterwards torn to pieces by dogs. Psamathe's grief at the occurrence betrayed her misfortune to her father, who condemned her to death. Apollo, in his indignation at the father's cruelty, visited Argos with a plague, and when his oracle was consulted about the means of averting the plague, he answered that the Argives must propitiate Psamathe and Linus. This was attempted by means of sacrifices, and matrons and virgins sang dirges which were called Λίνοι, and the month in which this solemnity was celebrated was called Δριεύς, and the festival itself Δριεύς, because Linus had grown up among lambs. The pestilence, however, did not cease until Crotopus quitted Argos and settled at Tripodisium, in Megaris (Conon. Narrat. 19; Paus. i. 43. § 7; Athen. iii. p. 99). According to a Boeotian tradition Linus was killed by Apollo, because he had ventured upon a musical contest with the god (Paus. ix. 29. § 3; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1163), and near Mount Helicon his image stood in a hollow rock, formed in the shape of a grotto; and every year before sacrifices were offered to the Muses, a funeral sacrifice was offered to him, and dirges (Λίνοι) were sung in his honour. His tomb was claimed both by the city of Argos and by Thebes (Paus. l. c., comp. ii. 19. § 7); but after the battle of Chaeroneia, Philip of Macedonia was said to have carried away the remains of Linus from Thebes to Macedonia. Subsequently, however, the king was induced by a dream to send the remains back to Thebes. Chalcis in Euboea likewise boasted of possessing the tomb of Linus, the inscription of which is preserved by Diogenes Laertius (Prooem. 4; comp. Suid. s. v. Λίνος). Being regarded as a son of Apollo and a Muse, he is said to have received from his father the three-stringed lute, and is himself called the inventor of new melodies, of dirges (Σπρίνοι), and of songs in general. Hesiod (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 330) even calls him παιωνίης οοφίης δεδωκώς. It is probably owing to the difficulty of reconciling the different mythuses about Linus, that the Thebans (Paus. ix. 29, in fin.) thought it necessary to distinguish between an earlier and later Linus; the latter is said to have instructed Heracles in music, but to have been killed by the hero (comp. Apollod. ii. 4. § 9; Theocrit. xxiv. 103; Diodor. iii. 67; Athen. iv. p. 164). In the time of the Alexandrine grammarians people even went so far as to look upon Linus as an historical personage, and to consider him, like Musaeus, Orpheus, and others, as the author of apocryphal works (Diodor. iii. 66), in which he described the exploits of Dionysus; Diogenes Laertius (Prooem. 3), who calls him a son of Hermes and Urania, ascribes to him several poetical productions, such as a cosmogony on the course of the sun and moon, on the generation of animals and fruits, and the like.

The principal places in Greece which are the scenes of the legends about Linus are Argos and Thebes, and the legends themselves bear a strong resemblance to those about Hyacinthus, Narcissus, Glaucus, Adonis, Maneros, and others, all of whom are conceived as handsome and lovely youths, and either as princes or as shepherds. They are the favourites of the gods; and in the midst of the enjoyment of their happy youth, they are carried off by a sudden or violent death; but their remembrance is kept alive by men, who celebrate their memory in dirges and appropriate rites, and seek the vanished youths generally about the middle of summer, but in vain. The feeling which seems to have given rise to the stories about these personages, who form a distinct class by themselves in Greek mythology, is deeply felt grief at the catastrophes observable in nature, which dies away under the influence of the burning sun (Apollo) soon after it has developed all its fairest beauties. Those popular dirges, therefore, originally the expression of grief at the premature death of nature through the heat of the sun, were transformed into lamentations of the deaths of youths, and were sung on certain religious occasions. They were afterwards considered to have been the productions of the very same youths whose memory was celebrated in them. The whole class of songs of this kind was called σπῆνος ὁλκρον, and the most celebrated and popular among them was the λινος, which appears to have been popular even in the days of Homer. (Il. xviii. 569, with the Schol.) Pamphos, the Athenian, and Sappho, sang of Linus under the name of Oetolius (ὄλος Ἀλίου, i. e. the death of Linus, Paus. ix. 29. § 3); and the tragic poets, in mournful choral odes, often use the form αἴλινος (Aeschyl. Agam. 121; Soph. Aias, 627; Eurip. Phoen. 1535, Orest. 1380), which is a compound of αἰ, the interjection, and λινος. As regards the etymology of Linus, Welcker regards it as formed from the mournful interjection, li, while others, on the analogy of Hyacinthus and Narcissus, consider Linus to have originally been the name of a flower (a species of narcissus). (Phot. Lex. p. 224, ed. Pora.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 99; compare in general Ambrosch, De Lino, Berlin, 1829, 4to; Welcker, Kleine Schriften, i. p. 8, &c.; E. v. Lassaulx, Ueber die Linoablage, Würzburg, 1842, 4to.) [L. S.]

LIPASÍUS, the engraver of a beautiful gem, bearing the head of the city Antioch, with the inscription ΑΠΙΛΑΚΙΟΥ, in the Museum Wordlogianum (p. 143). According to Raoul-Rochette, however, the name should be read Ἀρρασιού. (Lettre à M. Sokorn, p. 33, or p. 122, 2d edit.) [P. S.]

LIPODORUS (Λιπόδορος) commanded a body of 3000 soldiers in the army of the Greeks, who, having been settled by Alexander the Great in the upper or eastern satrapies of Asia, revolted as soon as they heard of his death, in a. c. 323. Pithon, having been sent against them by the regent Perdikkas, found means to bribe Lipodorus, who drew off his men during the heat of the battle, and thus caused the defeat of his friends. (Diod. xviii. 4, 7; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. pp. 56–58.) [E. E.]

LITAE (Ἀραι), a personification of the prayers offered up in repentance. They are described as the daughters of Zeus, and as following closely behind crime, and endeavouring to make amends for what has been done; but whoever disdains to receive them, has himself to atone for the crime that has been committed. (Hom. Il. ix. 502, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 768; Hesych. s. v. αἰραι, calls them Aetae, which however is probably only a mistake in the name.) [L. S.]

haps, have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. A few fragments of his writings, which are all that remain, are to be found in the collection of writers on veterinary surgery, first published in Latin by Jean de la Ruelle, Paris 1530, fol., and afterwards in Greek by Simon Grynaeus, Basil, 1537, 4to. [W. A. G.]

LITYERSES (Λιτυέρσης), a natural son of Midas, lived at Celaenae in Phrygia, engaged in rural pursuits, and hospitably received all strangers that passed his house, but he then compelled them to assist him in the harvest, and whenever they allowed themselves to be surpassed by him in their work, he cut off their heads in the evening, and concealed their bodies in the sheaves, accompanying his deed with songs. Heracles, however, slew him, and threw his body into the Maeander. The Phrygian reapers used to celebrate his memory in a harvest-song which bore the name of Lityerxes (Schol. ad Theocrit. x. 41; Athen. x. p. 615, xiv. p. 619; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1164; Hesych., Phot., Suid. s. v.; Pollux, iv. 54). Concerning the song Lityerxes see Eichstädt, De Dramate Graecor. comico-satyrico, imprimis de Sonithi Lityerxa, p. 16, &c.; Ilgen, De Scodiorum Poeti, p. 16, &c. [L. S.]

LIVILLA. [LIVIA.]

LIVIA. 1. Daughter of M. Livius Drusus, consul a. c. 112, and sister of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune of the plebs, who was killed a. c. 91. [See the genealogical table, Vol. I. p. 1076.] She was married first to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis (Cic. Brut. 62; Val. Max. iii. 1. § 2; Aur. Vict. de Vir. 18, 80; Plut. Cat. Min. i. 2), and subsequently to Q. Servilius Caepio, by whom she had a daughter, Servilia, who was the mother of M. Brutus, who killed Caesar. (Plut. Brut. 2, Caes. 62, Cat. Min. 24.) Some writers suppose that Caepio was her first husband, and Cato her second.

2. LIVIA DRUSILLA, the wife of Augustus, was the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus [Drusus, No. 7], who had been adopted by one of the Livii gens, but was a descendant of App. Claudius Caecus. Livia was born on the 28th of September, a. c. 56–54. (Létronne, Recherches pour servir à l'Histoire de l'Égypte, p. 171.) She was married first to Tib. Claudius Nero; but her beauty having attracted the notice of Octavian at the beginning of a. c. 38, her husband was compelled to divorce her, and surrender her to the triumvir. She had already borne her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus was six months pregnant with another, who subsequently received the name of Drusus. It was only two years previously that she had been obliged to fly before Octavian, in consequence of her husband having fought against him in the Peruvian war. (Suet. Tib. 3, 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 75, 79; Suet. Aug. 62; Dion Cass. xlviii. 15, 34, 44.)

Livia never bore Augustus any children, but she continued to have unbounded influence over him till the time of his death. The empire which she had gained by her charms she maintained by the purity of her conduct and the fascination of her manners, as well as by a perfect knowledge of the character of Augustus, whom she endeavoured to please in every way. She was a consummate actress, excelled in dissimulation and intrigue, and never troubled either herself or her husband by complaining of the numerous mistresses of the latter. There was only one subject which occasioned any discussion between them, and that was the succession. Augustus naturally wished to secure it for his own family, but Livia resolved to obtain it for her own children; and, according to the common opinion at Rome, she did not scruple to employ foul means to remove out of the way the family of her husband. Hence she was said to be "gravis in rempublicam mater, gravis domui Caesarum noverca." (Tac. Ann. i. 10.) The premature death of Marcellus was attributed by many to her machinations, because he had been preferred to her sons as the husband of Julia, the daughter of Augustus. (Dion Cass. liii. 33.) But for this there seems little ground. The opportune death both of C. Caesar and L. Caesar seems much more suspicious. These young men were the children of Julia by her marriage with Agrippa; and being the grandchildren of Augustus, they presented, as long as they lived, an insuperable obstacle to the accession of Tiberius, the son of Livia. But Lucius died suddenly at Massilia in A. D. 2, and Caius in Lycia A. D. 4, of a wound, which was not considered at all dangerous. It was generally suspected that they had both been poisoned, by the secret orders of Livia and Tiberius. She was even suspected of having hastened the death of Augustus in A. D. 14.

Augustus left Livia and Tiberius as his heirs; and by his testament adopted her into the Julian gens, in consequence of which she received the name of Julia Augusta. By the accession of her son to the imperial throne, Livia had now attained the long-cherished object of her ambition, and by means of her son thought to reign over the Roman world. But this the jealous temper of Tiberius would not brook. At first all public documents were signed by her as well as by Tiberius, and letters on public business were addressed to her as well as to the emperor; and with the exception of her not appearing in person in the senate or the assemblies of the army and the people, she acted as if she were the sovereign. She openly said that it was she who had procured the empire for Tiberius, and to gratify her the senate proposed to confer upon her various extraordinary honours. Thereupon Tiberius, perceiving that he was becoming a mere cypher in the state, forbade all these honours, and commanded her to retire altogether from public affairs; but she had gained such an ascendancy over him, that he did not feel himself his own master as long as he was in her neighbourhood, and accordingly removed his residence from Rome to Capreae. Such was the return she was destined to receive for all the toil she had sustained and the crimes she had probably committed, in order to secure the empire for her son. Tiberius no longer disguised the hatred he felt for his mother, and for the space of three years he only spoke to her once. When she was on her death-bed, he even refused to visit her. She died in A. D. 29, after suffering from repeated attacks of illness, at a very advanced age, eighty-two according to Pliny (H. N. xiv. 8), eighty-six according to Dion Cassius (lvi. 2). Tiberius did not attempt to dissemble the joy which he felt at her death. He took no part in the funeral rites, and forbade her consecration, which had been proposed by the senate, on the ground that she had not wished it herself. Her funeral oration was delivered by her great grandson, C. Caesar, subsequently the emperor Caligula; but Tiberius would not allow her testament to be carried into effect. The legacies which she had left were not fully paid till the accession of Caligula; and her consecration did not take place till the reign of Claudius. (Tac. Ann. i. 3, 5, 8, 10, 14, v. 1, 2; Dion Cass. lvi. 12, lviii. 2, lix. 1, 2, lx. 5; Suet. Tib. 50, 51.)

COIN OF LIVIA.

3. LIVIA or LIVILLA, the daughter of Drusus senior and Antonia, and the sister of Germanicus and the emperor Claudius. [See the genealogical table, Vol. I. p. 1076.] In her eleventh year B. C. 1, she was betrothed to C. Caesar, the son of Agrippa and Julia, and the grandson of Augustus. She was subsequently married to her first cousin, Drusus junior, the son of the emperor Tiberius, but was seduced by Sejanus, who both feared and hated Drusus, and who persuaded her to poison her husband, which she accordingly did in A. D. 23. Her guilt was not discovered till the fall of Sejanus, eight years afterwards, A. D. 31, when it was revealed to Tiberius by Apicata, the wife of Sejanus. According to some statements Livia was put to death by Tiberius, but according to others she was spared by the emperor on account of her mother, Antonia, who, however, caused her to be starved to death. Such is the account of Dion Cassius (lvi. 11); but from Tacitus saying (Ann. vi. 2) that in A. D. 32 the statues of Livia were destroyed and her memory cursed, because her crimes had not yet been punished, it would appear as if he supposed that she had died before the fall of Sejanus. (Suet. Claud. 1; Tac. Ann. ii. 43, 84, iv. 1, 40, vi. 2; Dion Cass. lvi. 22, lviii. 11.)

4. JULIA LIVILLA, the daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. [JULIA, No. 8.]

LIVIA GENS, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious houses among the Roman nobility. Suetonius says (Tib. 3) that the Livii had obtained eight consulships, two censorships, three triumphs, a dictatorship, and a mastership of the horse. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was M. Livius Dentor, B. C. 302; and it at length rose to the imperial dignity by the marriage of Livia with Augustus, whose son Tiberius by a former husband succeeded the latter in the government of the Roman world. The cognomens in this gens are DENTER, DRUSUS, LIBO, MACATUS, and SALINATOR.

LIVINEIUS. The name Livineius seems to belong to the family of the Reguli itself, originally at least a branch of the Gens Atilia. In Cicero (ad Att. iii. 17, ad Fam. xiii. 60) it is the appellation of two freedmen of the brothers M. and L. Regulus, one of whom, L. Livineius Trypho, Cicero commends to C. Munatius, as having befriended when others deserted him (ad Fam. l. c.); compare Tac. Ann. iii. 11, xiv. 17. [REGULUS.] [W.B.D.]

M. LIVIVS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 320, opposed the proposition for annulling the treaty made with the Samnites at Caudium. (Liv. ix. 8.)

LIVIVS, the Roman historian, was born at Patavium, in the consulship of Caesar and Bibulus, B. C. 59. The greater part of his life appears to have been spent in the metropolis, but he returned to his native town before his death, which happened at the age of 76, in the fourth year of Tiberius, A. D. 17. We know that he was married, and that he had at least two children, for a certain L. Magius, a rhetorician, is named as the husband of his daughter, by Seneca (Proem. Controv. lib. v.), and a sentence from a letter addressed to a son, whom he urges to study Demosthenes and Cicero, is quoted by Quintilian (x. 1. § 39). His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus (Tacit. Ann. iv. 34); he became a person of consideration at court, and by his advice Claudius, afterwards emperor, was induced in early life to attempt historical composition (Suet. Claud. 41), but there is no ground for the assertion that Livy acted as preceptor to the young prince. Eventually his reputation rose so high and became so widely diffused that, as we are assured by Pliny (Epist. ii. 3), a Spaniard travelled from Cadix to Rome, solely for the purpose of beholding him, and having gratified his curiosity in this one particular, immediately returned home.

Although expressly termed Patavinus by ancient writers, some doubts have been entertained with regard to the precise spot of his birth, in consequence of a line in Martial (Ep. i. 62):—

Verona docti syllabas amat vatis,
Marone felix Mantua est,
Censetur Apona Livio suo tellus, Stellaque nec Flacco minus—

from which it has been inferred that the famous hot-springs, the Patavinas Aquae, of which the chief was Aponus fons, situated about six miles to the south of Patavium, and now known as the Bagni d'Abano, ought to be regarded as the place of his nativity. According to this supposition he was styled Patavinus, just as Virgil was called Mantuanus, although in reality belonging to Aude; but Cluverius and the best geographers believe that Apona tellus is here equivalent to Patavina tellus, and that no village Aponus or Aponus vicus existed in the days of the epigrammatist. In like manner Statius (Silo. iv. 7) designates him as "Timavi alumnum," words which merely indicate his transpadane extraction.

The above particulars, few and meagre as they are, embrace every circumstance for which we can appeal to the testimony of ancient writers. The bulky and minute biography by Tomasius, and similar productions, which communicate in turgid language a series of details which could have been ascertained by no one but a contemporary, are purely works of imagination. The greater number of the statements derived from such sources have gradually disappeared from all works of authority, but one or two of the more plausible still linger even in the most recent histories of literature. Thus we are assured that Livy commenced his career as a rhetorician and wrote upon rhetoric; that he was twice married, and had two sons and several daughters; that he was in the habit of spending much of his time at Naples; that he first recommended himself to Octavianus by presenting some dialogues on philosophy, and that he was tutor to Claudius. The first of these assertions is entitled to respect, since it has been adopted by Niebuhr, but seems to rest entirely upon a few notices in Quintilian, from which we gather that the Epistole ad Fvium, alluded to above, contained some precepts upon style (Quintil. ii. 5. § 20, viii. 2. § 18, x. 1. § 39). The second assertion, in so far as it affirms the existence of two sons, involves the very broad assumption that the following inscription, which is said to have been preserved at Venice, but with regard to whose history nothing has been recorded, neither the time when, nor the place where, nor the circumstances under which it was found, must refer to the great historian and to no one else: T. LIVIVS. C. F. SIBI. ET. SUI. T. LIVIO. T. F. PRISCO. F. T. LIVIO. T. F. LONGO. ET. CASSIAR. NEX. F. PRIMAR. UXORI; while the number of daughters depends upon another inscription of a still more doubtful character, to which we shall advert hereafter. The third assertion is advanced because it has been deemed certain that since Virgil, Horace, and various other personages of wit and fashion were wont in that age to resort to the Campanian court, Livy must have done the like. With respect to the fourth assertion, we are informed by Seneca (Sauro. 100) that Livy wrote dialogues which might be regarded as belonging to history as much as to philosophy (Scripti enim et dialogos quos a magis Philosophiae annexerare possis quam Historiae), and books which professed to treat of philosophic subjects (ex professo Philosophiam antiqentes libros); but the story of the presentation to Octavianus is an absolute fabrication. The fifth assertion we have already contradicted, and not without reason, as will be seen from Suetonius (Claud. 41).

The memoirs of most men terminate with their death; but this is by no means the case with our historian, since some circumstances closely connected with what may be fairly termed his personal history, excited no small commotion in his native city many centuries after his decease. About the year 1360 a tablet was dug up at Padua, within the monastery of St. Justina, which occupied the site of an ancient temple of Jupiter, or of Juno, or of Concordia, according to the conflicting hypotheses of local antiquaries. The stone bore the following inscription, V. P. T. LIVIVS. LIVIAE. T. F. QUARTAE. L. HALYS. CONCORDIALIA. PATAVI. SIBI. ET. SUI. OMNIBUS, which was at first interpreted to mean Virus fecit Titus Livius Liviae Titii filiae quartae, (sc. uxori) Lucii Halys Concordialis Patavi sibi et suis omnibus. Some imagined that QUARTAE. L. HALYS denoted Quartus legionis Halys, but this opinion was overthrown without difficulty, because even at that time it was well known that L. is seldom if ever used in inscriptions as an abbreviation of LEGIO, and secondly because the fourth legion was entitled Seythica and not Halys. It was then decided that QUARTAE must indicate the fourth daughter of Livius, and that L. HALYS must be the name of her husband; and ingenious persons endeavoured to show that in all probability he was identical with the L. Magius mentioned by Seneca. They also persuaded themselves that Livy, upon his return home, had been installed by his countrymen in the dignified office of priest of the goddess Concord, and had erected this monument within the walls of her sanctuary, marking the place of sepulture of himself and his family. At all events whatever difficulties might seem to embarrass the explanation of some of the words and abbreviations in the inscription, no doubt seems for a moment to have been entertained that it was a genuine memorial of the historian. Accordingly, the Benedictine fathers of the monastery transported the tablet to the vestibule of their chapel, and caused a portrait of Livy to be painted beside it. In 1413, about fifty years after the discovery just described, in digging the foundations for the erection of new buildings in connection with the monastery, the workmen reached an ancient pavement composed of square bricks cemented with lime. This having been broken through, a leaden coffin became visible, which was found to contain human bones. An old monk declared that this was the very spot above which the tablet had been found, when immediately the cry rose that the remains of Livy had been brought to light, a report which filled the whole city with extravagant joy. The new-found treasure was deposited in the town hall, and to the ancient tablet a modern epitaph was affixed. At a subsequent period a costly monument was added as a further tribute to his memory. Here, it might have been supposed, these weary bones would at length have been permitted to rest in peace. But in 1451, Alphonso of Arragon preferred a request to the Paduans, that they would be pleased to bestow upon him the bone of Livy's right arm, in order that he might possess the limb by which the immortal narrative had been actually peened. This petition was at last complied with; but just as the valuable relic reached Naples, Alphonso died, and the Sicilian fell heir to the prize. Eventually it passed into the hands of Joannes Joannus Pontanus, by whom it was enshrined with an appropriate legend. So far all was well. In the lapse of time, however, it was perceived, upon comparing the tablet dug up in the monastery of St. Justina, with others of a similar description, that the contractions had been erroneously explained, and consequently the whole tenor of the words misunderstood. It was clearly proved that L. did not stand for LUCIVS but for LIBERTVS, and that the principal person named was Titus Livius Italys, freedman of Livia, the fourth daughter of a Titus Livius, that he had in accordance with the usual custom adopted the designation of his former master, that he had been a priest of Concord at Padua, an office which it appeared from other records had often been filled by persons in his station, and that he had set up this stone to mark the burying-ground of himself and his kindred. Now since the supposition that the skeleton in the leaden coffin was that of the historian rested solely upon the authority of the inscription, when this support was withdrawn, the whole fabric of conjecture fell to the ground, and it became evident the relics were those of an obscure freedman.

The great and only extant work of Livy is a History of Rome, termed by himself Annales (xliii. 13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, B. C. 9, comprised in 142 books: of these thirty-five have descended to us; but of the whole, with the exception of two, we possess summaries, which, although in themselves dry and lifeless, are by no means destitute of value, since they afford a complete index or table of contents, and are occasionally our sole authorities for the transactions of particular periods. The compiler of these Epitomes, as they are generally called, is unknown; but they must have proceeded from one who was well acquainted with his subject, and were probably drawn up not long after the appearance of the volumes which they abridge. By some they have been ascribed to Livy himself, by others to Florus; but there is nothing in the language or context to warrant either of these conclusions; and external evidence is altogether wanting.

From the circumstance that a short introduction or preface is found at the beginning of books 1, 21 and 31, and that each of these marks the commencement of an important epoch, the whole work has been divided into decades, or groups, containing ten books each, although there is no good reason to believe that any such division was introduced until after the fifth or sixth century, for Priacian and Diomedes, who quote repeatedly from particular books, never allude to any such distribution. The commencement of book xli. is lost, but there is certainly no remarkable crisis at this place which invalidates one part of the argument in favour of the antiquity of the arrangement.

The first decade (bks. i.—x.) is entire. It embraces the period from the foundation of the city to the year B. C. 294, when the subjugation of the Samnites may be said to have been completed.

The second decade (bks. xi.—xx.) is altogether lost. It embraced the period from B. C. 294 to B. C. 219, comprising an account of the extension of the Roman dominion over the whole of Southern Italy and a portion of Gallia Cisalpina; of the invasion of Pyrrhus; of the first Punic war; of the expedition against the Illyrian pirates, and of other matters which fell out between the conclusion of the peace with Carthage and the siege of Saguntum.

The third decade (bks. xxi.—xxx.) is entire. It embraces the period from B. C. 219 to B. C. 201, comprehending the whole of the second Punic war, and the contemporaneous struggles in Spain and Greece.

The fourth decade (bks. xxxi.—xl.) is entire, and also one half of the fifth (bks. xli.—xlv.). These fifteen books embrace the period from B. C. 201 to B. C. 167, and develop the progress of the Roman arms in Cisalpine Gaul, in Macedonia, Greece and Asia, ending with the triumph of Aemilius Paulus, in which Perseus and his three sons were exhibited as captives.

Of the remaining books nothing remains except inconsiderable fragments, the most notable being a few chapters of the 91st book, concerning the fortunes of Sertorius.

The whole of the above were not brought to light at once. The earliest editions contain 29 books only, namely, i.—x., xxi.—xxxii., xxxiv.—xl., the last breaking off abruptly in the middle of chapter 37, with the word edixerunt. In 1518 the latter portion of bk. xxxiii., beginning in chapter 17th with artis fuscibus, together with what was wanting of bk. xl., were supplied from a MS. belonging to the cathedral church of St. Martin at Mayence. In 1531 bks. xli.—xlv. were discovered by Grynaeus in the convent of Lorsch, near Worms, and were published forthwith at Basle by Frobenius; and finally, in 1615, a MS. was found at Bamberg, which filled up the gap remaining in bk. xxxiii.; and this appeared complete for the first time at Rome in 1616. The fragment of bk. xci. was copied from a palimpsest in the Vatican by Paulus Jacobus Bruus in 1772, and printed in the following year at Rome, Leipzig, and Hamburg. A small portion which he failed to decipher was afterwards made out by Niebuhr, who also supplied some words which had been cut away, and published the whole in his Ciceronis pro M. Fonteio et C. Rabirio Orat. Fragm., Berlin, 1820. Two short fragments possessing much interest, since they describe the death and character of Cicero, are preserved in the sixth Suavia of Seneca.

From the revival of letters until the reign of Louis XIV. the hopes of the learned were perpetually excited and tantalised by reports with regard to complete MSS. of the great historian. Strenuous exertions were made by Leo X. and many other European potentates in their efforts to procure a perfect copy, which at one time was said to be deposited at Iona in the Hebrides, at another in Chios, at another in the monastery of Mount Athos, at another in the seraglio of the grand signor, while it has been confidently maintained that such a treasure was destroyed at the sack of Magdeburg; and there can be no doubt that a MS. containing the whole of the fifth decade at least was once in existence at Lausanne. Tales too were circulated and eagerly believed of leaves or volumes having been seen or heard of under strange and romantic circumstances; but the prize, although apparently often within reach, always eluded the grasp, and the pursuit has long since been abandoned in despair.

We remarked that two of the Epitomes had been lost. This deficiency was not at first detected, since the numbers follow each other in regular succession from 1 up to 140; and hence the total number of books was supposed not to exceed that amount. Upon more careful examination, however, it was perceived that while the epitome of bk. cxxv. closed with the conquest of the Salassi, which belongs to a.c. 25, the epitome of bk. cxxvi. opened with the subjugation of the Rhaeti, by Tiberius, Nero, and Drusus, in a.c. 15, thus leaving a blank of nine years, an interval marked by the shutting of Janus, the celebration of the secular games, the acceptance of the tribunitian power by Augustus, and other occurrences which would scarcely have been passed over in silence by the abbreviator. Sigonius and Drakenborch, whose reasonings have been generally admitted by scholars, agree that two books were devoted to this space, and hence the epitomes which stand as cxxvii., cxxviii., cxxviii., cxxix., cxi., ought to be marked cxxviii., cxxix., cxl., cxli., cxlii., respectively.

It was little probable, a priori, that an undertaking so vast should have been brought to a close before any part of it was given to the world; and in point of fact we find indications here and there which throw some light upon the epochs when different sections were composed and published. Thus in book first (c. 19) it is stated that the temple of Janus had been closed twice only since the reign of Numa, for the first time in the consulship of T. Manlius (b.c. 235), a few years after the termination of the first Punic war; for the second time by Augustus Caesar, after the battle of Actium, in a.c. 29, as we learn from other sources. But we are told by Dion Cassius that it was shut again by Augustus after the conquest of the Cantabrians, in a.c. 25; and hence it is evident that the first book must have been written, and must have gone forth between the years a.c. 29 and a.c. 25. An attempt has been made to render these limits still narrower, from the consideration that the emperor is here spoken of as Augustus, a title not conferred until the year a.c. 27; but this will only prove that the passage could not have been published before that date, since, although written previously, the honorary epithet might have been inserted here and elsewhere at any time before publication. Again, we gather from the epitome that bk. li. contained a reference to the law of Augustus, De Mariandis Ordinibus, from which it has been concluded that the book in question must have been written after a.c. 18; but this is by no means certain, since it can be proved that a legislative enactment upon this subject was proposed as early as a.c. 28. Since, however, the obsequies of Drusus were commemorated in bk. cxlii. it is evident, at the very lowest computation, that the task must have been spread over seventeen years, and probably occupied a much longer time. We must not omit to notice that Niebuhr takes a very different view of this matter. He is confident that Livy did not begin his labours until he had attained the age of fifty (a.c. 9), and that he had not fully accomplished his design at the close of his life. He builds chiefly upon a passage in ix. 36, where it is said that the Cimian wood was in these days as impenetrable "quam nuper fuere Germanici saltus," words which, it is urged, could not have been used before the forests of Germany had been opened up by the campaigns of Drusus (a.c. 12-9); and upon another in iv. 20, where, after it is recorded that Augustus had repaired the shrine of Jupiter Feretrius, he is termed "templorum omnium conditorem aut restitutorem," a description which could not have been applied to him in so early a part of his career. Now, without insisting that casual remarks such as these might have been introduced during a revision of the text, it must be evident that the remarks themselves are much too vague to serve as the basis of a chronological theory, except in so far as they relate to the restoration of the shrine of Jupiter Feretrius; but this we know was undertaken at the suggestion of Atticus (Cornel. Nep. Att. c. 20), and Atticus died a.c. 82. On the other hand, the reasoning grounded on the shutting of the temple of Janus must be held, in so far as bk. i. is involved, to be absolutely impregnable; and we can scarcely imagine that the eighth book was not finished until sixteen years after the first.

In attempting to form an estimate of any great historical production, our attention is naturally and necessarily directed to two points, which may be kept perfectly distinct: first, the substance, that is, the truth or falsehood of what is set down; and secondly, its character merely as a literary composition.

As to the latter subject, Livy has little to fear from positive censure or from faint praise. His style may be pronounced almost faultless; and a great proof of its excellence is, that the charms with which it is invested are so little salient, and so equally diffused, that no one feature can be selected for special eulogy, but the whole unite to produce a form of singular beauty and grace. The narrative flows on in a calm, but strong current, clear and sparkling, but deep and unbroken; the diction displays richness without heaviness, and simplicity without tameness. The feelings of the reader are not laboriously worked up from time to time by a grand effort, while he is suffered to languish through long intervals of dullness, but a sort of gentle excitement is steadily maintained: the attention never droops; and while the great results appear in full relief, the minor incidents, which often conduce so materially to these results, are brought plainly into view. Nor is his art as a painter less wonderful. There is a distinctness of outline and a warmth of colouring in all his delineations, whether of living men in action, or of things inanimate, which never fail to call up the whole scene, with all its adjuncts, before our eyes. In a gallery of masterpieces, it is difficult to make a selection, but we doubt whether any artist, ancient or modern, ever finished a more wonderful series of pictures than those which are found at the conclusion of the 27th book, representing the state of the public mind at Rome, when intelligence was first received of the daring expedition of the consul Claudius Nero, the agonising suspense which prevailed while the success of this hazardous project was yet uncertain, and the almost frantic joy which hailed the intelligence of the great victory on the Metaurus. The only point involving a question of taste from which we should feel inclined to withhold warm commendation is one which has called forth the warmest admiration on the part of many critics. We mean the numerous orations by which the course of the narrative is diversified, and which are frequently made the vehicle of political discussion. Not but that these are in themselves models of eloquence; but they are too often out of keeping with the very moderate degree of mental cultivation enjoyed by the speakers, and are frequently little adapted to the times when they were delivered, or to the audiences to whom they were addressed. Instead of being the shrewd outpourings of homely wisdom, or the violent expression of rude passion, they have too much the air of polished rhetorical declamations.

Before proceeding to examine and to judge the matter or substance of the work, we are bound to ascertain, if possible, the end which the author proposed to himself. Now no one who reads the pages of Livy with attention can for a moment suppose that he ever conceived the project of drawing up a critical history of Rome. He desired indeed to extend the fame of the Roman people, and to establish his own reputation; but he evidently had neither the inclination nor the ability to enter upon laborious original investigations with regard to the foreign and domestic relations of the republic in remote ages. His aim was to offer to his countrymen a clear and pleasing narrative, which, while it gratified their vanity, should contain no startling improbabilities nor gross amplifications, such as would have shocked his fastidious contemporaries. To effect this purpose he studied with care some of the more celebrated historians who had already trodden the path upon which he was about to enter, comparing and remodelling the materials which they afforded. He communicated warmth and ease to the cold constrained records of the more ancient chronicles, he expunged most of the monstrous and puerile fables with which the pages of his predecessors were overloaded, retaining those fictions only which were clothed with a certain poetical seemliness, or such as had obtained so firm a hold upon the public mind as to have become articles in the national faith; he rejected the clumsy exaggerations in which Valerius Antias and others of the same school had loved to revel, and he moulded what had before been a collection of heavy, rude, incongruous masses, into one commanding figure, symmetrical in all its proportions, full of vigorous life and manly dignity. Where his authorities were in accordance with each other, and with common sense, he generally rested satisfied with this agreement; where their testimony was irreconcilable, he was content to point out their want of harmony, and occasionally to offer an opinion on their comparative credibility. But, however turbid the current of his information, in no case did he ever dream of ascending to the fountain head. Never did he seek to confirm or to confute the assertion of others by exploring the sources from which their knowledge was derived. He never attempted to test their accuracy by examining monuments of remote antiquity, of which not a few were accessible to every inhabitant of the metropolis. He never thought it necessary to inquire how far the various religious rites and ceremonies still observed might throw light upon the institutions of a distant epoch; nor did he endeavour to illustrate the social divisions of the early Romans, and the progress of the Roman constitution, by investigating the antiquities of the various Italian tribes, most of whom possessed their own records and traditions.

It may perhaps be objected that we have no right to assume that Livy did not make use of such ancient monuments or documents as were available in his age, and that in point of fact he actually refers to several. We shall soon discover, however, upon close scrutiny, that in all such cases he does not speak from personal investigation, but from intelligence received through the medium of the annalists. Thus he is satisfied with quoting Licinius Macer for the contents of the Fœdus Ardeatinum (iv. 7); the "Lex vetusta prisca literis verbisque scripta" (vii. 3), and the circumstances connected with the usage there commemorated are evidently taken upon trust from Cincius Alimentus; and although he appeals (viii. 20) to the Fœdus Neapolitanum, he does not pretend to have seen it. On the other hand, we have many positive proofs of his negligence or indifference. When he hesitates between two different versions of the Libri Lintei given by two different writers (iv. 23), we might be inclined, with Dr. Arnold, charitably to believe that they were no longer in existence, rather than to suppose that he was so indolent that he would not take the trouble of walking from one quarter of the city to another for the sake of consulting them, had he not himself a few pages previously given us to understand that he had never inspected the writing on the breastplate of Cosus (iv. 20), and had he not elsewhere completely misrepresented the Ililian law (iii. 31), although it was inscribed on a column of bronze in the temple of Diana, where it was examined by Dionysius, to whom we are indebted for an accurate account of its purport: nay, more, it is perfectly clear that he had never read the Leges Regiæ, nor the Commentaries of Servius Tullius, nor even the Licinian Rogations; and, stranger still, that he had never studied with care the laws of the twelve tables, not to mention the vast collection of decrees of the senate, ordinances of the plebs, treaties and other state papers, extending back almost to the foundation of the city, which had been engraven on tablets of brass, and were consumed to the number of three thousand in the destruction of the capital by the Vitellians (Sueton. Vesp. 8; Tacit. Hist. iii. 71.)

The inquiry with regard to the authorities whom he actually did follow would be simple had these authorities been preserved, or had they been regularly referred to as the work advanced. But unfortunately not one of the writers employed by Livy in his first decade has descended to us entire or nearly entire, and he seldom gives any indication of the sources from whence his statements are derived, except in those cases where he encountered inexplicable contradictions or palpable blunders. The first five books contain very few allusions to preceding historians, but a considerable number of fragments relating to this period have been preserved by Dionysius, Plutarch, and the grammarians. On the other hand, scarcely any fragments have been preserved relating to the period embraced by the five last books of this decade; but here we find frequent notices of preceding historians. We are thus enabled to decide with considerable certainty that he depended chiefly upon Ennius, Fabius Pictor, Cincius Alimentus, and Calpurnius Piso; and to these must be added, after the commencement of the Gallic war, Claudius Quadrigarius; while he occasionally, but with less confidence, made use of Valerius Antias, Licinius Macer, and Aelius Tubero. We can discern no traces of Sulpicius Galba, nor of Scribonius Libo, nor of Cassius Hemina, nor of Semonius Tuditanus, who were not altogether destitute of weight: we need not lament that he passed over Postumius Albinus and Cn. Gellius, to the latter of whom especially Dionysius was indebted for a load of trash; but it must ever be a source of regret that he should have neglected the Annals and Antiquities of Varro, as well as the Origines of Cato, works from which he might have obtained stores of knowledge upon those departments of constitutional history in which he is conspicuously defective. From the commencement of the third decade he reposes upon a much more firm support. Polybius now becomes the guide whom, for the most part, he follows closely and almost exclusively. Occasionally indeed he quits him for a time, in order to make room for those representations of particular occurrences by the Latin annalists which he deemed likely to be more palatable to his readers; but he quickly returns to the beaten path, and treads steadily in the footsteps of the Greek.

It will be seen from these remarks that when Livy professes to give the testimony of all preceding authors (omnes auctores), these words must be intended to denote those only which happened to be before him at the moment, and must not by any means be understood to imply that he had consulted every author accessible, nor even such as were most deserving of credit. And not only does he fail to consult all the authors to whom he might have resorted with advantage, but he does not avail himself in the most judicious manner of the aid of those in whom he reposed trust. He does not seem at any time to have taken a broad and comprehensive view of his subject, but to have performed his task piecemeal. A small section was taken in hand, different accounts were compared, and the most plausible was adopted; the same system was adhered to in the succeeding portions, so that each considered by itself, without reference to the rest, was executed with care; but the witnesses who were rejected in one place were admitted in another, without sufficient attention being paid to the dependence and the connection of the events. Hence the numerous contradictions and inconsistencies which have been detected by sharp-eyed critics like Perizonius and Glareanus; and although these seldom affect materially the leading incidents, yet by their frequent recurrence they shake our faith in the trustworthiness of the whole. Other mistakes also are found in abundance, arising from his want of anything like practical knowledge of the world, from his never having acquired even the elements of the military art, of jurisprudence, or of political economy, and above all, from his singular ignorance of geography. It is well known that his account of the disaster at the Caudine Forks, of the march of Hannibal into Etruria, of the engagement on the Thrasymene Lake, and of the passage of the Alps by the Carthaginians, do not tally with the natural features of the regions in question, and yet the whole of these were within the limits or on the borders of Italy, and the localities might all have been visited within the space of a few weeks.

While we fully acknowledge the justice of the censures directed against Livy on the score of these and other deficiencies, we cannot admit that his general good faith has ever been impugned with any show of justice. We are assured (Tacit. Ann. iv. 34) that he was fair and liberal upon matters of contemporary history, where, from his position about court, he had the greatest temptation to flatter those in power by depreciating their former adversaries; we know that he did not scruple to pay a high tribute to the talents and patriotism of such men as Cassius and Brutus, that his character of Cicero is a high eulogium, and that he spoke so warmly of the unsuccessful leader in the great civil war, that he was sportively styled a Pompeian by Augustus, who to his honour did not look coldly on the historian in consequence of his boldness and candour. It is true that in recounting the domestic strife which agitated the republic for nearly two centuries, he represents the plebeians and their leaders in the most unfavourable light; and whilst he at times almost allows that they were struggling for their just rights against the oppression of the patricians, he contrives to render their proceedings odious. This arose, not from any wish to pervert the truth, but from ignorance of the exact relation of the contending parties, combined with a lively remembrance of the convulsions which he witnessed in his youth, or had heard of from those who were still alive when he had grown up to manhood. It is manifest that throughout he never can separate in his own mind the spirited plebeians of the infant commonwealth, composed of the noblest and best blood of the various neighbouring states subjugated by Rome, from the base and venal rabble which thronged the forum in the days of Marius and Cicero; while in like manner he confounds those bold and honest tribunes, who were the champions of liberty, with such men as Saturninus or Sulpicius, Clodius or Vatinius. There is also perceptible a strong but not unnatural disposition to elevate the justice, moderation, and valour of his own countrymen in all their dealings with foreign powers, and on the same principle to gloss over their deeds of oppression and treachery, and to explain away their defects. But although he unquestionably attempts to put a favourable construction upon adverse facts, he does not warp or distort the facts themselves as he found them recorded, and this enables the reader who is biased by no national prepossessions to draw a correct inference for himself. Occasionally, especially in the darker periods, we can scarcely doubt that he indulged in a little willful blindness, and that when two conflicting traditions were current he did not very scrupulously weigh the evidence, but, adopting that which was most gratifying to his countrymen, passed over the other in silence. He certainly could scarcely have been altogether ignorant that his story with regard to the conclusion of the war with Porsena was not the only one entitled to consideration, although he was probably unacquainted with the treaty from which Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 39; comp. Tacit. Hist. iii. 72) extracted the humiliating conditions of the peace, and he must have been aware that there were good reasons for believing that the evacuation of Rome by the Gauls took place under circumstances very different from those celebrated in the songs and funeral orations of the Furian and other patrician class.

The reproaches lavished on the alleged credulity of Livy in the matter of omens and prodigies scarcely deserve even a passing comment. No one can regret that he should have registered these curious memorials of superstition, which occupied so prominent a place in the popular faith, and formed an engine of such power in the hands of an unscrupulous priesthood; nor can any one who has read the simple and eloquent observation on this very topic, in the thirteenth chapter of the forty-third book, consider that either the sentiments or the conduct of the historian stand in need of further apology or explanation. (Comp. xxi. 62, xxiv. 10, 44, xxvii. 23.)

We must not omit to notice a question which has been debated with great eagerness,—whether Livy had read Dionysius or Dionysius had made use of Livy. Niebuhr unhesitatingly maintains that the Archæologia of Dionysius was published before Livy began to compose his Annals, and that the latter received considerable assistance from the former. We must hesitate, however, to acknowledge the certainty of this conclusion, unless there are some arguments in reserve more cogent than those brought forward in the Lectures on Roman History. For there two reasons only are advanced, the one founded upon the opinion which we have already endeavoured to prove was scarcely tenable,—that Livy did not commence his task until he had attained the age of fifty; the other founded upon the fact that Dionysius nowhere mentions Livy, which, it must be remembered, is counterbalanced by another fact, namely, that Livy nowhere mentions Dionysius, and that all attempts to prove plagiarisms or trace allusions have failed. In reality it is most probable that while both were engaged in the same pursuit at the same time, each followed his own course independently, and both gave the result of their labours to the world without either having been previously acquainted with the researches of the other.

There is yet one topic to which we must advert. We are told by Quintilian twice (i. 5. § 56, viii. 1. § 3) that Asinius Pollio had remarked a certain paternity in Livy. Scholars have given themselves a vast deal of trouble to discover what this term may indicate, and various hypotheses have been propounded; but any one who will read the words of Quintilian with attention cannot fail to perceive that they are susceptible of one interpretation only, and that if there is any truth in the story, which Niebuhr altogether disbelieves, Pollio must have intended to censure some provincial peculiarities of expression, which we at all events are in no position to detect, as might have been anticipated, the conjectures collected and examined in the elaborate dissertation of Morhof being alike frivolous.

From what has now been said it will be evident that if our estimate is accurate, Livy must have been destitute of many qualifications essential in an historian of the highest class. He was, we fully believe, amiable, honest, and single-minded, sound in head and warm in heart, but not endowed with remarkable acuteness of intellect, nor with indefatigable industry. He was as incapable of taking broad, clear, and philosophic views of the progress and connection of events, as he was indisposed to prosecute laborious and profound inquiries at the expense of great personal toil. Although a mere man of letters, knowing little of the world except from books, he was not a man of deep learning, and indeed was but indifferently versed in many ordinary branches of a liberal education. Not only was he content to derive all he knew from secondary streams, but he usually repaired for his supplies to those which were nearest and most convenient, without being solicitous to ascertain that they were the most pure. The unbounded popularity which he has enjoyed must be ascribed partly to the fascinations of his subject, partly to his winning candour, but chiefly to the extraordinary command which he wielded over the resources of his native tongue.

No manuscript of Livy has yet been discovered containing all the books now extant. Those which comprise the first and third decades do not extend further. Of the first and third decades we have MSS. as old as the tenth century; those of the fourth do not ascend higher than the fifteenth century. The text of the first decade depends entirely on one original copy, revised in the fourth century by Flavianus Nicomachus Dexter and Victorianus, from which all the known MSS. of this portion of the work have flowed. Of these the two best are the Codex Medicus or Florentinus of the eleventh century, and the Codex Parisinus, collated by Alchefsai, of the tenth century, while perhaps superior to either was the codex made use of by Rhenanus, which has now disappeared. The text of the third decade rests upon the Codex Puteanus employed by Gronovius, and which has been pronounced less correct than any MS. of the first decade. The fourth decade is derived chiefly from the Codex Bambergensis and the Codex Moguntinus, while the five books of the fifth decade are taken entirely from the MS. found at Lorsch, hence called Codex Laurishamensis, now preserved at Vienna.

The Editio Princeps of Livy was printed at Rome, in folio by Sweynheym and Pannartz, about 1469, under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria; the second edition also was printed at Rome in folio, by Udalricus Gallus, towards the close of the same year or the beginning of 1470; the third was from the press of Vindelini de Spira, fol. Venet. 1470, being the first which bears a date. Of those which followed, the most notable are, that of Bernard. Herasmus, fol. Venet. 1491, with the commentaries of M. Antonius Sabellicus, which were very often reprinted; that of Ascensius, fol. Par. 1510, 1513, 1516, 1530, 1533; that of Aldus, Venet. 5 tom. 8vo., 1518—1533, including Florus, and a Latin translation of Polybius by Perotto; that of Frobenius, fol. Basel, 1531, containing for the first time the five books discovered by Grynaeus and the chronology of Glareanus, reprinted in 1535, with the addition of the notes of Rhenanus and Gelenius; that of Gryphus, Lond. 4 vol. 8vo., 1542, with the notes of Valla, Rhenanus, Gelenius, and Glareanus, reprinted at Paris, 1543, with the addition of the notes of Antonius Sabellicus; that of Manutius, fol. Venet. 1555, 1566, 1572, 1592, with the epitomes and scholia of Sigonius; and that of Gruterus, fol. Francf. 1608, 8vo. 1619, fol. 1628, 8vo. 1659. A new era commences with researches of Gronovius, who first placed the text upon a satisfactory basis by the collation of a vast number of MSS. His labours appear under their best form in the editions printed by Daniel Elzevir, 3 vols. 1665, 1679, forming part of the Variorum Classics in 8vo. The edition of Jo. Clericus, 10 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1710, containing the supplements of Freinsheimius entire, and of Crevier, 6 vols. 4to., Paris, 1735—41, are by no means destitute of value: the latter especially has always been very popular; the notes have been frequently reprinted. It was reserved, however, for Drakenborch to follow out what Gronovius had so well begun, and his most elaborate edition, published at Leyden, in 7 vols. 4to. 1738—46, is still considered the standard. This admirable performance, in addition to a text revised with uncommon care and judgment, comprehends everything valuable contributed by previous scholars, and forms a most ample storehouse of learning. Since that period little has been done for Livy; for the editions of Stroth and Döring, Goth. 1796—1819, of Ruperti, Götting. 1807—1809, and of Bekker and Raschig, Lips. 1829, cannot be regarded as possessing any particular weight. A new recension, recently commenced by Alchefsiki, Berol. 8vo. 1841—1843, and carried as far as the end of the first decade, promises to be very valuable. The edition of Drakenborch, together with the excellent Commentationes de Fontibus Historiarum T. Livii of Lachmann, 4to. Götting. 1822—1828, will supply everything that can be desired for general illustration. To these we may perhaps add the commentary of Ruperti, which, although frequently verbose upon what is easy and altogether silent upon what is difficult, contains much matter useful to a student. A long list of dissertations on various isolated topics connected with Livy, will be found in Schweiger's Handbuch der Classischen Bibliographie, 8vo. Leipzig, 1832, and in the Grundriss der Classischen Bibliographie of Wagner, Breslau, 1840.

The quint old translation of Philemon Holland, fol. Lond. 1600, 1659, is far superior to the loose weak paraphrase of Baker. The version published by John Hayes (Lond. 1744—1745, 6 vols. 8vo.), professing to be executed by several hands, and another which appeared anonymously (fol. Lond. 1686), embrace the supplements of Freinsheim as well as the text of Livy. [W. R.]

LI'VIUS ANDRONICUS. [ANDRONICUS, Vol. I. p. 175, b.]

LOBON (Λόβων), of Argos, the author of a work on poets, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 34, 112).

LOCHEIA (Λοχεία), the protectress of women in childbed, occurs as a surname of Artemis. (Plat. Sympos. iii. 10; Orph. Hymn. 35, 3.) [L. S.]

LOCURUS (Λοκρός). 1. A son of Phycius and grandson of Amphictyon, became by Cabya the father of Locrus, the mythical ancestor of the Ozolian Locrians (Pint. Quaest. Graec. 15). According to some the wife of the former Locrus was called Cambyae or Protogeneia (Pind. Ol. ix. 86; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 277).

2. A son of Zeus and Maera, the daughter of the Argive king Proetus and Antaia. He is said to have assisted Zethus and Amphion in the building of Thebes (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1688). [L. S.]

LOCURUS (Λοκρός), a Parian statuary, of unknown date, whose statue of Athena, in the temple of Ares, at Athens, is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 8, § 5). [P. S.]

LOCUSTA, or, more correctly, LOCUSTA (see Heinrich, ad Juu. vol. ii. p. 62), a woman celebrated for her skill in concocting poisons. She was employed by Agrippina in poisoning the emperor Claudius, and by Nero for despatching Britannicus. (Tac. Ann. xii. 66, xiii. 15; Suet. Ner. 33; Dion Cass. ix. 34; Juv. i. 71, with Schol.) Suetonius says (Nero, 33) that the poison which she administered being too slow, Nero impatiently struck her with his own hand, and forced her to prepare a stronger draught in his presence, which killed Britannicus instantaneously. She was rewarded by Nero with ample estates; but under the emperor Galba she was executed with other malefactors of Nero's reign. (Dion Cass. lvi. 3.) [W. L.]

LOEMIUS (Λοίμιος), the deliverer from plague (Λοίμω), was a surname of Apollo at Lindus in Rhodes. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 17.) [L. S.]

LO'GBASIS (Λογβάσις), a citizen of Selge in Pamphylia. When Selge was attacked by Glyceris, the general of Achaëus, in a. c. 218, Logbasis, as having been guardian to Achaëus's wife Laodice, was deputed by his countrymen to treat with the enemy, and used the opportunity to make a treacherous agreement for the surrender of the city. His design, however, was detected on the very eve of its completion, and his fellow-citizens burst into his house, and slew him, together with his sons and the enemy's soldiers who were secreted there. (Pol. v. 74—76.) [E. E.]

LO'LLIA. 1. The wife of A. Gabinus, debauched by Caesar (Suet. Caes. 50), was probably a daughter of M. Lollius Palicanus, tribune of the plebs B. c. 71. She may be the same as the Lolis whom Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 22, § 4) speaks of as a woman of bad character.

2. LOLLIA PAULLINA, the granddaughter of M. Lollius (LOLLIUS No. 5), and heiress of his immense wealth, the spoil of the provinces. (Plin. H. N. ix. 35, a. 58.) Pliny describes the jewels which she wore in her hair, round her neck, arms and fingers, as worth forty millions of aesteres. She was married to C. Memmius Regulus; but on the report of her grandmother's beauty, the emperor Caligula sent for her, divorced her from her husband, and married her, but soon divorced her again. (Suet. Calig. 25; Dion Cass. lix. 12.) After Claudius had put to death his wife Messalina, Lollia was one of the candidates for the vacancy; but her more successful rival, Agrippina, easily obtained from Claudius a sentence of banishment against her, and then sent a tribune to murder her. (Tac. Ann. xii. 1; Suet. Claud. 26; Dion Cass. lx. §2.) A sepulchre to her honour was not erected till the reign of the emperor Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 12.) [W. L.]

LOLLIA GENS, plebeian, which does not occur in Roman history till the last century of the republic. It would appear to have been either of Samnite or Sabine origin, for a Samnite of this name is mentioned in the war with Pyrrhus [LOLLIUS, No. 1]; and M. Lollius Palicanus, who was tribune of the plebs B. C. 71, is described as a native of Picenum. [PALICANUS.] The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was M. Lollus, B. C. 21. The only cognomen of the Lollii in the time of the republic was PALICANUS; but under the empire we find a few more, which are given below under LOLLIVS.

LOLLIANUS, one of the so-called thirty tyrants under the Roman empire, is spoken of under LARLIANUS.

LOLLIANUS (Λολλιανός), a celebrated Greek sophist in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, was a native of Ephesus, and received his training in the school of the Assyrian Iseus. [ISÆUS, No. 2.] He was the first person nominated to the professor's chair (Σχολός) of sophistry at Athens, where he also filled the office of σπαραγγός ἐπὶ τῷ δέσπῳ, which, under the emperors, had become merely a praefectura aemone. The liberal manner in which he discharged the duties of this office in the time of a famine is recorded with well-merited praise by Philostratus. Two statues were erected to him at Athens, one in the agora, and the other in the small grove which he is said to have planted himself.

The oratory of Lollianus was distinguished by the skill with which he brought forward his proofs, and by the richness of his style: he particularly excelled in extempore speaking. He gave his pupils systematic instruction in rhetoric, on which he wrote several works. These are all lost, but they are frequently referred to by the commentators on Hermogenes, who probably made great use of them. The most important of these works are cited under the following titles: Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ, περὶ προοιμίων καὶ διηγήσεων, περὶ ἀφορισμῶν ῥητορικῶν, &c. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. i. 23; Suidas, s. v.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 95, 18.)

It was generally supposed till recently, as, for instance, by Böckh, that the above-mentioned Lollianus is the same as the L. Egnatius Victor Lollianus whose name occurs in two inscriptions (Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. vol. i. n. 377 and n. 1624), in one of which he is described as ῥήτωρ, and in the other as proconsul of Achaia. But it has been satisfactorily shown by Kayser, in the treatise mentioned below, that these inscriptions do not refer to the sophist at all; and it appears from an inscription containing an epigram of four lines recently discovered by Ross at Athens, that the full name of the sophist was P. Hordeonius Lollianus, who would therefore seem to have been a client of one of the Hordeonii. This inscription is printed by Weicker in the Rheinisches Museum (vol. i. p. 210, Neue Folge), as well as by Kayser. (C. L. Kayser, P. Hordeonius Lollianus, geschildert nach einer noch nicht herausgegebenen Athenischen Inschrift, Heidelberg, 1841.)

fort, Caricinium in Samnium, from which he made predatory excursions, until he was overpowered and the fort taken by Q. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pictor, B. C. 269. (Zonar. viii. 17; Dionys. ap. Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Collect. vol. ii. p. 526.)

2. Q. LOLLIVS, a Roman eques in Sicily, was nearly ninety years old at the time of Verres' administration of Sicily (B. C. 73–71), and was most shamefully treated by Q. Apronius, one of the most infamous creatures of Verres. His age and infirm health prevented him from coming forward as a witness against Verres when he was accused by Cicero; but his son, M. Lollivus, appeared in his stead. He had another son, Q. Lollivus, who had accused Calpidius, and had set out for Sicily for the purpose of collecting information against Verres, but was murdered on the road, according to general opinion, at the instigation of Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 25.)

3. L. LOLLIVS, a legate of Pompey in the Mithridatic war (Appian, Mithr. 95), may perhaps be the same as the L. Lollivus whom Caecilius mentions in a letter to Cicero. (Ad Fam. viii. 8.)

4. CN. LOLLIVS, a triumvir nocturnus, was condemned, with his colleagues, M. Mulvius and L. Sextilius, when accused by the tribunes of the plebs before the people, because they had come too late to extinguish a fire which had broken out in the Sacra Via. (Val. Max. viii. 1, dama. 5.)

5. M. LOLLIVS, M. F. is first mentioned as governing the province of Galatia as proprator. (Eutrop. vii. 10.) He was consul B. C. 21, with Q. Aemilius Lepidus (Dion Cass. liv. 6; Hor. Ep. i. 20. 28); and in B. C. 16 he commanded as legate in Gaul. Some German tribes, the Sigambri, Usipetes and Tenctheri, who had crossed the Rhine, were at first defeated by Lollivus (Obsequ. 131), but they subsequently conquered the imperial legate in a battle, in which the eagle of the fifth legion was lost. Although this defeat is called by Suetonius (Aug. 23) "majoris infamiae quam detrimenti," yet it was considered of sufficient importance to summon Augustus from the city to Gaul; and it is usually classed, with the loss of the army of Varus, as one of the two great Roman disasters in the reign of Augustus. (Lollivus Varianaeque cludes, Tac. Ann. i. 10; Suet. l.c.) On the arrival of Augustus, the Germans retired and re-crossed the Rhine. (Dion Cass. liv. 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 97.)

The misfortune of Lollivus did not, however, deprive him of the favour of Augustus. He was subsequently appointed by the emperor as tutor to his grandson, C. Caesar, whom he accompanied to the East in B. C. 2. But it would appear that he did not deserve this confidence; for Pliny (H. N. ix. 35. s. 58) tells us that he acquired immense wealth by receiving presents from the kings in the East; and his character is drawn in still darker colours by Velleius Paterculus, who describes him (ii. 97) as a man more eager to make money than to act honourably, and as pretending to purity and virtue while guilty of every kind of vice. This estimate of his character, however, ought probably to be taken with some deductions, as Velleius is equally lavish in his praises of the friends, and in his abuse of the enemies of Tiberius; and Lollivus, we know, was a personal enemy of Tiberius, and prejudiced C. Caesar against him. (Suet. Tib. 12; Tac. Ann. iii. 48.) The commendation which Horace bestows upon Lollius in the ode addressed to him (Carmin. iv. 9) must, of course, be taken with as great deductions as the reproaches of Velleius; but since the poet expressly speaks of his freedom from all avarice,

"Vindex avarae fraudis et abstinens Ducentis ad se cuncta pecuniæ," we must believe that Lollius had not become notorious for his love of money till he accompanied C. Caesar into the East. While in the East, Lollius incurred the displeasure of C. Caesar, owing, it is said, to his having betrayed to the Parthians the plans of the Romans. Pliny states (l. c.) that Lollius put an end to his own life by poison, and Velleius Paterculus (ii. 102), though he leaves it uncertain, implies that such was the case, and adds that his death occasioned general joy.

It is uncertain whether Lollius bore any cognomen. In an inscription (apud Sigon. et Pigh. ad ann. 732) he is called simply M. Lollius, M. F. Some writers suppose that this surname was Paulinus, because his granddaughter was called Lollia Paullina, and because we find an M. Lollius Paulinus who was consul suffectus A. D. 93; but this is not conclusive evidence, as we know that the Romans frequently added cognomens, and changed them, in the imperial period. In no ancient writer is Lollius mentioned with any surname.

Lollius appears to have left two sons, to the eldest of whom Horace addressed two of his Epistles. (Ep. i. 2 and 18). In the latter of these epistles Horace speaks of Lollius having served against the Cantabri in Spain. One of these brothers appears to have obtained the consulship, though his name does not occur in the Fasti; for the M. Lollius, the father of Lollia Paullina, whom Tacitus calls consularis (Ann. xii. 1), must have been a son of M. Lollius, the guardian of C. Caesar.

LONGATIS (Λογγᾶτις), a surname of Athena (Lycoph. 520, 1032), which according to Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. l. c.), she derived from her being worshipped in a Boeotian district called Longas, which however is unknown. [L. S.]

LONGINUS, AEMI'LIUS, a deserter from the first legion, murdered Vocula, at the instigation of Classicius, in the great revolt of the Treviri against the Romans, A. D. 70; but was shortly afterwards put to death by the soldiers of the sixteenth legion. (Tac. Hist. iv. 59, 62.)

LONGINUS, CA'SSIUS, a celebrated plebeian family.

1. Q. CASSIUS LONGINUS, tribune of the soldiers in the second Punic war, B. C. 252, was sent by the consul, C. Aurelius Cotta, to blockade Lipari, but with strict orders not to engage in battle. As Longinus, however, disobeyed these orders, and suffered a severe defeat, he was deprived of his command by Cotta. (Zonar. viii. 14.)

2. Q. CASSIUS, L. F. Q. N. LONGINUS, grandson of No. 1, was praetor urbanus B. C. 167, in which year he conducted to Alba Perseus, the conquered king of Macedonia. He was consul B. C. 164, with A. Manlius Torquatus, and died in his year of office. (Liv. xlv. 16, 35, 42; Fasti Capitol.)

3. Q. CASSIUS LONGINUS, son of No. 2, only known from the Fasti.

4. L. CASSIUS, Q. F. L. N. LONGINUS RAVILLA, second son of No. 2, received his agnomen of Ravilla from his ruri oculi. (Festus, s. v. Ruri.) He was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 137, and proposed the second law for voting by ballot (tabellaria lex), the first having been brought forward by Gabinius two years before, B. C. 139. The law of Cassius introduced the ballot in the "Judicium Populi," by which we must understand criminal cases tried in the comitia by the whole body of the people; but cases of perdnellio were excepted from the operation of the law. This law gave great dissatisfaction to the optimates, as it deprived them of much of their influence in the comitia. (Cic. de Leg. iii. 16, Brut. 25, pro Sext. 48; Ascon. in Corn. p. 78, ed. Orelli.) It is commemorated on many coins of the Cassia gens, a specimen of which is given below.

COIN OF L. CASSIUS LONGINUS.

Longinus was consul B. C. 127, with L. Cassius Cinna, and censor B. C. 125, with Cn. Servilius Caepio. (Cic. Verr. i. 55.) Their censorship celebrated for its severity, of which an instance related in the condemnation of M. Lepidus Pater (LEPIDUS, No. 10.) Longinus had the charge of great severity as a judex, whence his tribune was called the scopulus reorum (Val. Max. i. § 9); but he was at the same time looked upon as a man of great integrity and justice. It is related of him that in all criminal trials he was accustomed to ask, before every thing else, what object (cui bono) a crime had been committed. It was in consequence of this reputation for justice and severity that he was appointed by the people in B. C. 113 to investigate certain cases of bribery, because the pontiffs were thought to have improperly acquitted two of the vestal virgins, Licinia and Marcia, while they condemned one, Aemilia. Longinus condemned not only Licinia and Marcia, but also several other persons; but the extreme severity with which he acted on this occasion was generally reprobated by public opinion. [LICINIA, No. 2.] (Cic. pro S. Rosc. 30; Ascon. in Milon. 12, p. 46, ed. Orelli; Dion Cas. Fr. 92; Oroa. v. 15; Liv. Epit. 63; Obsequ. 97; Plut. Quæst. Rom. p. 284, b.)

Ernesti (Clavis Cic.) and Orelli (Onom. Tull.) regard the tribune of B. C. 137, who proposed the tabellaria lex, as the father of the consul of B. C. 127, and of the censor of B. C. 125. It is, however, very improbable that a tribune of the plebs should be the father of a person who was consul ten years afterwards; and their identity is strongly supported by the character which Cicero (Brut. 25) gives of the tribune, which is quite in accordance with the well-known severity of the judex and the censor.

5. L. CASSIUS Q. F. Q. N. LONGINUS, son of No. 3, was praetor B. C. 111, and was sent to Numidia to bring Jugurtha to Rome, under promise of a safe conduct. Cassius also pledged his own word to Jugurtha for his security; and so high was the reputation of Cassius, that the Numidian king valued this as much as the public promise. In B. C. 107 he was consul with C. Marius, and received as his province Narbonese Gaul, in order to oppose the Cimbri and their allies; but in the course of the same year he was defeated and killed by the Tigurini in the territory of the Allobroges. Sall. Jug. 32; Liv. Epit. 65; Oroa. v. 15; Cæsa. l. G. i. 7; Tac. German. 37.)

6. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, described as L. F. by Isconius (in Cornel. p. 78, ed. Orelli), son of No. 4, as tribune of the plebs B. C. 104; and being a firm opponent of the aristocratical party, he brought forward many laws to diminish their power. Among them was one which enacted that no one should be a senator whom the people had condemned, or who had been deprived of their citizenship: this law was levelled against his personal enemy, Q. Servilius Cæpio, who had been deprived of his imperium on account of his defeat by the Cimbri. (Ascon. l. c.)

7. C. CASSIUS L. F. Q. N. LONGINUS, brother of No. 6, was consul B. C. 96, with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. He is mentioned by Cicero as one of those persons who were elected consuls notwithstanding their having failed to obtain the aedileship. (Cic. pro Planc. 21.)

8. C. CASSIUS, C. F. C. N. LONGINUS, of uncertain descent. He was chosen in B. C. 173 as one of the decemviri for distributing a portion of the African land; and two years afterwards, B. C. 171, consul with P. Licinius Crassus. He obtained his province Italy and Cisalpine Gaul; but anxious to distinguish himself in the war which had commenced against Macedonia, he attempted to reach Macedonia by marching through Illyricum; was obliged, however, to relinquish his design, and return to Italy. In the following year, while he was serving as legate in Macedonia under the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus, he was accused before the senate by ambassadors of the Gallic king, Ambibius, as well as by ambassadors of the Carni, and Ispydes, who complained that Cassius had treated them as enemies in his attempt to penetrate Macedonia in the previous year. The senate expressed their disapproval of the conduct of Cassius, but stated that they could not condemn a man of consular rank unheard, and while he was absent on the service of the state. In B. C. 164 Cassius was censor with M. Valerius Messalla. (Liv. xlii. 4, 28, 32, xliiii. 1, 5; Oroa. iv. 20; Plin. H. N. vii. 3. a. 4; Cic. pro Dom. 50, 53; Plin. H. N. xvii. 25. a. 38.) A theatre, which these censors had contracted to have built, was pulled down by order of the senate, at the suggestion of P. Scipio Nasica, as useless and injurious to public morals. (Liv. Epit. 48; Vell. Pat. i. 15; Val. Max. ii. 4. § 2; Oroa. iv. 21; Augustin, de Civ. Dei. i. 31; Appian, B. C. 1, 28, who erroneously calls Cassius Lucius, and places the event at too late a period.) Cassius accused M. Cato in his extreme old age: the speech of the latter, which he delivered in his defence, was extant in the time of Gellius. (Gell. x. 14; comp. Liv. xxxix. 40; Val. Max. viii. 7. § 1; Plut. Cat. 15; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Frag. p. 111, 2d. ed.)

9. C. CASSIUS, C. F. C. N. LONGINUS, son of No. 8, was consul B. C. 124, with C. Sextius Calvinus. (Fast. Sic.; Cassiod.; Vell. Pat. i. 15.) Eutropius (iv. 22) says that the colleague of Longinus was C. Domitius Calvinus, and that he carried on war with him against Bituitus; but both statements are erroneous. [BITUITUS.] Obsequens (c. 91) calls the other consul Sextilius.

10. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS VARUS, of uncertain descent, was consul B. C. 73, with M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. In order to quiet the people, the consuls of this year brought forward a law (lex Terentia Cassia) by which corn was to be purchased and then sold in Rome at a small price. (Cic. Verr. i. 23, iii. 41.) In the following year Longinus commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, and was defeated by Spartacus near Mutina, but was not killed in the battle, as Oroasius states. (Liv. Epit. 96; Flor. iii. 20; Plut. Crass. 9; Oroa. v. 24.) In B. C. 66 he supported the Manilian law for giving the command of the Mithridatic war to Pompey. (Cic. pro Leg. Man. 23.) He must have lived to a very advanced age: the consular Varus, who was proscribed and killed at Minturnæ in B. C. 43, can have been no other than the subject of this article, as we find no other consul with this surname from B. C. 73. (Appian, B. C. iv. 28.)

11. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS, the murderer of Julius Caesar, is sometimes represented as the son of the preceding [No. 10], but this is quite uncertain. He first appears in history as the quaestor of Crassus in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in B. C. 53, in which he greatly distinguished himself by his prudence and military skill; and if his advice had been followed by Crassus, the result of the campaign would probably have been very different. Indeed at first he attempted to dissuade Crassus from invading the country of the Parthians at all, and recommended him to take up a strong position on the Euphrates. In the fatal battle of Carrhae Cassius commanded one of the wings of the Roman army, and recommended the Roman general to extend his line, in order to prevent the enemy from attacking them on their flank, and likewise to distribute cavalry on the wings; but here again his advice was not followed. After the defeat of the Roman army, Cassius and the legate, Octavius, conducted the remnants of it back to Carrhae, as Crassus had entirely lost all presence of mind, and was incapable of giving any orders. So highly was Cassius thought of by the Roman soldiers, that they offered him in Carrhae the supreme command of the army; but this he declined, although Crassus, in his dependency, was quite willing to resign it. In the retreat from Carrhae, which they were soon afterwards obliged to make, Crassus was misled by the guides, and killed [CRASSUS, p. 878]; but Cassius, suspecting treachery, returned to Carrhae, and thence made his escape to Syria with 500 horsemen by another way. After crossing the Euphrates, he collected the remains of the Roman army, and made preparations to defend the province against the Parthians. The enemy did not cross the river till the following year, B. C. 52, and then only with a small force, which was easily driven back by Cassius, upon whom the government of the province had devolved as proquaestor, as no successor to Crassus had yet been appointed. Next year, B. C. 51, the Parthians again crossed the river, with a much larger army, under the command of Osaces and Pacorus, the son of Orodes, the Parthian king. As M. Bibulus, who had been appointed proconsul of Syria, had not yet arrived, the conduct of the war again devolved upon Cassius. He thought it more prudent to retire at first before the Parthians, and threw himself into the strongly fortified city of Antioch; and when the barbarians withdrew finding it impossible to take the place, he followed them, and gained, in September, a brilliant victory over them. Osaces died a few days after of the wounds which he had received in the battle, and the remains of the army fled in confusion across the Euphrates. Cicero, who commanded in the neighbouring province of Cilicia, was now delivered from the great fear he had entertained of being obliged to meet the Parthians himself, and accordingly wrote to Cassius to congratulate him on his success (ad Fam. xv. 14. § 5), but notwithstanding this attempted, in every possible way, to rob him of the honour of the victory. (Ad Fam. iii. 8, viii. 10, ad Att. v. 21.) On the arrival of Bibulus, Cassius returned to Italy. He expected to be accused of extortion; and he was generally supposed, and apparently with justice, to have fleeced the provincials unmercifully. But the breaking out of the civil war, almost immediately afterwards, saved him from the accusation which he dreaded.

In B. C. 49 Cassius was tribune of the plebs. He was a supporter of the aristocratical party, and, with the rest of the leaders of that party, left Rome in the month of January. He crossed over to Greece with Pompey in the month of March, and subsequently received the command of the Syrian, Phœnician, and Cilician ships. With these he went to Sicily in the following year, B. C. 48, where he burnt off Messina thirty-five ships, commanded by the Caesarian, M. Pomponius, and subsequently five ships belonging to the squadron of Sulpicius and Libo. After that he made many descents upon the coasts of Sicily and Italy, till the news of the battle of Pharsalia obliged him to put a stop to his devastations.

Cassius sailed to the Hellespont, with the hope of inducing Pharnaces to join him against Caesar; but in that sea he accidentally fell in with Caesar, and although he had a much larger force, he was so much astonished and alarmed at meeting with the conqueror, that he did not attempt to make any resistance, but surrendered himself unconditionally into his power. Caesar not only forgave him, but made him soon afterwards one of his legates. Whether Cassius took part in the Alexandrian war, is unknown; but he appears to have been engaged in that against Pharnaces. In A. C. 46 he remained in Rome, as he did not wish to accompany Caesar to Africa in order to fight against his former friends, and he was busily engaged during this time in studying along with Cicero. In the following year, B. C. 45, he retired from Rome to Brundisium, waiting to hear the result of the struggle in Spain, and intending to return to Rome on the first news of the victory of the dictator. During this time he and Cicero kept up a diligent correspondence with one another. (Cic. ad Fam. 17—19; comp. ad Att. xiii. 22.)

In B. C. 44 Cassius was praetor peregrinus, and was to receive the province of Syria next year. But although his life had been spared, and he was thus raised to honours by Caesar, yet he was the author of the conspiracy against the dictator's life. He was said to have been deeply aggrieved, because M. Brutus, although his junior, had been appointed by Caesar as city praetor, in preference to himself; but this slight only exasperated the feelings he had previously entertained. He had never ceased to be Caesar's enemy, and Caesar seems to have looked upon him with more mistrust than upon most of his former foes (comp. Plut. Caes. 62; Vell. Pat. ii. 56). One thing, however, is clear, that it was mere personal hatred and ambition which urged Cassius to take away the dictator's life; and that a love of country and of liberty was a sheer pretext. His great object was to gain over M. Brutus, the dictator's favourite, and when this was done, everything else was easily arranged. In the bloody tragedy of the 15th of March, Cassius took a distinguished part. When the conspirators pressed round Caesar, and one of them hesitated to strike, Cassius called out "Strike, though it be through me," and he himself is said to have wounded Caesar in the face.

After the murder the conspirators fled to the Capitol; but they were bitterly disappointed in finding that the supreme power fell into the hands of Antony, who was supported by the army of Lepidus, which was in the neighbourhood of the city. [LEPIDUS, p. 767.] A hollow agreement was patched up between Antony and the conspirators, in consequence of which the latter left the Capitol; but the riots which broke out at Caesar's funeral showed the conspirators that even their lives were not safe in Rome. Many of them immediately quitted the city, but Cassius and Brutus remained behind, till the attempts of the Pseudo-Marius, who was executed by Marius, hastened their departure in the middle of April. They did not, however, go far, but flattering themselves with the hope that there might be some change in their favour, they remained for the next four months at Latium and Campania. As praetors, they ought of course to have continued in Rome; and the senate anxious to make it appear that they had not fled from the city, passed a decree on the 5th of June by which they were commissioned to partition corn in Sicily and Asia. But Cassius looked upon this as an insult in the guise of a favour. About the same time he and Brutus received Cyrene and Crete as praetorian provinces, but this was a poor compensation for the provinces of Syria and Macedonia, the former of which Caesar had promised to Cassius and the latter to Brutus, but which he now been assigned to Dolabella and Antony respectively. Resolving to make a final effort to regain the popular favour, Brutus celebrated the Ludi Apollinares with extraordinary splendour in the month of July; but as this was not followed by the expected results, they resolved to leave Italy. They accordingly published a decree, in which they resigned their office as praetors, and declared that they would for the future live in banishment, in order to preserve the harmony of the state. This, however, was only done to excite odium against Antony. Instead of going to the provinces which had been assigned to them by the senate, Brutus went into Macedonia, and Cassius hastened to take possession of Syria before Dolabella could arrive there. In Asia Cassius received the support of the proconsul L. Trebonius, and of the quaestor P. Lentulus Spinther, who supplied him with money. On his arrival in Syria, where his former victories over the Parthians had gained him a great reputation, Cassius soon collected a considerable army. He was joined by the troops of Caecilius Bassus, the Pompeian, as well as by those of the Caesarian generals, who had for some years been carrying on war against one another. [BASSUS, CAECILIUS.] His army was still further strengthened by the addition of four legions, commanded by A. Allienus, the legate of Dolabella, and which went over to Cassius in Judea, at the beginning of B.C. 43. Cassius was now prepared to meet Dolabella; he was at the head of twelve legions, besides the troops which he had brought with him into Syria. The senate, meantime, who had come to an open rupture with Antony, confirmed Cassius in his province, and entrusted to him the conduct of the war against Dolabella. The latter, after he had killed Trebonius in Smyrna, entered Syria in the month of April. After an unsuccessful attack upon Antioch, he obtained possession of Laodiceia, where he maintained himself for a short time; but the town was soon afterwards betrayed to Cassius, and Dolabella, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, ordered one of his soldiers to put him to death. The inhabitants of Laodiceia, as well as those of Tarsus, which had also submitted to Dolabella, were obliged to purchase their pardon by large contributions.

Cassius now proposed to march against Cleopatra in Egypt; but Brutus summoned him to his assistance, in consequence of the formation of the celebrated triumvirate, in the month of October, by Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus. After appointing his brother's son, L. Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, and leaving him one legion, he set out with the rest of his forces to join Brutus. They met at Smyrna, and there concerted measures for the prosecution of the war. Brutus was anxious to proceed at once into Macedonia, but Cassius was of opinion that they should first put down all the friends of the triumvirs in Asia, and not proceed further till they had increased their army and fleet, and obtained further resources by plundering the provinces. The latter plan was resolved upon, and Rhodes, which had assisted Dolabella, was first destined to feel the vengeance of Cassius. After conquering the Rhodians in a sea-fight, he obtained possession of their city by treachery, executed fifty of the leading inhabitants, and plundered the rest so unmercifully that the booty was said to amount to 8500 talents. This immense sum only whetted still more the appetite of Cassius, and accordingly, on his return to Asia, he imposed upon the province a ten years' tribute, which was to be raised immediately. Meanwhile, the colleague of Cassius, M. Brutus, was employed in the same way in robbing the towns of Lycia; and the liberators of the Roman world made it pay very dearly for its freedom.

At the beginning of the following year, B. C. 42, Brutus and Cassius met again at Sardis, where their armies greeted them with the title of imperators. Here they had some serious differences, and were nearly coming to an open rupture; but the common danger to which they were exposed produced a reconciliation between them. They crossed over the Hellespont, marched through Thrace, and finally took up their position near Philippi in Macedonia. Here Antony also soon appeared with his army, and Octavian followed ten days afterwards. Brutus and Cassius, whose position was far more favourable than that of the enemy, resolved to avoid a battle, and to subdue them by hunger. But this plan was frustrated by the bold manoeuvres of Antony, who forced them into a general engagement. The left wing, commanded by Brutus, conquered Octavian's forces, and took his camp; but Antony, who commanded the other wing, defeated Cassius and obtained possession of his camp. Cassius himself, supposing all was lost, and ignorant of the success of Brutus, commanded his freedman Pindarus to put an end to his life. Brutus mourned over his companion, calling him the last of the Romans, and caused him to be buried in Thasos.

Cassius was married to Junia Tertia or Tertulla, half-sister of his confederate, M. Brutus: she survived him upwards of sixty years, and did not die till the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 22. [JUNIA, No. 3.] Only one of his children is mentioned [See No. 13], and we do not know whether he had any more.

Cassius was a man of literary tastes and habits. He received instruction in the Greek language and literature from Archelaus of Rhodes, and he both wrote and spoke Greek with facility. He was a follower of the Epicurean philosophy; but was abstemious and simple in his mode of life. His abilities were considerable; and though he would certainly have been incapable, like Caesar or Augustus, of governing the Roman world, yet he excelled the rest of the conspirators in prudence, resolution, and power of ruling. His campaigns against the Parthians had early gained for him a military reputation, and he was always respected and cheerfully obeyed by his soldiers. But with all this he had a mean soul. He was a lover of money, and a lover of self of the worst kind. In his first government of Syria he was notorious for his rapacity; and when a second time in Asia, he availed himself of the pretext of liberating his country, in order to increase his private fortune by plundering the provincials. It was his high estimate of himself, his envy of Caesar's position, and mortification at becoming an inferior and a subject, which led him to become a murderer of the greatest man that Rome ever produced. (Cicero, in the passages collected in Orelli's Onomast. TuII. vol. ii. p. 134, &c.; Plut. Crass. 18, 20, 22, 24, 27, Brut. 39—44; Appian, B. C. ii. 88, iv. 114; Dion Cass. lib. xi.—xlvii. All the authorities are collected in Drumann, Gesch. Roms. vol. ii. pp. 117—152.)

12. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, brother of No. 11, assisted M. Laterensis in accusing Cn. Plancius, in a. c. 54 [LATERENSIS], and the speech which he delivered on that occasion is replied to by Cicero at considerable length. (Cic. pro Planc. 24, &c.) He is again mentioned in a. c. 52 as the accuser of M. Sauricius. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 54, ed. Orelli.) On the breaking out of the civil war he joined the party of Caesar, while his brother espoused that of Pompey. He is mentioned as one of Caesar's legates in Greece in a. c. 48, and was sent by him into Thessaly, in order to keep a watch upon the movements of Metellus Scipio. Before the battle of Pharsalia he was despatched by Caesar with Fufius Calenus into Southern Greece [CALENUS.] Some ancient writers (Suet. Caes. 63; Dion Cass. xlii. 6) confound him with his brother, and erroneously state that it was Lucius, and not Caius, who fell in with Caesar in the Hellespont after the battle of Pharsalia. [See above, p. 800, b.]

In a. c. 44 L. Cassius was tribune of the plebs, but was not one of the conspirators against Caesar's life. He is mentioned by Cicero as present at the Ludi Apollinariae, which Brutus exhibited in the month of July, in order to conciliate the people [see above, p. 801, a.], and is said to have been received with applause as the brother of Caius. He subsequently espoused the side of Octavian, in opposition to Antony; and consequently, when the latter assembled the senate in the capitol on the 28th of November, in order to declare Octavian an enemy of the state, he forbade Cassius and two of his colleagues to approach the capitol, lest they should put their veto upon the decree of the senate. [Comp. TL CANUTIUS.] In March, a. c. 43, L. Cassius, in conjunction with his mother and Servilia, the mother-in-law of his brother Caius, attempted to prevent the latter from obtaining the conduct of the war against Dolabella, because the consuls Hirtius and Pansa laid claims to it. On the reconciliation of Octavian and Antony in the latter end of this year, Lucius, who dreaded the anger of the latter, fled to Asia; but after the battle of Philippi he was pardoned by Antony at Ephesus, in a. c. 41. (Caes. B. C. iii. 34, &c., 55; Dion Cass. xli. 51; Cic. ad Att. xiv. 2, ad Fam. xii. 2, 7, Philipp. iii. 9; Appian, B. C. v. 7.)

13. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS, the son of the murderer of Caesar [No. 11], to whom his father gave the toga virilis on the 15th of March, a. c. 44, just before the assassination of the dictator. (Plut. Brut. 14.)

14. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, son of No. 12, was left by his uncle C. Cassius [No. 11] as governor of Syria, in a. c. 43, when the latter departed from the province in order to unite his forces with those of M. Brutus. He subsequently joined his uncle, and fell in the battle of Philippi in the following year. (Appian, B. C. iv. 63, 135.)

15. Q. CASSIUS LONGINUS, is called by Cicero (ad Att. v. 21) the frater of C. Cassius [No. 11], by which he probably means the first cousin rather than the brother of Caius, more especially as both Quintus and Caius were tribunes of the plebs in the same year. The public life of Quintus commenced and ended in Spain. In a. c. 54 he went as the quaestor of Pompey into that country, and availed himself of the absence of the triumvir to accumulate vast treasures in Further Spain. His conduct was so rapacious and cruel, that a plot was formed to take away his life. In a. c. 49 he was tribune of the plebs, and, in conjunction with his colleague M. Antony, warmly opposed the measures of the aristocracy. They put their veto upon the decrees of the senate, and when they were driven out of the senate-house by the consuls on the 6th of January, they left Rome, and fled to Caesar's camp. Caesar's victorious advance through Italy soon restored them to the city, and it was they who summoned the senate to receive the conqueror. Upon Caesar's setting out for Spain in the course of this year, in order to oppose Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, he took Cassius with him; and after the defeat of the Pompeians, when he departed from the province, he left Cassius governor of Further Spain. Hated by the inhabitants, on account of his former exactions, and anxious to accumulate still further treasures, he was obliged to rely entirely upon the support of his soldiers, whose favour he courted by presents and indulgences of every kind. Meantime, he received orders from Caesar to pass over to Africa, in order to prosecute the war against Juba, king of Numidia, who had espoused the side of Pompey; orders which delighted him much, as Africa afforded a fine field for plunder. Accordingly, in a. c. 48, he collected his army at Corduba; but while he was thus employed, a conspiracy broke out which had been formed against him by the provincials, and in which many of his troops joined. He was openly attacked in the market-place of Corduba, and received many wounds: the conspirators, thinking that he was killed, chose L. Laterensis as his successor. [LATERENSIS, No. 2.] Cassius, however, escaped with his life, succeeded in putting down the insurrection, and executed Laterensis and all the other conspirators who were unable to purchase their lives. The province was treated with greater severity than ever. Shortly afterwards two legions, which had formerly served under Varro, the legate of Pompey, and which were marching to Calpe to be shipped for Africa, openly declared against Cassius, and elected one T. Torius as their commander. The inhabitants of Corduba also rose in insurrection, and the quaestor, M. Marcellus Aeserninus, who had been sent by Cassius to quiet the town, placed himself at their head. Cassius immediately sent to Bogud, king of Mauritania, and to M. Lepidus, who commanded in Nearer Gaul, for succours; and till these should arrive, he took up a strong position on a hill, about 4000 paces from Corduba, from which it was separated by the river Baetis (Guadalquivir). From this position, however, he was obliged to retire, and take refuge in the town of Ulia, which Marcellus proceeded to enclose by lines of circumvallation. But before these were completed Bogud came to his assistance, and shortly afterwards Lepidus appeared with a numerous force. The latter called upon Marcellus and Cassius to lay aside hostilities; Marcellus immediately obeyed, and joined Lepidus, but Cassius hesitated to place himself in his power, and asked for a free departure. This was granted to him; and as he heard about the same time that his successor, C. Trebonius, had arrived in the province, he hastened to place his troops in winter-quarters (a. c. 47), and to escape from the province with his treasures. He embarked at Malaca, but his ship sank, and he was lost, at the mouth of the Iberus. (Cic. ad Att. v. 20, 21, vi. 6, 8, vii. 3, 18, ad Fam. xvi. 11; Caes. B. C. i. 2, ii. 19, 21; Hirt. B. Alex. 48-64; Appian, B. C. ii. 33, 43; Dion Cass. xli. 15, 24, xlii. 15, 16, xliii. 29; Liv. Epit. 111.)

16. Q. CASSIUS (LONGINUS) is mentioned without any cognomen; but as he is said to have been a legate of Q. Cassius Longinus [No. 15] in Spain in A.C. 48, he was probably a son of the latter. He seems to be the same as the Q. Cassius to whom Antony gave Spain in B.C. 44. (Hirt. B. Alex. 52, 57; Cic. Philipp. iii. 10.)

17. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, of unknown descent, probably the same as the L. Cassius whom Cicero names among the judges of Cluentius (pro Cluent. 38), was, along with Cicero, one of the competitors for the consulship for the year B.C. 63. At the time he was considered to be rather deficient in abilities than to have any evil intentions; but a few months afterwards he was found to be one of Catiline's conspirators, and the proposer of the most dreadful measures. He undertook to set the city on fire; and he also carried on the negotiation with the ambassadors of the Allobroges, but was prudent enough not to give them any written document under his seal, as the others had done. He left Rome before the ambassadors, and accordingly escaped the fate of his comrades. He was condemned to death in his absence, but whether he was apprehended and executed afterwards we do not know. (Ascon. in Tog. Cand. p. 82, ed. Orelli; Appian, B.C. ii. 4; Sall. Cat. 17, 44, 50; Cic. Cat. iii. 4, 6, 7, pro Sulla. 13, 19.)

18. L. CASSIUS LONGINUS, consul, A.D. 30, was married by Tiberius to Drusilla, the daughter of Germanicus; but her brother Caligula soon afterwards carried her away from her husband's house, and openly lived with her as if she were his wife. DRUSILLA, No. 2.] (Tac. Ann. vi. 15, 45; Suet. Cal. 24.) Cassius was proconsul in Asia in A.D. 9, and was commanded by Caligula to be brought in chains to Rome, because an oracle had warned the emperor to beware of a Cassius. Caligula thought that the oracle must have had reference to Cassius Longinus, because he was descended from a great republican family, whereas it really meant Cassius Chaerea. [CHAEREA.] (Suet. Cal. 57; on Cass. lix. 29, who erroneously calls him Cassius, confounding him with No. 19.)

19. C. CASSIUS LONGINUS, the celebrated jurist, a governor of Syria, A.D. 50, in the reign of Claudius, and conducted to the Euphrates Meherzes, whom the Parthians had desired to have as their king. Though there was no war at that time, Cassius endeavoured, by introducing stricter discipline into the army and keeping the troops well trained, to maintain the high reputation which his army enjoyed in the province. [See above, No. 1.] On his return to Rome he was regarded as one of the leading men in the state, and possessed of influence both by the integrity of his character and his ample fortune. On these accounts he was an object of suspicion to the emperor Nero, who imputed to him as a crime that, among his ancestral images, he had a statue of Cassius, the destroyer of Caesar, and accordingly required the senate to pronounce a sentence of banishment against him. A.D. 66. This order was, of course, refused, and Cassius was removed to the island of Limnos, but was recalled from banishment by the emperor. At the time of his banishment he is said by Suetonius to have been blind. The mother of Cassius was a daughter of Tubero, the jurist of the second century, and she was a granddaughter of the emperor Serv. Sulpicius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 11, 12, xiii. 13, xiv. 43, xv. 52, xvi. 7, 9, 22; Suet. Ner.

Considerable controversy has arisen from Pomponius (l.c.) stating that C. Cassius Longinus was consul in A.D. 30, whereas other authorities make L. Cassius Longinus [No. 19] consul in that year. Hence, some writers suppose that C. Cassius and L. Cassius were the same person, while others maintain that they were both jurists, and that Pomponius has confounded them. Others, again, think that L. Cassius was consul suffectus in the same year that C. Cassius was consul. It is, however, more probable that Pomponius has made a mistake. (See Reimar, ad Dion. Cass. lix. 29.)

C. Cassius wrote ten books on the civil law (Libri Juris Civilis), and Commentaries on Vitellius and Urseus Ferox, which are quoted in the Digest. Cassius was a follower of the school of Masurius Sabinus and Ateius Capito; and as he reduced their principles to a more scientific form, the adherents of this school received afterwards the name of Cassiani. The characteristics of this school are given at length under CAPITO, p. 601. (Compare Steenwinkel, Dissert. de C. Cassio Longino J.Clo. Lugd. Bat. 1778.)

LONGINUS, CORNELIUS, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, one of which is imitated from the thirteenth epigram of Leonidas of Tarentum (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 200; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 184). Nothing is known of him, except his name, and even that is doubtful. His first epigram, which, in the Planudean Anthology, bears the name as above given, is entitled in the Vatican MS. Κορηλίου Λόγγου; the second is entitled in the Planudean Κορηλίου simply, and is not found in the Vatican. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 912.)

[P.S.]

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS CASSIUS (Διονύσιος Κάσσιος Λογγίνος), a very distinguished Greek philosopher of the third century of our era. His original name seems to have been Dionysius; but, either because he entered into the relation of client to some Cassius Longinus, or because his ancestors had received the Roman franchise, through the influence of some Cassius Longinus, he bore the name of Dionysius Longinus, Cassius Longinus, or in the complete form given at the head of this article. He was born about A.D. 213, and was killed in A.D. 273, at the age of sixty. His native place is uncertain; some say that he was born at Palmyra, and others call him a Syrian or a native of Emesa. The belief that he was of Syrian origin is only an inference from the fact that his mother was a Syrian woman, and from an obscure passage in Vopiscus (Aurelianus. 30), from which it may be inferred that he was conversant with the Syriac language. But it is clear that these circumstances prove nothing, for he may have learned the Syriac language either from his mother or during his subsequent residence at Palmyra. There is more ground for believing that Longinus was born at Athens, for Suidas (s.v. Φρόντων) states that Phronto of Emesa, the uncle of Longinus, taught rhetoric at Athens, and on his death in that place left behind him Longinus, the son of his sister. It would seem that this Phronto took especial care of the education of his nephew, and on his death-bed he instituted him as his heir. In the preface to his work περί τέλους, which is preserved in Porphyrius's life of Plotinus (p. 127), Longinus himself relates that from his early age he made many journeys with his parents, that he visited many countries, and became acquainted with all the men who at the time enjoyed a great reputation as philosophers, and among whom the most illustrious are Ammonius Saccas, Origen, Plotinus, and Amelius. Of the first two Longinus was a pupil for a long time, though they did not succeed in inspiring him with any love for that kind of speculative philosophy of which they were the founders. Longinus in his study of philosophy went to the fountain-head itself, and made himself thoroughly familiar with the works of Plato; and that he was a genuine Platonist is evident from the character of his works, or rather, fragments still extant, as well as from the commentaries he wrote on several of Plato's dialogues; and the few fragments of these commentaries which have come down to us, show that he had a clear and sound head, and was free from the allegorical fancies in which his contemporaries discovered the great wisdom of the ancients. His commentaries not only explained the subject-matter discussed by Plato, but also his style and diction. This circumstance drew upon him the contempt and ridicule of such men as Plotinus, who called him a philologist, and would not admit his claims to be a philosopher. (Porphy. Vit. Plot. p. 116; Proclus, ad Plat. Tim. p. 27.)

After Longinus had derived all the advantages he could from Ammonius at Alexandria, and the other philosophers whom he met in his travels, he returned to Athens, where he had been born and bred. He there devoted himself with so much zeal to the instruction of his numerous pupils, that he had scarcely any time left for the composition of any literary production. The most distinguished among his pupils was Porphyrius, whose original name was Malchus, which Longinus changed into Porphyrius, i. e. the king, or the man clad in purple. At Athens he seems to have lectured on philosophy and criticism, as well as on rhetoric and grammar (Eunap. Porphyr. init.; Porphy. Vit. Plot. p. 131; Vopisc. Aurelianus. 30; Suid. s. v. Λογγίνος), and the extent of his information was so great, that Eunapius calls him "a living library" and "a walking museum;" but his knowledge was not a dead encumbrance to his mind, for the power for which he was most celebrated was his critical skill (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 259; Sopat. Proleg. in Aristid. p. 3; Suid. s. v. Προφύριος, Λογγίνος), and this was indeed so great, that the expression κατὰ Λογγίνον κρίνειν became synonymous with "to judge correctly." (Hieronym. Epist. 95; Theophylact. Epist. 17.)

After having spent a considerable part of his life at Athens, and composed the best of his works, he went to the East, either for the purpose of seeing his friends at Emesa or to settle some of his family affairs. It seems to have been on that occasion that he became known to queen Zenobia of Palmyra, who, being a woman of great talent, and fond of the arts and literature, made him her teacher of Greek literature. As Longinus had no extensive library at his command at Palmyra, he was obliged almost entirely to abandon his literary pursuits, but another sphere of action was soon opened to him there; for when king Odenathus had died, and Zenobia had undertaken the government of her empire, she availed herself most extensively of the advice of Longinus, and it was he who, being an ardent lover of liberty, advised and encouraged her to shake off the Roman yoke, and assert her dignity as an independent sovereign. In consequence of this, Zenobia wrote a spirited letter to the Roman emperor Aurelian. (Vopisc. Aurelianus. 27.) In A. D. 273, when Aurelian took and destroyed Palmyra, Longinus had to pay with his life for the advice which he had given to Zenobia. (Vopisc. Aurelianus. 30; Suid. s. v. Λογγίνος.) This catastrophe must have been the more painful to Longinus, since the queen, after having fallen into the hands of the Romans, asserted her own innocence, and threw all the blame upon her advisers, and more especially upon Longinus. But he bore his execution with a firmness and cheerfulness worthy of a Socrates. (Zosimus, i. 56.)

Longinus was unquestionably by far the greatest philosopher of the age, and stands forth so distinct and solitary in that age of mystic and fanciful quibblers, that it is impossible not to recognise in him a man of excellent sense, sound and independent judgment, and extensive knowledge. He had thoroughly imbibed the spirit of Plato and Democritus, from whom he derived not only that intellectual culture which distinguished him above all others, but also an ardent love of liberty, and a great frankness both in expressing his own opinions and exposing the faults and errors of others. (Porphy. Vit. Plot. p. 126.) His work Περὶ ὕψους, a great part of which is still extant, surpasses in oratorical power every thing that was ever written after the time of the Greek orators, and he, like Cicero among the Romans, is the only Greek who not only knew how to teach rhetoric, but was able by his own example to show what true oratory is. Besides the Greek and Syriac languages, he was also familiar with the Latin, as we must conclude from his comparison of Cicero with Demosthenes (Περὶ ὕψ. § 12; comp. Suid. s. v. Δημοσθένος; Tzet. Posthom. p. 75.) In his private life he seems to have been a man of a very amiable disposition; for although his pupil Porphyrius led him, declaring that he would seek a better philosophy in the school of Plotinus, still Longinus did not show him any ill-will on that account, but continued to treat him as a friend, and invited him to come to Palmyra. (Porphy. Vit. Plot. pp. 120, 124, 131.) He was, and remained throughout his life, a pagan, though he was by no means hostile either to Judaism or Christianity.

Notwithstanding his manifold avocations, Longinus composed a great number of works, which appear to have been held in the highest estimation, but nearly all of which have unfortunately perished. All that has come down to us consists of a considerable part of his work Περὶ ὕψους, or De Sublimitate, and a number of fragments, which have been preserved as quotations in the works of contemporary and later writers. There is scarcely any work in the range of ancient literature which, independent of its excellence of style, contains so many exquisite remarks upon oratory, poetry, and good taste in general. It is addressed to one Pomponius Terentianus, but contains many lacunæ which cannot be filled up, since all the MSS. extant are only copies of the one which is preserved at Paris. The following is a list of his lost works:

1. Of φιλόλογος, a very extensive work, and a 21st book of it is quoted. It seems to have contained information and critical remarks upon a variety of subjects. (Auctor. Vit. Apollon. Rhod. Ruhnkens, Dissertatio Philol. De Vit. et Script. Lat. p. 28, &c.)

2. Περὶ τοῦ κατὰ Μειδίου, i. e. on the oration of Demosthenes against Meidias. (Suid. s. v. Ἀργύριος; comp. Phot. Bibl. Cod. 265.)

3. Ἀπορήματα Ὀμηρικά. (Suid. l. c.; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. Il. pp. 67, 106.)

4. Εἰ φιλόσοφος Ὀμηρος. (Suid. l. c.)

5. Προβλήματα Ὀμήρου καὶ λύσεις, in two books. (Suid. l. c.)

6. Τίνα παρὰ τὰς ἱστορίας οἱ γραμματικοὶ ὡς ἱστορικὰ ἐξηγουῦνται. (Suid. l. c.)

7. Περὶ τῶν παρ' Ὀμήρῳ πολλὰ σημαίνουσιν λέξεων, in three books. (Suid. l. c.)

8. Ἀπικὼν λέξεων ἐκδόσεις, in the form of a dictionary. (Phot. Lexic. s. v. Σέρφοι; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1919.)

9. Ἀλλεῖς Ἀντιμάχου καὶ Ἡρακλέωνος. (Suid. l. c.)

10. Περὶ ἰδρυκῶν. (Grammat. in Biblioth. Coislin. p. 597.)

11. Σχόλια εἰς τὸ τοῦ Ἡφαιστίωνος ὀρχηρίδιον, are still extant in MSS., and have been transcribed by the scholiast commonly printed with Hephaestion. (Schol. ad Hermog. p. 387.)

12. Περὶ συνθέσεως λόγων. (Longin. περὶ ὁρ. § 39.)

13. Τέχνη ῥητορική, or a manual of rhetoric. (Schol. ad Hermog. p. 380.)

14. Εἰς τὴν ῥητορικὴν Ἑρμογένους, of which some extracts are still extant in MS. at Vienna.

15. A commentary on the Prooemium of Plato's Timaeus. (Proclus, in Tim. pp. 10, 11, 16, 20, 21, 29, 50, 63, 98.)

16. A commentary on Plato's Phaedon. (Ruhnken, l. c. p. 18.)

17. Περὶ ὁρῶν, i. e. on the principles of things. Porphyry. Vit. Plat. p. 116.)

18. Περὶ τέλους, i. e. De finibus bonorum et malorum; the excellent introduction to it is preserved in Porphyry's life of Plotinus (p. 127).

19. Περὶ ἐρμῆς, or on natural instinct. (Porphyry. Vit. Plotin. p. 120.)

20. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς τὸν Ἀμέλιον, on the philosophy of Plotinus. (Ruhnken, l. c. p. 43.)

21. Περὶ τῆς κατὰ Πλάτωνα διακαιονήτης, was directed against Amelius. (Ruhnken, l. c. p. 43.)

22. Περὶ τῶν ἰδεῶν. Longinus wrote two works under this title, one against Plotinus, and the other against Porphyry. (Ruhnken, l. c.; Eustath. ad Aristot. Metaphys.)

23. Περὶ ψυχῆς, a fragment of it is quoted by Aesopius. (Præp. Evang. xv. 21; comp. Porphyry. i. Stob. Eclog. Phys. i. p. 109; Proclus, ad Plat. dial. p. 415.)

24. Ὁδαιναβος seems to have been the latest of the works of Longinus, and to have been a eulogy of Odenathus, the husband of Zenobia. (Libani. or. 998.)

The first edition of the treatise περὶ ὁρῶν is that of Fr. Robertello, Basel, 1554, 4to. The next important edition is that of F. Portus (Geneva, 69, 8vo.), which forms the basis of all subsequent editions until the time of Tollius. We may, however, mention those of G. Langbeene (Oxford, 36, 1638, and 1650, 8vo.) and T. Fabri (Salmur, 63, 8vo.). In 1694 there appeared the edition of Tollius, with notes, and Latin translation (Tralad Rhen. 4to.); it was followed in the editions of Hudson (Oxford, 1710, 1718, 1730, 8vo., and in burgh, 1733, 12mo.), Pearce (London, 1724, 1732, 8vo., and often reprinted), and N. rus (Leipzig, 1769-73, 8vo.). A collection of that is extant of Longinus was published by

J. Toupius, with notes and emendations by Ruhnken, of which three editions were printed at Oxford (1778, 1789, and 1806, 8vo.). The most recent editions are those of B. Weiske (Leipzig, 1809, 8vo.) and A. E. Egger, forming vol. i. of the Scriptorum Graec. Nova Collectio (Paris, 1837, 16mo.). Compare Ruhnken, Dissertatio de Vita et Scriptis Longini, which is printed in Toupius and other editions of Longinus; Sponberg, de Commentariis Dionysii Cassii Longini per ὁρῶν Expositionem, Upsala, 1835, 4to.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamk. § 98, notes 1-9. [L. S.]

LONGINUS, POMPEIUS, one of the tribunes of the praetorian troops, was deprived of his command by Nero in the suppression of Piso's conspiracy, A. D. 65. He is mentioned again as tribune, and one of Galba's friends, when the praetorian troops were deserting to Otho, A. D. 69. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71, Hist. i. 31.)

LONGUS (Ἀδύγος), a Greek sophist, who is believed to have lived in the fourth or at the beginning of the fifth century of our era. Concerning his history nothing is known, but it is probable that he lived after the time of Heliodorus, for there are some passages in his work which seem to be imitations of Heliodorus of Emesa. Longus is one of the erotic writers whom we meet with at the close of ancient and the beginning of middle age history. His work bears the title Ποιμενικῶν τῶν κατὰ Δάφνιν καὶ Χλόην, or in Latin, Pastoralia de Daphnide et Chloë, and was first printed at Florence (1598, 4to), with various readings, by Columbanus. It is written in pleasing and elegant prose, but is not free from the artificial embellishments peculiar to that age. A very good edition is that of Jungermann (Hanau, 1605, 8vo.), with a Latin translation and short notes. Among the more recent editions we may mention those of B. G. L. Boden (Lips. 1777, 8vo., with a Lat. transl. and notes), Villosion (Paris, 1778, 2 vols. 8vo. and 4to., with a very much improved text), Mitscherlich (Bipont. 1794, 8vo., printed together with the Ephesiaca of Xenophon, and a Lat. transl. of both), G. H. Schaefer (Lips. 1803, 8vo.), F. Passow (Lips. 1811, 12mo., with a German transl.), and of E. Seiler (Lips. 1843, 8vo.). There is an English translation of Longus by G. Thornley, London, 1657, 8vo. [L. S.]

LONGUS, L. ATYLIUS, was one of the first three consular tribunes, elected B. C. 444. In consequence of a defect in the auspices, he and his colleagues resigned, and consuls were appointed in their stead. (Liv. iv. 7; Dionys. xi. 61.)

LONGUS, CASSIUS, praefect of the camp, whom the soldiers of Vitellius, A. D. 69, chose as one of their leaders in the mutiny against Alfenus Caecina, when he prematurely declared for Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iii. 14.)

LONGUS, CONSIDIUS. [CONSIDIUS, No. 9.]

LONGUS, C. DULIUS, consular tribune B. C. 399, with five colleagues. (Liv. v. 13; Diod. xiv. 54; Fasti Capitol.)

LONGUS, LUCILIUS, one of the most intimate friends of Tiberius, and the only one of the senators who accompanied him to Rhodes, when Augustus obliged him to withdraw from his court. On his death in A. D. 23, Tiberius honoured him, although he was a novus homo, with a censor's funeral, and other distinctions. (Tac. Ann. iv. 15.)

LONGUS, L. MANLIUS VULSO. [VULSO.]

LONGUS, L. MU'SSIDIVS, not mentioned by ancient writers, but whose name frequently occurs on the coins of Julius Caesar and the triumvirs.

COIN OF MUSSIDIUS LONGUS.

LONGUS, SEMPRONIUS. 1. TI. SEMPRONIUS C. F. C. N. LONGUS, consul with P. Cornelius Scipio B. C. 218, the first year of the second Punic war. Sicily was assigned to him as his province, since the Romans did not dream that Hannibal would be able to cross the Alps, and invade Italy itself. Sempronius accordingly crossed over to Sicily, and began to prosecute the war against the Carthaginians with vigour. He conquered the island of Melita, which was held by a Carthaginian force, and on his return to Lilybaeum was preparing to go in search of the enemy's fleet, which was cruising off the northern coast of Sicily and Italy, when he was summoned to join his colleague in Italy, in order to oppose Hannibal. As it was now winter, Sempronius feared to sail through the Adriatic, and, accordingly, he crossed over the straits of Messana with his troops, and in forty years marched through the whole length of Italy to Ariminum. From this place he effected a junction with his colleague, who was posted on the hills on the left bank of the Trebia. As Sempronius was eager for an engagement, and Hannibal was no less anxious, a general battle soon ensued, in which the Romans were completely defeated, with heavy loss, and the two consuls took refuge within the walls of Placentia. (Liv. xxi. 6, 17, 51—56; Polyb. iii. 40, 41, 60—75; Appian, Annib. 6, 7.)

Sempronius Longus afterwards commanded in Southern Italy, and defeated Hanno [Hanno, No. 15] near Grumentum in Lucania, B. C. 215. (Liv. xxiii. 37.) He was decemvir sacris faciundis, and died B. C. 210. (Liv. xxvii. 6.)

2. TI. SEMPRONIUS TI. F. C. N. LONGUS, son of the preceding, seems to have been elected decemvir sacris faciundis in place of his father in B. C. 210, and likewise augur in the same year, in place of T. Otacilius Crassus. Livy (xxvii. 6) speaks of the augur and decemvir as Ti. Sempronius Ti. f. Longus; and though it is rather strange that he should have obtained the augurate before he had held any of the higher magistracies, yet we must suppose him to be the same as the subject of the following notice, since Livy gives his name with so much accuracy, and we know of no one else of the same name at this time. He was tribune of the plebs B. C. 210, curule aedile B. C. 197, and in the same year one of the triumviri for establishing colonies at Puteoli, Buxentum, and various other places in Italy; praetor B. C. 196, with Sardinia as his province, which was continued to him another year; and consul B. C. 194 with P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. In his consulship he assisted as triumvir in founding the colonies which had been determined upon in B. C. 197, and he fought against the Boii with doubtful success. In the year after his consulship, B. C. 193, he served as legate to the consul L. Cornelius Merula, in his campaign against the Boii, and in B. C. 191 he served as legate to the consul M. Atilius Glabrio, in his campaign against Antiochus in Greece. In B. C. 184 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship. (Liv. xxi. 20, xxxii. 27, 29, xxxiii. 24, 26, 43, xxxiv. 42, 45, 46, 47, xxxv. 5, xxxvi. 22, xxxix. 40.) He died B. C. 174. (Liv. xli. 21.)

3. C. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS was elected decemvir sacris faciundis in the place of Ti. Sempronius Longus [No. 2], who died in the great pestilence B. C. 174. (Liv. xli. 21.) He may have been a son of No. 2, and thus succeeded his father in the priestly office.

4. P. SEMPRONIUS LONGUS, praetor B. C. 184, obtained Further Spain as his province. (Liv. xxxix. 32, 38.)

LONGUS, SULPICIVS. 1. Q. SULPICIVS LONGUS, one of the consular tribunes A. C. 390, the year in which Rome was taken by the Gauls. He is mentioned two or three times in the legends of the period, and is said to have been the tribune who made the agreement with Brennus for the withdrawal of his troops. (Liv. v. 36, 47, 48; Diod. xiv. 110; Macrob. Satura. i. 16.)

2. C. SULPICIVS SER. F. Q. N. LONGUS, grandson of the preceding, was a distinguished commander in the war against the Samnites. He was consul for the first time, B. C. 337, with P. Aelius Paetus; for the second time, in B. C. 323, with Q. Aulus Cerretanus; and for the third time, B. C. 314, with M. Poetelius Libo. In the last year Sulpicius, with his colleague Poetelius, gained a great and decisive victory over the Samnites not far from Caudio; but it appears from the Triumphal Fasti that Sulpicius alone triumphed. (Liv. viii. 15, 37, ix. 24—27; Diod. xvii. 17, xviii. 26, xix. 73.) It is conjectured from a few letters of the Capitoline Fasti, which are mutilated in this year, that Sulpicius was censor in B. C. 319; and we know from the Capitoline Fasti that he was dictator in B. C. 312.

LONGUS, M. TU'LLIVS, consul, A. C. 500, with Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus Cornutus in the tenth year of the republic. For the events of the year see CAMERINUS, No. 1. Tullius died in his year of office. (Liv. ii. 19; Dionys. v. 32; Zonar. vii. 13; Cic. Brut. 16.)

LONGUS, VELIVS, a Latin grammarian, known to us from a treatise De Orthographia, still extant. He was older than Charisius, who refers to his writings twice; first (i. 18. § 2) to some work of which the title has not been preserved, and afterwards (ii. 9. § 4) to notes on the second book of the Aeneid. In a third reference (ii. 12. § 149) to certain observations on Lucretius, his name is an interpolation. The commentary on Virgil is mentioned by Macrobius (Sat. iii. 6) as if it were one of the earlier compilations of this class (haec multi alii commentatores acuti sunt), is noticed by Servius also (Ad Virg. Aen. x. 143), and in the collection of scholiasts upon Virgil published by Mai at Milan in 1818 (from a Verona palimpsest. (Suringar, Hist. Scholast. Lat. p. 184.)

The De Orthographia was brought to light by George Merula, and published by Fulvius Ursinus in his "Notae ad M. Varrorem de Re Rustica" 8vo. Rom. 1587. It will be found in the "Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui" of Putsch 4to. Hanov. 1603, p. 2214—2239. [W. R.]

LOPHON, one of the statuaris, who was "athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque"

(Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 34: the common editions have Leophron.) [P. S.]

LOTIS, a nymph, who in her escape from the embraces of Priapus was metamorphosed into a tree, called after her Lotis. (Ov. Met. ix. 847, &c.) [L. S.]

LOXIAS (Λοξίας), a surname of Apollo, which is derived by some from his intricate and ambiguous oracles (λοξός), but it is unquestionably connected with the verb λάγναι, and describes the god as the prophet or interpreter of Zeus. (Herod. i. 91, viii. 136; Aeschyl. Eum. 19; Aristoph. Plut. 8; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 794; Macrobi. Sat. i. 17.) [L. S.]

LOXO (Λοξώ), a daughter of Boreas, one of the Hyperborean maidens, who brought the worship of Artemis to Delos, whence it is also used as a surname of Artemis herself. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 292; Nonnus, Dionys. v. p. 168; comp. Spanheim, ad Callim. l. c.) [L. S.]

LUA, also called Lua mater or Lua Saturni, one of the early Italian divinities, whose worship was forgotten in later times. It may be that she was no other than Opa, the wife of Saturn; but all we know of her is, that sometimes the arms taken from a defeated enemy were dedicated to her, and burnt as a sacrifice, with a view to avert punishment or any other calamity. (Liv. viii. i. xlv. 33; Gellius, xiii. 22; Varro, de Ling. Lat. viii. 36, with Müller's note.) [L. S.]

LUCANUS, M. ANNAEUS. The short notices of this poet in common circulation, such as that prefixed to the edition of Weisse, although particularly meagre, contain a series of statements many of which rest upon very uncertain evidence, while the longer biographies, such as that of Nisard, are almost purely works of imagination. In order that we may be enabled to separate those portions of the narrative which admit of satisfactory proof from those which are doubtful or fictitious, we must examine our materials and class them according to their quality.

I. The facts collected from the writings of Statius, Martial, Juvenal, Tacitus, the Eusebian Chronicle as translated by Jerome and Sidonius Apollinaris, may be received with confidence. According to these authorities Lucan was a native of Cordova; his father was L. Annaeus Mella, a man of equestrian rank and high consideration, who, satisfied with amassing a large fortune by acting as agent for the imperial revenues (procurator), did not seek the same distinction in literature or politics, which was achieved by his brothers M. Seneca and Junius Gallio. The talents of the son developed themselves at a very early age and excited such warm and general admiration as to awaken the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to brook competition, forbade him to recite in public. Stung to the quick by this prohibition the fiery young Spaniard embarked in the famous conspiracy of Piso, was betrayed, and, by a promise of pardon, was with some difficulty induced to turn informer. In order to excuse the hesitation he had at first displayed, and to prove the absolute sincerity of his repentance, he began by denouncing his own mother Acilia (or Atilia), and then revealed the rest of his accomplices without reserve. But he received a traitor's reward. After the more important victims had been despatched, the emperor issued the mandate for the death of his poetical rival who, finding escape hopeless, caused his veins to be opened. When, from the rapid effusion of blood, he felt his extremities becoming chill, but while still retaining full consciousness, he recalled to recollection and began to repeat aloud some verses which he had once composed descriptive of a wounded soldier perishing by a like death, and with these lines upon his lips expired (A. D. 65). The following inscription which, if genuine, seems to have been a tribute to his memory proceeding from the prince himself, was preserved at no distant period in one of the Roman churches:—

M. ANNAEO . LUCANO . CORDUBENSI . POETAE .
BENEFICIO . NERONIS . FAMA . SERVATA .

From the birthday ode in honour of the deceased, addressed to his widow Polla Argentaria, by Statius, we gather that his earliest poem was on the death of Hector and the recovery of his body by Priam; the second, on the descent of Orpheus to the infernal regions; the third on the burning of Rome; the fourth, an address to his wife; the last, the Pharsalia; there is also an allusion to the success which attended his essays in prose composition, and we infer from an expression of Martial that his muse did not confine herself exclusively to grave and dignified themes. (Stat. Silo. ii. praef. and Carm. 7; Martial, Ep. i. 61, vii. 21, 22, 23, x. 64, xiv. 194; Juv. vii. 79; Tac. Ann. xv. 49, 56, 70, xvi. 17; comp. Dialog. de Orat. 20; Hieron. in Chron. Euseb. n. 2080; Sidon. Apollin. x. 239, xxiii. 165; Wernsdorff, Post. Lat. Min. vol. iv. pp. 41, 587.)

II. In a short trumpery fragment entitled "Vita Lucani," ascribed to Suetonius, and which may be an extract from the treatise of that grammarian, "De claris Poetis," we are told that Lucan made his first public appearance by reciting at the quinquennial games the praises of Nero, who ranked him among his chosen friends, and raised him to the quaestorship. This good understanding, however, was short-lived, and the courtly bard having been, as he conceived, insulted by his patron, from that time forward seized every opportunity of attacking him in the most bitter lampoons, and eventually took a lead in the plot which proved the destruction of himself and his associates.

III. Another "Vita Lucani," said to be "Ex Commentario Antiquissimo," but which can scarcely be regarded as possessing much weight, furnishes sundry additional particulars. It sets forth that he was born on the 3d of Nov. A. D. 39, that he was conveyed from his native country to Rome when only eight years old, that his education was superintended by the most eminent preceptors of the day, that he gave proofs of extraordinary precocity, attracted the attention of Nero, and while yet almost a boy was admitted into the senate, raised to the dignity of the quaestorship, that he exhibited in that capacity gladiatorial shows, and was soon after invested with a priesthood, that he incurred the hatred of Nero by defeating him and carrying off the prize with his Orpheus, in a poetical contest at the quinquennial games, in consequence of which he was prohibited from writing poetry or pleading at the bar; that, seeking revenge, he found death, and perished on the last day of April, A. D. 65, in the 26th year of his age. Then follows a catalogue of his works, many of the names being evidently corrupt: Iliacon. Saturnalia. Catacomon (probably Catacausmos, i. e. κατακαυσμός), Sylvarum X. Tragœdia Medea imperfecta. Salicæ Fabulae XIV. Hippamata prosa oratione in Octavianum Sagittam, et pro eo De incendio urbis (words which it has been proposed to reduce to sense by reading Hypomnemata prosa oratione in Octavianum Sagittam, et pro eo Declamationes—De incendio urbis). Epistolarum ex Campania.

As to the accuracy of the above list it is impossible to offer even an opinion; but it is confirmed to a certain extent, at least, by an old scholiast upon Statius, generally known as Lutatius, who quotes some lines from the Iliad (ad Stat. Theb. iii. 641, and vi. 322), besides which he gives two hexameters from a piece which he terms Catagonium (ad Stat. Theb. ix. 424). With regard to the story of the public defeat sustained by Nero, which has been repeated again and again without any expression of distrust, and has afforded the subject of a glowing picture to a French critic, we may observe that it is passed over in silence by all our classical authorities, that it is at variance with the account given by the compiler of the life attributed to Suetonius, that, a priori, it is highly improbable that any literary man at that period, however vain and headstrong, much less a court favourite, whose nearest kinsmen were courtiers, would ever have formed the project of engaging seriously in a combat where success was ruin. That no such event took place under the circumstances represented above, can be proved from history, for the quinquennial competition (quinquennale certamen — triplex, musicum, gymnicum, equestre) instituted by Nero, and called from him Neronia, was held for the first time A. D. 60, when, as we are expressly informed by Suetonius, “carminis Latini coronam, de qua honestissimus quisque contenderat ipsorum consensu concessam sibi recepit,” words which indicate most clearly the amount of opposition offered by these mock antagonists; the second celebration did not take place until after the death of Piso and his confederates (Tac. Ann. xiv. 20, xvi. 4; Sueton. Ner. 12, comp. 21; Dion Cass. lxi. 21). In all probability the fable arose from an obscure expression in the Genealogicon of Statius (v. 58), which, although hard to explain, certainly affords no sufficient foundation for the structure which has been reared upon it.

The only extant production of Lucan is an heroic poem, in ten books, entitled Pharsalia, in which the progress of the struggle between Caesar and Pompey is fully detailed, the events, commencing with the passage of the Rubicon, being arranged in regular chronological order. The tenth book is imperfect, and the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of the Alexandrian war, but we know not whether the conclusion has been lost, or whether the author never completed his task. The whole of what we now possess was certainly not composed at the same time, for the different parts do not by any means breathe the same spirit. In the earlier portions we find liberal sentiments expressed in very moderate terms, accompanied by open and almost fulsome flattery of Nero; but, as we proceed, the blessings of freedom are more and more loudly proclaimed, and the invectives against tyranny are couched in language the most offensive, evidently aimed directly at the emperor. Whether this remarkable change of tone is to be ascribed to the gradual development of the evil passions of the prince, who excited the brightest hopes at the outset of his reign, or whether it arose from the personal bitterness of a disgraced favourite, must be left to conjecture; but, whichever explanation we may adopt, it is impossible to believe that the work was published entire during the lifetime of the author, and it appears almost certain that it never received his last corrections.

A remarkable diversity of opinion exists with regard to the merits of Lucan. The earlier critics assuming the attitude of contending advocates, absurdly exaggerate and unreasonably depreciate his powers. And yet great defects and great beauties are obvious to the impartial observer. We find almost every quality requisite to form a great poet, but the action of each is clogged and the effect neutralised by some grievous perversity. We discover vast power, high enthusiasm, burning energy, copious diction, lively imagination, great learning, a bold and masculine tone of thought, great reflection and political wisdom; but the power being ill governed, communicates a jarring irregularity to the whole mechanism of the piece, the enthusiasm under no control runs wild into extravagant folly, the language flows in a strong and copious but turbid stream; the learning is disfigured by pedantic display; the imagination of the poet exhausts itself in far-fetched conceits and unnatural similes; the philosophic maxims obtruded at unseasonable moments are received with impatience and disgust; we distinctly perceive throughout vigorous grains struggling, but in vain, against the paralyzing influence of a corrupt system of mental culture and a depraved standard of national taste.

The Editio Princeps of Lucan was printed at Rome, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, under the superintendence of Andrew, Bishop of Aleria, fol. 1469, and two impressions, which have no date and no name of place or printer, are set down by bibliographers next in order. Some improvements were made by Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1502, 1515, but the first really critical editions are those of Pulmannus, 16mo, Antv. 1564, 1577, 1592. The text was gradually purified by the labours of Bernmannus, 8vo. Lips. 1584, 1589; of Grotius, 8vo. Antv. 1614, and Lug. Bat. 1626; of Curtius, 8vo. Lips. 1726; of Oudendorp, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1729; of Burmann, 4to. Leid. 1740; of Bentley, 4to. Strawberry Hill, 1760; of Renouard, fol. Paris, 1795; of Illycinius, Vindob. 4to. 1811; of C. F. Weber, 8vo. Lips. 1821—1831; and of Weiss, 8vo. Lips. 1835.

Of these the editions of Oudendorp and Burmann are the most elaborate and ample, especially the latter, but the most useful for all practical purposes is that of Weber, which contains an ample collection of Scholia and commentaries, a dissertation on the verses commonly considered spurious, and various other adminicula; a fourth volume, however, is required to complete the work, and is intended to contain remarks on the life and writings of Lucan, an account of the editions and fragments, complete indices, and other aids.

A supplement to the Pharsalia, in seven books, by Thomas May, being a translation into Latin of an English supplement appended to his metrical translation, was published at Leyden in 1630, and will be found at the end of the Amsterdam edd. of 1658, 1669.

The first book of the Pharsalia was rendered into English, line for line, by Christopher Marlow, 4to. Lond. 1600, the whole poem by Arthur Gorges, 4to. Lond. 1614, and by Thomas May, 12mo. Lond. 1627. The latter was reprinted in 1631, with a continuation of the subject until the death of Julius Caesar, and although pre-eminently dull, seems to have been popular, for it passed through a great number of editions. The best translation is that of Rowe, which first appeared in 1718 (fol. Lond.); it is executed throughout with considerable spirit.

Of the numerous French translations, that of Guillaume de Brebeuf, 4to. Paris, 1654—1655, long enjoyed great reputation, and, notwithstanding the censures of Boileau, still finds admirers. The prose version of Marmontel, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1768, is in every way detestable.

The German metrical translations of L. von Sekendorff, 8vo. Leip. 1695, and of C. W. von Burck, 8vo. Halle, 1749, are not highly esteemed, and that in prose by P. L. Haus, 8vo. Mannheim, 1792, is almost as bad as Marmontel's. [W. R.] LUCANUS, OCELLUS. [OCELLUS.]

LUCANUS, TERENTIUS. According to the life of the comic poet, Terence, which goes under the name of Suetonius, P. Terentius Lucanus was the name of the Roman senator whose slave Terence was, and who subsequently manumitted him. (Comp. Pighius, Annal. vol. ii. p. 347.) A painter of the name of C. Terentius Lucanus is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 7. s. 33.) There are several coins of the Terentia gens extant, bearing the legend C. TER. LUC. i. e. C. Terentius Lucanus; but by whom they were struck we do not know. A specimen of one is given below: the obverse represents the head of Pallas, with a small figure of Victory standing behind her, and the reverse the Dioscuri.

COIN OF C. TERENTIUS LUCANUS.

LUCCEIUS. 1. A Roman general, who, in conjunction with the praetor C. Cosconius, defeated the Samnites in the Social war, B. C. 89. (Liv. Epit. 75.) [COSCONIUS, No. 2.]

3. LUCCEIUS, M. F., a correspondent of Cicero, A. C. 50, and a zealous supporter of the aristocracy (ad Att. v. 21. § 13), must be distinguished from L. Lucceius, Q. F., the historian [No. 4]. The following passages of Cicero, in which the name of Lucceius occurs without any praenomen, are referred by Orelli (Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 361) to the former of the two (ad Att. v. 20. § 8, vi. 1. § 23, vii. 3. § 6).

4. L. LUCCEIUS, Q. F., the historian, was an old friend and neighbour of Cicero. His name frequently occurs at the commencement of Cicero's correspondence with Atticus, with whom Lucceius had quarrelled for some reason or another. Cicero attempted to reunite his two friends, but Lucceius was so angry with Atticus that he would not listen to any overtures. It appears that M. Sallustius was in some way or other involved in the quarrel. (Cic. ad Att. i. 3. § 3, 5. § 5, 10. § 2, 11. § 1, 14. § 7.)

In A. C. 63 Lucceius accused Catiline, after the latter had failed in his application for the consulship.

The speeches which he delivered against Catiline, were extant in the time of Asconius, who characterises Lucceius as an orator, paratus eruditusque (Ascon. in Tog. Cand. pp. 92, 93, ed. Orelli). In A. C. 60 he became a candidate for the consulship, along with Julius Caesar, who agreed to support him in his canvass, on the understanding that Lucceius, who was very wealthy, should promise money to the electors in their mutual names; but he lost his election in consequence of the aristocracy using every effort to bring in Bibulus, as a counterpoise to Caesar's influence (Suet. Caes. 19; Cic. ad Att. i. 17. § 11, ii. 1. § 9). Lucceius seems now to have withdrawn from public life and to have devoted himself to literature. He was chiefly engaged in the composition of a contemporaneous history of Rome, commencing with the Social or Marsic war. In A. C. 55 he had nearly finished the history of the Social and of the first Civil war, when Cicero, whose impatience to have his own deeds celebrated would not allow him to wait till Lucceius arrived at the history of his consulship, wrote a most urgent and elaborate letter to his friend, pressing him to suspend the thread of his history, and to devote a separate work to the period from Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero's recall from banishment. In this letter (ad Fam. v. 12), which Cicero himself calls valde bella (ad Att. iv. 6. § 4), and which is one of the most extraordinary in the whole of his correspondence, he does not hesitate to ask Lucceius, on account of his friendship and love for him, to say more in his favour than truth would warrant (plusculum etiam, quam concedet veritas, largiari), and to speak in higher terms of the events than he might perhaps think they deserved (ut ornēs vehementius etiam quam fortasse sentis); and he concludes by remarking that if Lucceius refuses him his request, he shall be obliged to write the history himself. Lucceius promised compliance with his request, and the book which Cicero sent to Lucceius by means of Atticus, shortly afterwards, probably contained materials for the work (Cic. ad Att. iv. 11. § 2). It was about this time that Cicero, anxious to conciliate Lucceius in every possible way, spoke of him in public in his oration for Caelius as sancitissimus homo atque integerrimus, as ille vir, illa humanitate praeditus, illis studiis, illis artibus atque doctrina (cc. 21, 22); but it would seem that Lucceius never produced the much-wished-for work.

In A. C. 55 Lucceius went to Sardinia (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6. § 2); and on the breaking out of the civil war in A. C. 49, he espoused the side of Pompey, with whom he had long lived on terms of intimacy: Pompey was in the habit of consulting him during the course of the war on all important matters (Caes. B. C. iii. 18; Cic. ad Att. ix. 1. § 3, 11. § 3). Lucceius was subsequently pardoned by Caesar and returned to Rome, where he continued to live on friendly terms with Cicero; and when the latter lost his beloved daughter Tullia in B. C. 45, Lucceius sent him a letter of condolence (Cic. ad Fam. v. 13). He probably died soon afterwards, as his name does not appear again in Cicero's correspondence.

5. C. LUCCEIUS C. F. HIRIUS, of the Pupinian tribe (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8. § 5), tribune of the plebs, B. C. 53, proposed that Pompey should be created dictator, and was in consequence very nearly deprived of his office (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 8. § 4, 9. § 3; Plut. Pomp. 54, where he is erroneously called Lucilius). In B. C. 52 he was a candidate with Cicero for the augurship, and in the following year a candidate with M. Caelius for the aedileship, but he failed in both; and as he was thus opposed both to Cicero and his friend, he is called in their correspondence, Hyllus, "the stammerer." When Cicero wished to obtain a triumph on account of the successes he had gained in Cilicia, he endeavoured to become reconciled to Lucius, and his name frequently occurs in Cicero's correspondence at that period. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 10. § 1, viii. 2. § 2, 3. § 1, 9. § 1, 11. § 2, ad Att. vii. 1. §§ 7, 8.)

On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, Hirrus joined Pompey, and was stationed with a military force in northern Italy, but, like the other Pompeian commanders, was deserted by his own troops (Caes. B. C. i. 15, where Lucceius is the true reading instead of Ulcillem; comp. Cic. ad Att. viii. 11. A.). He was subsequently sent by Pompey as ambassador to Ordes, king of Parthia, to endeavour to gain his assistance for the aristocracy, but he was thrown into prison by the Parthian king; and when Pompey's officers, before the battle of Pharsalia, confident of victory, were assigning the various offices of the state, there was a vehement dispute whether Hirrus should be allowed to stand for the praetorship in his absence (Caes. B. C. iii. 82; Dion Cass. xlii. 2). He was pardoned by Caesar after the battle of Pharsalia, and returned to Rome. The C. Hirrus mentioned by Pliny (H. N. ix. 55. s. 81) and Varro (R. R. iii. 17), as the first person who had sea-water stock-ponds for lampreys, and who sent some thousands of them to Caesar for his triumphal banquets, is most probably the same person as the preceding, though he is spoken of as a separate person under Hirrus. It would likewise appear that the Hirtius, whom Appian says (B. C. iv. 43, 84) was proscribed by the triumvirs in A. C. 43, and who fled to Sex. Pompey in Sicily, is a false reading for Hirrus.

6. CN. LUCCEIUS, a friend of D. Brutus, A. C. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 5. § 3.)

7. P. LUCCEIUS, a friend of Cicero, and recommended by him to Q. Cornificius, A. C. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 25. A. § 6, 30. § 5.)

LUCEIUS ALBINUS. [ALBINUS, Vol. I. p. 94, a.; compare Vol. I. p. 93, a.]

LUCERIUS, LUCERIA, also Lucetius and Lucetia, that is, the giver of light, occur as surnames of Jupiter and Juno. According to Servius (ad Aen. ix. 570) the name was used especially among the Oecana. (Macrob. Sat. i. 15; Gellius, v. 12; Paul. Diac. p. 114, ed. Müller; comp. LUCINA.) [L. S.]

LUCIANUS (Λουκιανός). 1. Of ANTIOCH, one of the most eminent ecclesiastics and biblical scholars in the early Church. He was born, like his illustrious namesake, the satirist, at Samosata, on the Euphrates: he was of respectable parents, by whom he was early trained up in religious principles and habits. They died, however, when he was only twelve years old; and the orphan lad, having distributed his property to the poor, removed to Edessa, where he was baptized, and devoted himself to ascetic practices, becoming the intimate friend, and apparently the pupil of Macarius, a Christian of that town, known principally as an expounder of the Scriptures. Lucian, having determined to embrace an ecclesiastical life, became a presbyter at Antioch, and established in that city a theological school, which was resorted to by many students from all parts, and which exercised a considerable influence on the religious opinions of the subsequent generation. What were the religious opinions of Lucian himself it is difficult exactly to determine. They were such as to expose him to the charge of heterodoxy, and to induce three successive bishops of Antioch to excommunicate him, or else to induce him to withdraw with his followers from communion with them. According to Valesius and Tillemont the three bishops were Domnus, the successor of Paul of Samosata (A. D. 269—273), Timaeus (A. D. 273—280), and Cyrillus (A. D. 280—300); and Tillemont dates his separation from A. D. 269, and thinks it continued ten or twelve years. The testimony of Alexander, patriarch of Alexandria (apud Theodoret, H. E. i. 4), who was partly contemporary with Lucian, makes the fact of this separation indisputable. He states that Lucian remained out of communion with the church for many years; and that he was the successor in heresy of Paul of Samosata, and the precursor of Arius. Arius himself, in a letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia (apud Theodoret, H. E. i. 5), addresses his friend as συλλουκιανιστὴν "fellow-Lucianist," which may be considered as intimating that Lucian held opinions similar to his own; though, as Arius would, in his circumstances, be slow to take to himself a sectarian designation, we are disposed to interpret the expression as a memorial that they had been fellow-students in the school of Lucian. Epiphanius, who devotes a section of his principal work (Panarion; Haeres. 43, a. ut alii, 23) to refute the heresies of the Lucianists, says that Lucian was originally a follower of Marcion, but that he separated from him and formed a sect of his own, agreeing, however, in its general principles, with that of the Marcionites. Like Marcion, the Lucianists conceived of the Demiurgos or Creator, as distinct from the perfect God, ὁ θεὸς ὁ ἀληθινός "the good one;" and described the Creator, who was also represented as the judge, as ὁ βλάσφημος "the just one." Beside these two beings, between whom the commonly received attributes and offices of God were divided, the Lucianists reckoned a third, ὁ πονηρὸς, "the evil one." Like the Marcionites, they condemned marriage: Epiphanius says that this was out of hatred to the Demiurgos or Creator, whose dominion was extended by the propagation of the human race. This description of the sect is to be received with very great caution, for Epiphanius acknowledges that it had been long extinct, and that his inquiries had led to no clear or certain information respecting it. The gnostic character of the doctrines ascribed to it receives no countenance from the statements of Alexander of Alexandria, and is probably altogether without foundation: the views of Lucian appear to have had more affinity with those of the Arians; and it is observable that Eusebius of Nicomedia, Leontius of Antioch, and other prelates of the Arian or Semi-Arian parties, and possibly (as already intimated) Arius himself, had been his pupils. But whatever may have been the heterodoxy of Lucian, he either abjured it or explained it so as to be restored to the communion of the Church, in which he continued until his martyrdom, the glory of which was regarded as sufficient to wipe off all the reproach of his former heresy; and "Lucian the martyr" had the unusual distinction of being referred to by orthodox and heterodox with equal reverence. It was probably on his reunion with the Church that he gave in the confession of his faith, which is mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. iii. 5), and given at length by Socrates (H. E. ii. 10). It was promulgated by the Eusebian or Semi-Arian Synod of Antioch (A. D. 341), the members of which announced that they had found it in the hand-writing of Lucian himself. Sozomen expresses his doubt of the genuineness of the document; and the caution with which it is worded, for the most part in scriptural terms, so suited to the purpose of the synod, which desired to substitute for the Nicene confession a creed which moderate men of both parties might embrace, renders the suspicion of Sozomen not unreasonable. The genuineness of the creed is, however, maintained by Bishop Bull (Defensio Fid. Nicæn. ii. 13, § 4—8), by powerful arguments, and is indeed generally admitted; but the controversy as to its orthodoxy has not been decided even in modern times; for although trinitarian writers for the most part affirm that it is orthodox, Petavius and Huetius, with the Arian Sandius, impute to it an Arian character. It was strenuously upheld by the Arians of the fourth century, especially as it did not contain the obnoxious term homoousios. Supposing it to be genuine, its ambiguity probably arose from the desire of Lucian not to compromise his own real sentiments, yet to express them in terms of so orthodox an appearance as to satisfy the rulers of the Church, into which he sought to be readmitted.

After his reunion with the Church, Lucian appears to have recovered or increased his reputation both for learning and sanctity. He was especially eminent for his charity to the poor. His eminence marked him out as a victim in the persecution under Diocletian and his successors. He fled from Antioch and concealed himself in the country; but, near the close of the year 311, he was apprehended at Antioch, by order, according to Eusebius and Jerome, of the emperor Maximian (Daza), but according to the author of his Acta, under Maximian (Galerius). The slight difference of the names Maximian and Maximian easily accounts for the difference of these statements: if he was martyred under Maximian we must place his apprehension at least a year earlier than the date just given. He was conveyed by land across Asia Minor to Nicomedeia in Bithynia, where, after suffering the greatest tortures, which could only extort from him the answer, "I am a Christian" (Chrysost. Homilia in S. Lucianum, Opera, vol. i. ed. Morel., vol. v. ed. Savil., vol. ii. ed. Benedict), he was remanded to prison. He died the day after the feast of the Epiphany, A. D. 312, most probably from the effects of the tortures already inflicted, and especially by starvation, having been fourteen days without food, for he would not taste of that which was placed before him, as it had been offered to idols. His body was cast into the sea, and having been washed ashore near the decayed town, or the ruins of Drepanum, was buried there. Constantine the Great afterwards rebuilt the town in honour of the holy martyr, and gave to it, from his mother, by whom he was probably influenced, the name of Helenopolis. The statement of the Alexandrian or Paschal Chronicle, that he was burnt to death, is utterly inconsistent with other more trustworthy statements.

Jerome (De Viris Illustr. c. 77), two small works, "libelli," on the Christian faith, and some short letters to various individuals. The two works "on the faith" (De Fide) were, perhaps, the creed already noticed as discovered and published by the synod of Antioch, and the speech (Oratio) made by him before the emperor, which is preserved by Rufinus (H. E. ix. 6). If this defence was spoken, it must have been at another examination than that described by Chrysostom. Of the letters of Lucian we have no remains, except a fragment in the Alexandrian Chronicle (p. 277, ed. Paris; p. 221, ed. Venice; vol. i. p. 516, ed. Bonn). But the most important of Lucian's literary labours was his revision of the text of the Septuagint. Some (Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. iv. p. 47, and Neander, Church Hist. by Rose, vol. ii. note ad fin.) have thought that he revised the text of the N. T.: but although some expressions used by Jerome (Praef. ad Evangelia) give countenance to their opinion, we believe the revision was limited to the Septuagint. The author of the Acta S. Luciani says he was moved to undertake his revision by observing the corruption of the sacred books; but his subsequent statement that the revision was guided by a comparison of the Hebrew text, limits the expression "sacred books" to the O. T. The copies of the edition of Lucian, though unfavourably characterised by Jerome (l.c.), are described by him elsewhere (Apolog. contra Rufin. ii. 27) as commonly used in the churches from Constantinople to Antioch. They were known as "exemplaria Lucianæ." (Hieron. De Viris Illustr. c. 77.) In the Synopsis S. Scripturae, printed with the works of Athanasius (c. 77), is a curious account of the discovery of Lucian's autograph copy of his revision at Nicomedeia. (Euseb. H. E. viii. 13, ix. 6; Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Rufinus, l. cc.; Philostorg. H. E. ii. 12—15; Synopsis S. Scripturae, Athanas. adscripta, l. c.; *Dial. 2. Of Byzæ, apparently the BIZYA of the classical writers, an episcopal city of Thrace, lived in the fifth century. A Latin version of a letter of his to the emperor Leo I. Thrac (who reigned from A. D. 457 to 474), is given in the various editions of the Concilia. It recognises the authority of the three councils of Nice, A. D. 325, Ephesus A. D. 431, and Chalcedon A. D. 451, and declares Timotheus (Aelurus) patriarch of Alexandria, to be deserving of deposition. From the reference to this last matter, on which Leo seems to have required the judgment of various prelates, the letter appears to have been written in or soon after A. D. 457. In the superscription to the letter he is called "Byzæ Metropolitanus;" but if we are correct in identifying Byzæ with Bizya, this title must not be understood as implying archiepiscopal rank, for Bizya does not appear to have been an archiepiscopal see, but a simple bishoprick, under the metropolitan of Heracleia, of whom Lucian appeared as the representative in the council of Chalcedon. Lucian's name is subscribed to a decretal of Gennadius I., patriarch of Constantinople (A. D. 459 to 471), as Lucian, "bishop of the Metropolitan see of Byzantium," ἐπισκοπος μητροπολιτικῆς Βυζαντίας. (Concilia, vol. iv. col. 903, ed. Labbe; vol. ii. col. 707, ed. Hardouin; vol. vii. col. 541, ed. Mansi; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 1146; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 457.)

3. Of CAPHARJAMALA (a village in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem), more commonly called HIEROSOLYMITANUS, or of JERUSALEM, an ecclesiastic of the fifth century. There is extant in a Latin version an epistle of his addressed to the whole church or body of Christians in all the world, giving an account of the appearance to him, as he slept one night in the baptistry of the church, as was his custom, of Gamaliel (the teacher of the apostle Paul), who revealed to him the burial-place of his own relics and those of his son Abibus or Abibas, his nephew Nicodemus (the same that came to Jesus Christ by night), and of the proto-martyr Stephen. The Latin version was made by Avitus of Bracara, now Braga, in Portugal, a contemporary of Lucian, who dictated it to Avitus in Greek (it is doubtful if he wrote it in that language); and is usually accompanied by a prefatory letter of Avitus to Palchonius or Balconius, bishop of Bracara. A brief abstract of an account of the vision of Lucian by Chrysippus, an ecclesiastic of Jerusalem, is given by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 171) from the work of Eustratus on the state of the soul after death. Of the Latin version of Lucian's Epistola there are two copies, differing in several respects from each other. That published by Ulimmerius, and commonly designated from him, is given by Surius (De Probatis Sanctor. Vitis, ad diem II. August.); and in the Appendix to the editions of Augustin by the Theologians of Louvain (vol. x. p. 630, &c.) and the Benedictines (vol. vii.). According to this copy, the vision of Lucian took place 3d Dec. 415. The other copy, which omits the date of the vision, is also given by the Benedictines, in parallel columns, to facilitate comparison. (Gennadius, De Vitis Illustr. c. 46, 47; Photius, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 327; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 415.)

4. HIEROSOLYMITANUS, or of JERUSALEM. [No. 3.]

5. THE MARTYR. [No. 1.]

6. METROPOLITA. [No. 2.]

7. PASIPHON (Πασιφών), a writer to whom Favorinus (FAVORINUS, No. 1), according to Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 73) ascribed the tragedies which were more commonly attributed to Diogenes the Cynic (DIOGENES), or to Philistus of Aegina, his disciple. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 295, 296, and 309.)

8. THE PRESBYTER. [Nos. 1 and 3.]

9. OF SAMOSATA. [See below, and also No. 1.]

10. THE TRAGIC WRITER. [No. 7.] [J. C. M.]

LUCIANUS (Λουκιανός), also called LYCINUS, a witty and voluminous Greek writer, but of Syrian parentage, having been born, as he himself tells us, at Samosata, the capital of Commagene. (Ἀλεξάνδρ. § 19; Πῶς δὲ ἴσθ. συγγρ. § 24.) There is no ancient biography of Lucian extant, except the short and inaccurate one by Suidas; but some particulars may be gleaned from his own writings.

Considerable difference of opinion has existed respecting the time in which Lucian flourished. Suidas places him under Trajan, and subsequently, and in this he is followed by Bourdelet. The opinion of Voss (De Histor. Graec. ii. 15), that he flourished in the reigns of M. Aurelius Antoninus and Commodus seems, however, more correct, and has been generally followed by later critics. It is impossible to fix the exact dates of his birth and death, but the following passages will afford some clue to his chronology. In the Πῶς δὲ ἴσθ. § 13, he tells us that there existed in his time, and was probably still alive, a man who had bought the lamp of Epictetus for 3000 drachma, in the hope of inheriting his wisdom. As this purchase was probably made shortly after the death of Epictetus, the natural inference is, that Lucian was alive in the time of that philosopher (hardly that Epictetus died before the time of Lucian, as Mr. Clinton says, Fasti Rom. A. D. 118). The uncertainty expressed as to whether the purchaser was still alive denotes that a considerable period had elapsed between the transaction recorded and the date of the Πῶς δὲ ἴσθ. But that piece can be shown to have been written shortly after the extraordinary suicide of Peregrinus, A. D. 165; for in § 14 Lucian mentions another silly fellow who had just recently purchased (χρὴς καὶ ἀπαρῆ) the stick of the fanatical cynic for a talent. Now Epictetus could hardly have survived the reign of Hadrian, who died A. D. 138 (ΕΠΙΚΤΗΤΟΣ, and Clinton, l. c.), and it is more likely that he did not reach the middle of it. On these grounds we might at a venture place Lucian's birth about the year 120; and this date tallies pretty well with other inferences from his writings. The Πῶς δὲ ἴσθ. συγγράμματα must have been nearly contemporary with the Πῶς δὲ ἴσθ. since it alludes to the Parthian victories of Vespasian (Clinton, A. D. 166), but was probably written before the final triumph, as from an expression in § 2 (τὰ ἐκ τοῦ ταύρα κενύοντος) the war would seem to have been still going on. These pieces, together with the account of the death of Peregrinus (Περὶ τῆς Περικλίου τελευτῆς), which has all the air of a narrative composed immediately after the event it records, are the earliest works of Lucian which we can connect with any public transactions. But he tells us that he did not abandon the rhetorical profession, and take to a different style of writing, till he was about forty (ἄλς ἡλικίᾳ, § 34); and though he there more particularly alludes to his Dialogues, we may very probably include in the same category all his other works, which, like the preceding, are unconnected with rhetoric. If these were his first works of that kind, and if he was forty when he wrote them, he would have been born about the year 125. They were, however, in all probability preceded by some others, such as the Hermotimus, which he mentions having written about forty (§ 13), the Nigrinus, &c. This brings us again to the year 120, as a very probable one in which to fix his birth; and thus he might have been contemporary as a boy with Epictetus, then in his old age; and with the man who bought his lamp, some 30 or 35 years, perhaps, before 165. A passage which alludes to later political events occurs in the Alexander, § 48, where mention is made of the war of Marcus Antoninus against the Marcomanni, A. D. 170—175; and as Marcus is there called Σέδς, Voss inferred that the piece was written after the death of that emperor in 180. According to the computation of Reitz, which is that above given, Lucian would then have been more than sixty years old. From § 56, it appears that Lucian's father was still alive when he visited Alexander; but the visit might have taken place at least ten years before the account of it was written. (Clinton, Fasti Rom. A. D. 182.) That Lucian himself was a man of some consequence at the time of it appears from the intimate terms he was on with Rutilianus, § 54, and from the governor of Cappadocia having given him a guard of two soldiers (§ 55). This is another argument for the visit having taken place when Lucian was well advanced in life, probably about fifty; for his youth was spent in struggling with adverse fortune. In the Ἀπολογία περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ μισθῷ συνόντων, § 1, he mentions having obtained an appointment in Egypt, probably under Commodus, when he had one foot almost in Charon's boat; but we have no means of determining the age at which he died. On the whole, however, Reitz's calculation may be safely adopted, who places his life from the year 120 to the end of the century.

Having thus endeavoured to fix Lucian's chronology, we may proceed to trace those particulars of his life which may be gathered from his works. In the piece called The Dream (Περὶ τοῦ ὕπνου), which stands at the beginning of them, he represents his parents as in poor circumstances, and as deliberating with their friends about the choice of a profession for himself, then about fourteen years of age. Those of the learned sort were too expensive for the family means, and it was therefore resolved to apprentice him to some mechanical trade, which might bring in a quick return of money. As a schoolboy, he had shown a talent for making little waxen images; and his maternal uncle being a statuary in good repute, it was determined that he should be put apprentice to him. Lucian was delighted with the thoughts of his new profession; but his very first attempt in it proved unfortunate. Having been ordered to polish a marble tablet, he leant too heavily upon it, and broke it. The consequence was, a sound beating from his uncle, which Lucian resenting, ran away home to his parents. In the version of the affair which he gave to them, he took the liberty to add a little circumstance, which already betrays the malice and humour of the boy. He affirmed that his uncle had treated him thus cruelly because he was apprehensive of being excelled in his profession! The event itself may almost be regarded as an omen of his future course, and of his being destined from his earliest years to be an iconoclast. From the remainder of the Dream, where, in imitation of Prodicus's myth of the choice of Hercules, related in Xenophon's Memorabilia, Ἐργολυσιᾶς (Statuary) and Παιδεία (Education) contend which shall have him for a votary, we can only infer that, after some deliberation, Lucian henceforward dedicated himself to the study of rhetoric and literature; but of the means which he found to compass his object we have no information. From the Δίς κατηγοροῦ, § 27, it would appear that, after leaving his uncle, he wandered for some time about Ionia, without any settled plan, and possessing as yet but a very imperfect knowledge of the Greek tongue. Subsequently, however, we find him an advocate by profession; and if we may trust the authority of Suidas, he seems to have practised at Antioch. According to the same writer, being unsuccessful in this calling, he employed himself in writing speeches for others, instead of delivering them himself. But he could not have remained long at Antioch; for at an early period of his life he set out upon his travels, and visited the greater part of Greece, Italy, and Gaul. At that period it was customary for professors of the rhetorical art to proceed to different cities, where they attracted audiences by their displays, much in the same manner as musicians or itinerant lecturers in modern times. The subjects of these displays were accusations of tyrants, or panegyrics on the brave and good (Δίς κατηγορ., § 32). It may be presumed that his first visit was to Athens, in order to acquire a perfect knowledge of the language; and that he remained there a considerable time may be inferred as well from his intimate familiarity with all the graces of the Attic dialect, as from his acquaintance with Demosthenes there, whom he tells us he knew for a long period. (Demosthenes Vita, § 1.) He did not, however, gain so much reputation by his profession in Ionia and Greece as in Italy and Gaul, especially the latter country, which he traversed to its western coasts, and where he appears to have acquired a good deal of money as well as fame. (Ἀπολογία περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ μισθῷ, § 15; Δίς κατηγορ., § 27.) Whether he remained long at Rome is uncertain. From his tract Ἐπὶ τῷ ἐν τῇ προσαγορεύσει πάλαιμας, § 13, he would seem to have acquired some, though perhaps an imperfect, knowledge of the Latin tongue; and in the Περὶ τοῦ ἡλέκτρον he describes himself as conversing with the boatmen on the Po. In the Περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ μισθῷ συν., he shows an intimate acquaintance with Roman manners; but his picture of them in that piece, as well as in the Nigrinus, is a very unfavourable one.

He probably returned to his native country in about his fortieth year, and by way of Macedonia. (Herodotus, § 7.) At this period of his life he abandoned the rhetorical profession, the artifices of which were foreign to his temper, the natural enemy of deceit and pretension (Δίς κατηγορ., § 32, Ἀλιεύς, § 29); though it was, perhaps, the money he had made by it that enabled him to quit it, and to follow his more congenial inclinations. In his old age, indeed, he appears to have partially resumed it, as he tells us in his Ἠρακλῆς, § 7; and to which period of his life we must also ascribe his Διδύμοις (§ 8). But these latter productions seem to have been confined to that species of declamation called a προσῳδή, to which the pieces just mentioned belong, and for which we have no equivalent term; and they were probably written rather by way of pastime and amusement than from any hopes of gain.

There are no materials for tracing that portion of his life which followed his return to his native country. It was, however, at this period that he produced the works to which he owes his reputation, and which principally consist of attacks upon the religion and philosophy of the age. The bulkiness of them suggests the inference that many years were spent in these quiet literary occupations, though not undiversified with occasional travel; since it appears from the Πῶς δεῖ ἴσθαι σὺν., § 14, that he must have been in Achaia and Ionia about the close of the Parthian war, A. D. 160—165; on which occasion, too, he seems to have visited Olympia, and beheld the self-immolation of Peregrinus. We have already seen that about the year 170, or a little previously, he must have visited the false oracle of the impostor Alexander, in Paphlagonia. Here Lucian planned several contrivances for detecting the falsehood of his responses; and in a personal interview with the prophet, instead of kissing his hand, as was the custom, inflicted a severe bite upon his thumb. For these and other things, especially his having advised Rutilianus not to marry Alexander's daughter by the Moon, that impostor was so enraged against Lucian, that he would have murdered him on the spot had he not been protected by a guard of two soldiers. Alexander, therefore, dissembled his hatred, and even, pretending friendship, dismissed him with many gifts, and lent him a vessel to prosecute his voyage. When well out at sea, Lucian observed, by the tears and entreaties of the master towards the rest of the crew, that something was amiss, and learnt from the former that Alexander had ordered them to throw their passenger into the sea, a fate from which he was saved only by the good offices of the master. He was now landed at Aegialos, where he fell in with some ambassadors, proceeding to king Eupator in Bithynia, who received him on board their ship, and landed him safely at Amastris. (Alex. 54—58.) We can trace no later circumstances of his life, except his obtaining the office of procurator of part of Egypt, bestowed upon him in his old age, probably by the emperor Commodus, and which has been already mentioned. From the Ἀπολ. περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ μ., § 12, it appears that his functions were chiefly judicial, that his salary was considerable, and that he even entertained expectations of the proconsulship. In what manner he obtained this post we have no means of knowing; but from his Imagines, which some have supposed to have been addressed to a concubine of Verus, and which Wieland conjectures to have been intended for the wife of Marcus Antoninus, as well as from his tract Pro Lapsu, he seems to have been neither averse from flattery nor unskilled in the method of applying it. He certainly lived to an advanced age, and it is probable that he may have been afflicted with the gout; but the inference that he died of it merely from his having written the burlesque drama called Ποδάρπα is rather strong. He probably married in middle life; and in the Εδρώνχος, § 13, he mentions having a son.

The nature of Lucian's writings inevitably procured him many enemies, by whom he has been painted in very black colours. According to Suidas he was surnamed the Blasphemer, and was torn to pieces by dogs, or rather, perhaps, died of canine madness, as a punishment for his impiety. On this account, however, no reliance can be placed, as it was customary with Suidas to invent a horrid death for those whose doctrines he disliked. To the account of Suidas, Volaterranus added, but without stating his authority, that Lucian apostatised from Christianity, and was accustomed to say he had gained nothing by it but the corruption of his name from Lucius to Lucianus. So too the scholiast on the Peregrinus, § 13, calls him an apostate (ὑπαστάτης); whilst the scholiasts on the Veræ Historiæ and other pieces frequently apostrophise him in the bitterest terms, and make the most absurd and far-fetched charges against him of ridiculing the Scriptures.

The whole gravamen of the accusation of blasphemy lies in the point whether Lucian was really an apostate. If he had never been initiated into the mysteries of Christianity, it is clear that he is no more amenable to the charge than Tacitus, or any other profane author, who from ignorance of our religion has been led to vilify and misrepresent it. The charge of apostasy might be urged with some colour against Lucian, if it could be shown that he was the author of the dialogue entitled Philopatris. The subject of the piece is shortly this. Triphon, who is represented as having been a member of the church, meets Critias, and inquires the reason of his disturbed looks and hurried gait. After some discourse about paganism and Christianity, Critias relates his having been among an assembly of Christians, where he has heard troubles and misfortunes predicted to the state and its armies. When he has concluded his story, Clelaus enters, and announces some military successes gained by the emperor in the East. A sneering tone pervades the whole piece, which betrays so intimate a knowledge of Christianity that it could hardly have been written but by one who had been at some time within the pale of the church.

Some eminent critics, and amongst them Fabricius, have held the Philopatris to be genuine. Towards the middle of last century, Gesner wrote his dissertation De Aetate et Auctore Philopatris, in which he showed satisfactorily that the piece could not have been Lucian's; and he brings forward many considerations which render it very probable that the work was composed in the reign of Julian the Apostate.

The scholiast on the Alexander, § 47, asserts that Lucian was an Epicurean, and this opinion has been followed by several modern critics. But though his natural scepticism may have led him to prefer the tenets of Epicurus to those of any other sect, it is most probable that he belonged to none whatever. In the Ἀπολ. περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ μισθῶν εν., § 15, he describes himself as οὐ σαρφός, but ἐκ τοῦ πολλοῦ δήμεν; and in the Hermotimus he calls himself ἰδιώτης, in contradistinction to that philosopher. In the Βίωσις πᾶσις, too, Epicurus is treated no better than the other heads of sects.

Of Lucian's moral character we have no means of judging except from his writings; a method which is not always certain. Several of his pieces are loose and licentious, but some allowance should be made for the manners of the age. The Ἐπὶ τῷ Ἐρωτι, the most objectionable, has been adjudicated by many critics, and for Lucian's sake it is to be hoped that they are correct; but in the Εἰκόνες we find allusions to the same perverted tastes, and in § 4 the promise of a story respecting the Cnidias Venus, which is actually found in the former piece. Yet in the Alexander, § 54, he seems indignant at the charge of immorality brought against him by that impostor; and that he must at least have avoided any grievous and open scandal may be presumed from the high office conferred upon him in Egypt. Lucian was not averse from praising himself, and in the Ἀλυσίς, § 20, has drawn his own character as a hater of pride, falsehood, and vain-glory, and an ardent admirer of truth, simplicity, and all that is naturally amiable; nor is there much to object against the truth of this autograph portrait. He seems to have retained through life a natural taste for the fine arts, as may be inferred from the many lively descriptions of pictures and statues interspersed through his works. That he was a warm admirer of dancing appears from his treatise Περὶ ὀρχήσεως.

In giving an account of Lucian's numerous and miscellaneous writings, it is difficult to class them under distinct heads with accuracy. Yet an attempt at arrangement seems preferable to going through them in the confused order in which they stand in the editions, which has not even the merit of being chronological. The main heads under which his pieces may be classed, and which are, perhaps, accurate enough for general purposes, are, 1. the Rhetorical; 2. the Critical; 3. the Biographical; 4. Romances; 5. Dialogues; 6. Miscellaneous pieces; 7. Poems. By some writers Lucian has also been called an historian, a mathematician, a physical philosopher, &c. But the works for which these appellations have been bestowed upon him are either not his, or fall more properly under one of the preceding divisions.

1. RHETORICAL WORKS. Lucian's rhetorical pieces were no doubt for the most part the first productions of his pen, for we have already seen that he did not lay aside that profession, and apply himself to a different style of writing, till he had reached the age of forty. Of all his pieces they are the most unimportant, and betray least of his real character and genius, and therefore require but a passing notice. They may be divided into προσλαλιαί, or introductory addresses, delivered in literary assemblies, and more regular rhetorical pieces in the demonstrative and deliberative kind. Among the προσλαλιαί may be reckoned Περὶ τοῦ ὕπνου, Somnium seu Vita Luciani, the closing sentence of which shows it to have been addressed to some assembly of his countrymen, apparently after his return from his travels. This piece, which is valuable for the anecdotes it contains of Lucian's life, has been already mentioned. The Ἡρόδοτος, Herodotus sive Aëtion, seems to have been addressed to some Macedonian assembly. Of Aëtion the painter an account is elsewhere given. [Αἴτιον.] From the picture described in this piece, Raphael is said to have taken one of his frescoes. Ζεύς, Zeus sive Antiochus, also contains the description of a picture which was carried off from Athens, and which was lost on its voyage to Rome, but of which a copy was taken in the time of Lucian. Ἀρμονίδης, Harmonides, which, however, is called by Marcellus a ύστασις, or Commentatio, contains an anecdote of Antiochus and his pupil Harmonides. Σκύθης ἢ πόρκετος, Scythæ, turns on the visit of Anacharsis to Athens, and his meeting Toxaris, a fellow-countryman, there, who introduces him to the friendship of Solon. Ἱππίας ἢ Βαλάντιον, Hippias sive Balanus, is the description of a bath. Προσλαία ἢ Δένδρος, Bacchus, turns on the conquests of Bacchus. Προσλαλία ἢ Ἡρακλῆς, Hercules ultimus. An account of the Gallic Hercules. πρὸ τοῦ ἤλεκτρον ἢ τῶν κύκων, De Electro seu ignis. This was probably an early piece, as in 2 the author mentions a recent visit to the Po, which he inquired for the poplars that distilled amber, and the singing swans; but without success. πρὸ τοῦ οἴκου, De Domo, contains a description of house, or rather apartment. Περὶ τῶν διψάδων, De psalibus. An account of certain Libyan serpents. More regular rhetorical pieces are Τυραννοκτό- vos, Tyrannicida, a declamation. A man intending to kill a tyrant, but not finding him, leaves his sword in the body of his son. At this sight the tyrant slays himself; whereupon the murderer claims a reward, as having killed him. This piece is perhaps spurious. Ἀποκρητιτόμενος, Abdicatus. This declamation is attributed to Libanius. Φάλαρις πρῶτος καὶ δεύτερος, Phalaris prior et alter. The authenticity of these two declamations, on the subject of the tyrant of Agrigentum, has likewise been doubted. Μούσας ἐγκώμιον, Encomium Musarum, a playful and ingenious little piece, describing the nature and habits of the fly. Πατριδὸς Ἐγκώμιον, Patriæ Encomium. The title indicates the subject of this declamation.

2. CRITICAL WORKS. Δίκη φωνήεντων, Judicium Vocalium, was probably a juvenile performance, in which σ brings a complaint of ejection against τ. The suit is conducted after the Athenian manner, the vowels being the dicasts. Λεξιφάνης, Lexiphanes, a humorous dialogue, written to ridicule the affectation of strange and obsolete diction. By some it has been considered as directed against the Onomasticon of Pollux; by others, against Athenæus; but in both cases probably without foundation. After Lexiphanes has been made to vomit up the strange farrago with which he has overloaded himself, Lucian prescribes the following course of wholesome diet, in order to complete a cure. First, to read the Greek poets; then the orators; next Thucydides and Plato, with the dramatic authors. The piece concludes with some sound critical advice. Πῶς δέῃ ἱστορίαν συγγράφειν, Quomodo Historia sit conscribenda, is the best of Lucian's critical works. The former portion is employed in ridiculing the would-be historians of the day, whilst the latter contains some excellent critical precepts. The 41st section in particular is admirable. The historian Du Thon thought so much of this essay, that he drew the rules for historical writing in the preface to his work principally from it. Ῥητορικὴ διδασκαλία, Rhetorum Preceptor, is a piece of critical irony, pretending to point out a royal road to oratory. It also contains a bitter personal attack upon some apparently Egyptian orator. Ψευδολογιστής, Pseudologista, a violent attack upon a brother sophist who had ignorantly asserted that the word ἀσώφρως, used by Lucian, was un-Attic. Δημοσθένεως Ἐγκώμιον, Demosthenis Encomium, a critical dialogue on the merits of Demosthenes. This piece has been reckoned spurious by many critics, but perhaps on insufficient grounds. The concluding part contains some interesting particulars of the death of the great orator. Ψευδοσοφιστής, Pseudosophista, a dialogue on Attic solecisms, has also been adjudicated, and on more certain grounds. Several phrases are given out as solecisms which are not really so, and which have even been used by Lucian himself.

3. BIOGRAPHICAL WORKS. The pieces which entitle Lucian to be called a biographer are the Ἀλέξανδρος ἢ Ψευδόμαντις, Alexander seu Pseudomantis; Δημόντακτος βίος, Vita Demonactis; and Περὶ τῆς Περεργίνου τελευτῆς, De Mortis Perergrini. They are, however, rather anecdotal memoirs (ἀπομνημονεύματα), like Xenophon's Memorabilia Socratis, than regular biographies. Of the first piece the chief contents are given elsewhere. [ALEXANDER, Vol. I. p. 123.] An account of Demonax will also be found under the proper head. The life of that philosopher must have been prolonged considerably beyond the reign of Hadrian, since Lucian tells us that he was personally acquainted with him for a long period. (Θατέρῳ δὲ τῷ Δημόνακτι, καὶ ἐπὶ μάλιστα συνεγένεον, § 1.) Demonax was a philosopher after Lucian's own heart, belonging to no sect, though he had studied the tenets of all, and holding the popular mythology in profound contempt. His chief leaning was to the school of Socrates, though, in the unconstrained liberty of his way of life, he seemed to bear some resemblance to Diogenes. Demonax sacrificed to the Graces, and was equally averse from the austerity of the Stoics and the filth of the Cynics. Had he been one of the latter, Lucian would never have mentioned him with praise. Of all the philosophic sects, Lucian detested the Cynics most, as may be seen in his Perigrinus, Fugitive, Convivium, &c.; though he seems to have made an exception in favour of Menippus, on account, perhaps, of his satirical writings, to which his own bear some resemblance. It was for his account of Demonax that Eunapius ranked Lucian among the biographers. Περὶ τῆς Περεγρίνου τελευτῆς, De Morte Peregrini, contains some particulars of the life and voluntary auto-da-fé of Peregrinus Proteus, a fanatical cynic and apostate Christian, who publicly burnt himself from an impulse of vain-glory shortly after the 236th Olympiad (A. D. 165), and concerning whom further particulars will be found elsewhere. [PEREGRINUS.] Lucian seems to have beheld this singular triumph of fanaticism with a sort of barbarous exultation, which nearly cost him a beating from the Cynics, who surrounded the pyre (§ 37). The Μακροβίοι may also be referred to this head, as containing anecdotes of several Greek and other worthies who had attained to a long life.

4. ROMANCES. Under this head may be classed the tale entitled Λούκιος ἢ 'Ὅνος, Lucius sive Asinus, and the 'Αληθοῦς ἱστορίας λόγος α' καὶ β', (Verae Historiae). Photius (Cod. 129) is inclined to believe that Lucian's piece was taken from a fable by Lucius of Patrae, but does not speak very positively on the subject. It has been thought that Appuleius drew his story of the Golden Ass from the same source [APPULEIUS]; retaining, however, the lengthy narrative and fanatical turn of the original tale; whilst Lucian abridged it, and gave it a comic cast, especially in the denouement, which, however, is sufficiently gross. M. Courier, on the contrary, who published an edition of the piece with a French version and notes (Paris 1818, 12mo), thinks that Lucian's is the original; and this opinion is acceded to by M. Letronne in the Journal des Savans, July, 1818. There are no means of deciding this question satisfactorily. The story turns on the adventures of Lucius, who, from motives of curiosity, having arrived at the house of a female magician in Thesaly, and beheld her transformation into a bird, is desirous of undergoing a similar metamorphosis. By the help of the magician's maid, with whom he has ingratiated himself, he gets access to her magic ointments; but, unfortunately, using the wrong one, is deservedly turned into an ass, in which shape he meets with a variety of adventures, till he is disenchanted by eating rose-leaves. The adventure with the robbers in the cave is thought to have suggested the well-known scene in Gil Blas. The Verae Historiae were composed, as the author tells us in the beginning, to ridicule the authors of extravagant tales, including Homer's Odyssey, the Indica of Ctesias, and the wonderful accounts of Iambulus of the things contained in the great sea. According to Photius (Cod. 166), Lucian's model was Antonius Diogenes, in his work called Τὰ ἐν τῷ Θωάλῳ ἀπίστα. That writer, however, was probably later than Lucian. Still Lucian may have had predecessors in the style, as Antiphanes. The adventures related are of the most extravagant kind, but show great fertility of invention. Lucian tells us plainly what we have to expect; that he is going to write about things he has neither seen himself nor heard of from others; things, moreover, that neither do, nor can by possibility exist; and that the only truth he tells us is when he asserts that he is lying. He then describes how he set sail from the columns of Hercules, and was cast by a storm on an enchanted island, which appeared, from an inscription, to have been visited by Hercules and Bacchus; where not only did the rivers run wine, but the same liquid gushed from the roots of the vines, and where they got drunk by eating the fish they caught. On again setting sail, the ship is snatched up by a whirlwind, and carried through the air for seven days and nights, till they are finally deposited in the moon by certain enormous birds called Hippogri (horse vultures). Here they are present at a battle between the inhabitants of that planet and those of the sun. Afterwards they prosecute their voyage through the Zodiac, and arrive at the city of Lantern, where Lucian recognises his own, and inquires the news at home. They then pass the city of Nephelococcygia (Cloud-cuckoo-town), and are at length deposited again in the sea. Here they are swallowed up by an immense whale; and their adventures in its belly, which is inhabited, complete the first book. The second opens with an account of their escape, by setting fire to a forest in the whale's belly, and killing him. After several more wonderful adventures, they arrive at the Isle of the Blest (Μακροβον νῆσος). Here they fall in with several ancient worthies, and Homer among the rest, which affords an opportunity for some remarks on his life and writings. Homer is made to condemn the criticisms of Aristarchus and Zenodotus. He asserts, as Wolf and others have since done, that he began the Iliad with the anger of Achilles merely from chance, and without any settled plan; and denies that the Odyssey was written before the Iliad, then a prevalent opinion. After this they again set sail, and arrive at the infernal regions, where, among others, they find Ctesias and Herodotus undergoing punishment for their falsehoods. The book is concluded with several more surprising adventures. That the Verae Historiae supplied hints to Rabelais and Swift is sufficiently obvious, not only from the nature and extravagance of the fiction, but from the lurking satire.

5. DIALOGUES. But Lucian's fame rests chiefly on his dialogues, by which term is here meant those pieces which are of an ethical or mythological nature, as well as of a dramatic form; and which were intended to ridicule the heathen philosophy and religion; for a few of his pieces which have not that scope are also in the shape of dialogues. Lucian has himself explained the nature and novelty of his undertaking in his Promethæus (Περὶ τὸν εἰρηστήν Προμηθεὺς εἰ ἐν λόγοις, § 5), when he tells us that it consists of a mixture of the Pis- tales dialogue with comedy; in other words, a combination of Plato and Aristophanes. In the Biæ Acrotatus, § 33, we have a still more complete account of his style, where Dialogue personified accuses Lucian of stripping him of his tragic mask, and substituting a comic and satyric one; of introducing scurrilous jokes, and the iambic licence; and of mixing him up with Eupolia, Aristophanes, and Menippus, the most snarling of the ancient cynics. These dialogues, which form the great bulk of his works, are of very various degrees of merit, and are treated in the greatest possible variety of style, from seriousness down to the broadest humour and buffoonery. Their subjects and tendency, too, vary considerably; for whilst some, as it has been said, are employed in attacking the heathen philosophy and religion, others are mere pictures of manners without any polemic drift. For the sake of convenience, we may first consider those which are more exclusively directed against the heathen mythology; next, those which attack the ancient philosophy; and lastly, those in which both the preceding objects are combined, or which, having no such tendency, are mere satires on the manners of the day and the follies and vices natural to mankind.

In the first class may be placed Προμηθεύς ἢ Εὐκαίριος, Prometheus seu Eucairius, which is properly a dialogue of the gods, and to which it forms a very fitting introduction, as it opens up the relationship between gods and men, and puts Zeus completely in the wrong for crucifying Prometheus. Though a good dialogue, it is in the grave style, and has little of Lucian's characteristic humour. The Θεῶν Διάλογοι, Deorum Dialogi, twenty-six in number, consist of short dramatic narratives of some of the most popular incidents in the heathen mythology. The reader, however, is generally left to draw his own conclusions from the story, the author only taking care to put it in the most absurd point of view. Hence, perhaps, we may conclude that, like some of Lucian's more serious dialogues, they were among his earlier attempts, before he had summoned hardihood enough to venture on those more open and scurrilous attacks which he afterwards made. Of the same class, but inferior in point of execution, are the fifteen dialogues of the Dei Marini, Ἑρδῶν Διάλογοι. In the last, that of Zephyr and Notus, the beautiful and graphic description of the rape of Europa is worthy of remark, which, as Hemsterhuis observes, was probably taken from some picture. In the Ζεὺς Ἐλεγχόμενος, Jupiter Confutatus, a bolder style of attack is adopted; and the cynic proves to Zeus's face, that every thing being under the dominion of fate, he has no power whatever. As this dialogue shows Zeus's want of power, so the Ζεὺς Ἰσχυρότης, Jupiter Tragoedus, strikes at his very existence, and that of the other deities. The subject is a dispute at Athens between Timocles, a comic, and Damias, an Epicurean, respecting the being of the gods. Anxious as to its result, Zeus summons all the deities to hear the arguments. Hermes first calls the golden ones, then the illyr, and so forth; not according to the beauty of their workmanship, but the richness of their materials. On meeting, a squabble takes place about precedence, which is with some difficulty settled. Timocles then goes through his arguments for the existence of the gods, which Damias refutes and ridicules. At this result, Zeus becomes defected; but Hermes consoles him with the reflection that though some few may be convinced by Damias, the great mass of the Greeks, and all the barbarians, will ever be of a contrary opinion. The abuse of the stoic on finding himself worsted is highly natural. Much of the same tendency is the Θεῶν Ἐκκαθάρσις, Deorum Concilium, which is in fact a dialogue of the gods. Momus complains of the rabble which has been introduced into heaven, not only mere mortals, but barbarians, and even apes and other beasts. In this class may also be enumerated the Τὰ πρὸς Κρόνον, Saturnalia, which contains a laugh at the ancient fable of Cronos.

In the second class of Dialogues, namely, those in which the ancient philosophy is the more immediate object of attack, may be placed the following: Βίαι πρὸς τὴν Παιδείαν, Vitium Auctio. In this humorous piece the heads of the different sects are put up to sale, Hermes being the auctioneer. Pythagoras fetches ten minae. Diogenes, with his rags and cynicism, goes for two obols—he may be useful as a house-dog. Aristippus is too fine a gentleman for any body to venture on. Democritus and Heraclitus are likewise unsaleable. Socrates, with whom Lucian seems to confound the Platonic philosophy, after being well ridiculed and abused, is bought by Dion of Syracuse for the large sum of two talents. Epicurus fetches two minae. Chrysippus, the stoic, who gives some extraordinary specimens of his logic, and for whom there is a great competition, is knocked down for twelve minae. A peripatetic, a double person (exoteric and esoteric) with his physical knowledge, brings twenty minae. Pyrrho, the sceptic, comes last, who, after having been disposed of, and in the hands of the buyer, is still in doubt whether he has been sold or not. From the conclusion, it appears that Lucian intended to include in another auction the lives of other members of the community; but this piece is either lost, or was never executed. The Ἀλιεύς ἢ Ἀναβαιορρέας, Piscator seu Reviviscentes, is a sort of apology for the preceding piece, and may be reckoned among Lucian's best dialogues. The philosophers are represented as having obtained a day's life for the purpose of taking vengeance upon Lucian, who in some degree makes the amende honorable by confessing that he has borrowed the chief beauties of his writings from them. He begs not to be condemned without a trial; and it is agreed that Philosophy herself shall be the judge; but Lucian expresses his fears that he shall never be able to find her abode, having been so often misdirected. On their way, however, they meet Philosophy, who is astonished to see so many of her chief professors again alive, and is surprised they should be angry at her being abused, when she has already endured so much from Comedy. It is with great difficulty that Lucian discovers Truth among her retinue, the allegorical description of which personage is very good. Lucian, indeed, excels in that kind of writing. The philosophers now open their case against him. He is charged with taking Dialogue out of their hands, and with persuading Menippus to side with him, the only philosopher who does not appear among his accusers. This may afford another answer to those who would make Lucian an Epicurean. Under the name of Parrhesiades, Lucian advocates his own cause; and having gained it, becomes, in turn, accuser. The philosophers of the age are summoned to the Acropolis, in the name of Virtue,

Philosophy, and Justice, but scarce one obeys the call. Lucian undertakes to assemble them by offering rewards. Immediately a vast concourse appear, quarrelling among themselves; but when they find that Philosophy herself is to be the judge, they all run away. In his haste to escape, a cynic drops his wallet, which, instead of lupins, brown bread, or a book, is found to contain gold, pomatum, a sacrificing knife, a mirror, and dice. Truth orders their lives to be inquired into by Logic, and the pretenders to be branded with the figure of a fox or an ape. Lucian then borrows a fishing-rod from the temple; and having baited his hook with figs and gold, flings his line from the Acropolis. He draws up a great many different philosophers, but Plato, Chrysippus, Aristotle, &c., disown them all, and they are cast down headlong. This piece is valuable, not only from its own merits, but from containing some particulars of Lucian's life. Ἐρμύριμος is chiefly an attack upon the Stoics, but its design is also to show the impossibility of becoming a true philosopher. The irony is of a serious and Socratic turn, and the piece, though carefully written, has little of Lucian's native humour. From § 13 it appears he was about forty when he wrote it; and like the Nigrinus, it was probably, therefore, one of his earliest productions in this style. The Εὐνούχος, Eunuchus, is a ridiculous dispute between two philosophic rivals for the emperor's prize, the objection being that the eunuchus is ipso facto a disqualified person, and incapable of becoming a philosopher. From § 12, it appears to have been written at Athens. The Φιλοψευδής may be ranked in this class. It is a dialogue on the love of falsehood, natural to some men purely for its own sake. In § 2 Herodotus and Ctesias are attacked as in the Veras Historiae, as well as Hesiod and Homer. Poets, however, may be pardoned, but not whole states that adopt their fictions; and Lucian thinks it very hard to be accused of impiety for disbelieving such extra vagancies. Some commentators have thought that the Christian miracles are alluded to in § 13 and § 16; but this does not seem probable. The main subject of the piece is the relation of several absurd stories of ghosts, &c., by a company of white-bearded philosophers. The Ἀπαστραλὸς, Fugitive, is directed against the cynics, by whom Lucian seems to have been attacked for his life of Peregrinus. In a conversation between Apollo and Zeus, the latter asserts that he was so annoyed by the stench that ascended from the pyre, that, though he fled into Arabia, all the frankincense there could hardly drive it out. He is about to relate the whole history to Apollo, when Philosophy rushes in, in tears and trouble, and complains of the philosophers, especially the cynics. She gives a history of her progress in India, Egypt, Chaldaea, &c., before she reached the Greeks, and concludes with a complaint against the cynics. Apollo advises Jupiter to send Mercury and Hercules to inquire into the lives of the cynics, and to punish the evil doers; the greater part being mere vagabonds and runaway slaves. Συμπόσιον ἢ Λαπίθαι, Convivium seu Lapithae, is one of Lucian's most humorous attacks on the philosophers. The scene is a wedding feast, at which a representative of each of the principal philosophic sects is present. Of all the guests these are the only absurd and troublesome ones, the unlettered portion behaving themselves with decency and propriety. The cynic Alcidas, who comes uninvited, is particularly offensive in his behaviour. In the midst of the banquet an absurd letter arrives from Hecimocles, a stoic, expostulating with Aristænetus, the host, for not having been invited. The discussion that ensues sets all the philosophers by the ears, and ends in a pitched battle. In the midst of the confusion, Alcidas, upon the chandelier; and when lights are again brought, strange scenes are discovered. The cynic is making free with one of the music-women; the stoic, Dionysidorus, is endeavouring to conceal a cup under his cloak. The similarity of this piece, and the 55th epistle of the third book of Alciphron, is too marked to be the result of accident. The relative chronology of Alciphron and Lucian cannot be accurately settled [ALCIPHRON]; but the dialogue is so much more highly wrought than the epistle, as to render Bergler's notion probable, that Lucian was the copyist. Under this head we may also notice the Nigrinus and the Parasite (Περὶ παρασίτου ἡτοῖς ἐπὶ τέχνῃ παρασιστρῶν). The Nigrinus has been reckoned one of Lucian's first efforts in this style, and this seems borne out by a passage in § 35. Wieland calls it a declaration of war against the philosophers, and thinks that it still bears traces of Lucian's rhetorical style. But though the piece may be considered as an attack on philosophic pride, its main scope is to satirise the Romans, whose pomp, vain-glory, and luxury, are unfavourably contrasted with the simple habits of the Athenians. The Parasitus is a mere piece of persiflage throughout. The dialogue is conducted like those of Socrates with the sophists, though the parasite, who may stand for the sophist, gets the better of the argument. The philosophical definition of parasitism in § 9 is highly humorous, as well as the demonstration of its superiority to philosophy, on account of its unity and definiteness, in which it equals arithmetic; for two and two are four with the Persians as well as the Greeks, but no two philosophers agree in their principles. So also it is shown to be superior to philosophy, because no parasite ever turned philosopher, but many philosophers have been parasites. The demonstration of the non-existence of philosophy, §§ 28, 29, seems directed against Plato's Parmenides.

The third and more miscellaneous class of Lucian's dialogues, in which the attacks upon mythology and philosophy are not direct but incidental, or which are mere pictures of manners, contains some of his best. At the head must be placed Τίμων ἢ μεσοδωρεὺς, Timon, which may perhaps be regarded as Lucian's masterpiece. The story is that of the well-known Athenian misanthrope mentioned by Plato, whose tower, Pausanias tells us (i. 30. § 4), still existed in his time. The introduction affords an opportunity for some sneers at Zeus. The dialogue between Pluto and Hermes, in which the former describes his way of proceeding with mankind, is very humorous and well-sustained, though the imitation of Aristophanes is obvious. The story of Timon, which is very dramatically told, is too well known to need description here. The Νεκρικοὶ Διάλογοι, Dialogi Mortuorum, are perhaps the best known of all Lucian's works. The subject affords great scope for moral reflection, and for satire on the vanity of human pursuits. Wealth, power, beauty, strength, not forgetting the vain disputations of philosophy, afford the materials; and some cynic philosopher, Diogenes or Menippus, is generally the common test. When Croesus and Menippus meet on the banks of the Styx, it is easy to see which will have the advantage. The disappointments of those who lie in wait for the inheritance of the rich, afford a fertile theme, which, however, Lucian has worn rather thread-bare. In a few of the dialogues it must be owned that some of the great men of antiquity are dipantly and unjustly attacked, and especially Socrates. Among the moderns these dialogues have been imitated by Fontenelle and Lord Lyttelton. The Μένιππος ἡ Νεκρομαντεία, Necromanteia, bears some analogy to the Dialogues of the dead. Menippus relates his descent into Hades, and the sights that he sees there, particularly the punishment of the great and powerful. The genuineness of this piece has been doubted. Du Soul thought that it was written by Menippus himself, who, as we learn from Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 101), wrote a Necromanteia, but Hemsterhuis discounts this conjecture. It certainly wants Lucian's jeeriness; but arguments from style are not always safe. In the Ἰσκαριώτις ἡ Τρεπρόφελος, Ischariotes, on the contrary, which is in Lucian's best vein, and a master-piece of Aristophanic humour, Menippus, disgusted with the disputes and pretensions of the philosophers, resolves on a visit to the stars, for the purpose of seeing how far their theories are correct. By the mechanical aid of a pair of wings he reaches the moon, and surveys thence the miserable passions and quarrels of men. Hence he proceeds to Olympus, and is introduced to the Thunderer himself. Here he is witness of the manner in which human prayers are received in heaven. They ascend by enormous ventholes, and become audible when Zeus removes the covers. Strange is the variety of their tenor! Some pray to be kings, others that their onions may grow; one sailor begs a north wind, another a south; the husbandman wants rain; the fuller, sunshine. Zeus himself is represented as a partial judge, and as influenced by the largeness of the rewards promised to him. At the end he pronounces judgment against the philosophers, and threatens in four days to destroy them all. Then he cuts Menippus's wings, and hands him over to Hermes, who carries him to earth by the ear. With a malicious pleasure Menippus hastens to the Poecile to announce to the assembled philosophers their approaching destruction. Χάρων ἡ Ἐπισκοπῶντις, Charon, is a very elegant dialogue, but of a graver turn than the preceding. Charon visits the earth to see the course of life there, and what it is that always makes men weep when they enter his boat. He requests Hermes to be his Cicerone. To get a good view they pile Pelion upon Ossa; but this not being high enough, Oeta must follow, and then Parnassus: a passage evidently meant to ridicule Homer. Parnassus being at top Charon and Hermes seat themselves on each of the peaks. Then pass in review Milo the wrestler, Cyrus, Croesus, and other celebrated characters. In this piece, as Hemsterhuis observes, our author has not been very scrupulous about chronology. In the interview between Croesus and Solon, Lucian follows Herodotus, but inverts the order of the happy. Of all Lucian's dialogues this is perhaps the most poetical: as in the description of the passions flying about; the comparison of cities to bee-hives attacked by wasps; the likening of human lives to bubbles; the death of cities as well as individuals. The whole is a picture of the smallness of mankind when viewed from a philosophic, as well as a physical height. Lucian seems to have put his own sentiment into the mouth of Charon (§ 16), παγγελοῦντα ταῦτα, ὃ Ἑρμῇ. The Κατάπλους ἡ Τύραννος, Catapulus sive Tyrannus, is in fact a dialogue of the dead. The persons are Charon, Clotho, Hermes, a cynic philosopher, the tyrant Megapenthes, the cobbler Miccyllus, and certain rich men. The reluctance of Megapenthes to obey the summons of Clotho, and his ludicrous attempts at evasion, are happily contrasted with the alacrity of Miccyllus. The latter being left behind on the banks of the Styx, swims after Charon's boat, which being full, he finds a place on the shoulders of the tyrant, and does not cease tormenting him the whole way. There is considerable drollery in his pretended lament for his old laats and slippers, when requested by Mercury to grieve a little, just for the sake of keeping up the custom. Megapenthes' description of the indignities which his household offer to his body while lying in state, and which, though conscious of them, he is powerless to resist, is very striking. Ὀνειρος ἡ Ἀλεκτρυών, Somnium seu Gallus. Here we have the cobbler Miccyllus again, who has been dreaming that he has fallen heir to Eucrates, a nouveaux riche. From this state of felicity he is awakened by the crowing of his cock, which he threatens to kill as soon as he gets up. The cock discovers himself to be Pythagoras in one of his transmigratory states, which gives occasion to some jokes at the expense of that philosophy. The cock then endeavours to persuade Miccyllus that he is much happier than the rich men whom he envies, and in order to convince him, desires him to pluck one of the long feathers from his tail, which has the power of conferring invisibility. Miccyllus, who has evidently a lurking spite against the bird, plucks out both his long feathers, much to the discomfiture of Pythagoras, whom, however, the cobbler consoles by telling that he looks much handsomer so than he would with only one. Being now invisible, Pythagoras and Miccyllus go round to the houses of several rich men, and behold their miseries and vices. This piece may be reckoned among the best of Lucian's. Δις κατηγορούμενος, Bis Accusatus, so called from Lucian's being arraigned by Rhetoric and Dialogue, is chiefly valuable for the information it contains of the author's life and literary pursuits. Zeus finds fault with Homer for calling the gods happy, when they have got so much to do, and when there are still so many undecided causes on hand. To clear these off a court is appointed, at which Justice is to preside. The first cause is Drunkenness versus the Academy, for depriving him of Polemo. The plaintiff being naturally disqualified for pleading, the Academy undertakes both sides of the question. Next we have the Porch versus Pleasure, which is defended by Epicurus. After two or three more causes Lucian is accused by Rhetoric of desertion, and by Dialogue of having lowered and perverted his style. We may here also mention the Κρονιάδων, Cron. Solon, and the Ἐπιστολαὶ Κρονικά, Epistolae Saturnales, which turn on the institution and customs of the Saturnalia.

Amongst the dialogues which may be regarded as mere pictures of manners, without any polemical tendency, may be reckoned the Ἐρπῆτες, to which allusion has already been made in a former part of this notice. The Ἑταίρικοι Διάλογοι, Dialogi

Meretriciæ, describe the manners of the Greek Hetaerae or courtesans, with liveliness and fidelity; perhaps too much so for the interests of morality. Πλοῖον ἢ Εἶχαλ, Navigium seu Vota. In this piece the company form various wishes, which are in turn derided by Lucian. The imitation of Plato in the opening is very strong.

Dialogues which cannot with propriety be placed under any of the preceding heads, are the Eixdres, Imagines, which has been already adverted to in the sketch of Lucian's life. Ἐν τῶν Εἰδόντων, Pro Imaginibus, a defence of the preceding, with the flattery of which the lady who was the subject of it pretended to be displeased. Τόξαις, Toxaris, a dialogue between a Greek and Scythian, on the subject of friendship, in which several remarkable instances are related on both sides. It is in the grave style. The Ἀνάχαρις, Anacharis, is an attack upon the Greek gymnasia, in a dialogue between Solon and Anacharis. It also turns on the education of youth. Here too the irony is of a serious cast. Περὶ ὀρχήσεως, De Saltatione, a disputation between Lucian and Crates, a stoic philosopher, respecting dancing. It has been observed before that Lucian was an ardent admirer of dancing, especially the pantomimic sort, to which he here gives the advantage over tragedy. The piece is hardly worthy of Lucian, but contains some curious particulars of the art of dancing among the ancients. Διδαχὴς πρὸς Ἡσιόδον, Disertatio cum Hesiodo. A charge against that poet that he cannot predict futurity, as he gave out. The genuineness is doubtful.

6. MISCELLANEOUS PIECES. We are now to enumerate those few works of Lucian which do not fall under any of the preceding divisions, and which not being in the form of dialogues, bear some analogy to the modern essay. Πρὸς τὸν εἰπόντα Προμηθεὺς εἰ ἐν λόγῳ, Ad eum qui dixerat Promethæus es in Verbis. A reply to somebody who had compared him to Prometheus. Allusion has already been made to this piece, which, as the title implies, turns chiefly on his own works. Περὶ θυσίῳ, De Sacrificiis. The absurdities of the heathen worship, especially of the Egyptian, are pointed out in a serious style. This was probably an early production. Περὶ τῶν ἐν μισθῷ συνόντων, De Mercede Conductis, was written to dissuade a Greek philosopher from accepting a place in a Roman household, by giving a humorous description of the miseries attending it. This little piece abounds with wit and good sense, and may be placed among Lucian's most amusing productions. It is likewise valuable for the picture it contains of Roman manners, which Lucian has here painted in highly unfavourable colours, but perhaps with some exaggeration and caricature. The Ἀπολογία περὶ τῶν ἐν μ. συν., Apologia pro de Merc. Cond., is Lucian's defence against a charge of inconsistency, in having accepted his Egyptian office, after having written the foregoing piece. The chief ground of defence is the difference between a public and private office, and indeed the charge was absurd. As already mentioned, this piece contains some particulars of Lucian's life. Ἐν τῷ ἐν τῇ προσ-αγορεύσει πταλάματος, Pro Lappi in Salutando, a playful little piece, though containing some curious learning, in which Lucian excuses himself for having saluted a great man with ὁλαύε in the morning, instead of χαῖρε. In the Περὶ παρθένου, De Lucina, the received opinion concerning the infernal regions is reviewed, and the folly of grief demonstrated in a rather serious manner. Πρὸς ἀκαθύντον, Adversus Indoctum, is a bitter attack upon a rich man who thought to acquire a character for learning by collecting a large library. Περὶ τοῦ μὴ βέλους πιστεύειν διαβολῇ, Non temere credendum esse Delationi. The title of this piece sufficiently explains its subject. It is in the grave style; but is well written, and has something of the air of a rhetorical declamation.

7. POEMS. These consist of two mock tragedies, called Τραγοποδοῦντα and Ἰακόντες, and about fifty epigrams. The Tragopodagra, as its name implies, turns on the subject of the gout; its malignity and pertinacity are set forth, and the physicians who pretend to cure it exposed. This little drama displays considerable vigour of fancy. It has been thought that Lucian wrote it to beguile a fit of the malady which forms its subject. The Ἰακόντες, which turns on the same theme, is much inferior, and perhaps a frigid imitation by some other hand. Of the epigrams some are tolerable, but the greater part indifferent, and calculated to add but little to Lucian's fame. Of some the genuineness may be suspected.

In the preceding account of Lucian's works those have been omitted, of whose spuriousness scarce a doubt can be entertained. These are:—Ἀλκυόν ἢ περὶ Μεταμορφώσεων, Halcyon seu de Transformatione. This dialogue is completely opposed to Lucian's manner, as the fabulous tale of the Halcyon, which he would have ridiculed, is treated seriously. It has been attributed to Leo the Academician. For the rest, the style is agreeable enough. Περὶ τῆς Ἀστρολογίας, De Astrologia, containing a serious defence of astrology, can never have been Lucian's. The Ionic dialect, too, condemns it; the affected use of which Lucian ridicules in his Quom. Hist. § 18. The same objections apply to the Περὶ τῆς Συρίας Θεᾶς, De Dea Syria, also in the Ionic dialect. Though the scholiast on the Notes of Aristophanes ascribes it to Lucian we may safely reject it. Such a narrative of superstitious rites could never have come from his pen, without at least a sneer, or a word of censure. Nor would he have sacrificed his beard at the temple of Hierapolis, as in the last sentence the author represents himself as having done. The Κυνικός, Cynicus, is adjudicated by the scholiast, and with reason; for the cynic worsts Lucian in the argument about his tenets. The Χαρίδμου ἢ περὶ καλλοῦς, Charidemus seu de Pulchro, is a frigid imitation of Plato, bearing no mark of Lucian's hand, and has been rejected by the best critics. Νέρον ἢ περὶ τῆς ὀρυκτῆς τοῦ Ἰσθμοῦ, Nero, seu de Fossione Isthmi. Wieland seems to have stood alone in asserting this dialogue to be Lucian's. From the concluding part the author appears to have been alive at the time of Nero's death. It contains some curious particulars of that emperor's singing. The spuriousness of the Philopatra has been already shown.

It is probable that several of Lucian's works are lost. In the Life of Democritus, § 1, he mentions having written a life of Sostratus, which is not now extant. Of his rhetorical pieces perhaps the greater part is lost, as Suidas says of them γάρησαν αὐτῷ ἄνευρα.

Lucian's merits as a writer consist in his knowledge of human nature, which, however, he generally viewed on its worst side; his strong common-same; the fertility of his invention; the raciness of his humour; and the simplicity and Attic grace of his diction. His knowledge was probably not very profound, and it may be suspected that he was not always master of the philosophy that he attacked. He nowhere grapples with the tenets of a sect, but confines himself to ridiculing the manners of the philosophers, or at most some of the salient and obvious points of their doctrines. Du Soul, in a note on the Hippias, § 3, has collected two or three passages to show Lucian's ignorance of the elements of mathematics; and from this charge he has hardly, perhaps, been rescued by the defence of Belin de Ballu. He had, however, the talent of displaying what he did know to the best advantage; and as he had travelled much and held extensive intercourse with mankind, he had opportunities to acquire that sort of knowledge which books alone can never give. Gesner justly calls him ἀνιδεός, and affirms that there is scarcely a sect or race of men whose history or chief characteristics he has not noted: presenting us with the portraits of philosophers of almost every sect; rhetors, flatterers, parasites; rich and poor, old and young; the superstitious and the atheistic; Romans, Athenians, Scythians; impostors, actors, courtesans, soldiers, clowns, kings, tyrants, gods and goddesses. (Dissert. de Philop. xvi.) His writings have a more modern air than those of any other classic author; and the keenness of his wit, the richness, yet extravagance of his humour, the fertility and liveliness of his fancy, his proneness to scepticism, and the clearness and simplicity of his style, present us with a kind of compound between Swift and Voltaire. There was abundance to justify his attacks in the systems against which they were directed. Yet he establishes nothing in their stead. His aim is only to pull down; to spread a universal scepticism. Nor were his assaults confined to religion and philosophy, but extended to every thing old and venerated, the poems of Homer and Hesiod, and the history of Herodotus. Yet writing as he did amidst the doomed idols of an absurd superstition, and the contradictory tenets of an almost equally absurd philosophy, his works had undoubtedly a beneficial influence on the cause of truth. That they were indirectly serviceable to Christianity, can hardly be disputed; but, though Lucian is generally just in his representations of the Christians, we may be sure that such a result was as far from his wishes as from his thoughts.

Photius (Cod. 128) gives a very high character of Lucian's style, of the purity of which he piqued himself, as may be seen in the Bis Acc. § 34, and other places, though occasional exceptions might perhaps be pointed out. Erasmus, who was a great admirer of Lucian, and translated many of his works into Latin, gives the following character of his writings in one of his epistles, and which, making a little allowance for the studied antithesis of the style, is not far from the truth. "Tantum obtinet in dicendo gratiae, tantum in inveniendo felicitatis, tantum in jocando leporis, in mordendo aceti; sic titillat allusionibus, sic seria nugis, nugis seriis miscet; sic ridens vera dicit, vera dicendo ridet; sic hominum mores, affectus, studia, quasi pucillo depingit, neque legenda, sed plane spectanda, oculis exponit, ut nulla comœdia, nulla satyra, cum hujus dialogis conferri debeat, seu voluptatem spectes, seu speciem utilitatem."

of Lucian's works:—Florence, 1486, fol. (printer unknown) Editio Princeps. First Aldine edition, Venice, 1503, fol. This edition, printed from bad MSS. and very incorrect, was somewhat improved in the second Aldine, 1522, fol., but is still inferior to the Florentine. In this edition the Peregrinus and Philopatrius are generally wanting, which had been put into the Index Expurgatorius, by the court of Rome. The Aldine, however, served as the basis of subsequent editions, till 1615, when Bourdelot published at Paris a Greek and Latin edition in folio, the text corrected from MSS. and the Editio Princeps. This was repeated with emendations in the Saumur edition, 1619. Le Clerc's edition, 2 vols. 8vo., Amsterdam, 1687, is very incorrect. In 1730 Tib. Hemsterhuis began to print his excellent edition, but dying in 1736, before a quarter of it had been finished, the editorship was assigned to J. F. Reitz, and the book was published at Amsterdam, in 3 vols. 4to., in 1743. In 1746 K. K. Reitz, brother of the editor, printed at Utrecht an Index, or Lexicon Lucianæum, in 1 vol. 4to., which, though extensive, is not complete. The edition of Hemsterhuis, besides his own notes, also contains those of Jensius, Kuster, L. Bos, Vitringa, Du Soul, Gesner, Reitz, and other commentators. An appendix to the notes of Hemsterhuis, taken from a MS. in the Leyden library, was published at that place by J. Geel, 1824, 4to. Hemsterhuis corrected the Latin version for his edition as far as De Sacrificiis; and of the remainder a new translation was made by Gesner. The reprint by Schmidt, Mittau 1776—80, 8 vols. 8vo., is incorrect. The Bipont edition, in 10 vols. 8vo., 1789—93, is an accurate and elegant reprint of Hemsterhuis's edition, with the addition of collations of Parisian MSS.; but the omission of the Greek index is a drawback to it. A good edition of the text and scholia only is that of Schmieder, Halle, 1800—1801, 2 vols. 8vo. Lehman's edition, Leipzig, 1821—31, 9 vols. 8vo., is well spoken of. There is a very convenient edition of the text by W. Dindorf, with a Latin version, but without notes, published at Paris, 1840, 8vo.

Amongst editions of separate pieces may be named Collogia Selecta, by Hemsterhuis, Amst. 1708, 12mo., and 1732. Dialogi Selecti, by Edward Leedes, London, 8vo., 1710 and 1726. Mythologie Dramatique de Lucien, avec le texte Grecque par J. B. Gail, Paris, 1798, 4to. Dialogues des Morts, par le même, Paris, 1806, 8vo. La Lucade, avec le texte Grecque par Courier, Paris, 1818, 12mo. Toxaris, Halle, 1825, and Alexander, Köln, 1829 8vo., with notes and prolegomena by K. G. Jacob. Alexander, Demonax, Gallus, Icaromenippus, &c., by Fritzsche, Leipzig, 1826. Dialogi Deorum, Ibid. 1829.

Lucian has been translated into most of the European languages. In German there is an excellent version by Wieland (Leipzig, 1788—9, 6 vols. 8vo.), accompanied with valuable comments and illustrations. The French translation of D'Ablancourt (Paris, 1654, 2 vols. 4to.) is elegant but unfaithful. There is another version by B. de Ballu, Paris, 1788, 6 vols. 8vo. In Italian there is a translation by Manzoni, 1819—20. Among the English versions may be named one by several hands, including W. Moyle, Sir H. Sherer, and Charles Blount, London, 1711. For this edition, which had been undertaken several years before it was published, Dryden wrote a life of Lucian, a hasty performance, containing some gross errors. The best English version is that of Dr. Franklin, 2 vols. 4to. London, 1780, and 4 vols. 8vo. London, 1781; but some of the pieces are omitted. Mr. Tooke's version (2 vols. 4to. London, 1820) is of little value. [T. D.]

LUCIENUS, a Roman senator, a friend of M. Varro, and one of the speakers in his dialogue De Re Rustica (ii. 5). He is supposed to be the same person with Lucienus or Luscienus mentioned by Cicero (ad Att. vii. 5). [W. B. D.]

LUCIFER. [PHOSPHORUS.]

LUCIFER, bishop of Cagliari, hence surnamed Calaritanus, first appears in ecclesiastical history as joint legate with Eusebius of Vercelli [EUSEBIUS VERCELLENSIS] from pope Liberius to the council of Milan (A. D. 354), where, along with his colleague, he displayed such determined firmness in withstanding the demands of the Arian emperor, that he was first cast into prison, and then transported from place to place as an exile, every where enduring hardships and cruelty. While residing at Eleutheropolis in Syria he composed in vigorous but coarse and unpolished style his chief work, entitled Ad Constantium Augustum pro Sancto Athanasio Libri II., which, although containing forcible arguments in favour of the truth, is characterised by such outrageous intemperance of expression, that many passages bear more resemblance to the ravings of a furious madman than to the calm reasoning which would become a Christian minister. Constantius, either in anger or contempt, inquired of Lucifer, through Florentius, the magister officiorum, whether he was really the author of this invective, but no immediate punishment appears to have followed the bold acknowledgment, and any scheme of vengeance which might have been meditated was frustrated by the death of the tyrant. The violent and ungovernable temper of the Sardinian prelate, who was now restored to freedom, along with other victims of religious persecution, soon began to introduce confusion and discord among his own friends. He increased the disorders which agitated the church at Antioch by interfering in their disputes, and ordaining Paulinus bishop, in opposition to Meletius; and when his proceedings were censured by Eusebius, who had been deputed to Antioch by the Alexandrian synod to quell these tumults, he did not hesitate to anathematise his old tried friend, so long the companion of his dangers and misfortunes. Finding that his extreme opinions received no sanction from the ecclesiastical authorities either in the East or West, and that he was disclaimed even by Athanasius, who at one time had spoken of his writings in terms of the warmest admiration, he retired to his native island, and there founded the small sect of the Luciferiani. The distinguishing tenet of these schismatics was, that no Arian bishop, and no bishop who had in any measure yielded to the Arians, even although he repented and confessed his errors, could enter the bosom of the church without forfeiting his ecclesiastical rank, and that all bishops and others who admitted the claims of such persons to a full restoration of their privileges became themselves tainted and outcasts—a doctrine which, had it been acknowledged at this period in its full extent, would have had the effect of excommunicating nearly the whole Christian world. Lucifer died during the reign of Valentinian, probably about A. D. 370.

The works of this fierce polemic, which, although all alike deformed by the same unseemly harshness and passion, are extremely valuable, on account of the numerous quotations from Scripture every where introduced, may be arranged in the following order:

I. Epistola ad Eusebium, written in the month of March or April, 355. II. De non conveniendo cum Haereticis, written between 356 and 358, at Germanica, while suffering under the persecution of Eudoxius, the Arian bishop of that place. III. De Regibus Apostolicis, written at Eleutheropolis in 358. IV. Ad Constantium Augustum pro Sancto Athanasio, Libri II., written at the same place, about 360. V. De non parcendo in Deum delinquentibus, written about the same time with the preceding. VI. Moriendum pro Filio Dei, written about the beginning of 361, on being interrogated respecting the authorship of the tract Ad Constantium. VII. Epistola ad Florentium Magistram Officiorum, written at the same time with the preceding. An Epistola ad Catholicos, written while imprisoned at Milan, is lost.

The Editio Princeps of the works of Lucifer appeared at Paris, 8vo. 1568, superintended by Joannes Tillius, bishop of Meaux (Meldensis), and dedicated to pope Pius the Fifth. Although in many respects very imperfect, it was repeated without alteration in the Magna Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Colon. 1618, vol. iv. p. 121, and also in the Paris collection. But even these are superior to the text exhibited in the Biblioth. Patrum Mss. fol. Lugdun. 1687, vol. iv. p. 181, since here we find not only many changes introduced without MS. authority, but all the scriptural quotations accommodated to the vulgate version. Much better than any of the preceding is the edition contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. vi. p. 115 (fol. Venet. 1770), but by far the best is that published by the brothers Coleti (fol. Venet. 1778), whose labours presented this father for the first time in a satisfactory form. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 95, Advers. Luciferian. Dial.; Rufin. H. E. i. 30; Sulp. Sever. H. E. ii. 48; Socrat. H. E. iii. 5; Sozomen. H. E. v. 12; Theodoret. H. E. iii. 4; Schönemann, Biblioth. Patr. Lat. i. § 8, where very full information concerning the different editions will be found.) [W. R.]

LUCILIA GENS, plebeian, produced only one person of any celebrity, the poet Lucilius; but none of its members obtained any of the higher offices of the state. Under the republic we find the cognomens BALBUS and BARBUS, and under the empire CAPITO and LONGUS. On coins we find the cognomen Rufus, which does not, however, occur in any ancient writer (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 239). A few persons of the name of Lucilias are mentioned without any cognomen.

LUCILIUS. 1. SEXT. LUCILIUS, tribune of the plebs, A. C. 86, a partisan of Sulla, was in the following year thrown down the Tarpeian rock by his successor P. Laenas, who belonged to the Marian party. (Vell. Pat. ii. 24.)

2. SEXT. LUCILIUS, the son of T. Gavius Caepio, was tribune of the soldiers in the army of M. Bibulus, and was slain at Mount Amanus, A. C. 59 (Cic. ad Att. v. 20. § 4.)

3. L. LUCILIUS, was with App. Claudius Pulcher [CLAUDIUS, No. 38] in Cilicia, A. C. 38 (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 5. § 1). He is probably the same as the Lucilius who is mentioned by Cicero as con-manding the fleet of Dolabella in Cilicia, a. c. 43 (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 13. § 3). Instead of Lucilius, Manutius wishes, on the authority of some MSS., to read Lucius, understanding thereby L. Figulus, whom Appian (B. C. iv. 60) mentions as the legate of Dolabella.

4. C. LUCILIUS, was, on account of his intimacy with Cicero, a friend of Milo. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 37, ed. Orelli.)

5. LUCILIUS, fought on the side of Brutus at the battle of Philippi, a. c. 42, and when the republican army was in flight and the enemy had nearly overtaken Brutus, he represented himself to be the latter in order to save his friend. He was brought before M. Antony, who was so struck with his magnanimity, that he not only forgave him, but treated him ever afterwards as one of his most intimate friends. (Appian, B. C. iv. 129; Plut. Brut. 50, Anton. 69.)

LUCILIUS, C. Our information with regard to this poet, although limited in extent, is sufficiently precise. In the version of the Eusebian Chronicle, by Jerome, it is recorded that he was born a. c. 118, that he died at Naples a. c. 103, in the 46th year of his age, and that he received the honour of a public funeral. From the words of Juvenal, compared with those of Ausonius, we learn that Secusa of the Aurunci was the place of his nativity; from Velleius, that he served in the cavalry under Scipio in the Numantine war; from Horace and the old scholiast on Horace, that he lived upon terms of the most close and playful familiarity with Africanus and Lælius; from Aëro and Porphyrio, that he was either the maternal grand-uncle, or, which is less probable, the maternal grandfather of Pompey the Great. Ancient critics agree that, if not absolutely the inventor of Roman satire, he was the first to mould it into that form which afterwards assumed consistency, and received full development in the hands of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. The first of these three great masters, while he censures the harsh versification and turbid redundancy which resulted from the slovenly haste with which Lucilius threw off his compositions, and from his impatience of the toil necessary for their correction, acknowledges, with the same admiration as the two others, the uncompromising boldness of purpose, the fiery vehemence of attack, and the trenchant sharpness of stroke which characterised his encounters with the vices and follies of his contemporaries, who were fearlessly assailed without respect to the rank, power, or numbers of those selected as the most fitting objects of hostility. One of the speakers in the De Oratore praises warmly his learning and wit (homo doctus et perurbanus), although in another piece Cicero, when discoursing in his own person, in some degree qualifies this eulogium; and paying a high tribute to his urbanitas, pronounces his doctrina to be mediocriter only. Quintilian, however, considered his erudition wonderful, and refused to admit the justice of the other strictures which had been passed upon his style, declaring that many persons, although he is himself as far from agreeing with them as with Horace, considered him superior, not only to all writers of his own class, but to all poets whatsoever. (Hieron. in Chron. Euseb. Olymp. clviii. 1, clxix. 2; Juv. i. 20; Auson. Epist. xv. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 9; Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 73, &c.; Plin. H. N. præf.; Quintil. x. 1; Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 62, &c.; Pers. i. 115; Juv. i. 165;

Hor. Sat. i. 4. 6, i. 10. 1, &c., 46, &c.; Cui. de Orat. ii. 6, de Fin. i. 3.)

It must not be concealed that the accuracy of many of the above statements with regard to matters of fact, although resting upon the best evidence that antiquity can supply, have been called in question. Bayle adduces three arguments to prove that the dates given by Jerome must be erroneous.

1. If Lucilius was born in a. c. 148, since Numantia was taken in a. c. 133, he could have scarcely been fifteen years old when he joined the army; but the military age among the Romans was seventeen or, at the earliest, sixteen.

2. A. Gellius (ii. 24) gives a quotation from Lucilius, in which mention is made of the Licinian sumptuary law; but this law was passed about a. c. 98, therefore Lucilius must have been alive at least five years after the period assigned for his death.

3. Horace (Sat. ii. 1. 28), when describing the devotion of Lucilius to his books, to which he committed every secret thought, and which thus present a complete and vivid picture of his life and character, uses the expression

— quo fit ut omnis
Votiva pateat veluti descripta tabella
Vita senis —

but the epithet senis could not with any propriety be applied to one who died at the age of forty-six.

To these arguments we may briefly reply—

1. It can be proved by numerous examples that not only was it common for youths under the regular military age to serve as volunteers, but that such service was frequently compulsory. This appears clearly from the law passed by C. Gracchus a. c. 124, to prevent any one from being forced to enter the army who had not attained to the age of seventeen. (See Steuch. ad Veyet. i. 7; Liv. xxv. 5; Sigon. de Jure Civ. Rom. i. 15; Manut. de Leg. 12.)

2. It is here taken for granted that the Lex Licinia sumptuaria was passed in the year a. c. 98, or rather, perhaps, a. c. 97, in the consulship of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Licinius Crassus. But the learned have been long at variance with regard to the date of this enactment; Pighius, in his Annals, and Freinsheim, in his Supplement to Livy (lxiv. 52), refer it to a. c. 112; Wüllner, in his treatise "De Laevio Poeta," to the praetorship of Licinius Crassus, a. c. 104, relying chiefly on the words of Macrobius (Sat. ii. 13); Bach, in his history of Roman jurisprudence, to a. c. 97; Gronovius, on A. Gellius, to a. c. 88; Meyer, in his Collection of the Fragments of Roman Orators, to the second consulship of Pompey and Crassus, a. c. 55. It is evident that no conclusion can be drawn from a matter on which such a remarkable diversity of opinion prevails.

3. It is not necessary to interpret senis as an epithet descriptive of the advanced age of the individual. It may, without any violence, relate to the remote period when he lived, being in this sense equivalent to priscus or antiquus. Thus when we are told that we do not understand that there is any allusion here to the years of the two dramatists, but to their antiquity alone, just as we ourselves speak familiarly of old Chaucer and old Marlowe.

— anfert
Pacuvius docti famam senis, Accius alti,

The writings of Lucilius being filled with strange and obsolete words, proved peculiarly attractive to the grammarians, many of whom devoted themselves almost exclusively to their illustration. At a very early period the different pieces seem to have been divided into thirty books, which bore the general name of Satiræ, each book, in all probability, containing several distinct essays. Upwards of eight hundred fragments from these have been preserved, but the greater number consist of isolated couplets, or single lines, or even parts of lines, the longest of the relics, which is a defence of virtue, and is quoted by Lactantius (Instit. Div. vi. 5), extending to thirteen verses only. From such disjointed scraps, it is almost impossible to form any judgment with regard to the skill displayed in handling the various topics which in turn afforded him a theme; but it is perfectly clear that his reputation for caustic pleasantry was by no means unmerited, and that in coarseness and broad personalities he in no respect fell short of the licence of the old comedy, which would seem to have been, to a certain extent, his model. It is manifest also, that although a considerable portion of these remarkable productions were satirical in the commonly received acceptation of the term, that is, were levelled against the vices and follies of his age, they embraced a much wider field than that over which Horace permitted himself to range, for not only did they comprise dissertations on religion, morals, and criticism, an account of a journey from Rome to Capua, and from thence to the Sicilian Strait, which evidently served as a model for the celebrated journey to Brundisium; but a large part of one book, the ninth, was occupied with disquisitions on orthography, and other grammatical technicalities. The theme of his sixteenth book was his mistress Collyra, to whom it was inscribed. Of the thirty books, the first twenty and the thirtieth appear to have been composed entirely in heroic hexameters; the remaining nine in iambic and trochaic measures. There are, it is true, several apparent exceptions, but these may be ascribed to some error in the number of the book as quoted by the grammarian, or as copied by the transcriber.

The fragments of Lucilius were first collected by Robert and Henry Stephens, and printed in the Fragmenta Poetarum Veterum Latinorum, 8vo. Paris, 1564. They were published separately, with considerable additions, by Franciscus Dousa, Lug. Bat. 4to. 1597, whose edition was reprinted by the brothers Volpi, 8vo. Patav. 1735; and, along with Censorinus, by the two sons of Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1743. They will be found attached to the Bipont Persius, 8vo. 1785; to the Persius of Achaintre, 8vo. Paris, 1811, and are included in the Corpus Poetarum Latinorum of M. Maittaire, fol. Lond. 1713, vol. ii. p. 1496. (A number of the controverted points with regard to the life and writings of Lucilius have been investigated with great industry by Varges in his Specimen Quaestionum Lucilianarum, published in the Rheinisches Museum for 1835, p. 13. Consult also Bayle's Dictionary, art. Lucile; Fr. Wüllner, de Laevio Poeta, 8vo. Monast. 1830; and Van Hensde, Studia Critica in C. Lucilium, 8vo. Traj. ad Rhen. 1842.) [W. R.]

us, exhibiting throughout great command of language, and containing not a few brilliant passages. The object proposed is not so much to present a highly coloured picture of the terrors of an eruption as to explain upon philosophical principles, after the fashion of Lucretius, the causes of the various physical phenomena presented by the volcano, and to demonstrate the folly of the popular belief which regarded the earthquakes and the flames as produced by the struggles and the fiery breathing of imprisoned giants, or by the anvils and furnaces of the swart Cyclopes. With regard to the author all is doubt. The piece was at one time generally supposed to belong to Virgil, in consequence, it would seem, of an expression in the biography of that poet, which bears the name of Donatus (scripsit etiam, de qua ambigitur, Aetnam); some of the earlier scholars believed it to be the work of Petronius, probably from having found it attached to the MSS. of the Satyricon; by Julius Scaliger it was ascribed to Quintilius Varus; by Joseph Scaliger (and his opinion has found many supporters), to Cornelius Severus [SEVERUS], who is known to have written upon this topic, while others have imagined that they could detect the hand of Manilius or of Claudian. Wernsdorff, followed by Jacob, the most recent editor, fixes upon Lucilius Junior, procurator of Sicily, the friend to whom Seneca addresses his Epistles, his Natural Questions, and his tract on Providence, and whom he strongly urges to select this very subject of Etna as a theme for his muse. Although it is perfectly vain, in the absence of all direct evidence, to pronounce dogmatically upon the question of authorship, we may, from a careful examination of the style, language, and allusions, decide with certainty that it is not a production of the Augustan age, and therefore cannot be assigned to Severus; but whether it belongs to the Neronian epoch, or to a much later date, as Barthius maintains, it is impossible to determine.

LUCILLA, ANNIA, daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born about A.D. 147. Upon the death of Antoninus Pius, in A.D. 161, she was betrothed to the emperor, L. Verus, who was at that time setting out upon an expedition against the Parthians, and joined her husband at Ephesus three years later. After his death, which happened in A.D. 169, hastened, according to Capitolinus (M. Aurel. c. 26), by poison from her hands, she was given in marriage to Claudius Pompeianus, a native of Antioch, who, although of equestrian rank only, was much esteemed on account of his great abilities and high character. Lucilla accompanied M. Aurelius to the East at the period of the rebellion of Avidius Cassius; and after her father's death, was treated with much distinction by her brother, Commodus; but being jealous of the superior honours paid to his empress, Crispina, and eager to get rid of a husband, whom she despised, as far inferior to herself, she engaged in a plot against the life of the prince, which, having been detected, she was banished to the island of Capreae, and there put to death, about the year A.D. 183. The story of her having been accessory to the death of Verus rests upon no good evidence, but in general profligacy she seems to have been a worthy descendant of the Faustinae, and a worthy sister to Commodus.

Historians do not expressly mention that she had children by her first husband; yet the legend, FEVNDITAS, which appears upon some of her medals, although the date of these may be uncertain, would lead to the conclusion that their union was not unfruitful; and since the Claudius Pompeianus who undertook to assassinate Commodus is called her son-in-law, it is manifest that the daughter whom he married must have been born of Verus, for the death of Lucilla happened thirteen years only after her second marriage. By Pompeianus she had a son named Pompeianus, who rose to great distinction under Caracalla. [POMPEIANUS.] (Dion. Cass. lxxi. 1, lxxii. 4; Capitolin. M. Aurel. 7, Ver. 2; Lamprid. Commod. 4, 5.)

COIN OF ANNIA LUCILLA.

LUCILLA, DOMITIA, otherwise DOMITIA CILVILLA, the wife of Annius Verus, and mother of M. Aurelius. (Capitolin. M. Aurel. i. 6; Spartian. Did. Jul. 1.) [W. R.]

LUCILLA, DOMITIA, was, according to some numismatologists, the name of the daughter of Nigrius, the wife of Aelius Caesar. There seem, however, to be no good grounds for this assertion; and the coins adduced as belonging to her ought to be assigned to ANNIA LUCILLA. (Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 527.) [W. R.]

LUCILLIUS (Λουκιλλίος). A poet of the Greek Anthology, who edited two books of epigrams. In the Anthology one hundred and twenty-four epigrams are ascribed to him (Brunck, Analect. vol. ii. p. 317; Jacobs, Anth. Græcæ vol. iii. p. 29); but of these, the Vatican MS. assigns the 118th to Lucian, and the 96th and 124th to Palladas. This authority, therefore, removes the foundation for the inferences respecting the poet's date, which Lessing and Fabricius drew from the mention of the physician Magnus in the 124th epigram. But, on the other hand, the Vatican MS. assigns to Lucilius the 16th epigram of Ammianus, the 36th and 41st of Philip, the 108th anonymous, and the 23rd of Leonidas of Alexandria. From the last epigram (which is also far more in the style of Lucilius than of Leonidas), it appears that the poet lived under Nero, and that he received money from that emperor. Nearly all his epigrams are sportive, and many of them are aimed at the grammarians, who at that time abounded at Rome. His name is often written Λουκιλλος in the MSS., but it appears from his 35th epigram that Λουκιλλίος is right. (Jacobs, Anth. Græcæ vol. xiii. pp. 912, 913.) [P. S.]

LUCILLUS (Λουκιλλος) of Tarrha, in Crete, wrote a work on the city of Thessalonica (Steph. Byz. s. v. Θεσσαλονίκη), a commentary on the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, and a collection of Proverbs, which, with those of Didymus of Alexandria, appear to have been the source of most of the later collections of the kind. Thus Zenobius expressly states that he collected his proverbs from Lucillus and Didymus. The proverbs of Lucillus are also quoted by Tzetzæe (Chil. viii. 149), by Apostolius, and by Stephanus (s. v. Τάρρα, reading Λουκιλλος for Λουκιος, comp. s. v. Κόλαρα; Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ vol. iv. p. 265, v. p. 107; Vossius, de Hist. Græcæ p. 463, ed. Westermann; Leutsch and Schneidewin, Paroem. Græcæ vol. i. Præf. p. xii.). [P. S.]

LUCILLUS, a painter, who is highly extolled by the architect Symmachus, whose house he decorated (Epist. ii. 2, ix. 47). He lived, therefore, under Theodoric, towards the end of the fifth century. [P. S.]

LUCINA, the goddess of light, or rather the goddess that brings to light, and hence the goddess that presides over the birth of children; it was therefore used as a surname of Juno and Diana, and the two are sometimes called Lucinae. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 69; Catull. xxxiv. 13; Horat. Carm. Saec. 14, &c.; Ov. Fast. ii. 441, &c., vi. 39; Tibull. iii. 4. 13.) When women of rank gave birth to a son, a lectisternium was prepared for Juno Lucina in the atrium of the house. (Serv. and Philarg. ad Virg. Eclog. iv. 63.) [L. S.]

LUCIUS (Λουκιος). 1. Of ADRIANOPLIS or HADRIANOPLIS, was bishop of that city in the fourth century, succeeding, though Tillemont doubts if immediately, St. Eutropius. He was expelled from his see by the Arian party, then predominant in the East, under the emperor Constantius II., the son of Constantine the Great; and went to Rome to lay his cause before the pope, Julius I., apparently in the year 340 or 341. Several other bishops were at Rome on a similar errand, about the same time; and the pope, having satisfied himself of their innocence and of their orthodoxy, sent them back to their respective churches, with letters requiring their restoration, and other letters rebuking their persecutors. The Oriental bishops appear to have rejected the pope's authority, and sent him back a remonstrance against his rebukes. Lucius, however, recovered his see by the authority of the emperor Constantius, who was constrained to restore him by the threats of his brother Constans, then emperor of the West. This restoration is placed by Tillemont before the council of Sardica, A. D. 347. When the death of Constans (A. D. 350) was known in the East, the Arian party, whom Lucius had provoked by the boldness and severity of his attacks, deposed him, bound him neck and hands with irons (as they had done at least once before), and in that condition banished him. He died in exile. The Romish church commemorates him as a martyr on the eleventh of February. (Athanas. Apolog. de Fuga sua, c. 3, and Hist. Arianor. ad Monach. c. 19; Socrat. H. E. ii. 15, 23, 26; Sozomen. H. E. iii. 8, 24, iv. 2; Theodoret, H. E. ii. 15; Tillemont, Mémoires, vols. vi. and vii.; Bolland, Acta Sanctorum Februarii, vol. ii. p. 519, Epistolas Julii Papæ ad Orient. Episc. apud Concilia, vol. ii. col. 475, &c. ed. Labbe.)

2. Of ALEXANDRIA. When, on the death of the emperor Constantius, and the murder of the Arian patriarch George of Cappadocia (GEORGIUS, No. 7), Athanasius recovered the patriarchate of Alexandria, the Arians were expelled from the churches, and held their meetings in obscure places. While in this condition, they elected Lucius to be their patriarch (Socrat. H. E. iii. 4), who on the death of the emperor Julian and the accession of Jovian, presented a petition to the latter, begging him to annul the re-establishment of Athanasius; but their petition was contemptuously rejected (Petitio ad Jovian. Imperat. Antiochie facta à Lucio aliisque, printed with the works of St. Athanasius, vol. i. p. 782, &c. ed. Benedict). When the Arian Valens became emperor of the East, the hopes of Lucius and his party revived; but the emperor would not allow him to return to Alexandria during Athanasius' lifetime, though he obtained the bishopric of Samosata, where, however, he was insulted even by the children of the orthodox party, in consequence of which he incited the officers of the government to inflict some severities on the orthodox. On the death of Athanasius (A. D. 373) and the ordination of Petrus or Peter, whom he had nominated as his successor, Valens sent Lucius to Alexandria, in company with Euzoius, Arian patriarch of Antioch, with orders to the authorities of Alexandria, in consequence of which Peter was deposed and imprisoned, and Lucius forcibly established in his room. A severe persecution of the orthodox then commenced, especially of the priesthood and the nuns, whom Lucius charged with exciting popular disturbances. Peter, who had escaped, fled to Rome, where he was supported by the pope Damasus I., who after some time sent him back to Alexandria, with letters confirming his ordination, in consequence of which he obtained possession of the patriarchate, and Lucius in turn was obliged to flee to Constantinople. This was probably in A. D. 377 or 378, not long before the death of Valens. Whether Lucius was ever restored is doubtful; if he was, he was soon again expelled by the emperor Theodosius. According to some authorities he still remained director of the Arian churches in his patriarchal city. He withdrew from Constantinople at the time of the expulsion of Demophilus, Arian patriarch of that city (A. D. 380), and nothing more is known of him. He wrote, according to Jerome, Solennes de Paschate Epistolae, and a few little books (libelli) on various subjects. The acts of the Lateran Council, A. D. 649, contain an extract from his Εἰς τὸ πᾶν ἄδως, Sermo in Pascha. Whether this Sermo was one of what Jerome has described as Solennes Epistolae, is not certain. (Socrat. H. E. iii. 4, iv. 21, 22, 24, 37; Sosomen, H. E. vi. 19, 20, 39; Theodoret, H. E. iv. 15, 20—23; Hieronym. De Vir. Illust. c. 118; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vi. vii. viii. passim; Cave, *Hist. 3. OF BRITAIN. Bede in his Historia Ecclesiastica, i. 4, states that in A. D. 156, in the reign of the Roman emperors Aurelius and Verus, and in the pontificate of Pope Eleutherius, Lucius, a British king, sent a letter to the Pope, praying for his assistance that he might be made a Christian; and having obtained his request, was with his people instructed in the Christian faith, which they preserved perfect and uncorrupted, and in peace, till the reign of Diocletian. A statement similar to this is given by Bede in his Chronicon a. de Sex Aetatebus, and by Ado of Vienne, in his Chronicon. The early Welsh notices and the Silurian Catalogues of Saints state (according to Mr. Rice Rees), that Lleuwrwg-ab-Coel-ab-Cyllin, called also Lleufer Mawr, "the Great Luminary," and Lleu, applied to Rome for spiritual instruction; and that in consequence four teachers, Dyfan, Fagan, Medwy, and Elfan were sent to him by Pope Eleutherius. Lucius is said to have founded the see of Llandaff. To these scanty, but in themselves, sufficiently credible notices, the credulity of the later ages has added many particulars. Lucius is made by Giraldus Cambrensis (apud Usher), king of the Britons; and the missionaries from Rome effect the conversion of the whole population of the island. Five metropolitan sees are established; one for each of the five provinces into which the Romans had divided the island, with twelve suffragan bishops to each. Geoffrey of Monmouth makes Lucius the son of Coillus, the son of Marinus, the son of Arringus; and, though differing in details from Giraldus, agrees with him in making the conversion of the inhabitants and the institution of the hierarchy complete. Some other traditions or legends of the middle ages make Lucius resign his crown, travel as a missionary, with his sister St. Emerita, through Rhaetia and Vindelicia, and suffer martyrdom near Curia, the modern Coire or Chur. Thus distorted by the credulity of a later age, the history of Lucius and his very existence have been by some critics altogether doubted. But we see no reason to doubt that there was a British regulus or chieftain of the same or somewhat similar name, about the time of Eleutherius; and that his influence, which he had retained under the Roman dominion, conduced to the establishment and diffusion of Christianity in Britain: and the Welsh traditions, which place him in the territory of the Silures, the present Glamorganshire, are more probable than the suppositions of Spelman, who makes him an Icenian, and of Stillingfleet, who makes him king of the Regni, in Surrey and Sussex. He probably lived in the latter half of the second century; but there are difficulties about the year of his application to Rome, as to which Bede is in error. A letter is extant, and is given by Usher, professing to be from Pope Eleutherius "to Lucius king of Britain," but it is doubtless spurious. Usher mentions that two coins, supposed to be of Lucius, had been found, one of gold, the other of silver; having the image of a king with a cross, and the letters, as far as could be made out, LVC. (Bede, ll. cc.; Ado, l. c. in the Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xvi. ed. Lyon, 1677; Galfred, Monemat. lib. ii. init.; Usher, Britannic. Eccles. Antiquitates, c. 3—6; Stillingfleet, Antiq. of the Brit. Churches, c. 2, with the preface of the Rev. T. P. Pastin, the latest editor; Rice Rees, An Essay on the Welsh Saints, pp. 82, seq.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ii. pp. 62, 63, 615, 616; Baron. Annal. ad Ann. 183.)

4. CHARINUS, an heretical writer of uncertain date. His name is written by Augustin (De Actis cum Felice Manichaeo, ii. 6), and the author of the book De Fide, contra Manichaeos, formerly attributed to Augustin, LLEUVOS or LLEUVOS, and is one MS. LOCUTIVUS, and in some printed editions LEONTIVUS. Photius writes the name LLEUVOS, CHARINUS (Asklus Xapinos). In the Decretum of pope Gelasius, De Libris Apocryphis, it is written LLENTICIVUS. This Leucius wrote a work, entitled according to Photius, αἱ τῶν Ἀποστόλων ἐπιστολῆς, Periodi Apostolorum, now lost, containing the Acts of the Apostles, Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul. Photius criticises the style as in many places too familiar, and condemns the sentiments as heretical, self-contradictory, and absurd. The writer distinguished between the God of the Jews (whom he designated as malignant, and whose minister Simon Magus was) and Christ (whom he called "the Good One"). He denied the reality of Christ's human nature, and affirmed that he was not crucified, but that another suffered in his place. He condemned marriage as altogether unlawful. Both Augustin and the author of the book De Fide (ll. cc.) cite a passage from this work, which they call Actus Apostolorum; and it is evident from what they say that it was much esteemed among the Manichæans, though rejected by the great body of Christians. But it is not so clear whether the author lived before or after the time of Manes, who flourished in the latter half of the third century. Whether he wrote any other works is not clear. Pope Innocent I., or the writer, whether Innocentius or not, of the Epistola III. ad Eusebium, ascribes to "one Leucius" some apocryphal writings extant in his time (Innocent died A. D. 417), under the names of Matthew, of James the Less, and of Peter and John: and in the prefatory letters to the apocryphal Evangelium de Nativitate Mariæ (Fabric. Codes Apocryph. N. T. vol. i. p. 19), which pretend to be addressed to or written by Jerome, by whom the Evangelium itself (which was ascribed to the evangelist Matthew) was professedly translated from the Hebrew into Latin, it is stated that a work on the same subject, or rather the same work much interpolated, had been published by Seleucus, a Manichæan. We are not aware that the date of these pseudo-Hieronimian letters is known, but they indicate that such a work by Seleucus was then in existence; and this Seleucus is by many critics identified with our Leucius. Huet supposes that the apocryphal writings ascribed to Leucius by pope Innocent included the Protevangelium Jacobi given by Fabricius (l. c. p. 66); but if there be any foundation for this opinion, Leucius must have lived a century before Manes, as indeed Grabe supposes that he did. Fabricius, however, decidedly rejects the opinion of Huet. Grabe (Not. ad Irenæum, lib. i. c. 17) cites from a MS. at Oxford, containing Leucii Evangelium, a passage which resembles part of the Evangelium Infantiae (c. 49), but does not exactly agree with it. A portion of the Montanists, who existed as late as the end of the fourth century, boasted, though falsely, of a Leucius, as having been an influential person among them (Pacian. Epistol. I. c. 6; apud Aguirre, Concil. Hispan. vol. i. p. 317, fol. Rom. 1753). This Leucius was perhaps the same as the Leucius Charinus of Photius; though Fabricius rather identifies him with another Leucius, mentioned by Epiphanius (Hæres. li. 6, p. 427, ed. Petav.) as a disciple of the Apostle John. (Augustin. Phot. ll. cc.; Fabric. Cod. Apocryph. N. T. pars ii. p. 768, pars iii. p. 624, alibi, 8vo. Hamb. 1719; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ii. p. 445, 446; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad Ann. 180, et ad fin. Sæc. vi.)

5. OF ETRURIA. Plutarch, in his Symposiac. a. Quæst. Convivial. (viii. 7, 8) introduces as one of the speakers Lucius, an Etruscan, and a disciple of Moderatus the Pythagorean, who flourished in the reign of the emperor Nero. Lucius asserted that Pythagoras himself was an Etruscan.

6. HÆRETICUS. [See Nos. 2, 4.]

7. MANICHÆUS. [See No. 4.]

8. PAPA, succeeded Cornelius as bishop of Rome according to Baronius in A. D. 255, but according to Pagi and Pearson in A. D. 252. According to Baronius he was born at Rome, and his father was named Porphyrius. Of his history previous to his pontificate little more is known than that he was one of the presbyters who accompanied his predecessor into exile when he was banished by the emperor Gallus to Centum Cellæ, now Civita Vecchia. [CORNELIUS.] Lucius himself was banished a short time after his election, but soon obtained leave to return. His return was about the end of the year 252, or early in the year 253 (256 according to Baronius), and he could not have long survived it, as his whole pontificate was only of six or eight months, perhaps even shorter than that. He died, not as Baronius states, in A. D. 257, but in A. D. 253, being, according to some accounts, martyred by decapitation. The manner of his death is, however, very doubtful. (Euseb. H. E. vii. 2; Cyprian. Epistol. 61, 68, ed. Fell. 58, 67, ed. Pamelli; Pearson, Annal. Cyprian. ad ann. 252, 253; Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 255, 256, 257, 258; Pagi, Critice in Baronium; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. iv. p. 118, &c.)

9. OF PATRÆ, a Greek writer of uncertain date. He wrote Μεταμορφώσεων Λόγοι διδασκοί, Μεταμορφώσεων Λιβρι Διεσσι, which are now lost, but were extant in the time of Photius, who has described them (Bibl. cod. 129). His style was perspicuous and pure, but his works were crowded with marvels; and, according to Photius, he related with perfect gravity and good faith the transformations of men into brutes and brutes into men, and "the other nonsense and idle tales of the ancient mythology." Some parts of his works bore so close a resemblance to the Lucius A. Arius of Lucian, that Photius thought he had either borrowed from that writer, or, as was more likely, Lucian had borrowed from him. The latter alternative appears to be the true one; for if Photius is correct as to Lucius believing the stories he related, we can hardly suppose he would have derived any part of his narratives from such an evident scoff as Lucian; and Lucian possibly designed, by giving the name Lucius to his hero, and making him an inhabitant of Patræ, to ridicule the credulity of his predecessor.

11. OF ROME. [See No. 8.] [J. C. M.]

LUCIUS, artists. 1. A lamp-maker, whose name is inscribed on a lamp in Bartoli's collection. (Lucerne, vol. iii. pl. 9; Welcker, in the Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 84; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 342, 2nd edition.)

2. An artist in pottery, the maker of a vessel in the Leyden Museum. (Janssen, Mus. Lugd. Inscript. p. 141.)

3. A gem-engraver, the maker of a beautiful head of Victory. (Bracci, vol. ii. p. 132.) [P. S.]

LUCIUS, a physician of Tarsus in Cilicia (Galen. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. ix. 5. vol. xiii. p. 295), who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Archigeneæ. (ap. Galen. ibid. iii. l. vol. xii. p. 623.) He was perhaps tutor to Crison (Galen, ibid. v. 3. vol. xii. p. 828) and Asclepiades Pharmacion (ibid. vol. xiii. pp. 648, 746, 846, 850, 852, 857, 969), unless (as is not unlikely) the term δ καθηγητής be used merely as a sort of honorary title. Fabricius says (Bibl. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 310, ed. vet.) that he was tutor to Galen, but it is probable that in the passage referred to (vol. xiii. pp. 524, 539) Galen is quoting the words of Asclepiades Pharmacion. His medical formulæ are also several times quoted by Aëtius (iii. 4. 42, p. 604, iv. 2. 3, p. 685, iv. 3. 3, 9, 14, pp. 740, 745, 762, 763), but none of his writings are extant. If he be the same person quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. ii. 1, 7, pp. 365, 386, iv. 3, p. 522), he wrote a work on chronic diseases (Tardæ Passiones) consisting of at least four books. [W. A. G.]

LUCRETIA. 1. The wife of Numa Pompilius, the second king of Rome, whom, according to some accounts, he married after his accession to the throne. (Plut. Nem. 21.)

LUCRETIA GENS, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. It was one of the most ancient gentes, and the name occurs as early as the reign of Numa Pompilius [LUCRETIA, No. 1]. The surname of the patrician Lucretii was TRICPTINUS, one of whom, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, was elected consul, with L. Junius Brutus, on the establishment of the republic, B. C. 509. The plebeian families are known by the surnames of GALLUS*, OFELLA, and VESPILLO. CARUS also occurs as the cognomen of the poet Lucretius. [See below.] On coins we have likewise the cognomen TRIO, which is not found in any ancient writer. A few Lucretii are mentioned without any surname.

LUCRETIVS. 1. L. LUCRETIVS, quaestor B. C. 218, was taken prisoner by the Ligurians, along with some other Roman officers, and delivered up to Hannibal. (Liv. xxi. 59.)

2. M. LUCRETIVS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 210, appears to have taken a leading part in the dispute about the appointment of a dictator in that year. (Liv. xxvii. 5.)

3. SP. LUCRETIVS, plebeian aedile, B. C. 206, and praetor B. C. 203, received in the latter year, as his province, Ariminum, which was the name then given to the province of Gallia Cisalpina. His imperium was continued to him for the two following years, B. C. 204—203; in the latter of which he had to rebuild Genua, which had been destroyed by Mago. In B. C. 200 he was sent as ambassador to Africa with C. Terentius Varro. (Liv. xxviii. 38, xxix. 13, xxx. 1, 11.)

4. C. LUCRETIVS GALLUS, was created duumvir navalis with C. Matienus, B. C. 181, in order to equip a fleet against the Ligurians (Liv. xl. 26). Livy (l.c.) calls him simply C. Lucretius, but there can be little doubt about his being the same as C. Lucretius Gallus. Lucretius Gallus was praetor B. C. 171, and received the command of the fleet in the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. He was a worthy match for the consul P. Licinius Crassus, and distinguished himself by his cruelties and exactions in Greece. With the money which he had amassed in the war, he constructed an aqueduct at Antium, and adorned the shrine of Aesculapius with votive pictures. On his return to Rome in B. C. 170, the Athenians and Chalcidians brought bitter complaints against him, in consequence of which he was accused by two tribunes of the plebs before the people, and condemned to pay a heavy fine. (Liv. xlii. 28, 31, 33, 48, 56, 63, xliii. 4, 6, 7, 8; Polyb. xxvii. 6.)

5. M. LUCRETIVS, brother of No. 4, tribune of the plebs A. C. 172, brought forward a bill "ut agrum Campanum censores fructum locarent." In the next year he served as legate to his brother in Greece. (Liv. xlii. 19, 48, 56.)

6. SP. LUCRETIVS, praetor A. C. 172, obtained the province of Further Spain. In A. C. 169 he served with distinction under the consul Q. Marcus Philippus, in the war against Perseus. He was one of the three ambassadors sent into Syria in A. C. 162. (Liv. xlii. 9, 10, xlii. 7; Polyb. xxi. 12, 13.)

7. M. LUCRETIVS, a senator, one of the judges retained by Verres, and hence suspected of having been bribed. (Cic. Verr. i. 7.)

8. Q. LUCRETIVS, accused Livius Drusus of praevaticatio, A. C. 54. He is mentioned by Cicero as an intimate friend of C. Cassius Longinus, and a supporter of the aristocratical party. On the breaking out of the civil war he was stationed at Salmo with five cohorts, but his colleague C. Aufus, according to Cicero, or his town troops according to Caesar, opened the gates of the town to M. Antony, and Lucretius was obliged to save himself by flight. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. § 5, vii. 24, 25; Caes. B. C. i. 18.)

T. LUCRETIVS CARUS. The information to be derived from ancient writers regarding the personal history of Lucretius is very scanty in amount and somewhat suspicious in character. That he was a Roman, or at least an Italian by birth, may be inferred from his own words, for he twice speaks of the Latin language as his native tongue (i. 831, iii. 261, comp. i. 42). The Eusebian Chronicle fixes A. C. 95 as the date of his birth, adding that he was driven mad by a love potion, that during his lucid intervals he composed several works which were revised by Cicero, and that he perished by his own hand in the forty-fourth year of his age, that is, A. C. 52 or 51. Donatus, on the contrary, affirms that his death happened in A. C. 55, on the very day on which Virgil assumed the toga virilis, an event which, in the Eusebian Chronicle, is placed two years later. From what sources the tale about the philtre may have been derived we know not. Pomponius Sabinus, in a note on the third Georgic (l. 202), states that the drug employed was hippomanes, while later writers, twisting a passage in the works of St. Jerome (ad Rufin. c. 22) to their own views, have declared that the potion was administered by his own wife Lucilia, in order that she might inspire him with more deep and fervent affection. It has been ingeniously conjectured that the whole story was an invention of some enemy of the Epicureans, who conceived that such an end would be peculiarly appropriate for one who so boldly professed and so zealously advocated the principles of that philosophy. Not a hint is to be found anywhere which corroborates the assertion with regard to the editorial labours of Cicero.

* When we consider that what has been set down above comprises everything that can be gleaned from authentic sources, we may feel somewhat surprised, on turning to the biographies of Lucretius prefixed to various editions and translations of his work, to find that they contain a detailed account of his family and connections, from the days of the chaste wife of Collatinus, a narrative of his journey to Athens for the prosecution of his philosophical studies, an account of the society in which he there lived, of the friendships which he there formed, of the preceptors from whose lips he derived his enthusiasm for those tenets which he subsequently expounded with such fervid faith, of his return to his native country, and of his life and habits while enjoying the charms of literary ease and peaceful seclusion. But the whole of these particulars are a mere tissue of speculations,—a web of conjectures originally woven by the imagination of Lambinus and afterwards variously embroidered by the idle and perverse ingenuity of a long line of commentators.

The period about which his piece was published can be reduced within narrow limits. The allusion to the unhappy dissensions by which his native country was distracted, have been supposed to bear special reference to the conspiracy of Catiline, but the expression "patriâ tempore iniquo" is so general that it is applicable to any portion of the epoch when he flourished. From the manner, however, in which Cicero, in a letter to his brother Quintus, written A. C. 55, gives his opinion on the merits of the poem, we may fairly conclude that it had been recently published; and, taking into account the slowness with which copies were multiplied, the conjecture of Forbiger becomes highly probable, that it may have been given to the world in the early part of the year A. C. 57, when the machinations of Clodius were producing a degree of disorder and anarchy almost without example even in those stormy times.

The work which has immortalised the name of Lucretius, and which, happily, has been preserved entire, is a philosophical didactic poem, composed in heroic hexameters, divided into six books, extending to upwards of seven thousand four hundred lines, addressed to C. Memmius Gemellus, who was prætor in A. C. 58 [MEMMIUS], and is entitled De Rerum Natura. It has been sometimes represented as a complete exposition of the religious, moral, and physical doctrines of Epicurus, but this is far from being a correct description. The plan is not by any means so vast or so discursive, and although embracing numerous topics requiring great minuteness of detail, and admitting of great variety of illustration, is extremely distinct, and possesses almost epical unity. Epicurus maintained that the unhappiness and degradation of mankind arose in a great degree from the slavish dread which they entertained of the power of the Gods, from terror of their wrath, which was supposed to be displayed by the misfortunes inflicted in this life, and by the everlasting tortures which were the lot of the guilty in a future state, or where these feelings were not strongly developed, from a vague dread of gloom and misery after death. To remove these apprehensions, which he declared were founded upon error, and thus to establish tranquillity in the heart, was the great object of his teaching; and the fundamental doctrine upon which his system reposed was, that the Gods, whose existence he did not deny, lived for evermore in the enjoyment of absolute peace, strangers to all the passions, desires, and fears, which agitate the human heart, totally indifferent to the world and its inhabitants, unmoved alike by their virtues and their crimes. As a step towards proving this position he called to his aid the atomic theory of Leucippus, by which he sought to demonstrate that the material universe is not the result of creative energy on the part of the Supreme Being, but that all the objects in which it abounds, mineral, vegetable, and animal, were formed by the union of elemental particles which had existed from all eternity, governed by certain simple laws; and that all those striking phenomena which, from their strangeness or mighty effects, had long been regarded by the vulgar as direct manifestations of divine power, were merely the natural results of ordinary processes. To state clearly and develop fully the leading principle of this philosophy, in such a form as might render the study attractive to his countrymen, few of whom were disposed to take any interest in abstract speculations, was the task undertaken by the author of the De Rerum Natura, his work being simply an attempt to show that there is nothing in the history or actual condition of the world which does not admit of explanation without having recourse to the active interposition of divine beings. The poem opens with a magnificent apostrophe to Venus, whom he addresses as an allegorical representation of the reproductive power, after which the business of the piece commences by an enunciation of the great proposition on the nature and being of the gods (57—62), which leads to a grand invective against the gigantic monster superstition, and a thrilling picture of the horrors which attends his tyrannous sway. Then follows a lengthened elucidation of the axiom that nothing can be produced from nothing, and that nothing can be reduced to nothing (Nîl fieri ex nihilo, in nihilum nil posse reverti); which is succeeded by a definition of the Ultimate Atom, infinite in number, which, together with Void Space (vacans), infinite in extent, constitute the universe. The shape of these corpuscles, their properties, their movements, the laws under which they enter into combination and assume forms and qualities appreciable by the senses, with other preliminary matters on their nature and affections, together with a refutation of objections and opposing hypotheses, occupy the first two books. In the third book, the general truths thus established are applied to demonstrate that the vital and intellectual principles, the Anima and Animus, are as much a part of the man as his limbs and members, but like those limbs and members have no distinct and independent existence, and that hence soul and body live and perish together; the argument being wound up by a magnificent exposure of the folly manifested in a dread of death, which will for ever extinguish all feeling. The fourth book—perhaps the most ingenious of the whole—is devoted to the theory of the senses, sight, hearing, taste, smell, of sleep and of dreams, ending with a disquisition upon love. The fifth book, generally regarded as the most finished and impressive, treats of the origin of the world and of all things that are therein, of the movements of the heavenly bodies, of the vicissitudes of the seasons, of day and night, of the rise and progress of man, of society, and of political institutions, and of the invention of the various arts and sciences which embellish and ennoble life. The sixth book comprehends an explanation of some of the most striking natural appearances, especially thunder, lightning, hail, rain, snow, ice, cold, heat, wind, earthquakes, volcanoes, springs and localities noxious to animal life, which leads to a discourse upon diseases. This in its turn introduces an appalling description of the great pestilence which devastated Athens during the Peloponnesian war, and thus the book closes. The termination being somewhat abrupt, induces the belief that Lucretius may have intended to continue his task, which might have been greatly extended, but there is no reason to suppose that anything has been lost.

With regard to the general merits of the production, considered merely as a work of art, without reference to the falseness and absurdity of the views which it advocates, but little difference of opinion has prevailed among modern critics. All have admired the marvellous ability and skill with which the most abstruse speculations and the most refractory technicalities have been luminously bodied forth in sonorous verse, and expressed in diction which, although full of animation and dignity, is never extravagant nor pompous. All have acknowledged the matchless power and beauty of those sublime outbursts of noble poetry which diffuse light, vivacity, and grace, upon themes, which in a less gifted writer must have proved obscure, dull, and repulsive. But even this is not sufficient praise. Had it not been for Lucretius we could never have formed an adequate idea of the power of the Latin language. We might have dwelt with pleasure upon the softness, flexibility, richness, and musical tone of that vehicle of thought, which could represent with full effect the melancholy tenderness of Tibullus, the exquisite ingenuity of Ovid, the inimitable felicity and taste of Horace, the gentleness, high spirit, and splendour of Virgil, and the vehement declamation of Juvenal; but had the verses of Lucretius perished we should never have known that it could give utterance to the grandest conceptions with all that sustained majesty and harmonious swell in which the Grecian Muse rolls forth her loftiest outpourings. Yet, strange to say, the Romans themselves seem never to have done full justice to the surpassing genius of their countryman. The criticism of Cicero is correct but cold, the tribute paid by Ovid to his memory is vague and affected, the observations of Quintilian prove how little he had entered into his spirit or appreciated his high enthusiasm, while the few remaining writers by whom he is named either insult him with faint approbation, or indulge in direct censure. Statius alone, perhaps, proves himself not insensible of the power which he describes as the "docti furor arduus Lucreti." (Corn. Nep. Att. xii. 4; Vitruv. ix. 3; Prop. ii. 25, 29; Vell. Pat. ii. 36; Senec. de Tranquill. Anim. 2, Ep. xcv. cx; Plin. Ep. iv. 18; Tac. Dial. de Orat. 23.)

The editio Princeps of Lucretius was printed at Brescia, in fol., by Thomas Ferandus, about 1473, and is of such excessive rarity that three copies only are known to exist. It has been fully described by Dibdin in the Bibl. Spencer. vol. ii. p. 149—153. The second edition, much less rare, and taken from an inferior MS., appeared at Verona, fol. 1486, from the press of Paul Friedenberger. The text was corrected from MSS. by Jo. Baptista Pius, fol. Bonon. 1511, by Petrus Candidus, Florent. Phil. Giunta. 8vo. 1512, and by Lambinus, whose two editions 4to. 1563, 1570, especially the second, are most valuable, and are accompanied by an excellent commentary. Considerable praise is due to Giffanius, 8vo. Antw. 1566, to Pareus, 2 vol. 8vo. Francf. 1631, to Creech, 8vo. Oxon. 1695, and especially to the comprehensive labours of Havercamp, whose bulky volumes (2 vols. 4to. Lug. Bat. 1725, forming a portion of the series of Dutch Variorum Classics, in 4to.) contain everything that is valuable in preceding editions. The text of Lambinus, however, underwent few changes until it assumed its present form in the hands of the celebrated Gilbert Wakefield, whose recension, founded upon the best English MSS., was published in three volumes, 4to. Lond. 1796, and reprinted at Glasgow, 4 vols. 8vo. 1813. We must not omit to mention with respect the edition of Albert Forbiger, 12mo. Lips. 1828, who has shown great taste and judgment in selecting the best readings, and has added short but useful notes. For practical purposes the edition of Lambinus, 1570, that of Havercamp, 1725, that of Creech, as reprinted, Oxon. 1818, exhibiting Wakefield's text, and that of Forbiger, will be found the most servicable, but any one who can procure the second and fourth of these may dispense with the rest.

We have complete metrical translations into English by Creech, 8vo. Oxford, 1682, very frequently reprinted; by John Mason Goode (black verse), accompanied by a most elaborate series of annotations, 2 vols. 4to. Lond. 1805; and by Thomas Buxby, 2 vols. 4to. Lond. 1813. We have translations also of the first book alone by John Evelyn, 8vo. Lond. 1656; by an anonymous writer, 8vo. Lond. 1799; and by W. H. Drummond, 8vo. Lond. 1809; but, excepting some detached passages rendered by Dryden, with all the wonted fire and inaccuracy, we possess nothing in our language which can be regarded as even a tolerable representation of the original. The best translation into French is that by J. B. S. de Pergerville, Paris, 1823, 1828; the best into Italian, that by Alessandro Marchetti, Lond. 1770, frequently reprinted; the best into German, that by Knebel, Leipzig, 1821, and improved, Leipzig, 1831. [W. R.]

LUCRINA, a surname of Venua, who had a temple at Baiae, near the Lucrine lake. (Stat. Silv. iii. l. 150; Martial, xi. 81.) [L. S.]

LUCTERIVS, the Cadurcan, described by Caesar as a man of the greatest daring, was sent into the country of the Ruteni, by Vercingetorix, on the breaking out of the great Gallic insurrection in a. c. 52. Lucterius met with great success, collected a large force, and was on the point of invading the Roman province in Gaul, in the direction of Narbo, when the arrival of Cæsar obliged him to retire. In the following year Lucterius again formed the design of invading the Roman province along with Drappes, the Senonian, but was defeated by the Roman legate C. Caninius Rebilus, not far from Uxellodunum. (Caes. B. G. vii. 5, 7, 8; viii. 30—35.)

LUCTUS, a personification of grief or mourning, is described as a son of Aether and Terra. (Hyll. Præf.) This being, who wasted (edax) the corpse of man, is placed by the poets together with other horrible creatures, at the entrance of the lower world. (Virg. Aen. vi. 274; Sil. Ital. x. 581.) [L. S.]

LUCULLUS, the surname of a plebeian family of the Licinia gens. It does not appear in history until the close of the second Punic war. The next genealogy exhibits those members of the family whose descent and connection can be traced with reasonable certainty:—

1. L. Licinius Lucullus, curule aedile, a. c. 202.
2. L. Licin. Lucullus, cos. a. c. 131.
3. L. Licin. Lucullus, praetor a. c. 103, married Caecilia, daughter of L. Metellus Calvus.

4. L. Licin. Lucullus, cos. a. c. 79, married, i. Caelia. & Servilia.

5. L. Licin. Lucullus, killed at Philippi, a. c. 42.

6. M. Licin. Lucullus, cos. a. c. 75.

Tertulla, the wife of M. Crassus, the triumvir.

1. L. LICINIUS LUCULLUS, curule aedile with Q. Fulvius in B. C. 202. He and his colleague distinguished themselves by the magnificence with which they exhibited the Ludi Romani; but some of the scribes and other officials under the aediles were convicted of defrauding the public treasury; and Lucullus himself incurred the suspicion of having connived at their practices. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

2. L. LICINIUS LUCULLUS, the grandfather of Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates, and the first of the family who attained to distinction (Plut. Lucull. 1; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 45), was probably a son of the preceding. He was elected consul for the year B. C. 151, together with A. Postumius Albinus, and was appointed to succeed M. Marcellus in the command in Spain. The war which was then going on in that country against the Celtiberians appears to have been unpopular at home, so that some difficulty was found in raising the necessary levies; and the severity with which these were enforced by Lucullus and his colleague, irritated the people and the tribunes to such a degree, that the latter went so far as to arrest both consuls, and to cast them into prison. These dissensions were at length terminated by the intervention of the young Scipio Aemilianus, who volunteered his services, and succeeded in reviving the military ardour of the populace. (Polyb. xxxv. 4; Liv. Epit. xlviii; Appian, Hist. 49; Oros. 21.) But before the arrival of Lucullus in Spain, the war with the Celtiberians had been completely terminated by Marcellus, and all tribes evincingly in arms had submitted. The new consul, however, greedy both of glory and plunder, and finding himself disappointed of his expected foes, turned his arms against the Vaccaean, a tribe who had hitherto had no relations with the Romans, and proceeded to cross the Tagus and invade their territories, without any authority from the state. His first attacks were directed against the city of Cauca, which was readily induced to submit, on terms of capitulation; but these were cruelly violated by Lucullus, who had no other made himself master of the town than he sed all the inhabitants to be put to the sword, the number of near 20,000. From hence he advanced into the heart of the country, crossed the river, and laid siege to Interucia, a strong city which for a long time defied his arms, but was at length induced to submit on favourable terms, the probability of which was guaranteed to them by him. A subsequent attack upon Pallantia was equally unsuccessful; and Lucullus, after suffering severely from hunger, and being hard pressed by his enemy, was compelled to recross the Douro, take up his winter-quarters in the south of Spain. But notwithstanding this ignominious termination of a war as unwarranted by authority as Rome as it was unjust in itself, no notice was taken of the proceedings of Lucullus, who continued in Spain, with the rank of proconsul. (Appian, Hist. 50—55; Liv. Epit. xlviii; Plin. H. N. ix. 30. § 48.) After wintering in Turdetania, in the spring of 150, he invaded the country of the Lusitanians, at the same time with Ser. Galba; and, according to Appian, shared with the latter in the guilt of the atrocious acts of perfidy and cruelty by which he disgraced the Roman name. [GALBA, No. 6.] But, more fortunate than his colleague, he escaped even the hazard of a trial on his return to Rome. (Appian, Hist. 55, 59, 61.) The war against the Vaccaean, though prompted chiefly by the avarice of Lucullus, had brought him but little booty; but he appears to have, by some means or other, amassed great wealth during the period of his government, a part of which he devoted to the construction of a temple of Good Fortune (Felicitas). It is a very characteristic trait, that having borrowed from L. Mummius some of the statues which the latter had brought from Corinth, to adorn this temple for the ceremony of its dedication, he afterwards refused to restore them, under the plea that they were now consecrated to the goddess. (Dion Cass. fragm. 81; Strab. viii. p. 381.)

3. L. LICINIUS L. F. LUCULLUS, son of the preceding, was praetor in B. C. 103, and was appointed by the senate to take the command in Sicily, where the insurrection of the slaves under Athenion and Tryphon had begun to assume a very formidable aspect. He took with him a force of 17,000 men, of which the greater part were regular Roman or Italian troops; but though he at first obtained a complete victory in the field, and compelled Tryphon to shut himself up in the fortress of Tricocala, he failed in reducing that stronghold, and ultimately retreated from before it in an ignominious manner. (Diod. xxxvi. Exc. Phot. p. 535, 536; Flor. iii. 19.) After this, whether from incapacity or corruption, he effected nothing more, and was soon after replaced by C. Servilius. He is said to have destroyed all his military stores and broken up his camp previous to resigning the command into the hands of his successor. (Diod. Exc. Vat. p. 111.) It was perhaps in revenge for this proceeding, that on his return to Rome he found himself assailed by another Servilius with a prosecution for bribery and malversation. But whatever may have been the motives of the latter, the guilt of Lucullus was so manifest that even his brother-in-law, Metellus Numidicus, declined to appear in his defence; and he was unanimously condemned and driven into exile. (Plut. Lucull. 1; Cic. Verr. iv. 66; Diod. Exc. Phot. p. 536; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 62.)

4. L. LICINIUS L. F. L. N. LUCULLUS, celebrated as the conqueror of Mithridates, and by much the most illustrious of his family. He was the son of the preceding and of Caecilia, the daughter of L. Metellus Calvus. (Plut. Lucull. 1.) [CAECILIA, No. 3.] We have no express mention of the period of his birth or of his age, but Plutarch tells us that he was older than Pompey (Lucull. 36, Pomp. 31); he must therefore have been born before B. C. 106, probably at least as early as 109 or 110, since his younger brother Marcus was old enough to be curule aedile in 79. [See No. 6.] His first appearance in public life was as the accuser of the augur Servilius, who had procured the banishment of his father, but had in his turn laid himself open to a criminal charge. This species of retaliation was looked upon with much favour at Rome; and although the trial, after giving rise to scenes of violence and even bloodshed, at length terminated in the acquittal of Servilius, the part which the young Lucullus had taken in the matter appears to have added greatly to his credit and reputation. (Plut. Lucull. 1; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1.)

While yet quite a young man, he served with distinction in the Marius or Social War; and at this time attracted the attention of Sulla, whom he afterwards accompanied as his quaestor into Greece and Asia on the breaking out of the Mithridatic war, B.C. 88. During the prolonged siege of Athens, Sulla found himself labouring under the greatest disadvantage from the want of a fleet, and he in consequence despatched Lucullus in the middle of winter (B.C. 87—86), with a squadron of only six ships, to endeavour to collect assistance from the allies of Rome. With considerable difficulty he raised a fleet, and expelled the forces of the king from Chios and Colophon. These operations extended far on into the summer of 85: meanwhile, Fimbria, who had assumed the command of the army in Asia, which had been sent out by the Marian party at Rome, had expelled Mithridates from Pergamus, and was besieging him in Pitane, where he had taken refuge. Had Lucullus co-operated with him by sea, the king himself must have fallen into their hands, and the war would have been terminated at once: but Lucullus was faithful to the party interests of Sulla rather than to those of Rome: he refused to come with his fleet to the support of Fimbria, and Mithridates made his escape by sea to Mytilene. Shortly afterwards Lucullus defeated the hostile fleet under Neoptolemus off the island of Tenedos; and thus made himself master of the Hellespont, where he rejoined Sulla, and facilitated his passage into Asia the following spring, B.C. 84. (Plut. Lucull. 2—4, Sull. 11; Appian, Mithr. 33, 51, 52, 56, Oros. vi. 2.)

Peace with Mithridates followed shortly after, and Sulla hastened to return to Rome. It was a fortunate circumstance for Lucullus that he did not accompany his leader at this time, being left behind in the charge of various public duties in Asia, by which means he escaped all participation in the scenes of horror that ensued, at the same time that he retained the high place he already enjoyed in the favour of the all-powerful Sulla. Nor do we find that he took any part in the aggressions of Murena, and the renewed war against Mithridates. [MURENA.] During the whole time that he continued in Asia he appears to have been occupied with civil and pacific employments, especially with the coining of money, and the exaction of the heavy sums imposed by Sulla upon the Asiatic cities as a penalty for their late revolt. In the discharge of this last duty he displayed the utmost kindness and liberality, and endeavoured to render the burthen as little onerous as possible; at the same time that the promptitude and vigour with which he punished the revolt of the Mytilenaeans showed that he was fully prepared to put down all open resistance. (Plut. Lucull. 4; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1.)

Lucullus remained in Asia apparently till near the close of the year 80, when he returned to Rome to discharge the office for the following year of curule aedile, to which he had been elected in his absence, together with his younger brother Marcus. According to Plutarch, he had, from affection for his brother, forborne to sue for this office until Marcus was of sufficient age to hold it with him. The games exhibited by the two brothers were distinguished for their magnificence, and were rendered remarkable by the introduction, for the first time, of elephants combating with bulls. (Plut. Lucull. 1; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1; de Off. ii. 16; Plin. H. N. vii. 7.) So great was the favour at this time enjoyed by Lucullus with Sulla, that the dictator, on his death-bed, not only confided to him the charge of revising and correcting his Commentaries—a task for which the literary attainments of Lucullus especially qualified him; but appointed him guardian of his son Faustus, to the exclusion of Pompey, a circumstance which is said to have first given rise to the enmity and jealousy that ever afterwards subsisted between the two. (Plut. Lucull. i. 4.) By a special law of Sulla, he was enabled to hold the praetorship immediately after the office of aedile, probably in the year 77. At the expiration of this magistracy he repaired to Africa, where he distinguished himself by the justice of his administration, and returned from thence to Rome, to sue for the consulship, which he obtained, in conjunction with M. Aurelius Cotta, for the year 74. (Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 74; Plut. Lucull. 5; Fast. Capit. an. 679.)

Of the political conduct of Lucullus during his consulship almost the only circumstance recorded to us is the determined and effectual opposition offered by him to the attempts of L. Quinctius to overthrow the constitutional laws of Sulla. (Plut. Lucull. 5; Sall. Hist. iii. fragm. 22, p. 234, ed. Gerlach.)

But the eyes of all at Rome were now turned towards the East, where it was evident that a renewal of the contest with Mithridates was become inevitable: and the command in this impending war was the darling object of the ambition of Lucullus. At first indeed fortune did not seem to befriend him: in the division of the provinces, Bithynia (which had been lately united to the Roman dominions after the death of Nicomedes III., and which was evidently destined to be the first point assailed by Mithridates), fell to the lot of Cotta, while Lucullus obtained only Cisalpine Gaul for his province. But just at this juncture Octavius, the proconsul of Cilicia, died; and Lucullus, by dint of intrigues, succeeded in obtaining the appointment as his successor, to which the conduct of the war against Mithridates was then added by general consent. Cotta, however, still retained the government of Bithynia, and the command of the naval force. (Plut. Lucull. 5, 6; Memnon. c. 37, ed. Orell.; Cic. pro Murena 13; Eutrop. vi. 6.)

Both consuls now hastened to Asia, where they arrived before the close of the year 74. Lucullus took with him only one legion from Italy; but he found four others in Asia, two of which, however, had formed part of the army of Fimbria; and though brave and hardy veterans, had been accustomed to licence and rapine, and were ever prone to sedition. Hence the first business of the new general was to restore the discipline of his own army, a task which he appears to have for a time easily accomplished; and he now took the field with a force of 80,000 infantry, and 2500 horse. (Plut. Lucull. 7, 8; Appian, Mithr. 72.) But almost before he was ready to commence operations he received the news that Mithridates had invaded Bithynia with an army of 150,000 men, had defeated Cotta both by sea and land, and compelled him to take refuge within the walls of Chalcedon. Lucullus was at this time in Galatia, but he hastened to the support of Cotta. He was met at a place called Otryae, in Phrygia, by a detachment of the army of Mithridates, commanded by the Roman exile Varius, but a meteoric apparition prevented an engagement. Meanwhile, Mithridates drew off his army from Chalcedon, and proceeded to besiege the strong city of Cyzicus. Hither Lucullus followed him; but confident in the strength of the place, and well knowing the difficulty of subsisting so vast a multitude as that which composed the army of the king, he was by no means desirous to bring on a battle, and contented himself with taking up a strongly entrenched camp in the immediate neighbourhood of that of Mithridates, from whence he could watch his proceedings, intercept his communications, and leave hunger to do the work of the sword. The result fully justified his expectations. All the efforts of Mithridates were baffled by the skill and courage of the besieged; and though he was still master of the sea, the winter storms prevented him from receiving supplies by that means, so that famine soon began to make itself felt in his camp, and at length increased to such a degree that no alternative remained but to raise the siege. A detachment of 15,000 men, which the king had previously sent off, was attacked and cut to pieces by Lucullus at the passage of the Rhyndacus; and when at length his main army broke up from the camp before Cyzicus, and commenced its march towards the West, Lucullus pressed closely upon their rear, and attacking them successively at the passage of the Aescopus and the Granicus, put thousands of them to the sword. Those that escaped took refuge in Lampascus, under the command of Varius. (Plut. Lucull. 8—11; Appian, Mithr. 71—76; Memnon. 37—40; Liv. Epit. xcv.; Flor. iii. 6; Eutrop. vi. 6; Orro. vi. 2; Cic. pro. Leg. Manil. 8, pro Muren. 15; Orelli, Inscr. 545.)

The great army of Mithridates, on the equipment and preparation of which he had bestowed all his care, was now annihilated; but he was still master of the sea; and placing the remains of his shattered forces on board the fleet, he gave the command of it to Varius, with orders to maintain possession of the Aegæan, while he himself returned by sea to Bithynia. Lucullus did not deem it prudent to advance further into Asia while his communications were thus threatened, and he despatched his lieutenants, Voconius and Triarius, in pursuit of Mithridates, while he occupied himself in assembling a fleet at the Hellespont. Contributions quickly poured in from all the Greek cities of Asia; and Lucullus soon found himself at the head of a considerable naval force, with which he defeated a squadron of the enemy off Ilium, and soon afterwards engaged and almost entirely destroyed their main fleet, near the island of Lemnos, taking prisoner Varius himself, together with his two colleagues in the command. (Appian, Mithr. 77; Plut. Lucull. 12; Cic. pro. Leg. Manil. 8, pro Muren. 15; Eutrop. vi. 6; Memnon. 42.) He was now at liberty to direct his undivided attention towards Mithridates himself, and advanced against that monarch, who had halted at Nicomedeia, where Cotta and Triarius were preparing to besiege him; but on learning the defeat of his fleet, and the advance of Lucullus, Mithridates withdrew from that city without a contest, and escaped by sea to Pontus.

Lucullus had thus succeeded in driving back Mithridates into his own dominions, and thither he now prepared to follow him. After joining Cotta and Triarius at Nicomedeia, he detached the former to besiege the important town of Heracleia, while Triarius, with the fleet, was posted at the Bosphorus, in order to prevent the junction of the enemy's detached squadrons. Meanwhile, Lucullus himself, with his main army, advanced through Galatia into the heart of Pontus, laying waste the country on his march; and in this manner penetrated, without any serious opposition, as far as Themiscyra. But he now began to be apprehensive lest Mithridates should avoid a battle, and elude his pursuit by withdrawing into the wild and mountainous regions beyond Pontus; and he therefore, instead of pushing on at once upon Cabeira, where the king was now stationed, determined to halt and form the siege of the two important towns of Amisus and Eupatoria. His object in so doing was in great part to draw Mithridates to their relief, and thus bring on a general engagement; but the king contented himself with sending supplies and reinforcements to the two cities, and remained quiet at Cabeira, where he had established his winter-quarters, and had assembled a force of 40,000 foot and 4000 horse. Lucullus at first pressed the siege of Amisus with the utmost vigour; but it was defended with equal energy and ability by Callimachus, the commander of the garrison; and after a time the efforts of both parties gradually relaxed, and the siege was protracted throughout the whole winter without any decisive result. With the approach of spring (B. C. 72) Lucullus broke up his camp; and leaving Murena with two legions to continue the siege of Amisus, led the rest of his forces against Mithridates, who was still at Cabeira. But the king was superior in cavalry, and Lucullus was therefore unwilling to risk a general action in the plain. Several partial engagements ensued, in which the Romans were more than once worsted; and Lucullus began to find himself in distress for provisions, which he was compelled to bring from Cappadocia. A series of movements and manoeuvres now followed, which are not very clearly related; but at length a numerous detachment from the army of the king, under his generals Menemachus and Myron, was entirely cut off by one of the lieutenants of Lucullus. In consequence of this blow Mithridates determined to remove to a greater distance from the enemy; but when the orders to retreat were given, a general panic spread through the army, which took to flight in all directions. The king himself narrowly escaped being trampled to death in the confusion, and was closely pursued by the Roman cavalry; but effected his escape to Comana, from whence he fled directly to Armenia, accompanied only by a small body of horsemen, and took refuge in the dominions of Tigranes. Lucullus, after making himself master of Cabeira, pursued the fugitive monarch as far as Talaura; but finding that he had made good his retreat into Armenia, halted at that city, and despatched App. Claudius as ambassador to Tigranes, to demand the surrender of Mithridates. Meanwhile, he himself subdued, or at least received the submission of the province of Lesser Armenia, which had been subject to Mithridates, as well as the tribes of the Chaldaeans and Tiberenians; after which he returned to complete the subjugation of Pontus. Here the cities of Amisus and Eupatoria still held out, but they were both in succession reduced by the renewed efforts of Lucullus. He had been especially desirous to save from destruction the wealthy and important city of Amisus, but it was set on fire by Callimachus himself previous to evacuating the place; and though Lucullus did his utmost to extinguish the flames, his soldiers were too intent upon plunder to second his exertions, and the greater part of the town was consumed. He, however, endeavoured to repair the damage as far as possible, by granting freedom to the city, and inviting new settlers by extensive privileges. Heracleia, which was still besieged by Cotta, did not fall apparently till the following year, B.C. 71; and the capture of Sinope by Lucullus himself, shortly afterwards, completed the conquest of the whole kingdom of Pontus. About the same time also Machares, the son of Mithridates, who had been appointed by his father king of Bosphorus, sent to make offers of submission to the Roman general, and even assisted him with ships and supplies in effecting the reduction of Sinope. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 23, 24; Appian, Mithr. 82, 83; Memnon. 45, 47—54; Strab. xii. p. 546, 547; Sall. Hist. ii. fr. 28, iv. fr. 12, p. 240, ed. Gerlach.)

During this interval Lucullus had devoted much of his time and attention to the settlement of the affairs of Asia, where the provincials and cities were suffering severely from the exactions and oppressions of the Roman revenue officers. To this evil he effectually put an end, by fixing one uniform and moderate rate of interest for all arrears, and by other judicious regulations checked the monstrous abuses of the public farmers of the revenue. By these measures he earned the favour and gratitude of the cities of Asia, which they displayed in public by celebrating games in his honour, and by every demonstration of respect and attachment. So judicious and complete indeed was the settlement of the internal affairs of Asia now introduced by Lucullus, that it continued long after to be followed as the established system. But by thus interposing to check the exactions of the Knights who were the farmers of the revenue, he brought upon himself the enmity of that powerful body, who were loud in their complaints against him at Rome, and by their continued clamours undoubtedly prepared the way for his ultimate recall. (Plut. Lucull. 20, 23; Appian, Mithr. 83; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. l.)

Meanwhile* Appius Claudius, who had been * The chronology of these events is very confused and perplexing. It seems certain that the siege of Cyzicus took place in the winter of 74—73, and that of Amisus in the following winter, 73—72 (Plut. Lucull. 33); hence it is probable that the flight of Mithridates into Armenia must have taken place before the end of 72; but as it is also certain (Dion Cass. xxxv.) that the first campaign of Lucullus against Tigranes did not take place till 69, the interval appears inexplicably long. Drumann, in consequence, refers the flight of Mithridates to the year 71, but it is difficult to reconcile this with the details of the campaigns as given by Appian and Plutarch.

sent by Lucullus to Tigranes, to demand the surrender of Mithridates, had returned with an unfavourable answer: intelligence had been also received that the two kings, laying aside all personal differences, were assembling large forces and preparing for immediate hostilities; and Lucullus now determined to anticipate them by invading the dominions of Tigranes. It was in the spring of B.C. 69, that he set out on his march towards Armenia, with a select body of 12,000 foot and 3000 horse, leaving his lieutenant Sornatius to command in Pontus (where every thing seemed now perfectly settled) during his absence. Ariobarzanes furnished him assistance on his march through Cappadocia, and the passage of the Euphrates was facilitated by an accidental drought, which was hailed as a good omen both by the general and his soldiers. From thence he advanced through the district of Sophene, and crossing the Tigris also directed his march towards Tigranocerta, the capital of the Armenian king. Tigranes, who had at first refused to believe the advance of Lucullus, now sent Mithrobarzanes to meet him, but that officer was quickly routed and his detachment cut to pieces. Hereupon Tigranes himself abandoned his capital, the charge of which he confided to an officer named Mancaeus, while he himself withdrew farther into the interior, to wait the arrival of the troops, which were now assembling from all quarters. Lucullus, meanwhile, proceeded to form the siege of Tigranocerta, principally, it would seem, with a view to induce the Armenian monarch to undertake its relief, and thus bring on a general action. Not were his calculations disappointed. Tigranes at first threw an additional body of troops into the place, and succeeded in carrying off in safety his wives and concubines, who had been shut up there; but he was determined not to let the city itself fall into the hands of the Romans, and soon appeared before it with an army of 150,000 foot, 55,000 horse, and 20,000 slingers and archers. Yet Lucullus fearlessly advanced with his small force to meet this formidable host, and when some one reminded him that the day (the sixth of October) was an unlucky one, he boldly answered, "Then I will make it a lucky one." The result fully justified this noble confidence. The heavily-armed horsemen of Tigranes, on whom the king placed his chief reliance, and who had been regarded with the greatest apprehension by the Romans, fled without striking a blow; and the whole army of the enemy was dispersed and put to flight with the loss of only five men on the side of the Romans. Tigranes himself had a narrow escape, and in the confusion of the flight, his royal diadem fell into the hands of the enemy, and afterwards served to grace the triumph of Lucullus. (Plut. Lucull. 23, 24—28; Appian, Mithr. 84, 85; Memnon. 46, 56, 57; Eutrop. vi. 9; Liv. Epit. xlviii.)

The fall of Tigranocerta was now inevitable, and it was hastened by dissensions between the Greeks and the barbarians within the city, in consequence of which the former opened the gates to Lucullus. The city was given up to plunder, but the inhabitants were spared, and the Greeks, who had been forcibly transplanted thither from Cilicia and Cappadocia, were all suffered to return to their respective cities. (Plut. Lucull. 29; Dion Cass. xxxv. 2; Strab. xi. p. 532.) Lucullus now took up his winter-quarters in Gordyene, where he received the submission of several of the petty princes who had been subject to the yoke of Tigranes. Antiochus Asiaticus also, the last king of Syria, who had been dethroned by the Armenian king, but had taken advantage of the advance of the Romans to establish himself once more on the throne of his ancestors, now obtained from Lucullus the confirmation of his power (Appian, Syr. 49). But by far the most important of the neighbouring monarchs was Arsaces, king of Parthia, to whom Lucullus, knowing that his friendship and alliance had been earnestly courted by Mithridates and Tigranes, despatched Sextilius as ambassador. The Parthian monarch gave a friendly reception to the Roman envoy, and dismissed him with fair promises, but his real object was only to temporise, and, so doubtful was his conduct, that Lucullus is said to have designed to leave both Mithridates and Tigranes for a time, and march at once against Arsaces. But his projects were now cut short by the mutinous spirit of his own army. It was late in the season before it was possible to renew military operations in the mountainous and elevated regions where he now found himself, and meanwhile he sent orders to Sornatius to bring to his support the troops which he had left in Pontus, but the soldiers absolutely refused to follow him, and the lieutenant was unable to enforce his authority. Even those who were under the command of Lucullus himself in Gordyene, took alarm at the idea of marching against the Parthians, and not only was their general compelled to abandon this design, but it was with some difficulty that he could prevail upon them to follow him once more against Mithridates and Tigranes. These two monarchs had again assembled a considerable army, with which they occupied the high table lands of the centre of Armenia, and when Lucullus at length (in the summer of 68) moved forward to attack them, they met him on the banks of the river Arsanias. The victory of the Romans was again decisive and as easily won as at Tigranocerta: he two kings fled ignominiously from the field, and numbers of their officers fell in the battle. But when Lucullus pushed forward with the intention of making himself master of Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, his soldiers again refused to follow him, and he was compelled to return into a less fertile region; and turning his arms southwards, he laid siege to the city of Nisibis, in Mygdonia. It was defended by the same Callimachus who had long defied the Roman arms at Amisus, and was considered to be altogether impregnable; but Lucullus surprised it during a dark and stormy winter's night, and afterwards took up his quarters there, until the season should admit of a renewal of military operations. (Plut. Lucull. 30—32; Appian, Mithr. 87; Dion Cass. xxxv. 4—7.) But the discontents among his troops which had early given Lucullus so much trouble, broke out in renewed violence in the camp at Nisibis. They were fostered by P. Clodius, whose turbulent and restless spirit already showed itself in its force, and encouraged by reports from Rome, where the demagogues, who were favourable to Pompey, or had been gained over by the equestrian party (whose bitter hostility against Lucullus had not relaxed), were loud in their clamours against the general. They accused him of protracting the war for his own personal objects either of ambition or avarice; and the soldiery, whose appetite for plunder had been often checked by Lucullus, readily joined in the outcry. It was, therefore, in vain that he endeavoured to prevail upon his mutinous army to resume operations in the spring of the year 67; and while he remained motionless at Nisibis, Mithridates, who had already taken advantage of his absence to invade Pontus and attempt the recovery of his own dominions, was able to overthrow the Roman lieutenants Fabius and Triarius in several successive actions. [MITHRIDATES.] The news of these disasters compelled Lucullus to return in all haste to Pontus, a movement doubtless in accordance with the wishes of his army, who appear to have followed him on this occasion without reluctance. On his approach Mithridates withdrew into the Lesser Armenia, and thither Lucullus prepared to pursue and attack him, when his movements were again paralysed by the open mutiny of his soldiers. All that he could obtain from them by the most abject entreaties, was the promise that they would not abandon his standard during the remainder of that summer, and he was compelled to establish himself in a camp, where he spent all the rest of the season in inactivity, while Mithridates and Tigranes were able to overrun without opposition the greater part both of Pontus and Cappadocia. Such was the state of things, when ten legates (among whom was Marcus, the brother of Lucullus) arrived in Asia, to settle the affairs of Pontus, and reduce it to the form of a Roman province; and they had, in consequence, to report to the senate that the country supposed to have been completely conquered was again in the hands of the enemy. The adversaries of Lucullus naturally availed themselves of so favourable an occasion, and a decree was passed to transfer to Acilius Glabrio, one of the consuls for the year, the province of Bithynia and the command against Mithridates. But Glabrio was wholly incompetent for the task assigned him: on arriving in Bithynia, and learning the posture of affairs, he made no attempt to assume the command or take the field against Mithridates, but remained quiet within the confines of the Roman province, while he still farther embarrassed the position of Lucullus, by issuing proclamations to his soldiers, announcing to them that their general was superseded, and releasing them from their obedience. Mithridates meanwhile ably availed himself of this position of affairs, and Lucullus had the mortification of seeing Pontus and Cappadocia occupied by the enemy before his eyes, and the results of all his previous campaigns apparently annihilated, without being able to stir a step in their defence. But it was still more galling to his feelings when, in the spring of a.c. 66, he was called upon to resign the command to his old rival Pompey, who had been appointed by the Manilian law to supersede both him and Glabrio. (Plut. Lucull. 33—35; Appian, Mithr. 88—91; Dion Cass. xxxv. 8—10, 12—17; Cic. p. Leg. Manil. 2, 5, 9, Ep. ad Att. xiii. 6; Eutrop. vi. 11.) The friends of the two generals succeeded in bringing about an interview between them before Lucullus quitted his government; but though the meeting was at first friendly, it ended in bickerings and disputes, which only aggravated the enmity already existing between them. Pompey still further increased the irritation of his rival by proceeding to rescind many of the regulations which the latter had introduced, even before he had quitted the province. (Plut. Lucull. 36, Pomp. 31; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 29.)

Deeply mortified at this termination to his glorious career, Lucullus returned to Rome to claim the well-merited honour of a triumph. But even this was opposed by the machinations of his adversaries. C. Memmius, one of the tribunes, brought against him various charges for maladministration, and it was not till an interval of nearly three years had elapsed, that this opposition was overcome, and Lucullus at length celebrated his triumph with the greatest magnificence, at the commencement of the year 63. (Plut. Lucull. 37, Cat. Min. 29; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 34.) In these disputes the cause of Lucullus was warmly supported by Cato, whose sister Servilia he had married, as well as by the whole aristocratic party at Rome, who were alarmed at the increasing power of Pompey, and sought in Lucullus a rival and antagonist to the object of their fears. But his character was ill adapted for the turbulent times in which he lived; and, instead of putting himself prominently forward as the leader of a party, he soon began to withdraw gradually from public affairs, and devote himself more and more to a life of indolence and luxury. After the return of Pompey, however, in a. c. 62, he took a leading part, together with Metellus Creticus, Cato, and others of the aristocratic party, in opposing the indiscriminate ratification of the acts of Pompey in Asia. By their combined efforts they succeeded in delaying the proposed measure for more than two years, but at the same time produced the effect, which they had doubtless not anticipated, of forcing Pompey into the arms of the opposite faction, and thus bringing about the coalition known as the First Triumvirate. (Plut. Lucull. 38, 42, Pomp. 46; Vell. Pat. ii. 40; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 49; Suet. Cues. 19.) After that event Lucullus took little part in political affairs. He had previously come forward at the trial of P. Clodius (b. c. 61), to give his testimony to the profligate and vicious character of the accused (Cic. pro Milon. 27), and by this means, as well as by the general course of his policy, had incurred the enmity both of Crassus and Caesar, so that he found himself on hostile terms with all the three individuals who had now the chief direction of affairs at Rome. Caesar even threatened him with a prosecution for his proceedings in Asia; a danger which so much alarmed him that he had recourse to the most humiliating entreaties in order to avert it (Suet. Cues. 20). In the following year (b. c. 59) he was among the leaders of the aristocratic party, charged by L. Vettius, at the instigation of Vatinius, with an imaginary plot against the life of Pompey (Cic. in Vatin. 10, Ep. ad Att. ii. 24); and in the same year he is mentioned among the judges at the trial of L. Flaccus (Cic. pro Flacco. 34). But these two are the last occasions on which his name appears in history. The precise period of his death is not mentioned, but he cannot long have survived the return of Cicero from exile, as the great orator refers to him as no longer living, in his oration concerning the consular provinces, delivered the following year, b. c. 56 (Cic. de Prov. Cons. 9). We are told that for some time previous to his death he had fallen into a state of complete dotage, so that the management of his affairs was confided to his brother Marcus (Plut. Lucull. 43; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illustr. 74). But his death, as often happens, revived in its full force the memory of his great exploits; and when the funeral oration was pronounced in the forum over his remains, the populace insisted that he should be buried, as Sulla had been, in the Campus Martius, and it was with difficulty that his brother prevailed on them to allow his ashes to be deposited, as previously arranged, in his Tusculan villa (Plut. Ibid.).

The name of Lucullus is almost as celebrated for the luxury of his latter years as for his victories over Mithridates. He appears to have inherited the love of money inherent in his family, while the circumstances in which he was placed gave him the opportunity of gratifying it without having recourse to the illegal means which had disgraced his father and grandfather. As quaestor under Sulla, and afterwards during his residence in Asia, it is probable that he had already accumulated much wealth: and during the long period of his government as proconsul, and his wars against Mithridates and Tigranes, he appears to have amassed vast treasures. These supplied him the means, after his return to Rome, of gratifying his natural taste for luxury, and enabled him to combine an ostentatious magnificence of display with all the resources of the most refined sensual indulgence. His gardens in the immediate suburbs of the city were laid out in a style of splendour exceeding all that had been previously known, and continued to be an object of admiration even under the emperors: but still more remarkable were his villas at Tusculum, and in the neighbourhood of Neapolis. In the construction of the latter, with its various appurtenances, its parks, fish-ponds, &c., he had laid out vast sums in cutting through hills and rocks, and throwing out advanced works into the sea. So gigantic indeed was the scale of these labours for objects apparently so insignificant, that Pompey called him, in derision, the Roman Xerxes. His feasts at Rome itself were celebrated on a scale of inordinate magnificence: a single supper in the hall, called that of Apollo, was said to cost the sum of 50,000 denarii. Even during his campaigns it appears that the pleasures of the table had not been forgotten; and it is well known that he was the first to introduce cherries into Italy, which he had brought with him from Cerasus in Pontus. (Plut. Lucull. 39—41; Cic. de Leg. iii. 13, de Off. i. 39; Plin. H. N. viii. 52, ix. 34, xiv. 14, xv. 25; Varr. de R. R. iii. 4, 17; Vell. Pat. ii. 33; Athen. ii. p. 50, vi. p. 274, xii. p. 343. For further details see Drumann's Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. pp. 169, 170, where all the ancient authorities are referred to.) In the midst of these sensual indulgences, however, there were not wanting pleasures of a more refined and elevated character. Lucullus had from his earliest years devoted much attention to literary pursuits, and had displayed an enlightened patronage towards men of letters: he had also applied part of his wealth to the acquisition of a valuable library, which was now opened to the free use of the literary public; and here he himself used to associate with the Greek philosophers and literati who at this time swarmed at Rome, and would enter warmly into their metaphysical and philosophical discussions. Hence the picture drawn by Cicero at the commencement of the Academica was probably to a certain extent taken from the reality. His constant companion from the time of his quaestorship had been Antiochus of Ascalon, from whom he imbibed the precepts of the Academic school of philosophy, to which he continued through life to be attached. (Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 2, de Fin.

fin 2; Plut. Lucull. 42.) His patronage of the poet Archias is too well known to require farther mention (Cic. pr. Arch. 3—5); and the sculptor Arcesilanus is also said to have been one of his constant associates. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. § 45.)

The character of Lucullus is one not difficult to comprehend. He had no pretension to the name of a great man, and was evidently unable to cope with the circumstances in which he found himself placed, and the sterner but more energetic spirits by whom he was surrounded. Yet he was certainly a man of no common ability, and gifted in particular with a natural genius for war. We cannot indeed receive in its full extent the assertion of Cicero (Acad. pr. ii. 1), that he had received no previous military training, and came out at once a consummate general on his arrival in Pontus, merely from the study of historical and military writings; for we know that he had served in his youth with distinction in the Marsic war; and as quaestor under Sulla he must have had many opportunities of acquiring a practical knowledge of military affairs. But the talent that he displayed as a commander is not the less remarkable. Plutarch has justly called attention to the skill with which he secured the victory at one time by the celerity of his movements, at another time by caution and delay: and though the far greater fame of his successor has tended to cast the military exploits of Lucullus into the shade, there can be no doubt that the real merit of the Mithridatic war is principally due to the latter. In one quality, however, of a great commander he was altogether wanting—in the power of attaching to him his soldiers; and to this deficiency, as we have seen, may be ascribed in great measure the ill fortune which clouded the latter part of his career. We are told indeed that some of the legions placed under his command were of a very turbulent and factious character; but these very troops afterwards followed Pompey without a murmur, even after the legal period of their service was expired. This unpopularity of Lucullus is attributed to a severity and harshness in the exaction of duties and punishment of offences, which seems strangely at variance with all else that we know of his character: it is more probable that it was owing to a selfish indifference, which prevented him from sympathising or associating with the men and officers under his command. (Comp. Plut. Lucull. 33; Dion Cass. xxxv. 16.) In his treatment of his vanquished enemies, on the contrary, as well as of the cities and provinces subjected to his permanent rule, the conduct of Lucullus stands out in bright contrast to that of almost all his contemporaries; and it must be remembered, in justice to his character, that the ill will of his own troops, as well as that of the unprincipled farmers of the revenue, was incurred in great part by acts of benevolence or of equity towards these classes. In his natural love of justice and kindness of disposition, his character more resembles that of Cicero than any other of his contemporaries. (See particularly Plut. Lucull. 19.)

Though early withdrawn from the occupations and pursuits of the forum, which prevented his becoming a finished orator, Lucullus was far from a contemptible speaker (Cic. Acad. ii. 1; Brut. 62); the same causes probably operated against his attaining to that literary distinction which his earliest years appeared to promise. Plutarch, however, tells us (Lucull. 1) that he composed a history of the Marsic war in Greek; and the same work is alluded to by Cicero. (Ep. ad Att. i. 19.) It has been already mentioned that Sulla left him his literary executor, a sufficient evidence of the reputation he then enjoyed in this respect. He was noted for the excellence of his memory, which, Cicero tells us, was nearly, if not quite, equal to that of Hortensius. (Acad. pr. ii. 1, 2.)

Lucullus was twice married: first to Clodia daughter of App. Claudius Pulcher, whom he divorced on his return from the Mithridatic war, on account of her licentious and profligate conduct (Plut. Lucull. 38): and secondly, to Servilia, daughter of Q. Servilius Caepio, and half-sister of M. Cato. By the latter he had one son, the subject of the following article. (The fullest account of the life of Lucullus, and a very just estimate of his character, will be found in Drumann's Geschichte Roms, vol. iv.)

5. L. (P) LICINIUS L. F. L. N. LUCULLUS, son of the preceding. His praenomen, according to Valerius Maximus, was Marcus; but this is considered by Drumann (Gesch. Roms. vol. iv. p. 175) as so contrary to analogy, that he does not hesitate to regard it as a mistake. (See also Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 352.) As he was the son of Servilia, he could not have been born before B. C. 65; and was a mere child at the time of his father's death. Lucullus had entrusted him to the guardianship of his maternal uncle, Cato; but at the same time recommended him, by his testament, to the friendly care of Cicero, who appears to have joined with Cato in superintending the education of the boy. (Cic. de Fin. iii. 2, ad Att. xiii. 6.) His relationship with Cato and Brutus naturally threw the young Lucullus into the republican party, whom he zealously joined after the death of Caesar: so that he accompanied Brutus to Greece, was present at the battle of Philippi, and was killed in the pursuit after that action, B. C. 42. (Cic. Phil. x. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 71; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 4.) Cicero tells us that he was a youth of rising talents, and of much promise. (De fin. iii. 2, Phil. x. 4.) While yet under age he had dedicated, by command of the senate, a statue of Hercules near the Rostra, in pursuance of a vow of his father. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 8. (19), ad fin.)

6. M. LICINIUS L. F. L. N. LUCULLUS, son of No. 5, and own brother of No. 4, though Eutropius (vi. 7) erroneously calls him his cousin (consobrinus). He was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and consequently bore the names of M. TERENTIUS M. F. VARRO LUCULLUS*, by which he appears in the Fasti. (Fast. Capit. ap. Gruter, p. 294. See also Orelli, Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 352, and Inscr. Lat. No. 570.) Hence Cicero, though he designates his consulship as that of M. Terentius and C. Cassius (in Verr. i. 23), elsewhere always calls him M. Lucullus. He was younger than L. Lucullus, though apparently not by much, as we find both brothers, who were united through life by the bonds of the most affectionate friendship, joining in the prosecution against the augur Servilius, with a view to avenge their father's memory, at which time Lucius was still very young. (Plut. Lucull.

* Drumann says that he was called M. Terentius M. f. Licinianus Varro; but this, though it would be strictly according to analogy, is contrary to all the evidence we possess.

1; Cic. Acad. pr. ii. 1, de Prov. Cons. 9). The year of his quaestorship is unknown, but he appears to have held that office under Sulla, as he was afterwards brought to trial by C. Memmius for illegal acts committed by him in that capacity by the command of the latter (Plut. Lucull. 37). In the civil war which followed the return of Sulla to Italy, we find M. Lucullus employed by that general as one of his lieutenants, and in a. c. 82 he gained a brilliant victory over a detachment of the forces of Carbo, near the town of Fidentia (Plut. Sull. 27; Vell. Pat. ii. 28; Appian, Civ. i. 92). In a. c. 79 he held the office of curule aedile, together with his brother Lucius (Plut. Lucull. 1; see above, No. 4). Two years later (a. c. 77) he obtained the praetorship, in which he distinguished himself greatly by the impartiality with which he administered justice, and by his efforts to check the lawless habits which had grown up during the late civil wars (Cic. pro M. Tullio, § 8, ed. Orell.). In a. c. 73 he succeeded his brother in the consulship, with C. Cassius Varus as his colleague (Cic. pro Cluentio, 49; Fast. Capit.). The year of their joint administration was marked by a law for the distribution of corn among the lower classes, known as the Lex Terentia et Cassia (Cic. in Verr. iii. 70, v. 21). Its precise provisions are, however, unknown.

He appears to have hastened before the expiration of his consulship to the province of Macedonia, which had fallen to his lot. He was probably desirous to emulate the successes of his brother, and Macedonia offered a ready field for distinction to a warlike governor, from the numerous tribes of hostile barbarians, who frequently infested its frontiers with their incursions. Against these Lucullus now directed his arms, defeated the Dardanians and Bessi in repeated actions, took their chief towns, and laid waste the whole country from Mount Haemus to the Danube, putting to the sword or mutilating in a cruel manner all the barbarians that fell into his hands. Nor did he spare the Greek cities on the Euxine: these had probably taken some part against Rome, as we learn that he captured in succession the cities of Apollonia, Calatia, Tomi, and Istrus, besides some others of minor note. On his return to Rome he was rewarded for these successes by the honour of a triumph, b. c. 71. Among the trophies with which this was adorned, the most conspicuous was a colossal statue of Apollo, 30 cubits in height, which he had brought from Apollonia, and subsequently erected in the capitol. (Eutrop. vi. 7, 8, 10; Oros. vi. 3; Flor. iii. 5; Appian, Illyr. 30; Liv. Epit. xcii.; Cic. in Pison. 19; Plin. H. N. iv. 13. § 27, xxxiv. 6. § 18; Strab. vii. p. 319.)

M. Lucullus was, as well as his brother, a strong supporter of the aristocratic party at Rome. It was probably to their influence that he was indebted for his appointment in a. c. 67, as one of the ten legates who were destined to settle the affairs of Pontus as a Roman province: a purpose which was defeated by the unfavourable change that had taken place in the affairs of that country. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6; Plut. Lucull. 35.) On his return he was assailed by C. Memmius with the accusation already mentioned, which however, terminated in his acquittal (Plut. ib. 37; Pseud. Ascon. ad Cic. Div. in Caecil. p. 109). From this time forth he bears a prominent place among the leaders of the aristocratic party or Optimates at Rome; thus we find him in a. c. 65, coming forward together with Hortensius, Catulus, Metellus Pius, and M. Lepidus, to bear testimony against the tribune C. Cornelius (Ascon. Arg. in Cic. p. Cornel. p. 60, ed. Orell.). Though opposed on this occasion to Cicero, he was in general a warm friend and supporter of the great orator, whom he assisted with his counsels in the dangers of the Catilinarian conspiracy, when both he and his brother were among the first to urge the execution of the conspirators (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21): and he is again mentioned as exerting his utmost endeavours both with Pompey and the consul L. Piso, to prevent the banishment of Cicero (Cic. in Pison. 31). After the return of the latter from his exile, Lucullus, both as one of the pontiffs, and afterwards in his place in the senate, supported him in his demand for the restitution of his house (Cic. pro Dom. 52, de Harusp. Resp. 6). After all these services both to himself and his party, we cannot wonder that Cicero should designate him as one of the "lights and ornaments of the republic" (de Prov. Cons. 9). How long he survived his brother—whose funeral oration he pronounced—is uncertain; the exact date of the death of either one or the other being nowhere recorded. But we learn from Cicero that he was still alive in a. c. 56; at the beginning of which year he took an active part in opposing the mission of Pompey to Egypt, and supporting the pretensions of Lentulus Spinther to that appointment (Cic. ad Fam. i. 1). He is again mentioned a few months later, as present at the debate in the senate concerning the consular provinces (Id. de Prov. Cons. 9), but we hear no more of him after this, and it seems probable that he did not long survive. It is certain at least that he died before the commencement of the civil war, a. c. 49. (Vell. Pat. ii. 49; Plut. Lucull. 43.)

We know very little of the character of M. Lucullus, except from the somewhat vague and general praises of Cicero, who appears disposed to place him on a level with his far more celebrated brother. The affectionate union which subsisted between the two through life, is undoubtedly a trait favourable to them both; but if we may judge from the account of the cruelties committed in his campaign against the Bessi, Marcus was far from possessing the mild and humane disposition of his elder brother. He is mentioned by Cicero as a speaker of considerable merit, though not deserving to be styled an orator (Brut. 62). He appears to have participated to some extent also in his brother's love of luxury and magnificence, though not to such a reprehensible excess. (Cic. ad Att. i. 18; Varr. de R. R. iii. 3. § 10.)

The following persons were probably more or less closely connected with the distinguished family whose members have been above enumerated, but in what manner is unknown.

7. C. LICINIUS LUCULLUS, tribune of the people a. c. 196, was the proposer of a law for the creation of the sacerdotal office of the Triumviri Epulonum, who continued from that time forth to be regularly appointed. He was himself one of the first three persons who held the new office (Liv. xxxiii. 42). In a. c. 191 he was one of two commissioners appointed to dedicate the temple of Juventas in the Circus Maximus, which had been vowed by M. Livius on occasion of the memorable defeat of Hasdrubal (Liv. xxvi. 36.)

8. M. LICINIUS LUCULLUS, was praetor peregrains in a.c. 186, the year that was rendered memorable by the detection of the Bacchanalian societies at Rome. So great was the alarm and confusion caused by this discovery, and by the severe measures adopted by the senate in consequence, that the praetors were compelled to suspend all judicial proceedings for the space of thirty days. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8, 18.)

9. P. (LICI)NIUS LUCULLUS, tribune of the people B.C. 110. He combined with one of his colleagues, L. Aunius, to procure their joint re-election, but this was opposed by the rest of the tribunes, and their dissensions had the effect of preventing the elections of magistrates from taking place during the whole remainder of the year. (Sall. Jug. 37.)

10. L. LICI)NIUS LUCULLUS, was praetor urbanus in B.C. 67; in which office he displayed a remarkable instance of moderation and mildness of disposition. The consul Acilius Glabrio had haughtily ordered his lictors to destroy the curule chair of Lucullus, because the latter had omitted to rise up on seeing him pass by; but the praetor, instead of resenting the insult, continued to administer his judicial functions standing, and his colleagues, to show their approbation of his conduct, imitated his example. The same disposition led him at the expiration of his office to decline the government of a province, that he might not share in the obloquy so generally incurred by the Roman governors. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 24.)

11. CN. (LICI)NIUS LUCULLUS, is mentioned by Cicero as one of his friends, at the funeral of whose mother he had been present (ad Att. xv. 1).

The surname of Lucullus is not found on any of the coins of the Licinia gens. [E. H. B.]

LUCUSTA. [LOCUSTA.]

LUDIUS, a Roman painter, in the time of Augustus, who, as Pliny tells us, was the first to adorn the walls of rooms with landscapes representing villas and porticoes, gardens, groves, hills, ponds, straits, rivers, shores, &c., according to the pleasure of his employers (qualia quis optaret), animated with figures of persons walking, sailing, and riding, or engaged in fishing, fowling, and gathering the vintage, and sometimes with scenes still more interesting and agreeable to the taste of that age. The landscape paintings on the walls of houses in Herculaneum and Pompeii may be safely taken as specimens of this style (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. a. 37). In the same passage, according to the reading of the common editions, Pliny speaks of a much more ancient painter of the same name, who decorated the temple of Juno at Ardea, for which work he received the freedom of the city, and his memory was preserved by the following inscription in the temple, written in ancient Latin letters:—

“Dignis digna loca picturis condecoravit, “Reginae Junoni” supremi conjugi” templum;
“Marcus Ludius Helotas Aetolia oriundus; “Quem nunc et post semper ob artem hanc Ardea laudat.

But the MSS. give no authority for the name Ludius at all. The passage is utterly corrupt. Sillig made a very ingenious attempt, in his Catalogus, to restore the true reading; and again in his edition of Pliny, where the line now stands thus:—

than which, certainly, no better reading has yet been made out. (See Sillig, Catal. Artif. a. v.; and Notes to his edition of Pliny.) [P. S.]

LUNA, the moon. The sun and the moon were worshipped both by Greeks and Romans, and among the latter the worship of Luna is said to have been introduced by the Sabine T. Tatius, in the time of Romulus (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 74; Dionys. ii. 50). But, however this may be, it is certain, notwithstanding the assertion of Varro, that Sol and Luna were reckoned among the great gods, that their worship never occupied any prominent place in the religion of the Romans, for the two divinities had between them only a small chapel in the Via Sacra (Sext. Ruf. Reg. Urb. iv.), Luna, on account of her greater influence upon the Roman mode of calculating time, seems to have been revered even more highly than Sol, for there was a considerable temple of her on the Aventine, the building of which was ascribed to Servius Tullius (Ov. Fast. iii. 883; Tac. Ann. xv. 41; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. xiii.). A second sanctuary of Luna existed on the Capitol, and a third on the Palatine, where she was worshipped under the name of Noctiluca, and where her temple was lighted up every night. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 68; Horat. Carm. iv. 6. 38). Further particulars concerning her worship are not known. [L. S.]

LUPERCA, or LUPA, an ancient Italian divinity, the wife of Lupercus, who, in the shape of a she-wolf, performed the office of nurse to Romulus and Remus (Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 3). In some accounts she is identified with Acca Laurentia, the wife of the shepherd Faustulus. (Liv. i. 4; comp. ACCA LAURENTIA.) [L. S.]

LUPERCUS, an ancient Italian divinity, who was worshipped by shepherds as the protector of their flocks against wolves, and at the same time as the promoter of the fertility among sheep, whence he was called Inuus or Ἐφιδάμνς. On the north side of the Palatine hill there had been in ancient times a cave, the sanctuary of Lupercus, surrounded by a grove, containing an altar of the god and his figure clad in a goat-skin, just as his priests the Luperci (Dionys. i. 79; Justin. xliii. 1, 4; Liv. i. 5; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 776; Isidor. viii. 11, 103, &c.; Artemid. Oneir. ii. 42). The Romans sometimes identified Lupercus with the Arcadian Pan. Respecting the festival celebrated in honour of Lupercus and his priests, the Luperci, see Dict. of Ant. a. v. Lupercalia and Luperci. [L. S.]

LUPERCUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, to whom the latter occasionally sent his orations for revision. (Plin. Ep. ii. 5, ix. 26.) He is probably the same as the Lupercus who frequently asked Martial for his epigrams. (Mart. i. 118.)

LUPERCUS (Λούπερκος), of Berytus, a learned grammarian, lived a little time before the Roman emperor Claudius II. (reigned A. D. 268–270). He was the author, according to Suidas, of the following works:—three books on the particle ἐν, Περὶ τοῦ ἐν, Περὶ τῆς καρίδος, Περὶ τοῦ παρὰ Πλάτωνι δλεκτρούνο, a Κρίσις of the Egyptian town Arainoetus or Arainbe, Ἀρταϊκὰ λέξεις, Τέχνη γραμματικὴ, and thirteen books on the three genders, in which Suidas says that Lupercus surpasses Herodian in many points.

LUPERCUS, MUMMIUS, a Roman legate, and commander of the winter-quarters of two legions of the army of the Rhine, was sent by Hordeonius Flaccus against Civilis, by whom he was defeated and driven into Vetera Castra, the fortifications of which he repaired, and where he maintained himself bravely against the insurgents, till his soldiers, starving and dispirited, and solicited by the emissaries of Classicus, surrendered to Civilis, A. D. 69—70. [CIVILIS; CLASSICUS.] Lupercus was sent among the presents to the German prophetae Velela, who had predicted the success of the insurgents; but he was killed on the journey. (Tac. Hist. iv. 18, 22, 23, 61.) [P.S.]

LUPUS, bishop of Troyes, hence surnamed Trecensis, whose praises are loudly proclaimed by Sidonius Apollinaris, was born at Toul towards the close of the fourth century. By descent and marriage he was allied to the most distinguished ecclesiastics of the age and country to which he belonged, for his mother was sister of St. Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, his brother Vincentius is by many believed to be the celebrated Vincentius Lirinensis, and he wedded in A. D. 419 Pimeniola, sister of Hilarius, bishop of Arles. Being seized with the prevailing passion for a life of solitary contemplation, he quitted the world, and entered the monastery of Lerins, from whence he was summoned in 427, to preside over the see of Troyes. Two years afterwards he was thought worthy of being associated with his uncle in a mission to Britain, for the purpose of arresting the progress of the Arian heresy in that island. Lupus returned to his native country in 480, and died in 479, after having occupied the episcopal chair for a space of fifty-two years.

Two letters of this prelate are still extant:—

I. The first written later than 443, jointly with Euphronius, bishop of Autun, is entitled Epistola ad Talasium Episcopum Andegavensem (of Angers) de Vigilis Natalis Domini, Epiphaniæ et Paschæ; de Bigamis; de iis qui conjugati assumuntur. First published by Sirmond in the Concilia Galliæ, fol. Paris, 1629, vol. i. p. 122.

II. Ad Sidonium Apollinarem, written in 471, to congratulate him on his appointment to the see of Clermont in Auvergne. First published by the Benedictine D'Achery in his Spicilegium veterum aliquot scriptorum, 4to. Paris, 1661, vol. v. p. 579, or vol. iii. p. 302, of the 2nd edit. fol. 1717. Both will be found under their best form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 576, fol. Venet. 1773; see also Prolegomena, c. xviii. (Sidon. Apollin. Ep. vi. 4, 9, ix. 11; Schönnemann, Biblioth. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 29; Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Litterat. Suppl. Band. § 151.) [W. R.]

LUPUS, a friend of Cicero and Brutus, who is mentioned more than once in Cicero's letters. (Ad Fam. xi. 5, 6, 7, 12, 25.) He frequently carried messages and letters from the one to the other. Whether he is identical with either of the Rutilii or Corneli is uncertain. [C. P. M.]

LUPUS, artista. 1. A gem-engraver, whose name appears on a gem in the Berlin Museum (Stosch. vi. 26).

2. C. SEVIVS LUPUS, an architect, known from an inscription in Gruter (p. 57. 7). [P. S.]

LUPUS, CORNELIUS LENTULUS, consul in A. C. 156. [LENTULUS, No. 13.]

LUPUS, CURTIUS, was quaestor in A. D. 24. Lipsius supposes that he was one of the four quaestores provinciales, having a province where his head-quarters were at Calca. Others suppose that he was inspector of the roads and forests (calles). While he was in the neighbourhood of Brundisium a man named Curtius attempted to excite an insurrection among the slaves. Lupus, with the aid of the crews of three vessels which happened to arrive, suppressed the movement. (Tac. Ann. iv. 27.) [C. P. M.]

LUPUS, JU'NIUS, a Roman senator, who brought a charge of treason against L. Vitellius, the father of A. Vitellina, for the way in which he abetted Agrippina in her irregularities. But the emperor yielded to the threats or entreaties of Agrippina, and Lupus was banished, A. D. 51. (Tac. Ann. xii. 42.) [C. P. M.]

LUPUS, NUM'SIUS, was commander of one of the three legions (the eighth) stationed in the province of Moesia. A decisive victory having been gained over the Rhoxolani, a Sarmatian tribe, who invaded the province, Lupus and his fellow-commanders received the insignia of consuls, A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 79, iii. 10.) [C. P. M.]

LUPUS, RUTIL'LIUS. 1. P. RUTILIUS, L. F. L. N. LUPUS, consul, with L. Julius Caesar, in A. C. 90, the year in which the Social or Mariæ war broke out. [CAESAR, No. 9.] While his colleague was engaged against the Samnites, Lupus was to prosecute the war against the Marii. He had chosen as his legate Marius, who was his relation, but he refused to listen to the advice of the veteran, who recommended him to accustom his soldiers to a little more training before he ventured to fight a battle. The enemy had taken up their position on the Liris under the command of Vettius Scato. Lupus divided his army into two bodies, one under his own command and the other under that of Marius, and threw two bridges across the river without experiencing any opposition from the enemy. Vettius Scato, with the main body of his forces, encamped opposite Marius, but during the night he concealed a strong detachment in some broken ground near the bridge of Lupus. Accordingly, when Lupus crossed the river on the following day, he was attacked by the troops in ambush, lost 8000 of his men, and died shortly afterwards of a wound which he had received in the battle. Marius was first informed of the calamity by the dead bodies of the Romans which floated down the river. The battle was fought on the festival of the Matralia, the 11th of June. (Ov. Fast. vi. 563.) No consul was elected to supply the place of Lupus, as his colleague was unable to come to Rome to hold the comitia. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 43; Oros. v. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 15, 16; Liv. Epit. 73; Plin. H. N. ii. 29, a. 30; Flor. iii. 18; Obsequ. 115; Cic. pro Font. 15.)

2. P. RUTILIUS LUPUS, probably son of the preceding, tribune of the plebs, A. C. 56, was a very warm partisan of the aristocracy. Immediately after entering upon his office in the December of the preceding year, he proposed the repeal of the agrarian law of Caesar; and he also took an active part in the disputes relating to the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 1, ad Fam. i. 1, 2.) He was praetor in A. C. 49, and was stationed at Tarracina with three cohorts, but he was deserted by his men as soon as they saw Caesar's cavalry approaching. Instead, however, of hastening to Brundisium to join Pompey, he returned to Rome, and administered justice there for a short time, but must have quitted the city before Caesar's arrival. (Caes. B. C. i. 24; Cic. ad Att. viii. 12, A. § 4, ix. 1, § 2.) Shortly afterwards he crossed over to Greece, and was by Pompey to take the charge of Achaia. (Caes. B. C. iii. 55.) He may have been the father of Rutilius Lupus, the grammarian, spoken of below.

LUPUS, RUTILIUS, is the name attached to a rhetorical treatise in two books, entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which appears to have been originally an abridgement of a work (εἰς τὰς διαβολὰς καὶ λέξεις), by Gorgias of Athens, one of the preceptors of young M. Cicero, but which has evidently undergone many changes in the hands of those by whom it was used for the purposes of instruction. Its chief value is derived from the numerous translations which it contains of striking passages from the works of Greek orators now lost. At one time the author of this piece was believed to be the person spoken of by Quintilian as contemporary with himself; but the reading Tutilium has been substituted for Rutilium in the passage in question by the best editors, on the authority of good MSS. and of all the earlier impressions. Lupus is now generally supposed to have been the son of P. Rutilius Lupus, mentioned above.

The Editio Princeps of the De Figuris was printed along with Aquila Romanus by Zoppinus at Venice, 8vo. 1619. It will be found in the Antiqui Rhetores Latini of F. Pithou, 4to. Paris, 1599, p. 1; and under its best form, along with Aquila and Julius Ruffinianus, in the edition of Ruhnken, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1768, reprinted, with many additions, by C. H. Frotcher, 8vo. Leip. 1831. (Quintil. iii. l. § 21, ed. Spalding. Ruhnken, in his preface, has collected every thing known with regard to Lupus. See also Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Litteratur, 3te Ausgabe, § 262.) [W. R.]

LUPUS, VIRIUS, governor of Britain in the reign of the emperor Alexander Severus, was obliged to purchase peace of the Maetae, a people bordering upon the Caledonians. The name of Virius Lupus frequently occurs in inscriptions found in various parts of Britain. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 5, with the note of Reimarus.)

LURCO, M. AUFIDIUS, tribune of the plebs, in a. c. 61, was the author of the Lex Aufidia de Ambitu, which enacted, among other things, that if a candidate promised and paid money to a tribe at the comitia, he should pay besides to that tribe 3000 sesterces yearly during his life: but if he merely promised and did not pay, he should be exempt. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Ambitus.) This, however, is Cicero's version of the principal clause of the Lex Aufidia, and, since it is part of his account of a wit-combat between himself and P. Clodius in the senate (ad Att. i. 16), B. C. 61, it is probably exaggerated. Three years afterwards, B. C. 59, Lurco was one of the witnesses for the defence at the impeachment of L. Valerius Flaccus [L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, No. 15], and then it suited Cicero's purpose to call him an honest man and his good friend (pro Flacc. iv. 34). In a. c. 52—1, Lurco prosecuted and procured the conviction of Sextus Clodius, for bringing the corpse of P. Clodius into the Curia Hostilia, and for other acts of violence. (Accus. in Cic. Milon. p. 55, Orelli.) Lurco was the maternal grandfather of the empress Livia, wife of Augustus. (Suet. Cal. 23.) He was the first person in Rome who fattened peacocks for sale, and is derived a large income from this source. (Varr. l. R. iii. C; Plin. H. N. x. 20.) [W. B. D.]

M. LURIIUS, praefect of Sardinia, under Augustus, in B. C. 40, was expelled from that island by Menas, Sextus Pompey's lieutenant. Luriius commanded the right wing of the Caesarian fleet at the battle of Actium, B. C. 31. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30; Vell. Pat. ii. 85; comp. Plut. Ant. 65, 66; Appian, B. C. v. 55.) No family of the Lurii is known: but there is extant a coin of the co-meyers of Augustus bearing on its obverse the legend "P. LURIUS AGRIPPA III. VIR. A. A. A. F. F." (Osrin. Fam. Rom.; Vaillant, "LURIL") [W. B. D.]

LUSCINUS, FABRICIUS. 1. C. FABRICIUS C. F. C. N. LUSCINUS, one of the most popular heroes in the Roman annals, who, like Cincinnatus and Curius, is the representative of the poverty and honesty of the good old times. He is first mentioned in a. c. 285 or 284, when he was sent as ambassador to the Tarentines and other allied states, to dissuade them from making war against Rome, but he was apprehended by them, while they sent embassies to the Etruscans, Umbrians, and Gauls, for the purpose of forming a general coalition against Rome. (Dion Cass. Frag. 144, ed. Reimar.) He must, however, have been released soon afterwards, for he was consul in a. c. 282 with Q. Aemilius Papus. In his consulship he had to carry on war in Southern Italy against the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttii. He marched first to the relief of the town of Thurii, to which the Lucanians and Bruttii had laid siege, under the command of Staiilius; but on leading out his army against the enemy, his soldiers lost courage at seeing that their forces were much smaller than those of the foe, when suddenly a youth of gigantic stature appeared at their front, carrying a scaling ladder, with which he began to mount the ramparts of the enemy. The youth was discovered to be Mars the Father; and Niebuhr remarks, that this narrative is the last episode in Roman history that belongs to poetry. A great victory, however, was gained by the Romans; the town of Thurii was relieved, and the grateful inhabitants erected a statue to the victorious consul. Fabricius followed up his success by gaining various other victories over the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnites, and taking several of their towns; and he obtained so much booty, that, after giving up a large portion to the soldiers, and returning to the citizens the tribute which they had paid the year before, he brought into the treasury after his triumph more than 400 talents. (Val. Max. i. 8. § 6, Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6, s. 15; Dionys. Exc. Leg. pp. 2344, 2355, ed. Reiske; Liv. Epit. 12; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 437.)

In B. C. 281 Pyrrhus landed at Tarentum, and in the following year, B. C. 280, the consul P. Valerius Laevinus was sent against him. Fabricius probably served under him as legate, and was thus present at the unfortunate battle of Heracleia, on the Siris, where the Romans were defeated by Pyrrhus. The subsequent history of the campaign belongs to the life of Pyrrhus [PYRRHUS]; and it is only necessary to state here, that after the king of Epirus had advanced almost up to the gates of Rome, he found it necessary to retreat, and eventually took up his winter-quarters at Tarentum. While stopping in this city, the Romans sent to him an embassy, with Fabricius at its head, to negotiate a ransom or exchange of prisoners. The conduct of Fabricius on this occasion formed one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and subsequent poets and historians delighted to embellish the account in every possible way. So much, however, seems certain—that Pyrrhus received the ambassadors in the most distinguished manner, and attempted particularly to gain the favour of Fabricius; that he offered the ambassador the most splendid presents, and endeavoured to persuade him to enter into his service, and accompany him to Greece; but that the sturdy Roman was proof against all his seductions, and rejected all his offers. The result of the embassy is differently stated by the ancient writers. [PYRRHUS.]

The war was renewed in the following year, B.C. 279, when Fabricius again served as legate, and shared in the defeat at the battle of Asculum, in which he is said to have received a wound. (Oros. iv. 1; Flor. i. 18, where he is erroneously called consul.) Next year, B.C. 278, he was elected consul a second time with Q. Aemilius Papus. The victories which Pyrrhus had previously gained were purchased so dearly, that he was unwilling to risk another battle against the Romans, especially when commanded by Fabricius; the Romans too, who were anxious to recover their dominion over their allies who had revolted, were no less eager for a conclusion of the war. The generosity with which Fabricius and his colleague sent back to the king the traitor who had offered to poison him, afforded a fair pretext for opening a negotiation; and so opportunely did this event occur, that Niebuhr conjectures that it was a preconcerted plan. Cineas was sent to Rome, a truce was concluded, and Pyrrhus sailed to Sicily, leaving his Italian allies to the vengeance of the Romans. [PYRRHUS.] Fabricius was employed during the remainder of the year in reducing Southern Italy to subjection, and on his return to Rome he celebrated a triumph for his victories over the Lucanians, Bruttians, Tarentines, and Samnites. (Fasti Triumph.; Eutrop. ii. 14; Liv. Epit. 13.) He exerted himself to obtain the election of P. Cornelius Rufinus to the consulship for the following year, on account of his military abilities, although he was an avaricious man. (Cic. de Oral. ii. 66.)

Fabricius is stated in the Fasti to have been consul suffectus in B.C. 273, but this appears to be a mistake, arising from a confusion of his name with that of C. Fabius Licinus. (Pigh. Annal. ad ann.) He was censor, B.C. 275, with Q. Aemilius Papus, his former colleague in the consulship, and distinguished himself by the severity with which he attempted to repress the growing taste for luxury. His censorship is particularly celebrated, from his expelling from the senate the P. Cornelius Rufinus mentioned above, on account of his possessing ten pounds' weight of silver plate. (Liv. Epit. 14; Zonar. viii. 6; Gell. xvii. 21.) The love of luxury and the degeneracy of morals, which had already commenced, brought out still more prominently the simplicity of life and the integrity of character which distinguished Fabricius as well as his contemporary Curius Dentatus; and ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which they lived on their hereditary farms, and how they refused the rich presents which the Samnite ambassadors offered them. Fabricius died as poor as he had lived; he left no dowry for his daughters, which the senate, however, furnished; and in order to pay the greatest possible respect to his memory, the state interred him within the pomerium, although this was forbidden by an enactment of the Twelve Tables. (Val. Max. iv. 3. § 7; Gell. i. 14; Appul. Apol. p. 265, ed. Alt.; Cic. de Leg. ii. 23.)

2. C. FABRICIUS LUSCINUS, probably a grandson of the preceding, judging from his praenomen and cognomen, was city praetor B.C. 195, and legate B.C. 190, with Sex. Digitius and L. Apustius, to the consul L. Scipio Asiaticus. (Digitius, No. 2.) (Liv. xxxiii. 42, 43, xxxvii. 4.)

L. LUSCIUS, a centurion in the times of Sulla, notorious for his crimes and for the wealth which he acquired by them. Luscius was convicted of three murders during the Sullan proscription, B.C. 81, and condemned B.C. 64. (Ascon. in Top. Caed. p. 92, ed. Orelli; comp. Appian, B.C. i. 101; Plut. Sull. 33; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10.) [W. B. D.]

LUSCIUS, LAVINIUS, a Latin comic poet, the contemporary and rival of Terence, who mentions him several times in the prologues to his plays. (Ter. Eunuch. prol. 7, Heautontim. prol. 30, Phorm. prol. 4.) The name of only one of his plays is known, the plan of which is given by Donatus (ad Ter. Eunuch. l. c.) Vulcatius Sedigitus assigned to Luscius the ninth place in the list of comic poets. (Gell. xv. 24.)

LUSCIUS OCREA. [OCREA.]

LUSCUS, a cognomen of the Annii, Anidia, and Furia gentes, derived, like so many of the Roman surnames, from a physical imperfection—blear-sight. (Plin. H. N. xi. 57. § 55; Fest. s. v. Luscio, p. 120, ed. Müller.) The Fabricia gens had a kindred surname, Luscinius. [W. B. D.]

LUSCUS, ANNIUS. 1. T. ANNIUS LUSCUS, son of T. Annii, captured by the Boian Gauls in B.C. 218 [ANNIUS, No. 3], was sent in B.C. 172, with two other envoys to Perseus, king of Macedonia, and in B.C. 169 was triumvir for augmenting the colony at Aquileia, in the territory of the Veneti. (Liv. xlii. 25, xliii. 17.)

2. T. ANNIUS T. F. LUSCUS, son, probably, of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 153 (see Fasti). Cicero mentions him as a respectable orator (Brut. 20). In B.C. 133, Luscius appears among the opponents of Tib. Gracchus whom he foiled in the comitia by an insidious question. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 14.) A few words from one of his speeches are extant in Festus (s. v. Satura).

3. T. ANNIUS T. F. T. N. LUSCUS, with the cognomen RUFUS, was consul in B.C. 128. He was probably a son of the preceding. (Fasti.)

4. C. ANNIUS T. F. T. N. LUSCUS, perhaps son of the preceding. He was commander of the praetorian at Leptis, under Q. Metellus Numidicus, in the Jugurthine war, B.C. 108. He was afterwards praetor, and in B.C. 81 was sent by Sulla with proconsular authority against Sertorius. Luscius drove the Sertorians through the passes of the Pyrenees into Spain, and at first by his superior forces, both by land and sea, rendered the situation of Sertorius highly precarious. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 134; Plut. Sert. 7; Sall. B. J. 77.) [W. B. D.]

LUSCUS, AUFIDIUS, the chief magistratus at Fundi, ridiculed by Horace, on account of the ridiculous and pompous airs he gave himself when Maecenas and his friends passed through Fundi, on their celebrated journey to Brundisium. Horace calls him praetor; but as Fundi was a praefectura and not a municipium, Luscius must have been sent from Rome simply as praefectus, and assumed the title of praetor to enhance his dignity. (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 34—36.)

LUSCUS, M. FU'RIOUS, plebeian aedile with C. Sempronius Blaesus, B. C. 187, exhibited a second time the plebeii ludi. (Liv. xxxix. 7.)

C. LUSIUS, a nephew of C. Marius, and tribune of the soldiers in the Cimbric war, B. C. 111—106, was slain by his tent-comrade, Trebonius, for attempting a criminal assault upon him. Marius acquitted and commended Trebonius. (Plut. Mar. 14; Cic. pro Mil. 4; Schol. Bob. pro Mil. p. 279, Orelli; Val. Max. vi. 1. § 12.) [W. B. D.]

LUSIUS GETA. [GETA.]

LUSIUS QUIETUS. [QUIETUS.]

LUTATIA GENS, plebeian. The name is sometimes written in MSS. Luctatius as well as Lutatius: in the poets the u in the latter form is short (Sil. Ital. vi. 687; Claudian, in Eutrop. i. 415.) This gens first became distinguished in Roman history by C. Lutatius Catulus, who was consul B. C. 242, the last year of the first Punic war. Its cognomens are CATULUS, CERCO, and PINTHIA; but Cerco is the only cognomen which we find upon coins. The Lutatii had a burial-place (sepulchrum Lutatorum) beyond the Tiber, which is mentioned in B. C. 82. (Oros. v. 21.)

LUTATIUS, the author of an historical work, entitled Communis Historia, or Communes Historiae, of which a fourth book is quoted. (Probus, ad Virg. Georg. iii. 280; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 710.) Some writers consider him to be the same as the C. Lutatius Catulus who perished in the proscription of Marius [CATULUS, No. 3]; but he was probably a different person, as Cicero makes no mention of the Communis Historia in his enumeration of the works of Catulus. (Cic. Brut. 35.) The fragments of this work are collected by Krause (Vitae et Fragm. Hist. Lat. p. 318, &c.).

LUTATIUS DAPHNIS, a celebrated grammarian, who was purchased by Q. Lutatius Catulus [CATULUS, No. 3] at an immense sum, and soon afterwards manumitted. (Suet. de Ill. Gram. 3.)

Q. LUTATIUS DIODORUS, received the Roman franchise from Sulla, through the influence of Q. Lutatius Catulus. He afterwards lived at Lilybaeum, where he was robbed by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 17.)

C. LUTO'RIOUS PRISCUS. [PRISCUS.]

LUXORIOUS flourished in Africa under the Vandal king Hilderic during the early part of the sixth century. His name is attached to a series of eighty-nine short poems or epigrams in various metres, many of them coarse, all of them dull. The language and versification, however, show that the author must have been a man of education, well acquainted with the models of classical antiquity, and one or two of the pieces are curious, inasmuch as they prove that the irregularities of the clergy had already begun to afford a theme for satire. Luxorius is one of the many poets to whom the term Perrigillum Veneris has been ascribed, it assuredly none of his acknowledged productions are of such a stamp as to induce us to believe him capable of having created any thing so bright and successful. (Burmman, Antholog. Lat. ii. p. 579, iii. f. 41, or n. 296—384, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

LYAEUS (Λυαῖος), the god who frees men from fear and anxiety, a surname of Bacchus. (Eustath. Hom. p. 108; Virg. Georg. ii. 229.) [L. S.]

sonages mentioned by Ovid (Met. iii. 625, v. 60, xii. 802).

LYCAEUS (Λυκαῖος), sometimes also Lyceus, a surname of certain divinities worshipped on mount Lycaenum in Arcadia, as for instance Zeus, who had a sanctuary on it, in which the festival of the Lycaea was celebrated. No one was allowed to enter the temple, and if any one forced his way in, he was believed to stay within one year, and to lose his shadow (Paus. viii. 2. § 1, 38. § 4, &c.; Pind. Ol. xiii. 154). According to others those who entered it were stoned to death by the Arcadians, or were called stags, and obliged to take to flight to save their lives (Plut. Quaest. Graec. 39). Pan also was called the Lycaean, because he was born and had a sanctuary on mount Lycaeon (Paus. viii. 38. § 4; Strab. viii. p. 388; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 16; Virg. Aen. viii. 344). Lycaeus also occurs as a surname of Apollo. See LYCIUS. [L. S.]

LYCAON (Λυκάων). 1. A son of Pelasgus by Meliboea, the daughter of Oceanus, and king of Arcadia (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1). Others call him a son of Pelasgus by Cyllene (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1642), and Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 11, 13) distinguishes between an elder and a younger Lycaon, the former of whom is called a son of Aegeus and father of Deianeira, by whom Pelasgus became the father of the younger Lycaon. The traditions about him place Lycaon in very different lights, for according to some, he was a barbarian who even defied the gods (Ov. Met. i. 198, &c.), while others describe him as the first civiliser of Arcadia, who built the town of Lycosura, and introduced the worship of Zeus Lycaeus. It is added that he sacrificed a child on the altar of Zeus, and that during the sacrifice he was changed by Zeus into a wolf (Paus. viii. 2. § 1; comp. Ov. Met. i. 237). By several wives Lycaon became the father of a large number of sons, some say fifty, and others only twenty-two; but neither their number nor their names are the same in all accounts (Apollod., Dionys. l. cc.; Paus. viii. 3. § 1; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 313). The sons of Lycaon are said to have been notorious for their insolence and impiety, and Zeus visited them in the disguise of a poor man, with a view to punish them. They invited him to a repast, and on the suggestion of one of them, Maenalus, they mixed in one of the dishes set before him the entrails of a boy whom they had murdered. According to Ovid Zeus was recognised and worshipped by the Arcadian people, but Lycaon, after a vain attempt to kill the god, resolved to try him with the dish of human flesh (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 481; Eratosth. Catast. 8). However, Zeus pushed away the table which bore the horrible food, and the place where this happened was afterwards called Trapeza. Lycaon and all his sons, with the exception of the youngest (or eldest), Nyctimus, were killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, or according to others, were changed into wolves (Ov., Tzet. l. cc.; Paus. viii. 3. § 1). Some say that the flood of Deucalion occurred in the reign of Nyctimus, as a punishment of the crimes of the Lycaonidae. (Apollod. l. c.)

2. A son of Priam and Laothoe, was taken and slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. iii. 333, xxi. 35, &c., xxii. 46, &c.)

3. A Lycian, the father of Pandarus. (Hom. Il. ii. 826, v. 197.) [L. S.]

LYCASTUS (Λύκαστος), a son of Minos and Ithone, was king of Crete and husband of Ida, the daughter of Corybas (Diod. iv. 60). The town of Lycastus in Crete derived its name from him or an autochthon of the same name (Steph. Byz. s. v.). A story about another Lycastus, likewise a Cretan, is related by Parthenius (Erot. 35). [L. S.]

LY'CEAS (Λυκίας), of Naucratis, the author of a work on Egypt, which is mentioned by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 560, e.; xiv. p. 616, d.) and by Pliny, in his list of authorities for his 36th book. [P. S.]

LYCE'GENES (Λυκηνεγής), a surname of Apollo, describing him either as the god born in Lycia, or as the god born of light. (Hom. Il. iv. 101, 119; comp. LYCIGENES.) [L. S.]

LYCEIA (Λυκεία), a surname of Artemis, under which she had a temple at Troezen, built by Hippolytus. (Paus. ii. 31. § 6.) [L. S.]

LYCEIUS (Λυκίος), a surname of Apollo, the meaning of which is not quite certain, for some derive it from λύκος, a wolf, so that it would mean "the wolf-slayer;" others from λύκη, light, according to which it would mean "the giver of light;" and others again from the country of Lycia. There are indeed passages in the ancient writers by which each of these three derivations may be satisfactorily proved. As for the derivation from Lycia, we know that he was worshipped at mount Cragus and Ida in Lycia; but he was also worshipped at Lycoreia on mount Parnassus, at Sicyon (Paus. ii. 9. § 7), Argos (ii. 19. § 3), and Athens (i. 19. § 4). In nearly all cases, moreover, where the god appears with this name, we find traditions concerning wolves. Thus the descendants of Deucalion, who founded Lycoreia, followed a wolf's roar; Latona came to Delos as a she-wolf, and she was conducted by wolves to the river Xanthus; wolves protected the treasures of Apollo; and near the great altar at Delphi there stood an iron wolf with inscriptions. (Paus. x. 14. § 4.) The attack of a wolf upon a herd of cattle occasioned the worship of Apollo Lyceus at Argos (Plut. Pyrrh. 32; comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 124); and the Sicyonians are said to have been taught by Apollo in what manner they should get rid of wolves. (Paus. ii. 19. § 3.) In addition to all this, Apollo is called λυκοκτόνος. (Soph. Elect. 7; Paus. ii. 9. § 7; Hesych. s. v.) Apollo, by the name of Lyceus, is therefore generally characterised as the destroyer. (Müller, Dor. ii. 6. § 8.) [L. S.]

LY'CIDAS (Λυκίδης), a member of the senate of Five Hundred at Athens, who was stoned to death by his fellow-citizens, because he advised them to listen to the proposals of peace offered by Mardonius in B.C. 479: his wife and children suffered the same fate at the hands of the Athenian women. (Herod. ix. 5.) The same story is related of Cynillus at the invasion of Xerxes eleven years before [CYNILUS]; and both tales probably refer to only one event.

LY'CINUS (Λυκίνος), an Italian Greek, an exile from his native city, who entered the service of Antigonus Gonatas, and was appointed by him to command the garrison, which he left in possession of Athens, after the termination of the Chremonidean war, B.C. 263. (Teles, ap. Stobæum, Floril. ii. p. 82, ed. Gaist.; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. pp. 206, 222.) Niebuhr conjectures, plausibly enough, that Lycinus was a native of Tarentum, and had been compelled to fly from that city on its conquest by the Romans. (Niebuhr, Kleine Schrift p. 461.) [E. H. B.]

LYCIS (Λύκισ), an Athenian comic poet, who is only known by the reference to him in the Frogs of Aristophanes (14; comp. Schol. and Suid. s. v.). He is also called Lycus. In fact Lycia, Lycina, and Lycus, are only different forms of the same name. (Ruhnken, ad Rasil. Lusp. p. 100.) [P. S.]

LYCISCUS (Λυκίσκος). 1. A Messenian, descended from Aegyptus. In the first Messenian war, the Messenians, having consulted the Delphic oracle, were told that to save their country, they must offer by night, to the gods below, an unstained virgin of the blood of the Aegyptidae. The lot fell on the daughter of Lyciscus; but Epebolus, the seer, pronounced her to be unfit for the sacrifice, as being no daughter of Lyciscus at all, but a supposititious child. Meanwhile, Lyciscus, in alarm, took the maiden with him and withdrew to Sparta. Here she died; and several years after, as he was visiting her tomb, to which he often resorted, he was seized by some Arcadian horsemen, carried back to Ithome, and put upon his trial for treason. His defence was, that he had fled, not as being hostile to his country or indifferent to her fate, but in the full belief of what Epebolus had declared. This being unexpectedly confirmed by the priestess of Hera, who confessed that she was herself the mother of the girl, Lyciscus was acquitted. (Paus. iv. 9, 12.) [ARISTODÆMUS, No. 1.]

2. An Athenian demagogue, obliged Euryptolemus to drop his threatened prosecution of Callixenus for his illegal decree against the commanders who had conquered at Arginusæ, B.C. 406, by moving that such as attempted to prevent the people from doing what they chose should have their fate decided by the same ballot as the generals themselves. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 13.) It is possible that the comedy of Alexis, called "Lyciscus," had reference to this demagogue. (See Meineke, Frag. Com. Græcæ vol. i. pp. 274, 275, iii. p. 446; Athen. xiii. p. 593, d.)

3. An officer of Cassander, was sent by him to Epeirus as regent and general, when the Epeirians had passed sentence of banishment against their king Acærides and allied themselves with Cassander, in B.C. 316. In B.C. 314, Cassander left him in command of a strong body of troops in Acarnania, which he had organised against the Aetolians, who favoured the cause of Antigonus. Lyciscus was still commanding in Acarnania, in B.C. 312, when he was sent with an army into Epeirus against Alcetas II. whom he defeated. He also took the town of Eurymanæ, and destroyed it. (Diod. xix. 36, 67, 88.)

4. An officer of Agathocles, by whom he was much esteemed for his military talents. During the expedition of Agathocles to Africa (B.C. 309), Lyciscus, being heated with wine at a banquet, assailed his master with abuse, which the latter met only with good-humoured jesting. But Archagathus, the son of Agathocles, was greatly exasperated; and when Lyciscus, in answer to his threats after the banquet, threw in his teeth his suspected intrigue with his step-mother Alcæa, he seized a spear and slew him. The consequence was a formidable mutiny in the army, which it required all the boldness and prudence of Agathocles to quell. (Diod. xx. 33, 34.)

5. An Acarnanian, was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to the Laedæmonians, B.C. 211 to urge them to ally themselves with Philip V. of Macedonia,—at any rate not to join the Roman and Aetolian league. He defended the kings of Macedonia from the attack of CHLAREAS, and dwelt on the danger of allowing the Romans to gain a footing in Greece and on the indignity of the descendants of those who had repulsed Xerxes and his barbarians becoming now the confederates of other barbarians against Greeks. (Pol. ix. 32—33.)

6. An Aetolian, a partisan of Rome, was made general of the Aetolians, in B.C. 171, through the influence of Q. Marcius and A. Atilius, two of the Roman commissioners sent to Greece in that year. (Liv. xlii. 38.) In B.C. 167, the Aetolians complained to Aemilius Paullus, then making a progress through Greece, that Lyciscus and Tisippus had caused 550 of their senators to be slain by Roman soldiers, lent them by Baebius for the purpose, while they had driven others into banishment and seized their property. But the murder and violence had been perpetrated against partisans of Perseus and opponents of Rome, and the Roman commissioners at Amphipolis decided that Lyciscus and Tisippus were justified in what they had done. Baebius only was condemned for having supplied Roman soldiers as the instruments of the murder. (Liv. xlv. 28, 31.) [BAEBIUS, No. 5.]

LYCISCUS, a statutory, who made "Lagonem puerum subdolae ac fucatae vernilitatis." (Plin. H.N. xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 17.) [P. S.]

LYCIUS (Λύκιος), i. e. the Lycian, a surname of Apollo, who was worshipped in several places of Lycia, and had a sanctuary and oracle at Patara in Lycia. (Pind. Pyth. i. 39; Propert. iii. 1. 38; Virg. Aen. iv. 142, 346, 377.) It must, however, be observed, that Lycius is often used in the sense of Lycæus, and in allusion to his being the slayer of wolves. (Comp. Serv. ad Aen. iv. 377, who gives several other explanations of the name; Paus. i. 9. § 7, 19. § 3; Philostr. Her. x. 4; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 354.)

Lycius also occurs as the proper name of two mythical beings, one a son of Lycaon (Apollod. iii. 1), and the other a son of Pandion. (Paus. i. 19. § 4.) [L. S.]

LYCIUS (Λύκιος), of Eleutherae, in Boeotia, was a distinguished statutory, whom Pliny mentions as only the disciple, while Pausanias and Polemon take him the son, of Myron. He must, therefore, have flourished about Ol. 92, B.C. 428. (Plin. H.N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19; Ibid. § 17; Paus. i. 23. § v. 22. § 3; Polemon, ap. Ath. xi. p. 486, d; Ibid. a. v.; respecting the true reading of the second passage of Pliny, see HEGESIAS, p. 368, b.) Pliny mentions as his works a group of the Argonauts, a boy blowing up an expiring flame: "a work worthy of his teacher." At the end of the same citation Pliny adds, "Lycius (for so the best MSS. read, not Lycus) et ipse puerum sufflorem," which we take to be obviously an after insertion, made with Pliny's frequent carelessness, and denoting nothing else than the "puerum sufflorem" mentioned by him above. Pausanias states that Lycius, of the Acropolis at Athens a bronze statue of a boy holding a sprinkling vessel (σφραγιστήριον). Pausanias (v. 22. § 2) also mentions a group by Lycius, which is exceedingly interesting as a specimen of the arrangement of the areas in a great work of statutory of the best period. The group (which stood at Olympian, near the Hippodamion, and was dedicated by the people of Apollonia, on the Ionian gulf), had for its foundation a semicircular base of marble, in the middle of the upper part of which was the statue of Zeus, with Thetis and Hemera (Aurora) supplicating him on behalf of their sons Achilles and Memnon. Those heroes stood below, in the attitude of combatants, in the angles of the semicircle; and the space between them was occupied by four pairs of Greek and Trojan chieftains,—Ulysses opposed to Helenus, they being the wisest men of either army, Alexander to Menelaus, on account of their original enmity, Aeneas to Diomed, and Deiphobus to the Telamonian Ajax. It is most probable that, though the base was of marble, the statues were of bronze. A vase has been recently discovered at Agrigentum, by Politi, the painting on which seems to be an imitation of this group. (Real-Encyclopädie d. Class. Alterthumswissenschaft, s. v.)

The question has been raised whether Lycius was not also a chaser of gold or silver cups. The fact is probable enough, for the great artists frequently executed such minute works, and cups by Myron, the father of Lycius, are expressly mentioned by Martial (vi. 92, viii. 51); but the actual authority on which the statement rests can hardly bear it out. Demosthenes (c. Timoth. p. 1193) mentions φάλας λυκούργεῖς (or λυκούργεῖς), which the grammarian Didymus explained as cups made by Lycius, not being aware, as Polemon objects (ap. Ath. xi. p. 486, e.), that such compounds are not formed from names of persons, but from names of places, like Ναζκούργεῖς κένθραρος, δῖος Μιλήσιουργεῖς, κλινὴ Χίουργεῖς, and τράπεζα Πηνειούργεῖς. Polemon explains the word as meaning made in Lycia, like the προβάλους λυκούργεας mentioned by Herodotus (vii. 76), and in this he is followed by Harpocration (a. v.), and by most modern scholars. (See Valckenner ad Herod. l. c.) The style of Lycius probably resembled that of his father. [P. S.]

LYCOATIS (Λυκοῦατις), a surname of Artemis, who had a temple at Lycoa, in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 36. § 5.)

LYCOCTONUS. [LYCEIUS.]

LYCOLEON (Λυκολέων), an Athenian orator, and a disciple of Isocrates, is mentioned only by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 10), who quotes a fragment of an oration of his ὑπὲρ Χαρίτων. As in that fragment mention is made of the bronze statue which was erected to Chabrias (Diod. xv. 33; Nep. Chab. 1), it is evident that that oration must have been delivered after the year B.C. 377. [L. S.]

LYCOMEDES (Λυκομήδης). 1. A king of the Dolopians, in the island of Scyros, near Euboea, father of Deidameia, and grandfather of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8.) Once when Theseus came to him, Lycomedes, dreading the influence of the stranger upon his own subjects, thrust him down a rock. Some related that the cause of this violence was, that Lycomedes would not give up the estates which Theseus had in Scyros, or the circumstance that Lycomedes wanted to gain the favour of Menestheus. (Plut. Thes. 35; Paus. i. 17, in fin.; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 1324; Soph. Phil. 243; Apollod. iii. 13.)

2. A son of Creon, one of the Greek warriors at Troy (Hom. Il. ix. 84); he was represented as a wounded man by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

3. A son of Apollo and Parthenope. (Paus. vii. 4. § 2.) [L. S.]

LYCOMEDES (Λυκομήδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Aeschreus, was the first Greek who captured a Persian ship at Artemisium, in B. C. 480, on which occasion he gained the prize of valour. (Her. viii. 11.) He was perhaps the same as the father of the Athenian general Arcestratus, mentioned by Thucydides (i. 57). Lycomedes was also the name of the father of Cleomedes, one of the Athenian commanders against Melos in B. C. 416. (Thuc. v. 84.)

2. A Mantinean, according to Xenophon and Pausanias, wealthy, high-born, and ambitious. Diodorus calls him in one passage a Tegean; but there can be no question (though Wesseling would raise one) of the identity of this Lycomedes with the Arcadian general whom he elsewhere speaks of as a Mantinean. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. § 23; Paus. viii. 27; Diod. xv. 59, 62; Wess. ad Diod. xv. 59; Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 3.) We first hear of him as one of the chief founders of Megalopolis in B. C. 370, and Diodorus (xv. 59), tells us that he was the author of the plan, though the words of Pausanias (viii. 27, ix. 14.) would seem to ascribe the origination of it to Epaminondas. (Comp. Arist. Pol. ii. 2, ed. Bekk.; Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 6, &c.) In B. C. 369 Lycomedes was general of the Arcadians and defeated, near Orchomenus, the forces of the Lacedaemonians under Polytropus. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 14; Diod. xv. 62.) In the following year we find symptoms of a rising jealousy towards Thebes on the part of the Arcadians, owing in great measure to the suggestions and exhortations of Lycomedes, who reminded his countrymen of their ancient descent as the children of the soil, of their numbers, their high military qualifications, and of the fact that their support was quite as important to Thebes as it had been to Lacedaemon; and it is possible that the spirit thus roused and fostered in Arcadia may have shortened the stay of Epaminondas in the Peloponneseus on this his second invasion of it. The vigour exhibited in consequence by the Arcadians under Lycomedes and the successes they met with are mentioned by Xenophon and Diodorus, the latter of whom however places these events a year too soon. Thus it was in B. C. 369, according to him, that Lycomedes marched against Pellene in Laconia, and, having taken it, made slaves of the inhabitants and ravaged the country. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 23, &c.; Diod. xv. 67; Wess. ad loc.) The same spirit of independence was again manifested by Lycomedes in B. C. 367, at the congress held at Thebes after the return of the Greek envoys from Susa; for when the rescript of Artaxerxes II. (in every way favourable to Thebes) had been read, and the Thebans required the deputies of the other states to swear compliance with it, Lycomedes declared that the congress ought not to have been assembled at Thebes at all, but wherever the war was. To this the Thebans answered angrily that he was introducing discord to the destruction of the alliance, and Lycomedes then withdrew from the congress with his colleagues. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. § 39.) In B. C. 366, the loss of Oropus having exasperated the Athenians against their allies, who had withheld their aid when it was most needed, Lycomedes took advantage of the feeling to propose an alliance between Athens and Arcadia. The proposal was at first unfavourably received by the Athenians, as involving a breach of their connection with Sparta; but they afterwards consented to it on the ground that it was as much for the advantage of Lacedaemon as of Athens that Arcadia should be independent of Thebes. Lycomedes, on his return by sea from Athens, desired to be put on shore at a certain portion of the Peloponnesian coast, where there happened to be collected a number of Arcadian exiles; and by these he was murdered. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. §§ 2, 3.) [CALLISTRATUS, No. 3.]

3. A Rhodian, was appointed to command the Persian garrison placed in Mytilene by Autophrades and the younger Pharnabazus, in B. C. 333. In the ensuing year the Persian garrisons were dislodged from the islands in the Aegean by Alexander's officer, Hegelochus. (Arr. Anab. ii. 1, iii. 2; Curt. iv. 5.)

4. Priest of the goddess Enyo or Bellona at Comana, and sovereign, therefore, of the surrounding country. He was an adherent of Antony, and was deposed by Augustus after the battle of Actium, B. C. 30. (Strab. xii. p. 558; Dion Cass. l. 2; comp. App. Mithr. 114.) [E. F.]

LYCON (Λύκων), the name of two mythical personages, one, a son of Hippocoon, was killed by Heracles (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; HIPPOCOON), and the other a Trojan. (Hom. Il. xvi. 335.) [L. S.]

LYCON (Λύκων), historical. 1. An orator and demagogue at Athens, was one of the three accusers of Socrates and prepared the case against him. According to Stallbaum, Lycon was one of the ten regular advocates (εὐρυφάποι) employed by the state to conduct public prosecutions; but there seems to be no authority for this statement. When the Athenians repented of their condemnation of Socrates, they put Melitus to death and banished Anytus and Lycon. (Plat. Apol. p. 23, e; Stallb. ad loc.; Diog. Laert. ii. 38, 39, 43; Menag. ad loc.) The Lycon, who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Fesp. 1301) as a drunken brawler, has been identified by some with the accuser of Socrates (Stallb. l. c.; Kühner, ad Xen. Mem. i. 1. § 1); and, if we may believe the scholiast on Plato (Apol. l. c.), the latter was also the same person as the husband of the notoriously profligate Rhodia, satirized by Eupolia. From the same authority we learn that he was an Ionian by descent, belonged to the deme of Thorica, and was noted for his poverty by Cratinus in the swine (Arist. Lysistr. 270; Schol. ad loc.; Schn. Proef. ad Xen. Anab. p. xxxii; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 117, ii. pp. 131, 441, 442, 515, 535.)

2. A Syracusan, who, when the Zacynthians assassins had entered the house of Dion unarmed, and were in want of a weapon to despatch him, handed a dagger to one of them through the window, B. C. 353. (Plut. Dion. 57; Diod. xvi. 31; Corn. Nep. Dion. 9.)

3. An admiral of Antigonus, king of Asia, was sent by him, in B. C. 313, to the aid of Callatis in Moesia, against Lyimachus, from whom it had revolted, and who was besieging it. Lycon, however, appears to have effected nothing. (Diod. xix. 73.)

4. Of Scarpheia, a comic actor, who, while performing on one occasion before Alexander the Great, inserted in a speech of the comedy a line asking the king for ten talents. Alexander laughed and gave them to him. (Plut. Alex. 29, de Alex. Fort. ii. 2; Athen. xii. p. 539, a.) The Lycon, whose convivial qualities are extolled in his epitaph by Phalaecus, was probably the same person; and perhaps also the play of Antiphanes, called "Lycophron," had reference to him. (Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 210, vii. p. 246, ed. Jacobs; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 327, iii. p. 80.) [E. E.]

LYCON (Λύκων), literary. 1. A Pythagorean philosopher. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 36.)

2. Of Iasos, wrote upon Pythagoras. (Ath. ii. p. 47, a, p. 69, e, x. 418, f.; Diog. Laërt. v. 69.) It is not clear whether he was the same person as the Pythagorean mentioned by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. xv. 2), as a contemporary and a calumniator of Aristotle.

3. Of Troas, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, who was the son of Astyanax, and the disciple of Straton, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school, in the 127th Olympiad, a. c. 272; and he held that post for more than forty-four years. He resided at Pergamus, under the patronage of Attalus and Eumeneas, from whom Antigonus Gonatas of Macedonia in vain sought to entice him (the old reading in the text of Laërtius was Antiochus). On several occasions his counsel was of great service to the Athenians. He was celebrated for his eloquence (comp. Cic. de Fin. v. 5), and for his skill in educating boys. He paid great attention to the body as well as to the mind, and, constantly practising athletic exercises, was exceedingly healthy and robust. Nevertheless, he died of gout at the age of 74. He was a bitter rival of Hieronymus the peripatetic.

Among the writings of Lycon was probably a work on Characters (similar to the work of Theophrastus), a fragment of which is preserved by Lucilius Lupus (de Fig. ii. 7), though the title of the book is not mentioned by any ancient writer. It appears from Cicero (Tusc. Disp. iii. 32) and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. p. 497), that he wrote on the boundaries of good and evil (De animis). A work of his on the nature of animals quoted by Appuleius (Apol. p. 42). In his will, preserved by Diogenes Laërtius, there is a reference to his writings, but no mention of their lex.

Diogenes states, that on account of his sweet quence, his name was often written Γλύκων. The fact appears to be that the guttural was originally a part of the word. (Diog. Laërt. v. 65—; Ruhnkens, ad Rutil. Lup. L. c., Opusc. vol. i. 393; Jonsius, Script. Hist. Philos. vol. iv. p. 1; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 851, vol. iii. p. 1.) [P. S.]

LYCOPEUS (Λυκοπέως), a son of Agrios, and brother of Tydeus, by whom he was slain. (Apollod. i. § 6; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 971.) [L. S.]

LYCOPHONTES (Λυκοφάντης), a son of Autonous, a Theban, who, in conjunction with son, lay in ambush, with 50 men, against Tydeus, but was slain by him. (Hom. Il. iv. 395.) He is also a Trojan of this name. (Hom. Il. 275.) [L. S.]

LYCOPHRON (Λυκόφρων), a son of Mastor, who had been obliged to quit his native place of Iasos, on account of a murder he had committed, accompanied the Telamonian Ajax against Troy, where he was slain by Hector. (Hom. Il. 130, &c.) [L. S.]

LYCOPHRON (Λυκόφρων). 1. The younger of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, by his wife Melissa having been killed by

Periander, her father Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, asked her two sons, while staying at his court, if they knew who had slain their mother. This rankled in the mind of Lycophron, and, on his return to Corinth, he refused to hold any communication with his father. Periander drove him from his house, and forbade any one to receive him or address him under the penalty of the confiscation of a certain sum to the service of Apollo; but the misery to which he was thus reduced had no effect on Lycophron's resolution, and even his father's entreaties, that he would recede from his obstinacy and return home, called forth from him only the remark that Periander, by speaking to him, had subjected himself to the threatened penalty. Periander then sent him away to Corcyra; but, when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned him back to Corinth to succeed to the tyranny, seeing that Cypselus, his elder son, was unfit to hold it from deficiency of understanding. The summons was disregarded, and, notwithstanding a second message to the same effect, conveyed by Lycophron's sister, and backed by her earnest entreaties, he persisted in refusing to return to Corinth as long as his father was there. Periander then offered to withdraw to Corcyra, if Lycophron would come home and take the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyraeans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death, probably about a. c. 586. (Herod. iii. 50—53; Diog. Laërt. i. 94, 95; comp. Paus. ii. 28.)

2. A Corinthian general, was slain in a battle with the Athenians, who had made a descent on the Corinthian coast, under Nicias, in a. c. 425. (Thuc. iv. 43, 44; Plut. Nic. 6.)

3. An Athenian, son of one Lycurgus, and father of Lycurgus the orator. The language of the author of the Lives of the Ten Orators is such as to leave it doubtful whether it was Lycophron or his father Lycurgus who was put to death by the thirty tyrants. (Paus. i. 29; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Lyc. ad init.; Clint. F. H. sub anno 337.)

4. A citizen of Pherae, where he put down the government of the nobles and established a tyranny. Aiming further at making himself master of the whole of Thessaly, he overthrew in a battle, with great slaughter (B. c. 404), the Larissaeans and others of the Thessalians, who opposed him, adherents, no doubt, of the Aleuadae. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 4.) Schneider (ad Xen. l. c.) conjectures that the troops and money obtained in the preceding year by Aristippus of Larissa from Cyrus the Younger were intended to resist the attempts of Lycophron (Xen. Anab. i. 1. § 10). In B. c. 395, Medius of Larissa, probably the head of the Aleuadae, was engaged in war with Lycophron, who was assisted by Sparta, while Medius received succours from the opposite confederacy of Greek states, which enabled him to take Pharsalus. (Diod. xiv. 82.) Of the manner and period of Lycophron's death we know nothing. He was probably the father of Jason of Pherae.

5. A son, apparently, of Jason, and one of the brothers of Thebe, wife of Alexander, the tyrant of Pherae, in whose murder he took part together with his sister and his two brothers, Tisiphonius and Peitholaus. On Alexander's death the power appears to have been wielded mainly by Tisiphonius, though Diodorus says that he and Lycophron made themselves joint-tyrants, with the aid of a mercenary force, and maintained their ascendancy by cruelty and violence. (Xen. Hell. vi. 4. § 37; Con. Narr. 50; Diod. xvi. 14; Plut. Pel. 35; Clint. F. H. vol. ii. App. Ch. 15.) In a.c. 352, by which time it seems that Tisiphonus was dead, Philip of Macedon, on the application of the Aleuadae and their party, advanced into Thessaly against Lycophron, who was now chief ruler. The latter was aided by the Phocians, at first under Phayllus, without success, and then with better fortune under Onomarchus, who defeated Philip in two battles and drove him back into Macedonia; but soon after Philip entered Thessaly again, and Onomarchus, having also returned from Boeotia to the assistance of Lycophron, was defeated and slain. Lycophron, and his brother Peitholaus, being now left without resource, surrendered Phœræ to Philip and withdrew from Thessaly with 2000 mercenaries to join their Phocian allies under Playilus. An antithetic sarcasm, quoted by Aristotle, seems to imply that they did not give their services for nothing. In the hostilities between Sparta and Megalopolis, in this same year (a.c. 352), we find among the forces of the former 150 of the Thessalian cavalry, who had been driven out from Phœræ with Lycophron and Peitholaus. (Diod. xvi. 35—37, 39; Paus. x. 2; Just. viii. 2; Dem. Olynth. ii. p. 22; Isocr. Phil. p. 86, b; Arist. Rhet. iii. 9. § 8.) From the downfall of Lycophron to the battle of Cynoscephalæ, in a.c. 197, Thessaly continued dependent on the kings of Macedonia.

6. A Rhodian, was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to Rome, in a.c. 177, to obtain from the senate, if possible, a more favourable decree than that which had just pronounced the Lycians to have been assigned by Rome to the Rhodians, eleven years before, as allies rather than as subjects. (Pol. xxvi. 7, 8; comp. Liv. xxxviii. 39, xli. 6.) [E. E.]

LYCOPHRON (Λυκόφρων), the celebrated Alexandrian grammarian and poet, was a native of Chalcis in Eubœa, the son of Socles, and the adopted son of the historian Lycus of Rhegium (Suid. s. v.). Other accounts made him the son of Lycus (Tzetzes, Chil. viii. 481). He lived at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, who entrusted to him the arrangement of the works of the comic poets contained in the Alexandrian library. In the execution of this commission Lycophron drew up a very extensive work on comedy (περὶ κωμῶν), which appears to have embraced the whole subject of the history and nature of the Greek comedy, together with accounts of the comic poets, and, besides this, many matters bearing indirectly on the interpretation of the comedians (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 9—11). Nothing more is known of his life. Ovid (Ibis, 533) states that he was killed by an arrow.

As a poet, Lycophron obtained a place in the Tragic Pleiad; but there is scarcely a fragment of his tragedies extant. Suidas gives the titles of twenty of Lycophron's tragedies; while Tzetzes (Schol. in Lyc. 262, 270) makes their number forty-six or sixty-four. Four lines of his Περσωνία are quoted by Stobæus (cxix. 13.) He also wrote a satyric drama, entitled Μερδῆναυς, in which he ridiculed his fellow-countryman, the philosopher Menedemus of Eretria (Ath. x. p. 420, b.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 140; comp. Menag. ad loc.), who, nevertheless, highly prized the tragedies of Lycophron (Diog. ii.

133). He is said to have been a very skilful composer of anagrams, of which he wrote several in honour of Ptolemy and Arsinoë.

The only one of his poems which has come down to us is the Cassandra or Alexandra. This is neither a tragedy nor an epic poem, but a long iambic monologue of 1474 verses, in which Cassandra is made to prophesy the fall of Troy, the adventures of the Grecian and Trojan heroes, with numerous other mythological and historical events, going back as early as the Argonauts, the Amazons, and the fables of Io and Europa, and ending with Alexander the Great. The work has no pretensions to poetical merit. It is simply a cumbrous store of traditional learning. Its obscurity is proverbial. Suidas calls it σκοτεινὸν σοφίαν, and its author himself obtained the epithet σκοτεινός. Its stores of learning and its obscurity alike excited the efforts of the ancient grammarians, several of whom wrote commentaries on the poem: among them were Theon, Decton, and Orus. The only one of these works which survives, is the Scholæ of Isaac and John Tzetzes, which are far more valuable than the poem itself.

A question has been raised respecting the identity of Lycophron the tragedian and Lycophron the author of the Cassandra. From some lines of the poem (1226, &c., 1446, &c.) which refer to Roman history, Niebuhr was led to suppose that the author could not have lived before the time of Flamininus (about a.c. 190); but Welcker, in an elaborate discussion of the question, regards the lines as interpolated.

The first printed edition of Lycophron was the Aldine, with Pindar and Callimachus, Venet. 1513, 8vo.; the next was that of Laisius, with the Scholia, Basil. 1546, fol.: of the later editions the most important are those of Potter, Oxon. 1697, fol., reprinted 1702; Reichard, Lips. 1787, 2 vols. 8vo.; and Bachmann, Lips. 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.; to which must be added the admirable edition of the Scholia by C. G. Müller, Lips. 1811, 3 vols. 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 750; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöid. pp. 1256—1263; Bernhardt, Grundriss d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 613, 1026—1029.) [P. LYCOPHRONIDES (Λυκόφρωνίδης), a lyric poet, quoted by Clearchus, the disciple of Aristotle. (Athen. xiii. p. 564, b., xv. p. 670, e.)

LYCÖ'REUS (Λυκοῦρεῦς). 1. A surname of Apollo, perhaps in the same sense as Lycæus; but he is usually so called with reference to Lycæon, on Mount Parnassus. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1490; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 19; Orph. Hymn. 33. l.)

2. A son of Apollo and the nymph Corymbus, from whom Lycœia, in the neighbourhood of Delphi, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. x. 6. § 2.)

There are two other mythical personages of the same name. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 51; Serv. ad Aen. i. 761.) [L. S.]

LYCÖ'RIS was the name under which C. Cornelius Gallus celebrated in his poems his mistress Cytheris. The syllabic quantity of the fictitious name is the same as that of the true one, according to the rule inferred from Apuleius. (De Magis Or. vol. ii. p. 12, ed. Bipont; see Acro. ad Hor. Sat. i. 2. 64; and Bentley's note, Carm. ii. 12.) [C. T. R.]

LYCORTAS (Λυκόρτας), of Megalopolis, was the father of Polybius, the historian, and the com-

friend of Philopoemen, to whose policy, prudent at once and patriotic, we find him adhering throughout. In B. C. 189, he was sent as ambassador to Rome, with his rival Diophanes, to receive the senate's decision on the question of the war which the Achæan League had declared against Lacedæmon; and, while Diophanes expressed his willingness to leave every thing to the senate, Lycortas urged the right of the league to free and independent action. (Liv. xxxviii. 30—34.) In A. C. 186, he was one of the three ambassadors sent to Ptolemy V. (Epiphanes), to effect a new alliance between Egypt and the Achæans; but, at an assembly held at Megalopolis in the next year, when Aristæus was strategus, neither Lycortas and his colleagues nor the Egyptian envoys, who had accompanied them from Ptolemy's court, could specify which of the several treaties made in former times with Egypt had now been renewed; and Lycortas accordingly incurred much blame and furnished a triumph to the party of Aristæus. (Pol. xxi. 1, 7, 9.) In the same year (185), Philopoemen and Lycortas defended successfully, at Argos, the treatment of the Lacedæmonians by the Achæans, which had been censured by Cæcilius Metellus; and, when Appius Claudius was sent from Rome, in B. C. 184, to settle the question, Lycortas, now general of the league, again intended that the Achæans were justified in the ode in which they had dealt with Lacedæmon: it did not carry his point with Appian. (Pol. ii. 23, xxiii. 1, 7, 10, 11, 12, xxiv. 4; Liv. xix. 33, 35—37, 48; Plut. Philop. 16, 17; Ant. vii. 9.) In B. C. 183, when Deinocrates and a party had withdrawn Messenia from the league, Lycortas was sent against them by the aged Philopoemen, but was unable to force his way through a pass into Messenia. Being, however, made general of the league, on the death of Philopoemen, the end of the same year or the beginning of 2, he invaded Messenia and took full vengeance on the chief authors of Philopoemen's murder. [DEINOCRATES; PHILOPOEMEN.] Soon after Messenia was re-admitted into the league, and Lycortas, at the same time, urged successfully against Diophanes the re-admission of Lacedæmon. (Pol. xxiv. 12, xxv. 1, 2, Spic. Rel. xxiv. 2, Plut. Philop. 18—21; Paus. iv. 29; Liv. xix. 48—50; Just. xxii. 1.) In B. C. 180, Lycortas, together with his son Polybius, and thus (son of the famous general of the same name), was again appointed ambassador to Ptolemy Epiphanes, who had made the most friendly address to the Achæans; but the intelligence of king's death prevented the embassy from being sent. (Pol. xxv. 7.) In B. C. 179, when Hyperbatus was general of the league, Lycortas spoke against compliance with the requisition of Romans for the recall of all the Lacedæmonians without exception. On this occasion he was opposed to Callicrates and Hyperbatus; and, of course, became more and more an object of dislike and aversion to the Romans. He adhered, however, to the moderate policy which he had adopted the first; and, when the war between Rome and the Achæans broke out, he recommended the Achæans to reserve a strict neutrality. (Pol. xxvi. 1, &c., ii. 3, 6.) In B. C. 168, we find him proposing, in opposition again to Callicrates and Hyperbatus, and aid to the two Ptolemies (Philometor and Cleopatra), who had asked for a force, with Lycor-tas for general, against Antiochus Epiphanes; but his motion was unsuccessful. From this period we hear no more of him. Had he been alive in A. C. 167, he would doubtless have been among the 1000 Achæans who were apprehended and sent to Rome after the conquest of Macedonia; but his son Polybius makes no mention of him, nor ever alludes to him, as one of the prisoners in question. We may, therefore, perhaps infer that he was by that time dead. (Pol. xxix. 8—10; see above, vol. i. p. 569, b; Clint. F. H. vol. iii. pp. 318, 386.) [E. E.]

LYCTUS (Λύκτος), a son of Lycaon, and the mythical founder of the ancient town of Lyctos in Crete. (Hom. Il. ii. 647; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 313; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

LYCURGUS (Λυκούργος). 1. A son of Dryas, and king of the Edones in Thrace. He is famous for his persecution of Dionysus and his worship on the sacred mountain of Nyseion in Thrace. The god himself leaped into the sea, where he was kindly received by Thetis. Zeus thereupon blinded the impious king, who died soon after, for he was hated by the immortal gods. (Hom. Il. vi. 130, &c.) The punishment of Lycurgus was represented in a painting in a temple at Athens. (Paus. i. 20. § 20.) The above Homeric story about Lycurgus has been much varied by later poets and mythographers. Some say that Lycurgus expelled Dionysus from his kingdom, and denied his divine power; but being intoxicated with wine, he first attempted to do violence to his own mother, and to destroy all the vines of his country. Dionysus then visited him with madness, in which he killed his wife and son, and cut off one (some say both) of his legs; or, according to others, made away with himself. (Hygin. Fab. 132, 242; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 14.) According to Apollodorus (iii. 5. § 1), Dionysus, on his expeditions, came to the kingdom of Lycurgus, but was expelled; whereupon he punished the king with madness, so that he killed his son Dryas, in the belief that he was cutting down a vine. When this was done, Lycurgus recovered his mind; but his country produced no fruit, and the oracle declared that fertility should not be restored unless Lycurgus were killed. The Edonians therefore tied him, and led him to mount Pangæum, where he was torn to pieces by horses. Diodorus (i. 20, iii. 65) gives a sort of rationalistic account of the whole transaction. According to Sophocles (Antig. 955, &c.), Lycurgus was entombed in a rock. (Comp. Ov. Trist. v. 3, 39.)

2. A son of Aleus and Neæra, and a brother of Cepheus and Auge, was king in Arcadia, and married to Cleophila, Eurynome, or Antinoë, by whom he became the father of Anceus, Epochus, Amphidamas, and Jasus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1, &c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 164.) Some also call Cepheus his son, and add another of the name of Jocrates. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Βορραχίδα.) Lycurgus killed Areithous with his lance, meeting him in a narrow valley. He took the club with which his enemy had been armed, and used it himself; and on his death he bequeathed it to his slave Ereuthalion, his sons having died before him. (Hom. Il. vii. 142, &c.; Paus. viii. 4. § 7.) His tomb was afterwards shown at Lepreæ. (Paus. v. 5. § 4.)

3. A son of Pronax and brother of Amphithee, the wife of Adrastus. He took part in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and engaged in a contest with Amphiaræus, which was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclæe (Paus. iii. 18. § 7; Apollod. i. 9. § 3). He is also mentioned among those whom Asclepius called to life again after their death. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 96, ad Eurip. Alcest. 1.)

4. A son of Pheres and Periclymene, a brother of Admetus, was king of the country about Nemea, and married to Eurydice or Amphithea, by whom he became the father of Opheltes (Apollod. i. 9. § 14, iii. 6. § 4). His tomb was believed to exist in the grove of the Nemean Zeus. (Paus. ii. 15. § 3.)

5. One of the suitors of Hippodameia, was killed by Oenomaus. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7.)

6. A son of Eunomus, a mythical legislator of the Lacedæmonians. His son is called Eucosmus (Plut. Lyc. 1), and he is said to have lived shortly after the Trojan times. But his whole existence is a mere invention to account for the chronological inconsistencies in the life of the famous legislator Lycurgus, who himself scarcely belongs to history. [See below.] [L. S.]

LYCURGUS (Λυκοῦργος), the Spartan legislator. We cannot more appropriately begin the life of Lycurgus than by repeating the introductory remark of Plutarch, that concerning Lycurgus nothing can be said for certain, since his genealogy, his travels, his death, and likewise his laws and political arrangements, are differently told by different writers. Modern criticism has not been satisfied with such a simple statement of inextricable difficulties, but has removed them all at once, by denying the real existence of Lycurgus altogether. However, such hasty scepticism is warranted neither by conflicting and vague statements, which, in the case of a semi-historical personage, cannot well be otherwise; nor even by the fact, that Lycurgus had a temple in Sparta, and was there worshipped as a hero. But although we do not deny the existence of Lycurgus, we cannot pretend to know any thing for certain beyond his bare existence. Hardly a single action, or a single institution, commonly attributed to Lycurgus, can be historically proved to belong to him. Of the real Lycurgus we know almost nothing; and the one with whom we are acquainted is the Lycurgus of half historical fiction. Yet to his name are attached questions of the highest importance. To him is attributed the framing of the most peculiar, as well as the most highly and universally extolled (Plut. Lyc. 35) of the constitutions, which ancient Greece, like a fertile soil, brought forth with wonderful exuberance and unparalleled variety. We shall try therefore in the following article, 1. to give an outline of what passes for the life of Lycurgus; 2. to point out the general features and the character of the Spartan constitution, while for the details we refer once for all to the respective articles in the Dictionary of Antiquities; and 3. to trace the origin of the Spartan constitution.

Aristotle makes Lycurgus to be a contemporary of Iphitus, who lived B.C. 884. In conjunction with Iphitus, Lycurgus is said to have established the sacred armistice of Olympia, which prohibited all wars during the Olympic festivals, and protected the territory of the Eleians for ever against all hostile attacks. (Müller, Dor. i. 7. § 7.) Xenophon differs widely from Aristotle in placing Lycurgus more than 200 years earlier, that is, at the time of the Heracleids. (Xen. Rep. Lac. x. 1.) Timæus, perhaps in order to remove the difficulty, assumed that there were two Lycurgi. (Plut. Lyc. 1.) It appears from these discrepancies that the name of Lycurgus did not occur in the list of Spartan kings, which belongs to the oldest documents of Greek history (Müller, Dor. i. 7. § 3.) Therefore it is intelligible how Herodotus could (i. 65) call Lycurgus the guardian of his nephew, Labotas, the Eurysthenid; whilst Simonides (Aelian, V. H. ix. 41) calls him the son of Prytanis, brother of Eunomus, the Proclid, Dionysius (ii. 49) makes him to be uncle to Eunomus; and the common account (Plut. Lyc. 2; Arist. Pol. ii. 7. 1; Ephor. op. Strab. x. p. 482) the son of Eunomus, and guardian of his nephew Chariæus. Sparta was in a state of anarchy and licentiousness, perhaps in consequence of the conquest of Laconia, at a time when the victorious Dorians, finding themselves in a new position, in the midst of a conquered and subject population, and in a comparatively rich land, had not yet been able to accommodate their old forms of government to their new situation. There were conflicts between the kings, who aspired to tyranny, and the people, anxious for democratic reforms. (Arist. Pol. v. 8. § 4; Heracl. Pont. c. 2; Plut. Lyc. 2.) At this juncture the king, Polydectes, the brother of Lycurgus, died, leaving his queen with child. The ambitious woman proposed to Lycurgus to destroy her yet unborn offspring if he would share the throne with her. He seemingly consented; but when she had given birth to a son, he openly proclaimed him king; and as next of kin, acted as his guardian. But to avoid all suspicion of ambitious designs, with which the opposite party charged him, and which might seem to be confirmed by the untimely death of the young king, Lycurgus left Sparta, and set out on his celebrated journey, which, almost like the wanderings of Hercules, has been magnified to a fabulous extent. He is said to have visited Crete, and there to have studied the wise laws of Minos, and of his Dorian kinsmen. Thence he repaired to Asia Minor, where he derived not less instruction from comparing the dissolute manners of the Ionians with the simple and honest hardihood of the Dorian race. Here he is said to have met either with Homer himself, or at least with the Homeric poems, which he introduced into the mother country. But not content with the Grecian world, he is further said to have penetrated into Egypt, the land of mystery from the days of Herodotus to our own, and therefore duly entitled to claim the authorship of everything the origin of which was or seemed obscure; and he is even reported to have been carried by his curiosity into Libya, Iberia, and India, and to have brought back to rugged Lacedæmon and his Spartan warriors the philosophy of the gymnosophists. It is useless for criticism to try to invalidate these accounts. Their very extravagance sufficiently proves their falsehood. The return of Lycurgus to Sparta was hailed by all parties, since he was considered as the man who alone could cure the growing disease of the state. He undertook the task: yet before he set to work he strengthened himself with the authority of the Delphic oracle, and with a strong party of influential men at Sparta, who were able in case of need to support his measures with their arms. The reform seems not to have been carried altogether peaceably. The new division of all the land among the citizens must have violated many existing interests. Plutarch has preserved a statement, that King Charilaus fled into the temple of Athene Chalcioecus; and we may presume (if the whole story can be looked upon as authentic) that this was not from a mere mistake, as Plutarch thinks, but from necessity.

Whatever opposition there was, however, was overborne, and the whole constitution, military and civil, was remodelled. After Lycurgus had obtained for his institutions an approving oracle of the national god of Delphi, he exacted a promise from the people not to make any alterations in his laws before his return. And now he left Sparta to finish his life in voluntary exile, in order that his countrymen might be bound by their oath to preserve his constitution inviolate for ever. Where and how he died nobody could tell. He vanished from the earth like a god, leaving no traces behind but his spirit; and he was honoured as a god at Sparta with a temple and yearly sacrifices down to the latest times. (Herod. i. 65; Plut. Lyc. 31; Ephor. op. Strab. viii. p. 366.)

The Spartan constitution was of a mixed nature: the monarchical principle was represented by the kings, the aristocracy by the senate, and the democratical element by the assembly of the people, and by their representatives, the ephors. The question has therefore arisen, what the prominent feature of the Spartan constitution was. Plato doubts whether it ought to be called a tyranny, on account of the arbitrary power of the ephors, or a monarchy, on account of the kings; while, at other times, no state seemed more democratical, "although he adds) not to call it an aristocracy (i. e. a government of the ἀριστοι, or best), is altogether absurd." (Leg. iv. p. 712.) So too Isocrates says in his place (p. 270; comp. p. 152, a) that the Spartans had established among themselves an equal democracy, and in another (p. 265, a) that the Spartan government was a democracy mixed with aristocracy. (Comp. Arist. Pol. ii. 6.) Again, Aristotle (Pol. iv. 9) "that the test of a well mixed constitution is the uncertainty of its name: thus a Spartan constitution is sometimes called a democracy, because the rich and poor are treated in the same manner as to education, dress, and food; and because the people have a share in the two highest offices, by electing the one, and being eligible to the other; sometimes an oligarchy, because it has many oligarchical institutions, such as it none of the magistrates are chosen by lot, and a few persons have power to pass sentence of punishment and death." It is evident that the royal prerogatives were on the decline during the whole of the period in which we can follow the rise and fall of events. Even at the earliest stage it was divided between two persons, and was consequently weak. The kings had originally to perform the most important functions of the kings of the heroic age. They were high priests, judges, and leaders in war; in all of these departments they were in course of time superseded more or less. As judges they exercised only a particular branch of jurisdiction, referring to the succession of property. As military commanders they were restricted and watched by commissioners sent by the senate; the functions of high priest were curtailed least, perhaps, because least obnoxious. In compensation for the loss of power, the kings enjoyed great honours, both during their life and after their death, which at Sparta might almost be thought extravagant. Still the principle of monarchy was very weak among the Spartans, although their life resembled more that of the camp than that of a town. Military obedience was nowhere so strictly enforced as at Sparta, but nowhere was the commander himself so much restricted by law and custom.

It is more difficult to decide whether the aristocratical or the democratical element prevailed. The powers of the senate were very important: they had the right of originating and discussing all measures before they could be submitted to the decision of the popular assembly; the management of foreign policy and the most important part of the administration was entrusted to them (Isocr. Pan. p. 265, a; Dionys. ii. 14; Paus. iii. 11. § 2; Aeschin. in Tim. p. 25. 36); they had, in conjunction with the ephors, to watch over the due observance of the laws and institutions; and they were judges in all criminal cases, without being bound by any written code. For all this they were not responsible, holding their office for life, a circumstance which Aristotle (Pol. ii. 6, § 17) strongly censures.

But with all these powers, the elders formed no real aristocracy. They were not chosen either for property qualification or for noble birth. The senate was open to the poorest citizen, who, during 60 years, had been obedient to the laws and zealous in the performance of his duties. (Arist. Pol. ii. 6. § 15.) Tyrannical habits are not acquired at such an age and after such a life; party spirit cannot exist but in a close corporation, separated from the rest of the community by peculiar interests. Thus, in Sparta, during its better days, the elements of an aristocracy were wanting. The equal division of property was alone sufficient to prevent it. The only aristocracy was one of merit and personal influence, such as will and must always exist.

There are mentioned, however, a class of citizens called the equals, or peers (ὅμοιοι) (Xen. Hell. iii. 3, § 4, &c.; de Rep. Lacod. x. 4, with the note of Haase), who may appear to have formed an exclusive body, possessed of peculiar privileges. But these ὅμοιοι must be regarded as those Spartans who had not suffered a diminution of their political rights, who were not ὑπομειλότες or ἐτίμοι, as such citizens were called at Athens; afterwards perhaps the word was used in contradistinction from emancipated slaves, who were not admitted to all the civil privileges of the genuine Spartans. These equals perhaps formed also the lesser assembly mentioned by Xenophon (Hell. iii. 3, 8. ἡ μικρὰ ἐκκλησία) (see Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterth. § 55, p. 464; Hermann, § 28); but were by no means an aristocratical body.

The mass of the people, that is, the Spartans of pure Doric descent, formed the sovereign power of the state. From them emanated all particular delegated authority, except that of the kings, which indeed was theoretically based on what may be called divine right, but, as we have seen, derived its strength in every particular part from the consent of the people. The popular assembly consisted of every Spartan of 30 years of age, and of unblemished character; only those were excluded who had not the means of contributing their portion to the sysitia. (Arist. Pol. ii. 7, 4.) They met at stated times, to decide on all important questions brought before them, after a previous discussion in the senate. They had no right of amendment, but only that of simple approval or rejection, which was given in the rudest form possible, by shouting. A law of the kings, Theopompus and Polydorus, during the first Messenian war, modified the constitutional power of the assembly; but it is difficult to ascertain the exact meaning of the old law preserved by Plutarch, which regulated this point. (Plut. Lyc. 6.) It seems to have authorised the magistrates to refuse any amendments being made by the people, so that if this right existed before by law or custom, it was now abolished; or if it had been illegally assumed, it was again suppressed. The want of this right shows that the Spartan democracy was moderate as well as its monarchy and aristocracy, for the right of amendment, enjoyed by a popular assembly such as existed at Athens, is almost the last stage of licentious ochlocracy. But it must be confessed that the sovereign people of Sparta had neither frequent nor very important occasions for directly exerting their sovereign power. Their chief activity consisted in delegating it; therefore the importance of the ephors, who were the representatives of the popular element of the constitution, rose so high, in proportion as the kings lost their ancient prerogatives. The ephors answer in every characteristic feature to the Roman tribunes of the people. Their origin was lost in obscurity and insignificance, and at the end they had engrossed the whole power of the state, although they were not immediately connected with military command. Their institution is variously attributed to Lycurgus (Herod. i. 65) and Theopompus (Plut. Lyc. 7), who is said to have had in view the perpetuation of monarchy, through the diminution of its rights. The ephors were ancient officers for the regulation of police and minor law-suits. It is significant that their origin is ascribed to Theopompus, who diminished the power of the popular assembly. Consequently, as the people in a body withdrew more and more from the immediate exercise of sovereign power, this power was vested in their representatives, the ephors, who, in behalf of the people, now tend to the kings the oath of allegiance, and receive from them the oath of obedience to the laws. They rise paramount to kings and people, and acquire a censorial, inquisitorial, and judicial power, which authorizes them, either summarily to impose fines on the magistrates, and even kings, or to suspend their functions, or to impeach and arrest them, and bring them to trial before themselves and the senate. On account of this excess of power, Aristotle says that their power was tyrannical, and justly so; for they exercised the sovereign power of the people, who were in themselves the source of all law.

It may surprise us, that the Spartan constitution, which contained such a strong democratical element, was always looked upon in Greece as the model of a perfect aristocracy, and that Sparta invariably throughout the whole history of her incessant wars supported aristocratical institutions against the aggressions of democracy. She always took the lead of the aristocratical, as Athens did of the democratical party. The reason is, that the Dorians in general, and particularly the Spartans, considered good order (κόσμος) as the first requisite in the state. (Müller, Dor. iii. 1. § 1, 10.) They preferred order, even coupled with suppression, to anarchy and confusion. The Spartan willingly yielded during his whole life, and in every situation, to military discipline, and submitted unconditionally to established authority. Müller says (L. c.) "the Doric state was a body of men acknowledging one strict principle of order and one unalterable rule of manners; and to subjecting themselves to this system, that scarcely anything was unfettered by it, but every action was influenced and regulated by the recognised principles." And this was not an unaccountable fancy, a predilection, a favourite pursuit; but on it was based the security of the whole Spartan commonwealth. The Spartans were a small number of lords among a tenfold horde of slaves and subjects. To maintain this position, every feature in the constitution, down to the minutest detail, was calculated. (Thuc. iv. 3; Arnold, Second Appendix to his Thucydidea.)

With reference to their subjects, the few Spartans formed a most decided aristocracy; and to maintain their dominion, they had to preserve order and concord among themselves. Nothing was so dangerous as a turbulent popular assembly, nothing could tempt so much either the subject population to aspire to equality, or a demagogue to procure it for them, and thus to acquire tyrannical power for himself. In the relative position of the Spartans to their subjects, we discover the key to all their institutions and habits: the whole of their history was formed by this single circumstance.

When the Dorians had conquered Peloponnesus, they appear to have granted at first mild conditions to the conquered inhabitants, which in Argolis, Sicyon, Corinth, and Messenia allowed both races to coalesce in course of time. (Isocrat. Panath. p. 270, a. b. 286, a.; Ephorus, ap. Strab. viii. § 4; Arnold, 2nd appendix. to Thucyd. p. 641; Müll. Dor. iv. 4, § 3.) But in Sparta this partial equality of rights was soon overthrown. Part of the old Achæans, under the name of periœci, were allowed indeed to retain their personal liberty, but they lost all civil rights, and were obliged to pay to the state a rent for the land that was left them. They were subject to Spartan magistrates, and compelled to serve as heavy-armed soldiers, by the side of the Spartans, in wars which did not concern them. But still they might be considered fortunate in comparison with the Helots, for their want of political rights was compensated to some extent by greater individual liberty than even the Spartans enjoyed. (Müll. Dor. iii. 2.) Those, however, of the old inhabitants who had through obstinacy and continued resistance exasperated the Dorians, were reduced to a state of perfect slavery, different from that of the slaves of Athens and Rome, and more similar to the villanage of the feudal ages. They were allotted together with patches of land, to which they were bound, to individual members of the ruling class. They tilled the land, with their wives and children, and paid a fixed rent to their masters, not as the periœci to the state (Plut. Lyc. 8); they followed the Spartans as light-armed soldiers in war, and were in every respect regarded as the ever available property of the citizens, who through the labour of their bondsmen were enabled to indulge in unlimited leisure themselves. But the number of these miserable creatures was large. (Müll. Dor. iii. 3, § 6.) At Plataeae every Spartan was accompanied by seven Helots; and they were by no means so different in race, language, and accomplishments, either from one another or from their masters, as were the slaves of Athens or Rome, bought from various barbarous countries, a motley mass, that was easily kept down. Such slaves were very rare at Sparta. (Müll. Dor. iii. 3, § 2.) The Helots assumed the appearance of a regular class in the state, and became both useful and formidable to their masters: their moral claims for enfranchisement were much stronger than those of the Athenian slaves. The resistance of their ancestors to the invading Dorians was forgotten in course of time, and in the same proportion the injustice of their degraded state became more and more flagrant and insupportable; therefore the Helots yielded only a reluctant obedience so long as it could be enforced. They kept a vigilant look-out for the misfortunes of their masters, ever ready to shake off their yoke, and would gladly "have eaten the flesh of the Spartans raw." Hence we hear of constant revolts or attempts at revolts on the side of the oppressed, and of all possible expedients for keeping them down on the side of the oppressors. No cruelty was too flagrant or too cruel to accomplish this end. We need only revert to the hateful crypteia, an institution which authorised select bands of Spartan youths to range the country in all directions armed with daggers, and secretly to despatch those of the Helots who were ungrateful to their masters. (See Dict. of Ant. v.) But when this quiet massacre worked too slowly, wholesale slaughters were resorted to. Thucydides (iv. 80) relates an act of tyranny, the cruelty of which is increased by the mystery it surrounds it. By a promise of manumission, most impatient and dangerous of the Helots were induced to come forward to claim this high reward for their former services in war, and then were all secretly despatched, about 2000 in number. The face of such a heinous cowardly crime, it is difficult to be persuaded by Müller, who (Dor. 3, § 3) attempts to make out that the slavery of the Helots was far milder than it is represented. It had been, it would have been borne more patiently. But after the great earthquake in B.C. 464 we find that the Messenian Helots took advantage of the confusion at Sparta, seized upon the towns of Thuria and Aethaea, and fortified Ithome, where they long held out against all the power of Sparta. (Thuc. i. 100.) After the taking of Pylos, in the Spartans and Athenians concluded an alliance for fifty years, it was stipulated that if the Helots should revolt, the Athenians should assist the Spartans with all their forces. (Comp. Thuc. 8, v. 14, 23; Arist. Pol. ii. 6, § 2.) Similar rebellions often occur in after-times. After the battle of Leuctra, many of the Perioeci and all the Helots revolted to the Thebans. They kept his character to the very last, when they joined the Romans in the war, which extinguished the independence of Sparta.

It is unnecessary to go much into detail. Enough has been said to show, that as long as Sparta was doomed to maintain her tyrannical ascendancy over her subject population, all her institutions have united to accomplish this one end. And, indeed, was the case. In the first place we need wonder no more at the co-existence of the three political elements of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, which, although varying at times in their relative positions, were on the whole preserved as integral parts of the constitution, none being entirely crushed by the other; and therefore caused the discrepancy of the ancients in calling the Spartan constitution either a monarchy, or an aristocracy, or a democracy. It was the fear of their common enemy that kept all those unanimously together, who were within the precincts of the privileged class. The same forbearance was shown in Sparta by the people, who constitutionally possessed the sovereign power, as that which we see existing in Rome for a long period after the comitia of the tribes had unlimited power in enacting and abolishing laws. As in Rome it was the danger of foreign wars which induced the people to resign into the hands of a select body, the senate, that prerogative which they constitutionally possessed, so at Sparta the assembly of the people voluntarily withdrew from the immediate exercise of all the powers it might have assumed, because they saw that they must, and that they could with safety entrust the management of public affairs to a few men who were themselves as much interested as the whole people in supporting the dominion of Sparta. In comparison with these subjects, indeed, every Spartan was a noble, and thus the Spartan constitution might on this account be termed an aristocracy, as well as that of the early Roman republic. Arnold, in his 2nd Appendix to his Thucydides, considers this the ground on which the Spartan government was looked upon in Greece as the model aristocracy, and always took the lead of the aristocratical against the democratical party. But G. C. Lewis (in the Philol. Mus. vol. ii. p. 56, &c.) has satisfactorily refuted this supposition, and shown that the condition of slaves and perioeci never came into consideration with ancient politicians in determining the nature of a government, but that only the body politic, which comprised the citizens of full right, was taken notice of. Thus, Plato says, that Sparta was an aristocracy, not by reason of the perioeci, but of the gerontes: and when he, Isocrates, and others, call it democratic, they allude to the power of the whole Spartan order in making laws and in electing magistrates, to the equality of education, to the public tables, &c., which are democratical institutions in relation to the body of Spartans, though they were aristocratical in respect of the perioeci and helots (Phil. Mus. vol. ii. p. 60). This is very true; but nevertheless it was their dominion over their subjects, which fostered originally among the Spartans that predilection for aristocratical institutions in other parts of Greece, because they were accustomed to consider them as the support of order and quiet, in opposition to the restless spirit of democracy.

If we go more into the details of the institutions of Sparta, we find in the military aspect of the whole body of citizens, or rather soldiers, another striking result of this operative cause at the bottom of the whole political system. The Spartans formed, as it were, an army of invaders in an enemy's country, their city was a camp, every man a soldier, and very properly called ἐμπόριος from his seventeenth to his sixtieth year. The peaceful life in the city was subjected to more restraints and hardships than the life during a real campaign, for the military institutions of Sparta were not intended to enable her to make foreign conquests, but to maintain those she had already made. Sparta, although constantly at war, made no conquests after the subjection of Messenia; all her wars may be called defensive wars, for their object was chiefly to maintain her commanding position, as the head of the Hellenic race.

In an army nothing can be of higher importance than subordination. Hence it was the pride of the Spartans, as king Archidamus (Isocrat. § 81, p. 132, Steph.) said, "that they excelled in Greece, not through the size of their city, nor through the number of their citizens, but because they lived like a well-disciplined army, and yielded a willing obedience to their magistrates." We have seen already that these magistrates, and the ephors of later times in particular, were entrusted with very extensive power. They resembled less consuls or tribunes, than dictators, chosen in time of need and danger.

Another striking feature in the government of Sparta was the excessive degree to which the interference of the state was carried, a practice never realised to such an extent in any other government, before or after, except in the ideal states of Plato and other philosophers. In a constitutional monarchy, such as England, people know not from experience what state-interference is; but even in the most absolute monarchies of the Continent, where people complain that the state meddles with everything, nothing short of a revolution would immediately follow the attempt at an introduction of anything only distantly similar to the state-interference of Sparta. The whole mode of viewing things at present is different, nay the reverse of what it was then. We maintain that the state exists for the sake of its individual citizens; at Sparta, the citizen only existed for the state,—he had no interest but the state's, no will, no property, but that of the state. Hence the extraordinary feature in Sparta, that not only equality, but even community of property, existed to an extent which is unequalled in any other age or country. Modern politicians dread nothing more than the spreading of communism or socialism. In Sparta it was laid down as a fundamental principle of the constitution, that all citizens were entitled to the enjoyment of an equal portion of the common property. We know that such a state of things could not exist in our age for a single moment, and even all the vigilance and severity of Sparta was unable to prevent in course of time the accumulation of property in a few hands; but that it could at all exist there to a certain degree for a long period, can again only be accounted for by the existence of the same cause to which we must trace all the institutions of Sparta. It was devised for securing to the commonwealth a large number of citizens and soldiers, free from the toils and labours for their sustenance, and able to devote their whole time to warlike exercises, in order so to keep up the ascendancy of Sparta over her perioeci and helots; and on the other hand, it was the toils and labours of the perioeci and helots which alone could supply the state with a stock of property available for an equal distribution among the citizens. Where no such subject population existed, it would have been a fruitless attempt to introduce the Spartan constitution.

The Spartans were to be warriors and nothing but warriors. Therefore not only all mechanic labour was thought to degrade them, and only to become their slaves; not only was husbandry, the pride of the noblest Romans, despised and neglected, trade and manufactures kept off like a contagious disease, all intercourse with foreign nations prevented, or at least impeded, by laws prohibiting Spartans to travel and foreigners to come to Laconia, and by the still more effective means of the iron money; but also the nobler arts and sciences, which might have adorned and sweetened the leisure of the camp, as the lyre soothed the grief of Achilles, were so effectually stifled, that Sparta is a blank in the history of the arts and literature of Greece, and has contributed nothing to the instruction and enjoyment of mankind. What little trade and art there was in Laconia was left to the care of an oppressed race, the Lacedæmonians provincials, who received little or no encouragement from Sparta, and never rose to any distinction.

But the sort of state interference which is the most repulsive to our feelings, and the most objectionable on moral and political grounds, was that which was exercised in the sanctuary of that circle which forms the basis of every state, the family. It is evident that, in order to maintain their superiority, the Spartans were obliged to keep up their numbers; even the most heroic valour and the best organisation of military discipline would fail to perpetuate the subjection of the Helots, if these should ever outnumber their lords too disproportionately. We have seen that, to prevent this, by thinning their ranks, the most barbarous and iniquitous policy was pursued. But even this was inefficient, and it was necessary to devise means for raising the number of citizens as well as lessening that of the slaves. Sparta seems never to have suffered from a dread of over population. It is the fate of all close corporations, which admit no new element from without, to decrease in number more in number, as, for instance, the body of patricians in Rome.

The Spartans were particularly jealous of the political franchise, and consequently their numbers rapidly diminished. In her better days Sparta mustered from 8000 to 10,000 heavy-armed men (Herod. vii. 234; Arist. Pol. ii. 6. 12); but in days of Aristotle this number had sunk to 1000 (Arist. Pol. ii. 6. § 11); and king Agis, who attempted his reform, found only 700. (Plut. Agis. 5.) Even as early as the time of Lycurgus Sparta must have felt a decrease of citizens, for him is ascribed a law which rewarded a father who had three children with release from military service, and one of four children with freedom from all taxes to the state. (Arist. Pol. ii. 6. 13. Compare, however, Manso, Sparta, i. 1, p. 128, who doubts that this was a law of Lycurgus.) But the mere increase of a citizen was of little use to the community, in order to be of efficient service, he must have a strong healthy body, sufficient property in land to enable him to live as a soldier, and he must, moreover, be trained in the regular Spartan state education, which alone could form the true Spartan citizen. From these causes were derived the laws regulating marriage, the division of property and education. Every citizen was bound to marry, in order to give citizens to the state; and he must marry neither too early nor too late, nor an unsuitable woman. (Mills iv. 4. § 3.) The king Archidamus, for instance, freed because he married a short woman (Plut. de Educad. 2), from whom no kings, but only kinglings (Basilissai), could be expected. To the matrimonial alliance so little sanctity was attached for its own sake, that it was sacrificed without scruple to maxims of state policy or private expediency (Plut. Lyc. 15; comp. Polyb. in Mai's Nov. Coll. Fd. Scriptor. ii. p. 384.); a regular family life was rendered impossible by the husband's continual absence from home, either in the gymnasia, or at the chase, or at the Syssitia and Leaschae. Women were excluded from the common meals of the men. It was considered disreputable for the husband to be seen much in the company of his wife (Xen. de Rep. Lac. i. 5); his whole existence was engrossed by his public duties. The chief and only object of marriage was the procreation of a healthy offspring to supply the state with good citizens. Hence those regulations, so shocking to our feelings, which authorised a weak or old husband to admit a strong man to his matrimonial rights; or those which provided a widow, who had not yet any children, to supply her husband's place with a man (probably a slave), and to produce heirs and successors to the deceased. (Xen. Rep. Lac. i. 6; Müll. Dor. iii. 10. § 4.) In Sparta it was considered an act of unanimity that, when Leonidas was sent to Thermopylae, he left as a legacy to his wife, Gorgo, the maxim, "Marry nobly, and produce a noble offspring" (Plut. de Herod. Malign. 32, p. 321, Lac. Apophth. p. 216, fr. p. 355); and when Acrotatus had fought bravely in the war against Pyrrhus, the women followed him through the town; and some of the older ones shouted after him: "Go, Acrotatus, enjoy yourself with Chelidonia, and beget valiant sons for Sparta." (Plut. Pyrrh. 28.)

We cannot blame the Spartans so much for the laws which disposed of the hands of heiresses without in the least taking notice of their individual inclinations. The laws regarding this point were pretty nearly alike in most ancient Greek states, as every where the maintenance of the existing families and properties was considered of primary importance to the welfare of the state. Hence at Sparta the next in kin had a right and was bound to marry an heiress, and to continue her father's family. (Müll. Dor. iii. 10. § 4.)

But that branch of social life in which Sparta stood most aloof from the rest of Greece and the world was the education of her citizens, young and old; for the education of the Spartan was not confined to his youth, but extended nearly throughout his whole life. The syssitia, or, as they were called at Sparta, phiditia, the common meals, may be regarded as an educational institution; for at these meals subjects of general interest were discussed and political questions debated, so that they were not a bad school in politics and laws for the citizens. The discussions on these occasions may have been a sort of compensation for the silence that was imposed on the popular assembly; they may to some extent have answered the purpose of the Roman contiones, and of the public press of our days. And they were the more efficient for such purposes, as friends and relations generally, to the number of fifteen, formed companies for dining together at one table, into which companies fresh members were only admitted by unanimous election. These traiptai (as they were called by the Dorians in Crete) formed a sort of elementary division of the army, and a political body, bound together by the ties of friendship and mutual esteem. The youths and boys used to eat separately from the men in their own divisions. For a concise view of the Spartan system of education see Thirlwall's Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 327.

The organisation of the Spartan army, the climax of all their political institutions and social arrangements, which we have now reviewed, is treated of in the Dict. of Ant., so that we can here dispense with a repetition of its details. It was more perfect than any other in Greece, and procured to Sparta an authority among Greeks and barbarians, which the envy and hatred of her bitterest enemies could not but acknowledge. As long as Sparta could supply her armies with a sufficient number of genuine Spartan citizens they were invincible; but the decline of her free population necessarily drew after it that of her military strength, and after the days of Leuctra and Mantinea she never rose to that eminence she had proudly occupied after the battle of Platæne or Aegospotami.

We now return to the more immediate subject of this article, and inquire how far the framing of the constitution of Sparta must be attributed to Lycurgus. This inquiry is not a useless speculation, but will serve to throw additional light on the character of that extraordinary political organisation, as we shall have to determine whether it was a spontaneous result of the Dorian character and the peculiar circumstances of the Spartan Dorians, or whether it was stamped upon them by the hand of a superior genius, without whose interference the course of political development would have run in a different direction.

We have said already that the ancients were unanimous in regarding Lycurgus not only as a real historical person, but also as the originator of all the institutions of Sparta. But their testimony in this respect proves too much. One need only read Xenophon's little work, De Republica Lacædaemoniorum, in order to see the absurdity of ascribing every thing to the lawgiver. According to this view, the Spartans must have lived before Lycurgus without all law, custom, and government, which we know is not true, and cannot be true, or, what would be more wonderful still, Lycurgus had the power of sweeping away every ancient custom, and supplanting it by a whole system of new foreign regulations. To adduce a few instances of this erroneous view, we will mention the institution of the popular assembly, which is ascribed to Lycurgus (Plut. Lyc. 6). There cannot be any doubt that an assembly of the people existed in Sparta from the first, as well as in all other Greek states, even in the heroic ages. A still more essential part of every Greek commonwealth was the council of elders, and yet this also is ascribed to Lycurgus. (Plut. Lyc. 5.) But it is quite ridiculous to say that Lycurgus abolished gold and silver money, and enacted that iron should be the only currency. The first money in Greece was coined about the eighth Olympiad by Pheidon, tyrant of Argos. (Müll. Aegnetica, p. 57.) This was silver money. Gold money was first coined in Asia. The Spartan state at the time of Solon possessed not gold enough to gild the face of the statue of Apollo at Thornax, and sent to Croesus to buy it. (Herod. i. 69.) A similar mistake is made when the institution of the ephors is ascribed to Lycurgus. (Herod. i. 65; Xen. de Rep. Lacæd. 8. § 3.) Other accounts mention the king Theopompus as the author of this magistracy. (Plut. Lyc. 7; Arist. Pol. v. 9.) But neither of the two statements is correct. The office of ephors was common to several Doric states. They were originally officers of police, exercised a civil jurisdiction in minor cases (Müll. Dor. iii. 7), and were doubtlessly coeval with the first origin of the Spartan state.

Such considerations have induced modern critics to examine more carefully the truth of every separate statement, in order thus to arrive at a more correct notion of the influence of the individual mind of a lawgiver on the spirit of the Spartan constitution. Some critics have gone quite to the extreme, and, placing Lycurgus in the same category with Theseus or Romulus, have entirely denied his historical existence, alleging the authority of Helianicus, the most ancient writer on Sparta, who ascribes the Spartan institutions to Procles and Eurysthenes, without even mentioning the name of Lycurgus. (Strab. viii. p. 366.) Other reasons alleged for this view are contained in the divine honours paid to Lycurgus at Sparta, and the significant name of Eunomus, his father, nephew, or brother, according to different accounts. We are not inclined to go all the length of this argument; we allow with the soberest modern historians the reality of Lycurgus, but in order to limit the exaggerations of the ancients, we adduce the following considerations, which tend to show that by far the greater part of the regulations which are commonly ascribed to Lycurgus arose, independently of him, by the spontaneous development of the commonwealth of Sparta.

1. It is a general and obvious remark, that people have a propensity to ascribe to prominent individuals the sayings and doings of a great many less celebrated persons, and to make these individuals the representatives of whole ages. This propensity is more especially peculiar to an age of primitive simplicity, ignorance, and poetry. A prosaical, analysing, scientific research, dispels such delusions. We no longer imagine that Romulus selected out of his motley crowd of fugitives some few whom he made patricians, nor that he devised the division of the people into tribes and curiae, nor that Numa invented religious rites wholly anomalous with the existing institutions; we know now that the twelve tables of the decemvirs contained little, if anything, that was new, and only reduced to a concise, fixed form the laws which were formerly only partially and imperfectly written down. If we lived in an age similar to the early period of Grecian history, there can be no doubt that the Code Napoleon would soon be regarded in the same light in which the ancients regarded the legislation of Lycurgus. It would be considered to have entirely emanated from one individual mind, without having any connection with previous institutions. Such being the case, we naturally hesitate before we admit all that we hear about the legislation of Lycurgus.

2. Our doubts will be reasonably confirmed by the observation, that the chief part of that reform which is ascribed to Lycurgus consists not in definite regulations concerning the functions of the various magistrates, the administration, criminal or civil law, in short, the purely political organisation of the state; but in the peculiar direction he is said to have given to the nature of private life, to the manners and customs, modes of thinking and feeling of his countrymen. Now it is evident that the power of any individual lawgiver must in this point be very limited, since these things are only the outward appearance of a nation's character, which it would be just as easy to alter by legal enactments as a negro lawgiver might by the same means change the black colour of his countrymen or their woolly hair. No power on earth could induce the population of any town or village in modern Europe to adopt the manner of life of the ancient Spartans, granting that this were otherwise possible; and we are equally positive in asserting that the influence of Lycurgus on the character of his countrymen, however great it may have been, could never materially alter their peculiar mode of life.

3. The difficulty of influencing a political community in almost every concern of public and private life by legal enactments is still further increased, if we consider the means at the disposal of a lawgiver in the time of Lycurgus. We know well the difficulty there is in putting in force a single new law. What could Lycurgus have done without all the means of modern times, without a nicely arranged administration, without even the art of writing? This art, although existing at that time, was not used for fixing and preserving the laws of Lycurgus. A particular rhetra forbade the use of it. (Plut. Lyc. 13.) The laws were transmitted by word of mouth, and existed only in the memory and hearts of the citizens. Is it possible that a great number of them could originate at once? We know a few of the rhetrae ascribed to Lycurgus. They lay down simply the broad fundamental features of the constitution. All the detail, it appears, was left to be regulated by the prevailing sentiment among the Spartans.

4. What we have said with regard to the tendency of all the institutions of Sparta, viz. that their object was to keep down a large subject population, and that they were necessary for this purpose, is at the same time an argument for doubting the influence of Lycurgus. Sparta assumed from the time of the invasion of Peloponnesus the attitude of a conqueror. The Helots existed before the time of Lycurgus, and consequently also the contrivances of the Spartan state to keep them in subjection. The only thing that we can allow is, that before the time of Lycurgus these institutions were in a state of development, and varying at various times and occasions; and that they were finally settled in the reform which the whole state underwent through Lycurgus. We hear of disorders that prevailed at Sparta, of quarrels between the community (people) and the king (Plut. Lyc. 2), of the tyranny of king Charilaus (Arist. Pol. v. 10. § 3), which was put an end to by the establishment of an aristocracy; at the same time we read of an equal division of land, so opposed to the spirit of aristocracy. The easiest explanation of these traditions is that given by bishop Thiersch (Hist. of Gr. vol. i. p. 297), that the quarrels were not among the Spartans themselves, but between them and the Laconian provincials, many of whom were only recently subjected, or still independent. "It seems not improbable that it was reserved for Lycurgus finally to settle the relative position of the several classes" (p. 300). This theory appears the more correct, as it is evident from the comparison of other Dorian states in Peloponnesus and Crete, that the peculiar character of the Dorians race developed itself purely only in those countries where, as in Crete, the Dorians were prevented from mixing with other races. In proportion as they amalgamated with the conquered the Dorian character disappeared, as, for instance, in Corinth, Argos, and Messenia. If therefore Sparta owed to Lycurgus the confirmation of her political ascendancy over her subjects, and was thus enabled to preserve and develop the original Dorian character, it is explained how Lycurgus could be regarded as the originator of things which in reality he was only accessory in upholding.

5. There is one consideration more to corroborate the view which we take of Lycurgus. We have just mentioned, that the institutions of Sparta were originally not peculiar to her alone, but were common to the whole Dorian race. Müller, in his Dorians, has proved this point beyond all doubt. He adduces Pindar (iii. 1. § 7), who mentions (Pyth. i. 61) that Hieron the Syracusan wished to establish the new city of Aetna upon the genuine Doric principles. He founded it "with heavenly freedom, according to the laws of the Hylian model," i.e. after the example of the Spartan constitution; "for the descendants of Pamphilus and of the Heracleidae, who dwell under the brow of Taygetus, wish always to retain the Doric institutions of Argimus." This passage is as decisive as can be to prove that the laws of Sparta were considered the true Doric institutions. (Comp. Hermann, Pol. Ant. § 20, 1.) Müller has enlarged upon this subject by tracing remnants of the same Doric institutions in other Doric states, where, as we have seen, they are found effaced more or less, through the admission of strangers to the right of citizenship. But in Crete these institutions were reserved in their full purity to such an extent, that the ancients unanimously made Lycurgus the author of his laws from his Cretan kinmen. Strab. x. p. 737, a.; Hoeck, Kreta, iii. p. 11. "here existed in that island Helots (called ἀπαμωνοί or μωρατοί), subject provincials (δμηκοί), systematic, all nearly on the same principles as in Sparta. The Cretan education resembled that of Sparta in every feature, in short, the whole aspect of political, and still more that of social life, was the same in these countries, whence Plato called their laws ἀποδωμένους. (Plat. de Leg. iii. p. 683, a.; comp. Pol. ii. 7. § 1.) But, far from discovering this circumstance a proof that Sparta borrowed her laws from Crete, we recognise in those of the latter country only another independent development of the Doric institutions (Herm. Pol. Ant. § 10), without however denying that of which we have no positive proof, that Lycurgus in his reforms have had in view the similar organisation of the kindred tribe. (Müll. Dor. iii. 1. § 8.) For this purpose it can be indifferent to us whether, as Müller thinks, the Dorians migrated into Crete from the district of mount Olympus long before the Trojan war, so that Minos would be a Dorian, and legislation founded on Doric principles (Müll. i. 9), or whether the Dorians only came into the country sixty or eighty years after their conquest of Epaminondas under Pollis and Althaemenes (Diod. 60, v. 80), according to Hoeck (Kreta, ii. 5).

To sum up our opinion in a few words, we would state, that although we do not deny the historical reality of Lycurgus, or his character as a legislator of Sparta, yet we consider that every thing essential in the Spartan constitution is in its origin independent of Lycurgus. His merit consists partly in fixing the institutions he found, or in re-establishing older regulations, which began to give way, partly in restoring peace by his personal influence, and aiding in establishing or restoring that equal division of property, and that subjection of the conquered under the conquerors, which were essential for preserving the Doric character in its purity.

The ancient literature on Lycurgus is chiefly contained in Plutarch's Lycurgus and Instituta Laconica; Xenophon, de Republica Lacædæmonior. (excellent edition by Fr. Haase, 1833); Aristotle's Politica, ii. 6. Comprehensive collections of all the materials are those of Nic. Cragius (de Republ. Lacædæm. Genev. 1593), and T. Meursius (Miscellanea Laconica, Amst. 1661, and De Regno Laconico, Ultraj. 1687; also in Gronov. Theaur.). Of more recent date are Arnold's 2nd appendix to his Thucydides, on the Spartan Constitution; a review of this by G. C. Lewis, in the Philological Museum, vol. ii.; Manso's Sparta, 1800; Müller's Dorians; Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterth. § 55; Hermann's Political Antiq., where, § 23, the whole literature is given at full length; and Grote's History of Greece, vol. ii. c. 6. [W. I.]

LYCURGUS (Λυκοῦργος). 1. An Athenian, son of Aristolaidas, was the leader of the high oligarchical party, or the party of the plain, while those of the coast and the highlands were headed respectively by Megacles, the Alcmaeonid, and Peisistratus. The government having been usurped by Peisistratus, in B. C. 560, Megacles and Lycurgus coalesced and drove him out in B. C. 554. But they then renewed their dissensions with one another, and the consequence was the restoration of Peisistratus, in B. C. 548, by marriage with the daughter of Megacles. He treated the lady, however, as only nominally his wife, and the Alcmaeonidae, indignant at the insult, again made common cause with Lycurgus, and expelled Peisistratus for the second time, in B. C. 547. (Her. i. 59, &c.)

2. A Lacædæmonian, who, though not of the royal blood, was chosen king, in B. C. 220, together with Agesipolis III., after the death of Cleomenes; in the words of Polybius, "by giving a talent to each of the Ephori, he became a descendant of Heracles and king of Sparta." It was not long before he deposed his colleague and made himself sole sovereign, though under the control of the Ephori. Placed on the throne by the party favourable to Aetolia, he readily listened to the instigations of Machatas, the Aetolian envoy, to make war on Philip V. of Macedon, and the Achæans. Having invaded Argolis and taken several towns, he laid siege to the fortress named Athenæum, in the district of Belbina, claimed by the Megalopolitans as their territory, and took it in consequence of the dilatory conduct of Aratus, to whom it looked for succour, B. C. 219. In the same year he barely escaped with his life from the conspiracy of Chælon, and fled for refuge to Pellene on the western frontier of Laconia. In B. C. 218 he made an incursion into Messenia, simultaneously with the invasion of Thessaly by Dorimachus, the Aetolian, in the hope of drawing Philip away from the siege of Palus in Cephallenia; but Philip, while he himself invaded Aetolia, desired Eperatus, the Achæan general, to go to the relief of the Messenians. Lycurgus effected little in Messenia, and was equally unsuccessful in the same year, in an attempt which he made on the citadel of Tegea, and also in his endeavour to intercept and defeat Philip in the passes of the Menelaion, on his return from his invasion of Laconia. Not long after, he was falsely accused to the Ephori of revolutionary designs, and was obliged to flee to Aetolia for safety. In the following year, however (B. C. 217), the Ephori discovered the groundlessness of the charge and recalled him; and soon after he made an inroad into Messenia, in which he was to have been joined by Pyrrhus, the Aetolian general, but the latter was repulsed in his attempt to pass the frontier, and Lycurgus returned to Sparta without having effected any thing. He died about B. C. 210, and Machanidas then made himself tyrant. (Pol. iv. 2, 35—37, 60, 81, v. 5, 17, 21—23, 29, 91, 92; Paus. iv. 29; Liv. xxxiv. 26.) Lycurgus left a son named Pelops, who was put to death by Nabia, B. C. 205. (Diod. Eac. de Virt. et Vit. p. 570; Valer. and Wess. ad loc.) [E. E.]

LYCURGUS (Λυκούργος), an Attic orator, was born at Athens about B. C. 396, and was the son of Lycophon, who belonged to the noble family of the Eteobutadas. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 841; Suidas, s. v. Λυκούργος; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 268, p. 496, &c.) In his early life he devoted himself to the study of philosophy in the school of Plato, but afterwards became one of the disciples of Isocrates, and entered upon public life at a comparatively early age. He was appointed three successive times to the office of ραπάλα τῆς κοινῆς προόδου, i. e. manager of the public revenue, and held his office each time for five years, beginning with B. C. 337. The conscientiousness with which he discharged the duties of this office enabled him to raise the public revenue to the sum of 1200 talents. This, as well as the unwearied activity with which he laboured both for increasing the security and splendour of the city of Athens, gained for him the universal confidence of the people to such a degree, that when Alexander the Great demanded, among the other opponents of the Macedonian interest, the surrender of Lycurgus also, who had, in conjunction with Demosthenes, exerted himself against the intrigues of Macedonia even as early as the reign of Philip, the people of Athens clung to him, and boldly refused to deliver him up. (Plut. Phot. ll. cc.) He was further entrusted with the superintendence (φύλαξις) of the city and the keeping of public discipline; and the severity with which he watched over the conduct of the citizens became almost proverbial. (Cic. ad Att. i. 13; Plut. Flamin. 12; Amm. Marc. xxii. 9, xxx. 8.) He had a noble taste for every thing that was beautiful and grand, as he showed by the buildings he erected or completed, both for the use of the citizens and the ornament of the city. His integrity was so great, that even private persons deposited with him large sums of money, which they wished to be kept in safety. He was also the author of several legislative enactments, of which he enforced the strictest observance. One of his laws forbade women to ride in chariots at the celebration of the mysteries; and when his own wife transgressed this law, she was fined (Aelian, V. H. xiii. 24); another ordained that bronze statues should be erected to Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, that copies of their tragedies should be made and preserved in the public archives. The Lives of the Ten Orators ascribed to Plutarch (p. 842, &c.) are full of anecdotes and characteristic features of Lycurgus, from which we must infer that he was one of the noblest specimens of old Attic virtue, and a worthy contemporary of Demosthenes. He often appeared as a successful accuser in the Athenian courts, but he himself was as often accused by others, though he always, and even in the last days of his life, succeeded in silencing his enemies. Thus we know that he was attacked by Philinus (Harpocrat. s. v. Σεισάκ), Deinarchus (Dionys. Disarct. 10), Aristogeiton, Menesechmus, and others. He died while holding the office of ἐπιστάτης of the theatre of Dionysus, in A. C. 323. A fragment of an inscription, containing the account which he rendered to the state of his administration of the finances, is still extant. At his death he left behind three sons, by his wife Callisto, who were severely persecuted by Menesechmus and Tharsycles, but were defended by Hyperides and Democles. (Plut. l. c. p. 842, &c.) Among the honours which were conferred upon him, we may mention, that the archon Anaxicrates ordered a bronze statue to be erected to him in the Cerameicus, and that he and his eldest son should be entertained in the prytaneum at the public expense.

The ancients mention fifteen orations of Lycurgus as extant in their days (Plut. l. c. p. 843; Phot. l. c. p. 496, b), but we know the titles of at least twenty. (Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Beredt., Beilage vi. p. 296.) With the exception, however, of one entire oration against Leocrates, and some fragments of others, all the rest are lost, so that our knowledge of his skill and style as an orator is very incomplete. Dionysius and other ancient critics draw particular attention to the ethical tendency of his orations, but they censure the harshness of his metaphors, the inaccuracy in the arrangement of his subject, and his frequent digressions. His style is noble and grand, but neither elegant nor pleasing. (Dionys. V. d. Script. orat. v. 3; Hermogen. De Forma. Orat. ii. p. 500; Dion Chrysost. Or. xviii. p. 256, ed. Mor.) His works seem to have been commented upon by Didymus of Alexandria. (Harpocrat. s. v. τίλωνα, προκρίσις, σπρωτήριον.) Theon (Prolegom. pp. 71, 77) mentions two declamations, 'Ελένης ἔγκλημα and Εὐρυδάτου φόβος, as the works of Lycurgus; but this Lycurgus, if the name be correct, must be a different personage from the Attic orator. The oration against Leocrates, which was delivered in B. C. 330 (Aeschin. adv. Ctesiph. § 93), is printed in the various collections of the Attic orators by Aldus, Stephens, Gruter, Reiske, Dukas, Bekker, Baiter, and Sauppe. Among the separate editions, the following deserve to be mentioned—that of J. Taylor (Cambridge, 1743, 8vo., where it is printed together with Demosthenes' speech against Andrias), C. F. Heinrich (Bonn, 1821, 8vo.), G. Pütz (Leipzig, 1824, 8vo., with a learned introduction, notes, and a German translation), A. G. Beck (Magdeburg, 1821, 8vo.). The best editions are those of Baiter and Sauppe (Turici, 1834, 8vo.) and E. Maetner (Berlin, 1836, 8vo.). Compare G. A. Blume, Narratio de Lycurgo Oratore, Paderborn, 1834, 4to.; A. F. Nissen, De Lycorgi Orationis Vita et Rebus Gestis Dissertatio, Kiel, 1834, 8vo. [L. S.]

LYCUS (Λύκος). 1. One of the sons of Aegisthus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)
2. A son of Poseidon and Cleona, who transferred by his father to the islands of the blessed. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1.)

3. A son of Hyriens, and husband of Dirce, one of the mythical kings of Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 3. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 8.)

4. A tyrant of Thebes, is likewise called by some a son of Poseidon, though Euripides (Herc. Fur. 31) calls him a son of Lycus (No. 2), but makes him come to Thebes from Euboea. In the absence of Heracles, L. had attempted to destroy Megara and her children by Heracles, and killed Creon, king of Thebes, but on the return of Heracles he was killed by him. (Hygin. Fab. 32; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 38.)

5. One of the Telchines, who is said to have gone to Lycia, and there to have built the temple of the Lycian Apollo on the river Xanthus. (Diod. v. 58.)

6. A son of Pandion, and brother of Aegeus, Nisus, and Palamas. He was expelled by Aegeus, and took refuge in the country of the Termili, with Sarpedon. That country was afterwards called, after him, Lycia (Herod. i. 173, vii. 92). He was honoured at Athens as a hero, and the Lyceum derived its name from him. (Paus. i. 19. § 4; Aristoph. Vesp. 408.) He is said to have raised the mysteries of the great goddesses to greater celebrity, and to have introduced them from Attica to Andania in Messenia (Paus. iv. 1. § 4, &c.). He is sometimes also described as an ancient prophet (Paus. iv. 20. § 2, x. 12, in fin.), and the family of the Lycomedes, at Athens, traced their name and origin to him. This family was intimately connected with the Attic mysteries, and possessed chapels in the demus of Phylae and at Andania. (Paus. i. 22. § 7, iv. 1, 4, &c.; Plut. Themist. 1.)

7. A Thracian who was slain by Cygnus in single combat. (Paus. i. 27. § 7.)

8. A king of Lycia, who is said to have intended to sacrifice to Ares, Diomedes, who on his return from Troy was thrown upon the Lycian coast. But Diomedes was saved by the king's daughter Calirhoe. (Plut. Parall. Graec. et Rom. 23.)

9. A son of Daecylus, and king of the Marian-dynasts, was connected with Heracles and the Argonauts by ties of hospitality. (Apollod. i. 9. § 23, ii. 5. § 9; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 139.)

There are two other mythical personages of the name of Lycus. (Ov. Met. xii. 232; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 132.) [L. S.]

LYCUS (Λύκος). 1. Of Pharae, in Achaia, lieutenant-general of the Achaeans, for Aratus, in a. c. 217, defeated EURIPIDES, the Aetolian, who was acting as general of the Eleans. In the same year, Euripides having marched with his Aetolians against Tritaea in Achaia, Lycus invaded Elia, and by a well-planned ambuscade slew 200 Eleans, and carried off 80 prisoners and much spoil. (Polyb. v. 34, 95.)

2. A commander of the Rhodians, who, when the Ceanians had revolted from Rhodes, in b. c. 167, reduced them again to submission. (Polyb. xxx. 5; Liv. xiv. 25.) [E. E.]

LYCUS (Λύκος), of Rhegium, surnamed Bou-phages, the father, real or adoptive, of the poet Lycophron, was an historical writer in the time of Demetrius Phalereus, who, for some unknown reason, aimed at his life. He wrote a history of Libya, and of Sicily, and a work on Alexander the Great. He is quoted by several ancient writers, some of whom ascribe to him also works upon Thebes and upon Nestor, which seem clearly to have been of a mythological character. (Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀπόδρονος, Ζεύς; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 924; Antig. Caryst. 46, 148, 154, 170, 188; Tzetz. Vit. Lycophr.; Schol. ad Lycoph. 615, 1206; Schol. ad Hesiod. Theog. 326; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 111, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. p. 484.) [P. S.]

LYCUS (Λύκος), the name of two physicians who have generally been confounded together.

1. A native of Napi s, who is quoted by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. pp. 66, 214), and who must therefore have lived in or before the former half of the first century after Christ. He appears to have commented on the whole or part of the Hippocratic Collection, as the second book of his commentary on the treatise "De Locis in Homine," is quoted by Erotianus, but none of his writings are still extant. He is also quoted by Pliny (xx. 83).

2. A native of M cedonia, who was a pupil of Quintus, in the former half of the second century after Christ (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136; De Muscul. Dissect. vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 1000; De Libr. Propr. c. 2, vol. xix. p. 22), and who may perhaps be the person said by Galen (De Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 143; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. 7, vol. xvi. p. 82) to have belonged to the sect of the Empirici. Galen speaks of him as a contemporary, but says he was never personally acquainted with him. (De Anat. Admin. iv. 10, vol. ii. p. 471.) He wrote some anatomical works, which are several times quoted and alluded to by Galen, who says they enjoyed some reputation, but had many errors in them. (De Natur. Facult. i. 17; De Anat. Admin. i. 3, iv. 6, 10, vol. ii. pp. 727, 449, 470; De Urs. Part. v. 8, vol. iii. p. 366; Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." ii. 36, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 966; De Muscul. Dissect. vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 926, 933.) He also composed a commentary on some of the treatises of the Hippocratic Collection, viz., the Aphorisms (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." iii. praef. vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 562), De Morbis Popularibus (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." i. 4, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 502), and De Humoribus (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. 24, vol. xvi. p. 197), but is accused by Galen of misunderstanding and misrepresenting the sense of Hippocrates. (De Ord. Libr. suor. vol. xix. pp. 57, 58.) Galen wrote a short treatise in defence of one of the Aphorisms of Hippocrates (i. 14, vol. iii. p. 710), directed against Lycus, which is still extant (vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 196, &c.), and in which he seems to treat his adversary with unjustifiable harshness and severity. (See Littré, Oeuvres d'Hippocr. vol. i. pp. 96, 106, 107.) He is quoted also by Paulus Aegineta (v. 3, 12, pp. 536, 540), Oribasius (Synops. iii. p. 57, Coll. Med. ix. 25, p. 378), and in Dietz's Scholion in Hippocr. et Galen. vol. ii. pp. 344, 356. [W. A. G.]

LYDIADES (Λυδιδης). There is, however, considerable doubt whether this or Λυδιδης is the more correct form of the name. (See Schweigh. ad Polyb. ii. 44.) 1. A citizen of Megalopolis, who, though of an obscure family, raised himself while yet a young man to the sovereignty of his native city. We know nothing of the steps by which he rose to power, but he is represented to us as a man of an ambitious but generous character, who was misled by false rhetorical arguments to believe a monarchical government to be the best for his fellow-citizens. (Plut. Arat. 30; Paus. viii. 27. § 12.) So far as we are able to judge, his elevation appears to have taken place about the time that Antigonus Gonatas made himself master of Corinth, B.C. 244. (Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 372.) We find him mentioned by Pausanias as one of the commanders of the forces of Megalopolis at the battle of Mantinea against Agis IV., king of Sparta (Paus. viii. 10. §§ 6, 10); but the date of that battle is unknown. From his being associated on that occasion with another general, Leocydes, we may perhaps infer that he had not then established himself in the absolute power. If the date above assigned to the commencement of his reign be correct, he had held the sovereign power about ten years, when the progress of the Achaean league and the fame attained by Aratus as its leader, led him to form projects more worthy of his ambition; and after the fall of Aristippus, tyrant of Argos, instead of waiting till he should be attacked in his turn, he determined voluntarily to abdicate the sovereignty, and permit Megalopolis to join the Achaean league as a free state. This generous resolution was rewarded by the Achaeans by the election of Lydiades to be strategus or commander-in-chief of the confederacy the following year, B.C. 233. (Concerning the date see Droysen, vol. ii. p. 438.) His desire of fame, and wish to distinguish the year of his command by some brilliant exploit, led him to project an expedition against Sparta, which was, however, opposed by Aratus, who is said to have already begun to be jealous of his favour and reputation. Lydiades, indeed, threatened to prove a formidable rival; he quickly rose to such consideration in the league as to be deemed second only to Aratus himself, and notwithstanding the opposition of the latter, was elected strategus a second and third time, holding that important office alternately with Aratus. The most bitter enmity had by this time arisen between the two; each strove to undermine the other in the popular estimation; but though Lydiades was unable to shake the long-established credit of Aratus, he himself maintained his ground, notwithstanding the insidious attacks of his rival, and the suspicion that naturally attached to one who had formerly borne the name of tyrant. In B.C. 227 the conduct of Aratus, in avoiding a battle with Cleomenes at Palantium, gave Lydiades fresh cause to renew his attacks, but they were again unsuccessful, and he was unable to prevent the appointment of Aratus for the twelfth time to the office of strategus, B.C. 226. His enmity did not, however, prevent him from taking the field under the command of his rival: the two armies under Aratus and Cleomenes met at a short distance from Megalopolis, and though Aratus would not consent to bring on a general engagement, Lydiades, with the cavalry under his command, charged the right wing of the enemy and put them to the rout, but being led by his eagerness to pursue them too far, got entangled in some enclosures, where his troops suffered severely, and he himself fell, after a gallant resistance. His body was left on the field, but Cleomenes had the generosity to honour a fallen foe, and sent it back to Megalopolis, adorned with the insignia of royal dignity. Except Cleomenes himself, the later history of Greece presents few brighter names than that of Lydiades. (Polyb. ii. 44, 51; Plut. Arat. 30, 35, 37, Cleom. 6, de

Ser. Num. vind. 6, p. 552; Paus. viii. 27. § 12-15.)

2. A native of Megalopolis, one of the three ambassadors sent by the Achaeans to Rome in A.C. 179, in pursuance of the views of Lycortas. (Polyb. xxvi. 1.) It was on this occasion that Callicrates, who was head of the embassy, betrayed the interests of his country to the Romans. [CALLICRATES.] [E.H.B.]

LYDUS (Λυδός), a son of Atys and Callithes, and brother of Tyrrhenus or Torybus, is said to have been the mythical ancestor of the Lydians. (Herod. i. 7, 94; Dionys. Hal. i. 27, &c.; Strab. v. p. 219.) [L.S.]

LYDUS, JOANNES. [JOANNES, No. 79.]
LYGDAMIS (Λυγδάμης.) 1. The leader of the Cimmerians in their invasion of Lydia. They took Sardis, and were marching towards Ephesus, to plunder the temple of Artemis, when they suffered a defeat, which was ascribed to the intervention of Artemis, and were obliged to retire to Cilicia, where Lygdamis and all his army perished. Herodotus no doubt alludes to the same invasion of the Cimmerians, when he relates that in the reign of Ardys (B.C. 680-631), king of Lydia, the Cimmerians, expelled from their own settlements by the Nomad Scythians, invaded Asia, and took Sardis, with the exception of the citadel. (Strab. i. p. 61, xiii. p. 627; Plut. Mar. 11; Callimach. Hymn. in Dian. 252, &c.; Hesych. s.v. Λυγδάμης; Herod. i. 15.)

2. Of Naxos, was a distinguished leader of the popular party of the island in their struggle with the oligarchy. He conquered the latter, and obtained thereby the chief power in the state. With the means thus at his disposal, he assisted Peisistratus in his third return to Athens; but during his absence his enemies seem to have got the upper hand again; for Peisistratus afterwards subdued the island, and made Lygdamis tyrant of it, about B.C. 540. He also committed to the care of Lygdamis those Athenians whom he had taken as hostages. Lygdamis is mentioned again in B.C. 532 as assisting Polycrates in obtaining the tyranny of Samos. He was one of the tyrants whom the Lacedaemonians put down, perhaps in their expedition against Polycrates, B.C. 525. (Aristot. Pol. v. 5; Athen. viii. p. 348; Herod. i. 61, 64; Polyæn. i. 23. § 2; Plut. Apophth. Lac. 64.)

3. The father of Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, the contemporary of Xerxes. (Herod. vi. 99; Paus. iii. 11. § 3.) [ARTEMISIA, No. 1.]

4. Tyrant of Halicarnassus, the son of Pisidolia, and the grandson of Artemisia. The historian Herodotus is said to have taken an active part in delivering his native city from the tyranny of this Lygdamis. [HERODOTUS, p. 431, b.]

5. A Syracusan who conquered in the Pancratium in the Olympic games in the 33rd Olympiad. A monument was erected to him near the Leontinae in Syracuse. He is said to have been equal in size to the Theban Hercules, and to have measured with his feet the Olympic stadium, which like Hercules, he found to be only 600 feet in length, whereas, measured by the foot of a man of the ordinary size, it was 625 feet. (Paus. v. 3. § 8; African. ap. Euseb. Ev. EA. 'OA. p. 40; Schlegel Topog. Sicily. p. 315; Krause, Olympia, p. 321.)

LYGDAMUS. [THELLUS.]
LYGODESMA (Λυγοδέσμα), a surname of Artemis whose statue had been found by a Lydian then Astrabacus and Aloeopus under a bush of willows (Ἀλφειός), by which it was surrounded in such a manner that it stood upright. (Paus. iii. 16. § 7.) [L. S.]

LYNCEUS (Λυγκεύς). 1. A son of Aegyptus and Argypbia, and husband of the Danaid Hypermnestra, by whom he became the father of Abas. He was king of Argos, whence that city is called Ἀργεῖα (Apollon. Rhod. i. 125). His story is, that when the Danaides, by the desire of their father, killed their husbands in one night, Hypermnestra alone spared the life of her husband Lynceus. Danaus thereupon kept his disobedient daughter in strict confinement, but was afterwards prevailed upon to give her to Lynceus, who succeeded him on the throne of Argos (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5, 2. § 1; Paus. ii. 16. § 1; Ov. Heroid. 14). The cause of Hypermnestra sparing Lynceus is not the same in all accounts (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 10, ad Eurip. Hecub. 869, ad Pind. Pyth. ix. 200). It is also said that she assisted her husband in his escape from the vengeance of Danaus, that he fled to Lyrceia (Lynceia), and from thence gave a sign with a torch that he had safely arrived there; Hypermnestra returned the sign from the citadel of Argos, and in commemoration of this event the Argives celebrated every year a festival with torches (Paus. ii. 25. § 4; comp. ii. 19. § 6, 21. § 1, 20. § 5). When Lynceus received the news of the death of Danaus from his son Abas, Lynceus gave to Abas the shield of Danaus, which had been dedicated in the temple of Hera, and instituted games in honour of Hera, in which the victor received a shield as his prize (Hygin. Fab. 273). According to some, Lynceus slew Danaus and all the sisters of Hypermnestra, in revenge for his brothers (Schol. ad Eurip. Hecub. 869; Serv. ad Aen. x. 497). Lynceus and his wife were revered at Argos as heroes, and had a common sanctuary, and their tomb was shown there not far from the altar of Zeus Phryxius (Hygin. Fab. 168; Paus. ii. 21. § 2). Their statues stood in the temple at Delphi, as a present from the Argives. (Paus. x. 10. § 2.)

2. A son of Aphareus and Arene, and brother of Idas, was one of the Argonauts and famous for his keen sight, whence the proverb δύττερον βλέπειν τοῦ Λυγκεύς (Apollod. i. 8. § 2, 4. § 17, iii. 10. § 3). He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters, and was slain by Pollux (i. 8. § 2, iii. 11. § 2; comp. Pind. Nem. x. 21, 115, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 151, &c., iv. 1466, &c.; Aristoph. Plut. 210).

There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 173; Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

LYNCEUS (Λυγκεύς), of Samos, the disciple of Theophrastus, and the brother of the historian Duris, was a contemporary of Menander, and his rival in comic poetry. He survived Menander, upon whom he wrote a book. He seems to have been more distinguished as a grammarian and historian than as a comic poet; for, while only one of his comedies is mentioned (the Κέρταυρος), we have the titles of the following works of his: — Ἀλυσιακά, Ἀπομνημονεύματα, Ἀποφθίγματα, Ἐπιστολαὶ δεσποτικαὶ, τέχνη θύωντικὴ. (Suid. s. v.; Athen. viii. p. 337, d., et passim; Plut. De nob. 27; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 134, ed. Westermann; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 468; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. p. 498.) [P. S.]

LYNCEUS, a contemporary of Propertius, who complains that Lynceus had won the affections of his mistress. (Propert. iii. 30.) Lynceus was a poet, and appears to have written a tragedy on the expedition of the Seven against Thebes (Ibid. vv. 39—42.)

LYNCUS (Ἀλφύκος), a king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily, wanted to murder Triptolemus, who came to him with the gifts of Ceres, in order to secure the merit to himself, but he was metamorphosed by the goddess into a lynx (Ov. Met. v. 650, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 327). Another person of the same name occurs in Quintus Smyrnaeus (xi. 90). [L. S.]

LYRCUS (Λύρκος), the name of two mythical personages. (Paus. ii. 25. § 4; Parthen. Erof. i.) [L. S.]

LYSANDER (Λύσανδρος), of Sparta, was the son of Aristocleitus or Aristocritus, and, according to Plutarch, of an Heracleid family. Aelian and Athenaeus tell us that he rose to the privileges of citizenship from the condition of a slave (μυθῶν), and Müller thinks that he was of a servile origin, as well as Callicratidas and Gylippus; while Thirlwall supposes them to have been the offspring of marriages contracted by freemen with women of inferior condition, and to have been originally in legal estimation on a level with the μυθῶν, or favoured helot children, who were educated in their master's family together with his sons. (Plut. Lys. 2; Paus. vi. 3; Ael. V. H. xii. 43; Athen. vi. p. 271, f; Müller, Dor. iii. 3. § 5; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 374; Mitford's Greece, ch. xx. sect. 2, note 4.)

In B. C. 407, Lysander was sent out to succeed Cratesippidas in the command of the fleet, the Spartans, as it would appear, having been induced to appoint him, partly because his ability marked him as fit to cope with Alcibiades, partly that they might have the advantage of his peculiar talents of supple diplomacy at the court of Cyrus the Younger. (Comp. Cic. De Off. i. 30, De Senect. 17.) Having increased his fleet to seventy ships by reinforcements gathered at Rhodæ, Coa, and Miletus, he sailed to Ephesus; and, when Cyrus arrived at Sardis, he proceeded thither, and so won upon the prince as to obtain from him an increase in the pay of the sailors: nor could Tissaphernes, acting doubtless under the instructions of Alcibiades, succeed in his efforts to induce Cyrus even to receive an Athenian embassy. Lysander fixed his headquarters at Ephesus, of the later prosperity and magnificence of which he is said by Plutarch to have laid the foundation, by the numbers he attracted thither as to a focus of trade. After his victory at Notium over Antiochus [see Vol. I. pp. 100, b, 193, b], he proceeded to organise a number of oligarchical clubs and factions in the several states, by means of the men who seemed fittest for the purpose in each; and the jealousy with which he regarded CALLICRATIDAS, his successor in B. C. 406, and the attempts he made to thwart and hamper him, may justify the suspicion that his object, in the establishment of these associations, was rather the extension of his own personal influence than the advancement of his country's cause. His power and reputation among the Spartan allies in Asia were certainly great, for, in a congress at Ephesus, they determined to send ambassadors to Lacedæmon requesting that Lysander might be appointed to the command of the fleet, an application which was supported also by Cyrus. The Lacedæmonian law, however, did not allow the office of admiral to be held twice by the same person; and, accordingly, in order to comply with the wish of the allies, without contravening the established custom, Aracus was sent out, in B.C. 405, as the nominal commander-in-chief, while Lysander, virtually invested with the supreme direction of affairs, had the title of vice-admiral. Having arrived at Ephesus with 35 ships, he assembled from different quarters all the available navy of Lacedæmon, and proceeded to build fresh gallees besides. For this purpose, as well as for the pay of the men, he was again furnished with money by Cyrus, who, being soon after summoned to court by his father Darius, even intrusted Lysander with authority over his province, and assigned to him the tribute from its several cities. Thus amply provided with the means of prosecuting the war, Lysander commenced offensive operations. Sailing to Miletus, where he had excited the oligarchical faction to attack their opponents in defiance of a truce between them, he pretended to act as mediator, and, by his treacherous professions, induced the majority of the popular party to abandon their intention of fleeing from the city. Having thus placed themselves in the power of their enemies, they were massacred, and Lysander's faction held undisputed ascendancy in Miletus. Thence he proceeded to Cedeææ, on the Ceramic gulf, which he took by storm, and sold the inhabitants for slaves. He then directed his course to the Saronic gulf, over-ran Aegina and Salamis, and even made a descent on the coast of Attica, where he was visited by Agis, then in command at Deceleia, and had an opportunity of exhibiting to the Spartan army an appearance of supremacy by sea. But, when he heard that the Athenian fleet from Samos was in chase of him, he sailed away to the Hellespont. Here he took Lampæcus by storm, and soon after the Athenian navy, of 180 ships, arrived, and stationed itself opposite Lampæcus at Aegospotami. Within a few days from this time the unaccountable rashness and negligence of the Athenian commanders, with the single exception of Conon, enabled Lysander to capture all their fleet, saving eight ships, which escaped with Conon to Cyprus, and the Paralus, which conveyed to Athens the tidings of the virtual conclusion of the war and the utter ruin of her fortunes. Lysander then sailed successively to Byzantium and Chalcedon, both of which opened their gates to him. The Athenian garrisons he permitted to depart, on condition of their going to Athens; and the same course he adopted with all the Athenians whom he found elsewhere; his object being to increase the number of mouths in the city, and so to shorten the siege. Sailing from the Hellespont with 200 ships, he proceeded to the south, establishing in the several states on his way oligarchical governments, composed of his own partisans—members of the political clubs he had already taken so much care to form—and thus everywhere, except for a time at Samos, the friends of Athens and democracy were overborne. He settled also in their ancient homes a remnant of the Aeginetans, Scionæans, and Melians who had been driven out by the Athenians (comp. Thuc. ii. 27, v. 32, 116), and he then sailed to the mouth of the Peiræus, and blockaded it with 150 gallees. He had previously sent notice of his approach to Agis and to the Spartan government, and the land-forces of the Peloponnesian confederacy had entered Athens under Pausanias, and encamped in the Academy (comp. Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. ii. 2, § 8). In the spring of 404 Athens capitulated, and Lysander, sailing into the Peiræus, began to destroy the long walls and the fortifications of the harbour to the sound of joyful music, and (according to Plutarch) on the 16th of Munychion, the very day of the Greek victory over the fleet of Xerxes at Salamis.

The several accounts of the events immediately ensuing are not very consistent with each other. From Xenophon, it would appear (Hell. ii. 3, § 3; comp. Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 174, note 2), that Lysander did not quit Athens for Samos before the establishment of the thirty tyrants; but it seems more probable that, as we gather from Lysias and Diodorus, he sailed forthwith to Samos, to reduce it, before the complete demolition of the Athenian walls, but soon returned to Athens to support the oligarchical party in the contemplated revolution (Lys. c. Erastoth. p. 126; Diod. xiv. 4). Accordingly, we find him sternly quelling the expression of popular discontent at the proposal to subvert democracy, by declaring that the Athenians could no longer appeal to the treaty of capitulation, since they had themselves infringed it by omitting to throw down their walls within the appointed time. All opposition was thus overborne, and the creatures of Sparta were put in possession of the government. Plutarch tells us that Lysander, having thus settled matters in Athens, went to Thrace; but this, perhaps, is only a mis-placed reference to his expedition to Byzantium before-mentioned. It seems nearly certain that he returned immediately to Samos. The island capitulated after a short siege, and the conqueror sailed home in triumph with the spoils and trophies of the war. The introduction of so much wealth into Sparta called forth the censure of many, as tending to foster corruption and cupidity—an opinion which the recent case of GYLIPPUS might be thought to support,—and it required all the efforts of Lysander and his party to defeat a proposal for dedicating the whole of the spoil to the Delphic god, instead of retaining it in the public treasury. As it was, a number of statues were erected at Delphi, and other offerings made there, as well as at Sparta and Amyclæ, in commemoration of Lysander's victories and the close of the struggle with Athens. (See Paus. iii. 17, 18, x. 9; Athen. vi. p. 233, f.)

Lysander was now by far the most powerful man in Greece, and he displayed more than the usual pride and haughtiness which distinguished the Spartan commanders in foreign countries. He was passionately fond of praise, and took care that his exploits should be celebrated by the most illustrious poets of his time. He always kept the poet Choerilus in his retinue; and his praises were also sung by Antilochus, Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heracleia. He was the first of the Greeks to whom Greek cities erected altars to a god, offered sacrifices, and celebrated festivals (Plut. Lys. 18; Paus. vi. 3, §§ 14, 15; Athen. xv. p. 696; Heysch. z. v. Ἀντιάδης). Possessing such unlimited power, and receiving such extraordinary marks of honour from the rest of Greece, his residence at Sparta, where he must have been under restraint, could not be agreeable to him. We accordingly find that he did not remain long at Sparta, but again repaired to Asia Minor, where he was almost adored by the oligarchical clubs he had established in the Greek cities. But his excessive power, and the homage that was paid to him everywhere, awakened the envy and jealousy even of the kings and ephors in Sparta. When, therefore, Pharnabazus sent ambassadors to Sparta to complain of Lysander having plundered his territory, the ephors recalled him to Sparta, and at the same time, to make him feel their power, they put to death his friend and colleague Thorax, for having money in his private possession. Alarmed at these indications of hostility, Lysander hastened to Pharnabazus and prayed him to give him an exculpatory letter for the Spartan government; but the Persian satrap, while he promised compliance with his request, craftily substituted another letter in place of the one he had promised, in which he repeated his former complaints. This letter, which Lysander carried himself to Sparta, placed him in no small difficulty and danger. (Plut. Lys. 20; Polyæn. vii. 19.) Fearing to be brought to trial, and anxious to escape from Sparta, he obtained, with great trouble, permission from the ephors to visit the temple of Zeus Ammon, in Libya, in order to fulfil a vow which he pretended to have made before his battles. But the attempts of Thrasylbulus and of the democratical party to overthrow the oligarchical government which had been established at Athens, soon recalled him to Sparta, where he seems to have again acquired his wonted influence; for, although the government refused to send an army to the support of the oligarchs, they appointed Lysander harmost, allowed him to raise troops, advanced a hundred talents from the treasury, and nominated his brother Agis admiral, with a fleet of forty ships. As soon, however, as Lysander had left Sparta, the party opposed to him again obtained the upper hand; and the king, Pausanias, who was his bitterest enemy, concerted measures, in conjunction with three of the ephors, to thwart his enterprise, and deprive him of the glory which he would acquire from a second conquest of Athens. Under pretence of raising an army to co-operate with Lysander, Pausanias marched into Attica; but soon after his arrival at the Peiræus the Spartan king made terms with Thrasylbulus and his party, and thus prevented Lysander from again establishing the oligarchical government. (Plut. Lys. 21; Xen. Hell. ii. 4. § 28, &c.; Lys. c. Eratosth. p. 96.)

From this time Lysander continued in obscurity some years. He is again mentioned on the death of Agis II. in B.C. 398, when he exerted himself to secure the succession for Agesilaus, the father of Agis, in opposition to Leotychides, the adopted son of the latter. [LEOTYCHIDES, No. 3.] These efforts he was successful, but he did not receive from Agesilaus the gratitude he had expected. He was one of the members of the council, thirty in number, which was appointed to accompany the new king in his expedition into Asia in B.C. 396. Lysander had fondly hoped to renew intrigues among the Asiatic Greeks, and to regain his former power and consequence in that country; but he was bitterly disappointed: Agesilaus purposely thwarted all his designs, and removed all the favours which he asked; and Lysander was so deeply mortified that he begged for an appointment to some other place. Agesilaus sent him to the Hellespont, where he did the Greek cause some service, by inducing Spithridates, a Persian of high rank, to revolt from Pharnabazus, and join the Spartans. (Plut. Lys. 23, 24, Agessil. 7, 8; Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 7, &c.)

Lysander soon afterwards returned to Sparta, highly incensed against Agesilaus and the kingly form of government in general, and firmly resolved to bring about the change he had long meditated in the Spartan constitution, by abolishing hereditary royalty, and throwing the throne open to all the Heracleidae, or, according to some accounts, to all the Spartans without exception. He is said to have got Cleon of Halicarnassus, to compose an oration in recommendation of the measure, which he intended to deliver himself; and he is further stated to have attempted to obtain the sanction of the gods in favour of his scheme, and to have tried in succession the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Zeus Ammon, but without success. Plutarch indeed relates, on the authority of Ephorus, a still more extraordinary expedient to which he had recourse, but which also failed. (Plut. Lys. 24, &c., Agessil. 8; Diod. xiv. 13; Cic. de Divin. i. 43.) Of the history of these events, however, we know but little. (Comp. Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. Appendix 4, "On Lysander's Revolutionary Projects.") He does not seem to have ventured upon any overt act, and his enterprise was cut short by his death in the following year. On the breaking out of the Boeotian war in B.C. 395, Lysander was placed at the head of one army, and the king Pausanias at the head of another. The two armies were to meet in the neighbourhood of Haliartus; but as Pausanias did not arrive there at the time that had been agreed upon, Lysander marched against the town, and perished in battle under the walls, B.C. 395. His body was delivered up to Pausanias, who arrived there a few hours after his death, and was buried in the territory of Panopeus in Phocia, on the road from Delphi to Chaeroneia, where his monument was still to be seen in the time of Plutarch. Lysander died poor, which proves that his ambition was not disgraced by the love of money, which sullied the character of Gylippus and so many of his contemporaries. It is related that after his death Agesilaus discovered in the house of Lysander the speech of Cleon, which has been mentioned above, and would have published it, had he not been persuaded to suppress such a dangerous document. (Plut. Lys. 27, &c.; Xen. Hell. iii. 5. § 6, &c.; Diod. xiv. 81; Paus. iii. 5. § 3, ix. 32. § 5.)

LYSANDRA (Λύσανδρα), daughter of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater. She was married first to Alexander, the son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and after his death to Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus. (Dexippus, ap. Synecell. p. 265; Euseb. Ann. p. 155; Paus. i. 9. § 6; Plut. Demetr. 31.) By this second marriage (which took place, according to Pausanias, after the return of Lysimachus from his expedition against the Getæ, B.C. 291) she had several children, with whom she fled to Asia after the murder of her husband, at the instigation of Arsinoë [AGATHOCLES], and besought assistance from Seleucus. The latter in consequence marched against Lysimachus, who was defeated and slain in battle B.C. 281. From an expression of Pausanias, it appears that Lysandra must at this time have accompanied Seleucus, and was possessed of much influence, but in the confusion that followed the death of Seleucus a few months after we hear no more either of her or her children. (Paus. i. 10. § 3—5.) [E. H. B.]

LYSA'NIAS (Λυσάνιος). 1. An Athenian of the deme Sphectus who, according to some accounts, was the father of Aeschines, the disciple of Socrates. (Plat. Apol. Socr. c. 22; Diog. Laërt. ii. 60.)

2. The father of Cephalus, one of the interlocutors in the republic of Plato. (Plat. Polit. p. 330, b.)

3. A friend of Alexander the Great. In conjunction with Philotas he was sent to the coast, in charge of the booty taken after the victory over the Thracians, B. C. 335. (Arrian. i. 2.)

4. A Greek grammarian, a native of Cyrene. He is mentioned by Athenaeus as the author of a work on the Iambic poets (vii. p. 304 b, xiv. p. 620 c.). Suidas (s. v. Ἐπαροσθένης) speaks of him as the instructor of Eratosthenes. It is perhaps the same who is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 23) as the son of Aeschrius.

5. Tetrarch of Abilene. He was put to death by Antony, to gratify Cleopatra, B. C. 36. (Dion Cass. xlix. 32; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xv. 4. § 1.)

6. A descendant of the last, who was tetrarch of Abilene, at the time when our Saviour entered upon his ministry (Luke, iii. 1). He died probably about the time when the emperor Claudius ascended the throne. In the first year of the reign of this emperor the tetrarchy of Lysanias was conferred upon Herod Agrippa. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xx. 7. § 1.) [C. P. M.]

LYSA'NIAS, a statuary, whose name occurs in an inscription on a base found in the island of Scio, Λυσάνιος Διονύσιου τὸν Διόνυσον κατεσκεύασε, whence it appears that the artist's father was named Dionysus, and that the statue was one of the god Dionysus. The word κατεσκεύασε might indeed refer to the dedication of the statue; but there are other inscriptions, in which it undoubtedly designates the artist. Dionysus is frequently found as a man's name, as well as the commoner form, Dionysius. (Winckelman, Gesch. d. Kunst, bk. xi. c. 3. § 26, Meyer's note.) [P. S.]

LYSANO'RIDAS (Λυσανόριδας), one of the three Spartan hermits who surrendered the Cadmeia to the Theban exiles in B. C. 379. His two colleagues Herippidas or Hermippidas and Arceus were executed by the Spartan government; but as Lysanoridas was absent on the night of the insurrection, he met with a less severe punishment, and was sentenced to pay a large sum of money. Being unable, however, to do this, he went into voluntary exile. (Plat. Pelop. 13, De Gen. Socrat. 5, 17, 34; Diod. xv. 27.) It was related by Theopompus (ap. Athen. xiii. p. 609, b.) that Lysandridas, by whom he probably means Lysanoridas, was expelled from Sparta by the intrigues of his enemy Agesilaus, and that his mother Xenopeitheia, the most beautiful woman in the Peloponnesus, and his sister Chryse, were put to death by the Lacedaemonians.

LY'SIADES (Λυσιάδης). 1. An Athenian poet, (probably dithyrambic, since his victory was gained with a chorus of boys), whose name appears on the choragic monument of Lysicrates, which fixes his date to OLI. c. 2, B. C. 335. [LYSICRATES.]

2. An Epicurean philosopher of Athens, the son of the celebrated philosopher Phaedrus, was contemporary with Cicero, who speaks of him as

"homo festivus," and attacks his appointment by Antony as a judge. (Philipp. v. 8, viii. 9.)

3. A Pythagorean philosopher of Catana. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 36.) [P. S.]

LYSIANASSA (Λυσισάννα), the name of three mythical personages, none of whom is of any interest. (Hesiod. Theog. 258; Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Paus. ii. 6. § 3.) [L. S.]

LY'SIAS (Λυσίας). 1. An Athenian, who, according to Diodorus (xiii. 74), was one of the ten generals appointed to succeed Alcibiades in the command of the fleet, B. C. 406. His name indeed does not occur in the list of them as given by Xenophon (Hell. i. 5. § 16), but that author agrees with Diodorus in mentioning him shortly after as one of those who actually held the command at the battle of Arginusæ, on which occasion his trireme was sunk, and he himself made his escape with difficulty. It was only to encounter a worse fate, for on his return to Athens with five of his colleagues, they were all six immediately brought to trial, condemned, and executed, on the charge of having neglected to carry off the bodies of the citizens who had fallen in the action. (Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 30, 7; Diod. xiii. 99, 101; Philochorus. ap. Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 1196.)

2. A general under Seleucus Nicator, who, B. C. 286, by the command of that prince, occupied the passes of Mount Amanus, so as to prevent the escape of Demetrius Poliorcetes, who, in consequence, fell into the hands of Seleucus. (Polyaen. iv. 9. § 5; comp. Plut. Demetr. 49.)

3. One of the ambassadors sent by Antiochus the Great, in B. C. 196, to meet the ten deputies appointed by the Romans to settle, together with Flaminius, the affairs of Greece. He was afterwards present at the interview of the king with the Roman ambassadors at Lysimachia. (Plut. xviii. 30, 33.) According to Appian (S. 6), he also accompanied Hegesianax and Menippus on their embassy to Rome in B. C. 193, though he is not mentioned on that occasion by Livy (xxxv. 57—59).

4. A general and minister of Antiochus Epiphanes, who enjoyed so high a place in the confidence of that monarch, that when Antiochus set out for the upper provinces of his empire in B. C. 166, he not only entrusted Lysias with the care of his son Antiochus, but gave him the sole command of the provinces from the Euphrates to the Nile. Lysias was especially charged to prosecute the war against the Jews, and accordingly hastened to lead an army into Judaea, under the command of Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, Nicanor, and Gorgias; but these generals were totally defeated near Bethsura by Judas Maccabæus. The next year Lysias in person took the field, with a very large army, but effected nothing of importance. Not soon after arrived of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, Tabæ, in Persia (B. C. 164), on which Lysias immediately caused the young prince under his care to be proclaimed king, by the title of Antiochus Eupator, and himself assumed the sovereignty as his guardian, although that office had been conferred by Antiochus Epiphanes on his death upon another of his ministers named Philip. A new expedition against the Jews was now undertaken by Lysias, accompanied by the young king, who they made themselves masters of the strong tower of Bethsura, and compelled Judas to fall back on Jerusalem, where they besieged him in the camp and reduced him to such straits for provisions, that the fortress must have quickly fallen had not the news of the approach of Philip induced Lysias to grant a peace to the Jews on favourable terms, in order that he might hasten to oppose his rival. Philip was quickly defeated, and put to death. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 7. § 2—5, 9, § 1—7; 1 Maccab. iii. iv. v. 1—35, vi. 2 Macc. x. xi. xiii.)

Lysias now possessed undisputed authority in the kingdom; and the Romans, the only power whom he had cause to fear, were disposed to favour Antiochus on account of his youth, and the advantages they might hope to derive from his weakness. They, however, despatched ambassadors to Syria, to enforce the execution of the treaty formerly concluded with Antiochus the Great; and Lysias did not venture openly to oppose the arbitrary proceedings of these deputies, but was supposed to have connived at, if he did not command, the murder of Octavius, the chief of the embassy. [LEPTINES.] He indeed immediately sent ambassadors to Rome to disclaim all participation in the deed, but did not offer to give up or punish the assassin. Meanwhile, the young prince, Demetrius, made his escape from Rome, where he had been detained as a hostage and landed at Tripolis in Syria. The people immediately declared in his favour; and Lysias, as well as the young Antiochus, was seized by the populace, and given up to Demetrius, who ordered them both to be put to death, B. C. 162. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 10. § 1; 1 Macc. vii. 2 Macc. xiv. 1, 2; Appian. Syr. 46, 47; Polyb. xxi. 15, 19; Liv. Epit. xli; Euseb. Ann. p. 166, fol. edit.)

5. A native of Tarsus in Cilicia, called by Athenæus an Epicurean philosopher, who raised himself to the position of tyrant of his native city. (Athen. v. p. 215. h.) [E. H. B.]

LY'SIAS (Λυσίας), an Attic orator, was born at Athens in B. C. 458; he was the son of Cephæus, who was a native of Syracuse, and had taken up his abode at Athens, on the invitation of Pericles. (Dionys. Lys. 1; Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 835; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 262, p. 488, &c.; Suid. s. v. Λυσίας; Lys. c. Eratosth. § 4; Cic. Brut. 16.) When he was little more than fifteen years old, in B. C. 443, Lysias and his two (some say three) brothers joined the Athenians who went as colonists to Thurii in Italy. He there completed his education under the instruction of two Syracusans, Tisias and Nicias, and afterwards enjoyed great esteem among the Thurians, and even seems to have taken part in the administration of the young republic. From a passage of Aristotle (ap. Cic. Brut. 12), we learn that he devoted some time to the teaching of rhetoric, though it is uncertain whether he entered upon this profession while yet at Thurii, or did not commence till after his return to Athens, where we know that Isæus was one of his pupils. (Plut. L. c. p. 839; Phot. Bibl. Cod. p. 490, a.) In A. C. 411, when he had attained the age of forty-seven, after the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, all persons, both in Sicily and in the south of Italy, who were suspected of favouring the cause of the Athenians, were exposed to persecutions; and Lysias, together with 300 others, was expelled by the Spartan party from Thurii, as a partisan of the Athenians. He now returned to Athens; but there too great misfortunes awaited him, for during the rule of the Thirty Tyrants, after the battle of Agospotami, he was looked upon as an enemy of the government, his large property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison, with a view to be put to death. But he escaped from Athens, and took refuge at Megara. (Plut. Phot. II. cc.) His attachment to Athens, however, was so great, that when Thrasybulus, at the head of the patriots, marched from Phyle to liberate their country, Lysias joyfully sacrificed all that yet remained of his fortune, for he sent the patriots 2000 drachmas and 200 shields, and engaged a band of 302 mercenaries. Thrasybulus procured him the Athenian franchise, as a reward for his generosity; but Archinus afterwards induced the people to declare it void, because it had been conferred without a probuleuma; and Lysias henceforth lived at Athens as an isoteles, occupying himself, as it appears, solely with writing judicial speeches for others, and died in B. C. 378, at the age of eighty. (Dionys. Lys. 12; Plut. L. c. p. 836; Phot. L. c. p. 490.)

Lysias was one of the most fertile writers of orations that Athens ever produced, for there were in antiquity no less than 425 orations which were current under his name, though the ancient critics were of opinion that only 230 of them were genuine productions of Lysias. (Dionys. Lys. 17; Plut. L. c. p. 836; Phot. L. c. p. 488; Cic. Brut. 16.) Of these orations 35 only are extant, and even among these some are incomplete, and others are probably spurious. Of 53 others we possess only a few fragments. Most of these orations, only one of which (that against Eratosthenes, B. C. 403) he delivered himself in court, were composed after his return from Thurii to Athens. There are, however, some among them which probably belong to an earlier period of his life, when Lysias treated his art more from a theoretical point of view, and they must therefore be regarded as rhetorical exercises. But from the commencement of the speech against Eratosthenes we must conclude that his real career as a writer of orations began about B. C. 403. Among the lost works of Lysias we may mention a manual of rhetoric (τάχυν ῥητορικῆς), probably one of his early productions, which, however, is lost. How highly the orations of Lysias were valued in antiquity may be inferred from the great number of persons that wrote commentaries upon them, such as Caecilius Calactinus, Zosimus of Gazæ, Zeno of Cittiium, Harpocration, Paulus Germinus, and others. All the works of these critics have perished. The only criticism of any importance upon Lysias that has come down to us is that of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in his Περὶ τῶν ῥημάτων ῥητόρων ἀπομνημονεύματα, the τῶν ῥημάτων ὑπόμνημα, and in his account of Lysias, to which we may add the remarks of Photius. According to the judgment of Dionysius, and the accidental remarks of others, which are borne out by a careful examination of the orations still extant, the diction of Lysias is perfectly pure, and may be looked upon as the best canon of the Attic idiom; his language is natural and simple, but at the same time noble and dignified (Dionys. Lys. 2, 3, Demosth. 13; Cic. Brut. 82; Quintil. xii. 10. § 21, comp. ix. 4, § 17); it is always clear and lucid; the copiousness of his style does not injure its precision; nor can his rhetorical embellishments be considered as impairing the charming simplicity of his style. (Dionys. Lys. 4, &c.) His delineations of character are always striking and true to life. (Dionys. Lys. 7; Quintil. iii. 8. § 51; Phot. L. c. p. 488.) But what characterises his orations above those of all other ancients, is the indescribable gracefulness and elegance which pervade all of them, without in the least impairing their power and energy; and this gracefulness was considered as so peculiar a feature in all Lysias' productions, that Dionysius thought it a fit criterion by which the genuine works of Lysias might be distinguished from the spurious works that went by his name. (Dionys. Lys. 10, &c., 3, Demosth. 13, Dinarch. 7; comp. Cic. Brut. 9, 16; Quintil. ix. 4. § 17, xii. 10. § 24.) The manner in which Lysias treats his subjects is equally deserving of high praise. (Dionys. Lys. 15—19; Hernogen. De Form. Orat. ii. p. 490.) It is, therefore, no matter of surprise to hear that among the many orations he wrote for others, two only are said to have been unsuccessful. (Plut. l. c. p. 836.)

The extant orations of Lysias are contained in the collections of Aldus, H. Stephens, Reiske, Dukas, Bekker, and Baier and Sauppe. Among the separate editions, we mention those of J. Taylor (London, 1739, 4to. with a full critical apparatus and emendations by Markland), C. Foerisch (Leipzig, 1829, 8vo.), J. Frans (Munich, 1831, 8vo., in which the orations are arranged in their chronological order); compare J. Franz, Dissertatio de Lysia Oratore Attico Graece scripta, Norimbergae, 1828, 8vo.; L. Hoelscher, De Lysiae Oratoris Vita et Dictione, Berlin, 1837, 8vo., and De Vita et Scriptis Lysiae Oratoris Commentatio, Berlin, 1837, 8vo.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, §§ 46, 47, and Beilage, iii. pp. 278—288.

There are some other persons of the name of Lysias, who come under the head of literary characters. 1. Lysias of Tarsus, an epicurean philosopher, who usurped the tyranny in his native place on the occasion of his being raised to the priesthood of Heracles, and afterwards distinguished himself by his indulgence in luxuries and cruelty. (Athen. v. p. 215.) 2. A person who is one of the interlocutors in Plutarch's treatise de Musica. 3. A sophist, who was, according to Taylor, the author of the ἑρμηνεία, which are attributed by some of the ancients to the orator Lysias. (Taylor, Vit. Lys. p. 154.) This sophist may be the one mentioned by Demosthenes (c. Neaer. p. 351. [L. S.])

LYS'IAS, a sculptor of the time of Augustus, for whom he executed a great and highly valued group, representing Apollo and Diana in a four-horse chariot, which Augustus placed in the chapel erected by him to the memory of his father, Octavius, on the Palatine hill. Pliny says that the group was of one piece of marble; but similar statements of his respecting other groups, which are still extant, the Laocöon for instance, have been disproved by an examination of the works themselves: we may therefore suspect his accuracy in this instance. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. a. 4. § 10; Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 33, 39.) [P. S.]

LYSICLES (Λυσικλῆς). 1. Possibly a son of Abronychus, was sent out by the Athenians, with four colleagues, in command of twelve ships for raising money among their allies, b. c. 428. He was attacked, in an expedition up the plain of the Maeander, by some Carians and Samians of Anaea, and fell with many of his men. (Thuc. iii. 19.) Possibly this Lysicles is the same with Lysicles "the sheep dealer," whom Aristophanes appears to allude to (Eq. 131) as Cleon's immediate predecessor on the demagogic throne, and in a subsequent passage (ib. 765) names in bad company, and who, it appears, after the death of Pericles married Aspasia. By her he had a son, Poristes, and through her instructions, says Aeschines the disciple of Socrates, he attained the highest importance. (Ap. Plut. Per. c. 24; Schol. ad Plat. Menes. p. 235; compare Harpocr. and Hesych. s. v. προβατάριος; Schol. ad Aristoph. Eq. l. c.) [A. H. C.]

2. One of the commanders of the Athenian army at the battle of Chaeroneia, b. c. 338, was subsequently condemned to death, upon the accusation of the orator Lysurgus. (Diod. xvi. 85, 88.) The speech which Lysurgus delivered against Lysicles is referred to by Harpocration (s. v. ἐπὶ Δηλῶν καὶ Λαμιάδων).

LYSI'CRATES (Λυσικράτης), an Athenian, whose name has become celebrated by means of his beautiful choragic monument. The custom of giving a bronze tripod as a prize to the choragus in the dramatic exhibitions, and of then dedicating the tripod to some divinity, is described in the "Dictionary of Antiquities," s. v. CHORAGIA. The most usual manner of dedicating the tripod was by placing it on the summit of a small building erected for the express purpose of receiving it. The choragic monument of Lysicrates is such an erection. From a square base arises a circular building, consisting of six Corinthian columns, connected by a wall, and supporting a flat cupola of one piece of marble, from the centre of which rises a beautiful flower-like ornament, which spreads out at the summit so as to afford a base for the tripod, the marks of which are still visible upon it. The details are of surpassing beauty, and can only be appreciated from a good drawing. The best engraving, or rather set of engravings, of it are given by Mauch (Neue Systematische Darstellung d. Architektonischen Ordnungen, 3e Auflage, taf. 54—57). The following is the inscription on the architrave:

Λυσικράτης Λυσικλείδου Κικυνεὺς ἐχορῆγε,
Ἀκαμαρτίῳ παῖδον ἔνικα, Θέων ᾠλεῖ,
Λυσιάδης Ἀθηναῖος ἐδίδασκε, Εὐαίνοτος ἄρχη.

(Böckh, Corp. Inscr. 221.) The archonship of Euaenetus was in Ol. cxi. 2, b. c. 335.

The building is vulgarly called the Lantern of Demosthenes, who is said to have erected it with the object of studying in the seclusion of its interior. Not only is this tradition unsupported by any authority, and disproved by the inscription, but it is clear that the interior of the building, which is not quite six feet in diameter, was not applied to any use, and had, in fact, no entrance. It is now open, having at some period been broken into, probably in search of treasure. (Stuart and Revett, Antiquities of Athens, vol. i. p. 139; Hist. Geschichte d. Baukunst bei den Alten, vol. ii. p. 26.) [P. S.]

LYSI'DICE (Λυσιδίκη), a daughter of Peleus, married to Mestor, by whom she had a daughter, Hippothoe (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5). Others call her the wife of Alcaeus, and mother of Amphibius (Paus. viii. 14. § 2). A third account is given by the scholiast on Pindar (Ol. vii. 49). A second personage of the name is mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 7. § 8). [L. S.]

LYSI'DICUS, the father of C. Annius Cimber, the latter of whom Cicero calls Lysidicus quoniam omnia iura dissolvit. (Cic. Phil. xi. 6.) [CIMBER, ANNICUS.]

LYSI'MACHE (Λυσίμαχη), a daughter of Abas, and the wife of Talaus (Apollod. i. 9, § 13; Apollodorus). Another personage of the same name occurs in Apollodorus (iii. 12, § 5). [L. S.]

LYSIMACHIDES (Λυσίμαχος), a Greek writer, the author of a work on the Attic orators, addressed to Caecilius. He seems also to have written on other subjects connected with the Athenians. (Ammon. de Diff. Voc. s. v. Θεωρός; Harpocrat. s. v. Μαμακρησιδών, Μεγακρησιδών; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 231, ed. Westermann.) [C.P.M.]

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσίμαχος). 1. An Athenian, father of Aristides the Just. (Herod. viii. 79; Thuc. i. 91; Plut. Arist. init.)

2. Son of Aristides, and grandson of the preceding, is spoken of as a man himself of an insignificant character, but who received a grant of lands and money, as well as an allowance for his daily maintenance, by a decree of Alcibiades, in consideration of his father's services. He left two children, a son, Aristides, and a daughter named Polycreta, who also received a public allowance for her grandfather's sake. (Plut. Arist. 27; Dem. c. Lept. § 95, p. 491, and Schol. ad loc.)

3. Son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace (see below), by Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy Soter. After the death of his father (B.C. 281), he fled with his mother and younger brother, Philip, to Cassandria, where they remained for some time in safety, until Ptolemy Ceraunus, who had established himself upon the throne of Macedonia, decoyed Arsinoë and her two sons into his power, by promising to marry the former, and adopt the two young men. But as soon as they met their treacherous uncle, both Lysimachus and Philip were instantly seized and put to death, in the very arms of their mother. Lysimachus was at the time 16 years old; his brother three years younger; and both were remarkable for their beauty. (Justin. xiv. 2, 3; Memnon, c. 14.)

4. Son of Ptolemy Philadelphus by Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, king of Thrace. He survived both his brother Ptolemy III. Euergetes, and his nephew, Ptolemy IV. Philopator; but was put to death by Sosibius, the minister and guardian of Ptolemy Epiphanes. (Schol. ad Theocrit. Idyll. vii. 128; Polyb. xv. 25.)

5. A friend and counsellor of Philip V., king of Macedonia, was one of the two selected by him to assist in the secret council for the trial of his son, Demetrius. (Liv. xl. 8.) [DEMETRIUS.]

6. A brother of Apollodotus, the general who defended Gaza against Alexander Jannæus. He saved his brother to be assassinated, and then surrendered the city into the hands of Alexander. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13, § 3.)

7. A Jew, one of the friends of Herod, who was put to death by him as being connected with the conspiracy of Costobarus. [HEROD.] (Joseph. Ant. xv. 7, §§ 8, 10.) [E. H. B.]

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσίμαχος), king of Thrace. He was a Macedonian by birth (according to Arrian, a native of Pella), but not by origin, his father, gathobas, having been originally a Penest or serf of Cræon in Thessaly, who had inactivated himself by his flatteries into the good graces of Philip of Macedonia, and risen to a high place in his favour. (Arrian. Anab. vi. 28; Theopomp. ap. Athen. vi. 259; Eschsch. Arm. p. 156.) Lysimachus himself was distinguished for his undaunted courage, as well as for his great activity and strength of body, qualities to which he probably owed his appointment to the important post of one of the συνταγματάρχαι, officers immediately about the person of Alexander. But though we find him early attaining this distinction, and he is frequently mentioned as in close attendance on the king, he does not seem to have been readily entrusted with any separate command, or with the conduct of any enterprise of importance, as was so often the case with Ptolemy, Perdicas, Leonnatus, and others of the same officers. Hence it would appear that Alexander deemed him more qualified for a soldier than a general. (Arr. Anab. v. 13, 24, vi. 28, vii. 5, Ind. 13; Curt. viii. 1, § 46; but comp. Aelian. V. H. xii. 16, who calls him στρατηγὸν ἀγαθόν.)

We are told by Q. Curtius that Lysimachus, when hunting in Syria, had killed a lion of immense size single-handed, though not without receiving severe wounds in the contest; and this circumstance that writer regards as the origin of a fable gravely related by Justin, Plutarch, Pliny, and other authors, that on account of some offence, Lysimachus had been shut up by order of Alexander in the same den with a lion; but though unarmed, had succeeded in destroying the animal, and was pardoned by the king in consideration of his courage. (Curt. viii. 1, § 15; Plut. Demetr. 27; Paus. i. 9, § 5; Justin. xv. 3; Plin. H. N. viii. 16 (21); Val. Max. ix. 3, ext. 1; Seneca, de Ira, iii. 17.) In the division of the provinces, after the death of Alexander, Thrace and the neighbouring countries as far as the Danube were assigned to Lysimachus, an important government, which he is said to have obtained in consequence of his well-known valour, as being deemed the most competent to cope with the warlike barbarians that bordered that country on the north. (Diod. xviii. 3; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 69, b; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, b; Curt. x. 10, § 4; Justin. xiii. 4.) Nor was it long before he had occasion to prove the justice of this opinion; he had scarcely arrived in his government when he was called upon to oppose Seuthæ, king of the Odrysians, who had assembled a large army, with which he was preparing to assert his independence. In the first battle Lysimachus obtained a partial victory, notwithstanding a great disparity of force; but we know nothing of the subsequent events of the war. (Diod. xviii. 14; Paus. i. 9, § 6.) It seems probable, however, that he was for some time much occupied with hostilities against the Odrysians and other barbarian tribes; and that it was this circumstance which prevented him from taking any active part in the wars which arose between the other generals of Alexander. But during the seven years which he thus spent in apparent inactivity, it is clear that he had not only consolidated his power, but extended his dominion as far as the mouths of the Danube, and occupied with his garrisons the Greek cities along the western shores of the Euxine. (Diod. xix. 73; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 326.)

At length, in B.C. 315, the increasing power of Antigonus induced Lysimachus to join the league which Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander, had already formed against that monarch: he laid claim to the Hellespontine Phrygia, in addition to the territories he already possessed; and on the refusal of Antigonus, immediately prepared for war. Still we do not hear of his taking any active part in the hostilities that ensued, until he was aroused by the revolt of the Greek cities on the Euxine, Callatia, Istrus, and Odessus. He thereupon immediately crossed the Haemus with an army, defeated the forces of the Scythian and Thracian tribes, which the Greeks had called in to their assistance, as well as a fleet and army sent by Antigonus to their support, and successively reduced all the three cities. (Diod. xix. 56, 57, 63; App. Syr. 53; Paus. i. 6. § 4.) By the general peace of 311, Lysimachus was confirmed in the possession of Thrace (including, apparently, his recent acquisitions on the north), but without any farther accession of territory. (Id. xix. 105.) In 309 he founded the city of Lysimachia, on the Hellespont, not far from the site of Cardia, great part of the inhabitants of which he compelled to remove to the new settlement. (Id. xx. 29; Paus. i. 9. § 8; App. Syr. 1.) Three years afterwards (B.C. 306) he followed the example first set by Antigonus, and immediately imitated by Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander, and assumed the title and insignia of royalty. (Diod. xx. 53; Plut. Demetr. 18; Justin. xv. 2.)

We hear no more of Lysimachus for some time: but he appears, though taking no prominent part in the hostilities between the other rival monarchs, to have been constantly on friendly terms, if not in direct alliance with Cassander, to whose sister, Nicaea, he was married, and who was accustomed, we are told, to apply to him for counsel on all occasions of difficulty. (Diod. xx. 106.) Thus in 304 we find them both sending supplies of corn to the relief of the Rhodians, at that time besieged by Demetrius (Id. xx. 96); and two years later (B.C. 302) Lysimachus readily joined in the plan originated by Cassander, for forming a general coalition to oppose the alarming progress of Antigonus and Demetrius. They accordingly sent ambassadors to Ptolemy and Seleucus, who were easily persuaded to join the proposed league; and in the meantime they both took the field in person; Cassander to oppose Demetrius in Greece, while Lysimachus, with a large army, invaded Asia Minor. His successes were at first rapid: several cities on the Hellespont either voluntarily submitted, or were reduced by force; and while his lieutenant, Prepelasus, subdued the greater part of Aeolia and Ionia, he himself overran Phrygia, and made himself master of the important town of Synnada. On the advance of Antigonus, however, he determined to confine himself to the defensive, and not risk a general engagement until he should have been joined by Seleucus: he, in consequence, withdrew first to Dorylaeum, where he fortified himself in a strong position, but was ultimately forced from thence; and retiring into Bithynia, took up his winter-quarters in the fertile plains of Salomía, where the neighbourhood of the friendly city and port of Heracleia secured him abundant supplies. Before the close of the winter Seleucus arrived in Cappadocia, while Demetrius, on the other side, with the army which he brought from Greece, recovered possession of the chief towns on the Hellespont. All particulars of the campaign of the following year are lost to us; we know only that in the course of the spring Lysimachus effected his junction with Seleucus; and Demetrius, on the other hand, united his forces with those of Antigonus; and that early in the summer of B.C. 301 the combined armies met at Ipsus, in the plains of Upper Phrygia. The battle that ensued was decisive: Antigonus himself fell on the field, and Demetrius, with the shattered remnant of his forces, fled direct to Ephesus, and from thence embarked for Greece. The conquerors immediately proceeded to divide between them the dominions of the vanquished; and Lysimachus obtained for his share all that part of Asia Minor extending from the Hellespont and the Aegean to the heart of Phrygia; but the boundary between his dominions and those of Seleucus in the latter quarter is nowhere clearly indicated. (Diod. xx. 106—109, 113; Plut. Demetr. 28—30; Justin. xv. 2, 4; Appian. Syr. 55; Paus. i. 6. § 7; Euseb. Arm. p. 163. Concerning the extent of Lysimachus' dominions, see Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 344, foll.)

The power of Lysimachus was thus firmly established, and he remained from this time in undisputed possession of the dominions thus acquired, until shortly before his death. During the whole of this period his attention seems to have been steadily directed to the strengthening and consolidation of his power, rather than to the extension of his dominions. His naturally avaricious disposition led him to accumulate vast treasures, for which the possession of the rich gold and silver mines of Thrace gave him peculiar advantages, and he was termed in derision, by the flatterers of his rival, "the treasurer (γαροφύλαξ)." The great mass of these accumulations was deposited in the two strong citadels of Tirisiz on the coast of Thrace, and of Pergamus in Mysia. (Strab. vii. p. 319, xiii. p. 625; Athen. vi. p. 246, e. 261, h.; Plut. Demetr. 25.) At the same time he sought, after the fashion of the other contemporary monarchs, to strengthen his footing in his newly-acquired dominions in Asia by the foundation of new cities, or at least by the enlargement and re-establishment of those previously existing. Thus, he rebuilt Antigonia, a colony founded by his rival Antigonus, on the Ascanian lake, and gave to it the name of Nicaea, in honour of his first wife: he restored Smyrna, which had long remained almost uninhabited, but which quickly rose again to a high point of prosperity; and when Ephesus, which had been one of the last places in Asia that remained faithful to Demetrius, at length fell into his hands, he removed the city to a situation nearer the sea, and repopulated it with the inhabitants of Lebedes and Colophon, in addition to its former population. New Ilium and Alexandria Troas are also mentioned as indebted to him for improvements which almost entitled him to rank as their founder. (Strab. xii. p. 565, xiii. p. 593, xiv. p. 640, 646; Paus. i. 9. § 7, vii. 3. §§ 4, 5; Steph. Byz. v. "Eφεσος.") In Europe we hear less of his internal improvements, but he appears to have effectually reduced to submission the barbarian tribes of the Odrysians, Paconians, &c., and to have established his dominions without dispute over all the countries south of the Danube. (Paus. i. 9. § 6; Polyæn. iv. 12. § 3; Diod. op. Tzetz. Chil. vi. 53.)

Meanwhile, Lysimachus was not indifferent to the events that were passing around him. The alliance concluded by Seleucus with Demetrius led him in his turn to draw closer the bonds of union between himself and Ptolemy; and it was probably about the same period that he married Arisbe, the daughter of the Egyptian king. (Plut. Demetr. 31; Paus. i. 10. § 3; comp. Droysen, Hellesmism. vol. i. p. 555.) With Macedonia his friendly relations continued unbroken until the death of Cassander (B.C. 297), and after that event he sought still to maintain them by giving his daughter Eurydice in marriage to Antipater, one of the sons of the deceased king. The dissensions between the brothers, however, having eventually opened the way for Demetrius to seat himself on the throne of Macedonia [DEMETRIUS, vol. i. p. 964], Lysimachus found himself involved in a war with that monarch, but was content to purchase peace by abandoning his claims of his son-in-law, whom he soon after sent to death, either to gratify Demetrius, or from displeasure at the indignant remonstrances of the young man himself. (Paus. i. 10. § 1; Justin. vi. 1, 2; Plut. Pyrrh. 6; Diod. Ecc. Hoeschel. xi. p. 490.) We are told that Lysimachus was compelled to conclude this disadvantageous peace, because he was at the time embarrassed by the hostilities in which he was engaged on his northern frontier with the Getæ. (Justin. xvi. 1.) We know little of the circumstances which led to this war (A. C. 292), but it appears to have been one of aggression on the part of Lysimachus. If so, he was deservedly punished by the series of disasters that followed. His son Agathocles, who had led an army into the enemy's territory, was defeated and taken prisoner, but generously set at liberty and sent back to Lysimachus. Notwithstanding his king soon assembled a more powerful army, with which he crossed the Danube and penetrated to the heart of the country of the Getæ; but he was soon reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, and ultimately compelled to surrender with his whole army. Dromichaetes, king of the Getæ, treated him with the utmost generosity, and after gently reproaching him with his unprovoked aggression, restored him at once to his liberty. (Diod. Ecc. xxi. p. 559, ed. Wess., Ecc. Vat. xxi. p. 49, ed. Hind.; Strab. vii. pp. 302, 305; Paus. i. 9. § 6; Plut. Demetr. 39, 52; Polyæn. vii. 25; Memnon, 5, ed. Orell.) On his return to his own dominions Lysimachus found that Demetrius had taken advantage of his absence and captivity to invade the cities of Thrace, but that prince had been already recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Greece, and Lysimachus apparently found himself too weak to avenge the aggression at the moment. (Plut. Demetr. 39.) In A. C. 288, however, he became more united with Ptolemy and Seleucus in a common league against Demetrius, to which the cession of Pyrrhus was easily obtained, and early in the following spring Lysimachus invaded Macedonia on the one side, and Pyrrhus on the other. The success of their arms was owing not so much to their own exertions as to the disaffection of the Macedonian soldiers. Demetrius, abandoned by his own troops, was compelled to seek safety in flight, and the conquerors obtained undisputed possession of Macedonia, A. C. 287. Lysimachus was compelled for a time to permit Pyrrhus to seat himself on the vacant throne, and to rest contented with the acquisition of the territories on the river Euxus, on the borders of Thrace and Macedonia. He soon after appears to have found an opportunity to annex Pæonia to his dominions; and it was not long before he was able to accomplish the object at which he was evidently aiming, and effect the expulsion of Pyrrhus from his newly acquired kingdom of Macedonia, A. C. 286. For this result Lysimachus appears to have been indebted mainly to the influence exercised upon the Macedonians by his name and reputation as one of the veteran generals and companions of Alexander. (Plut.

Demetr. 44, Pyrrh. 11, 12; Paus. i. 10. § 2; Justin. xvi. 3; Dexippus, ap. Syncell. p. 267.)

Lysimachus now found himself in possession of all the dominions in Europe that had formed part of the Macedonian monarchy, as well as of the greater part of Asia Minor. The captivity of Demetrius soon after delivered him from his most formidable enemy; and, in order still farther to secure himself from any danger in that quarter, he is said to have repeatedly urged upon Seleucus the ungenerous advice to put his prisoner at once to death. (Plut. Demetr. 51; Diod. xxi. Ecc. Vales. p. 561.) But the course of events had now rendered Lysimachus and Seleucus themselves rivals, and, instead of joining against any common foe, all their suspicions and apprehensions were directed henceforth towards one another. This naturally led the former to draw yet closer the bonds of his alliance with Egypt. Lysimachus himself, as we have seen, had already married Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy Soter; his son Agathocles had espoused Lysandra, another daughter of the same monarch, and, in A. C. 285, he gave his daughter Arsinoë in marriage to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had already ascended the Egyptian throne. (Schol. ad Theocr. Idyll. xvii. 128; Paus. i. 7. § 3.)

The few remaining events of the reign of Lysimachus were for the most part connected with his private relations; and the dark domestic tragedy that clouded his declining years led also to the downfall of his empire. In A. C. 302, after the death of his first wife Nicaea, he had married Amastria, the widow of Dionysius, tyrant of Heracleia, whose noble character appears to have made a great impression upon his mind, so that long after he had been induced, by motives of policy, to abandon her for Arsinoë, he still dwelt with fondness upon the memory of her virtues; and in 286 proceeded to avenge her murder upon her two sons, Oxathres and Clearchus, both of whom he put to death. He at that time restored Heracleia to the possession of its freedom, but was soon after persuaded to bestow that city as a gift upon his wife, Arsinoë, whose influence seems to have been at this time on the increase. It was not long before she exerted it to much worse purpose. The young prince, Agathocles, had long been the object of her enmity, and she sought to poison the mind of the aged king against him, by representing him as forming designs against the life of Lysimachus. She found a ready auxiliary in her step-brother, Ptolemy Ceraunus, who had just arrived as a fugitive at the court of Lysimachus; and the king was at length induced to listen to their representations, and consent to the death of his unhappy son, who perished, according to one account, by poison, while others state him to have fallen by the hand of Ptolemy himself. (Memnon, c. 6—8, ed. Orell.; Justin. xvii. 1; Paus. i. 10. § 3; Strab. xiii. p. 623.)

The consequences of this bloody deed proved fatal to Lysimachus: the minds of his subjects were alienated; many cities of Asia broke out into open revolt; his faithful eunuch, Philetærus, to whom he had confided the charge of his treasury at Pergamus, renounced his allegiance; and Lysandra, the widow of Agathocles, fled with her children to the court of Seleucus, who, notwithstanding his advanced age, hastened to raise an army, and invade the dominions of Lysimachus. The latter also was not slow to cross into Asia, and endeavour to check the rising spirit of disaffection. The two monarchs—the last survivors of the warriors and companions of Alexander, and both of them above seventy years of age—met in the plain of Corus (Corupedion); and in the battle that ensued Lysimachus fell by the hand of Malaccon, a native of Heracleia (A. C. 281). His body was given up to his son, Alexander, and interred by him at Lysimachia. (Memnon, c. 8; Justin, xvii. i. 2; App. Syr. 62; Paus. i. 10. §§ 4, 5; Oros. iii. 23; Euseb. Arm. p. 156.)

The age of Lysimachus at the time of his death is variously stated: Hieronymus of Cardia, probably the best authority, affirms that he was in his 80th year (ap. Lucian. Macrob. 11). Justin, on the contrary, makes him 74; and Appian (l. c.) only 70 years old; but the last computation is certainly below the truth. He had reigned 25 years from the period of his assuming the title of king, and had governed the combined kingdoms of Macedonia and Thrace during a period of five years and six months. (Euseb. Arm. l. c.)

The accounts transmitted to us of Lysimachus are too fragmentary and imperfect to admit of our forming a very clear idea of his personal character; but the picture which they would lead us to conceive is certainly far from a favourable one: harsh, stern, and unyielding, he appears to have been incapable of the generosity which we find associated in Pyrrhus and Demetrius, with courage and daring at least equal to his own; while a sordid love of money distinguished him still more strikingly from his profuse, but liberal contemporaries. Even his love for Anastria, one of the few softer traits presented by his character, did not prevent him from sacrificing her to the views of his interested ambition. Self-aggrandisement indeed seems to have been at all times his sole object; and if his ambition was less glaringly conspicuous than that of some of his contemporaries, from being more restrained by prudence, it was not the less his sole motive of action, and was even farther removed from true greatness.

Lysimachus was by his various wives the father of a numerous family: Justin indeed states (xvii. 2) that he had lost fifteen children before his own death; but the greater part of these (if they ever really existed) are wholly unknown. Besides Agathocles, whose fate has been already mentioned, we hear of six children of Lysimachus who survived him; viz. 1. Alexander, who, as well as Agathocles, was the offspring of an Odrysian woman named Macris. (Polyaen. vi. 12; Paus. i. 10. § 5.) 2. Arsinoë, the wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, a daughter of Lysimachus and Nicaea. 3. Eurydice (probably also a daughter of Nicaea), married to Antipater, the son of Cassander. 4. Ptolemy. 5. Lysimachus. 6. Philip. The three last were all sons of Arsinoë, and shared for a time their mother's fortunes. One other daughter is mentioned as married, during her father's lifetime, to Dromichaetes, king of the Getae. (Paus. i. 9. § 6.)

COIN OF LYSIMACHUS.

The coins of Lysimachus are very numerous, and those in gold and silver remarkable for the beauty of their workmanship. They all bear on the obverse the head of Alexander, represented with horns, as the son of Ammon. The reverse has a figure of Pallas seated, and holding in her hand a victory. [P. H. R.]

LYSIMACHUS, literary. 1. A comic poet, mentioned by Lucian, who ridicules him for the absurd pedantry with which, though born in Boeotia, he affected to carry the Attic use of  $\tau$  for  $\chi$  to an extreme, using not only such words as τετταράκοντα, τμήρον, καττίτερον, κάττωμα and πίττω, but even βασιλίστα. (Lucian, Jad. Vocal. i. p. 90; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 493.) Nothing more is known of this Lysimachus, and possibly the name is fictitious.

2. A lyric poet of only moderate worth, μελωδός: εὐτελής, who, as we are informed by Suidas and Harpocration, was mentioned by the orator Lycurgus in his speech περὶ διοικήσεως.

3. One of the tutors of Alexander the Great, was an Acarnanian by birth. Though a man of very slender accomplishments, he ingratiated himself with the royal family by calling himself Phoenix, and Alexander Achilles, and Philip Peleus; and by this sort of flattery, he obtained the second place among the young prince's tutors. (Plut. Alex. 5.)

4. Another philosopher of the same name, and of a similar character, is mentioned by Athenaeus as the tutor and courtier of king Attalus, respecting whose education he wrote books full of all kinds of flattery. He was the disciple of Theodorus, according to Callimachus, or of Theophrastus, according to Hermippus. (Ath. vi. p. 252.)

5. Of Alexandria, a distinguished grammarian, frequently cited by the scholiasts and other writers, who mention his Νόστοι and his συγκαταῖνθε καὶ παραδόξων. (Ath. iv. p. 158, c. d.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 558, iii. 1179, ad Soph. Oed. Col. 91, ad Eurip. Andr. 880, Hec. 892, Phoen. 26, Hipp. 545, ad Pind. Pyth. v. 108, Isth. iv. 104, ad Lycoph. 874; Apost. Prov. xvii. 25; Plut. de Flav. 18; Hesych. s. v. Σεύρος.) He is perhaps also the author of the Αἰγυπτιάκων cited by Josephus (c. Ap. i. 34, ii. 2, 14, 33), and perhaps may even be identified with Lysimachus of Cyrene, who wrote περὶ ποιητῶν. (Proleg. ad Hes. Opp. p. 30; Tzetz. Chil. vi. 920.) A writer of the same name is mentioned by Porphyry as the author of two books, περὶ τῆς Ἐσφοῦ κλωτῆς. (Euseb. Præp. Evang. x. 3.) Respecting the time of Lysimachus the Alexandrian, we only know that he was younger than Mnaseas, who flourished about A. C. 140. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 464, ed. Weidemann; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 384, vol. ii. p. 129.)

6. A writer on agriculture, often referred to by Varro, Columella, and Pliny; and perhaps the same as Lysimachus who is mentioned in the Schol. ad Nic. Alex. 376, and Plin. II. N. xiv. 7. [P. S.]

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσίμαχος), of Cos, a physician, who wrote a commentary on the works of the Hippocratic Collection in three books, addressed to Cydias, a follower of Herophilus, and another in four books, addressed to Demetrius (Erotian. Gloss. Hippocr. p. 10), neither of which is now extant. If this Demetrius was the physician born at Apameia, Lysimachus probably lived in the third and second centuries B. C. [W. A. G.]

LYSIPPUS is mentioned in the spurious letters of Phalaris, as a poet who wrote odes and tragedies against Phalaris. (See Bentley's Dissertation and Answer to Boyle.) [P. S.]

LYSIPPE (Λύσιππη), the name of three mythical personages, one a daughter of Theopius (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8), the second a daughter of Proetus (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; comp. PROETUS), and the third the wife of Prolaus in Elia. (Paus. v. 2. § 4.) [L. S.]

LYSIPPUS (Λύσιππος), a Lacedaemonian, was left by Agis II. as hostage at Epitalium in Elia, when the king himself returned to Sparta from the Elia campaign, B. C. 400. During the summer and winter of that year Lysippus made continual devastations on the Elia territory. In the next year, B. C. 399, the Elians sued for peace. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2. §§ 29, &c.; comp. Diod. xiv. 17; Wess. ad loc.; Paus. iii. 8, where he is called Lysistrata.) [E. E.]

LYSIPPUS (Λύσιππος), literary. 1. An Arcadian, a comic poet of the old Comedy. His date is fixed by the marble Didascalia, edited by Oederus, at Ol. lxxvi. 2, B. C. 434, when he gained the first prize with his Karaxhina; and this agrees with Athenaeus, who mentions him in conjunction with Callias (viii. p. 344, c.). Besides the Karaxhina, we have the titles of his Bdaxhai (Suid., Eudoc.), which is often quoted, and his Θυρακόμοσ (Suid.). Vossius (de Poet. Graec. p. 227) has followed the error of Eudocia, in making Lysippus a tragic poet. Besides his comedies he wrote some beautiful verses in praise of the Athenians, which are quoted by Dicaearchus, p. 10. (Meineke, Frag. Vm. Graec. vol. i. p. 215, vol. ii. p. 744; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 310.)

2. Of Epeirus, wrote a κατάλογος δασεών, which is quoted by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, v. 1093. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 464, ed. Westermann; Ebert, Dis. Sicul. p. 107; Mounier, le Diogenes Melio, p. 41, Rotterdam. 1838.) [P. S.]

LYSIPPUS (Λύσιππος), artist. 1. Of Sicyon, one of the most distinguished Greek statuaries, is named by Pliny at Ol. 114, as a contemporary of Alexander the Great (H. N. xxiv. 8. s. 19). We have no very clear intimation of how long he lived; but there is no doubt that the great period of his artistic activity was during the reign of Alexander; and perhaps Pliny has mentioned the 14th Olympiad in particular, as being that in which Alexander died. We learn from Pausanias (i. 1. § 2) that he made the statue of the Olympic victor Troilus, who conquered in the 102nd Olympiad; but there is abundant evidence that the statues of victors in the games were often made long after the date of their victories. On the other hand, there is an inscription on a base found at Rome, Σέλευκος βασιλεὺς, Λύσιππος ἐποίησεν. Seleucus did not assume the title of King till Ol. 117. 1. But this proves nothing; for the dilution of an inscription to a statue made long before, was a most frequent occurrence, of which we have many examples.

Originally a simple workman in bronze (fulberarius), he rose to the eminence which he afterwards obtained by the direct study of nature. It was to the painter Eupompus that he owed the guiding principle of his art; for, having asked him which of the former masters he should follow, Eupompus replied by pointing to a crowd of men, aged in their various pursuits, and told him that nature must be imitated, and not an artist (Plin. l. c. § 6). It is not to be inferred, however, that he neglected the study of existing works of art: on the contrary Cicero tells us (Brut. 86), that Lysippus used to call the Doryphorus of Polycleitus his master; and there can be no doubt that the school of Lysippus was connected with the Argive school of Polycleitus, as the school of Scopas and Praxiteles was with the Attic school of Phidias; there being in each case a succession of great principles, modified by a closer imitation of the real, and by a preference for beauty above dignity. Perhaps the great distinction between Lysippus and his predecessors could not, in a few words, be better expressed than by saying that he rejected the last remains of the old conventional rules which the early artists followed, and which Phidias, without permitting himself to be enslaved by them, had wisely continued to bear in mind, as a check upon the liberty permitted by mere natural models, and which even Polycleitus had not altogether disregarded (Varr. de Ling. Lat. ix. 18). In Lysippus's imitation of nature the ideal appears almost to have vanished, or perhaps it should rather be said that he aimed to idealize merely human beauty. He made statues of gods, it is true; but even in this field of art his favourite subject was the human hero Hercules; while his portraits seem to have been the chief foundation of his fame. He ventured even to depart from the proportions observed by the earlier artists, and to alter the robust form (τὸ τεργύγωνον, quadratus velerum staturus) which his predecessors had used in order to give dignity to their statues, and which Polycleitus had brought to perfection. Lysippus made the heads smaller, and the bodies more slender and more compact (graciliora siccioraque), and thus gave his statues an appearance of greater height. He used to say that former artists made men as they were, but he as they appeared to be. His imitation of nature was carried out in the minutest details: "propriae hujus videntur esse argutiae operum, custoditae in minimis rebus," says Pliny, who also mentions the care which Lysippus bestowed upon the hair. Propertius (iii. 7. 9) speaks of his statues as seeming to have the breath of life (animosa), and the same idea is expressed by the grammarian Nicephorus Chumnuus, in an interesting but little known passage, in which he describes Lysippus and Apelles as making and painting ψῶσας εἰκόνας καὶ πνοῆς μύθους καὶ κυρτῶν ἀποεικονόμενας. (Boissonade, Anecd. vol. iii. p. 357.)

The works of Lysippus are said to have amounted to the enormous number of 1500; at least this is the story of Pliny, who tells us that Lysippus used to lay by a single piece of gold out of the price received for each of his works, and that, after his death, the number of these pieces was found to be 1500 (H. N. xxiv. 7. s. 17). His works were almost all, if not all, in bronze; in consequence of which none of them are extant. But from copies, from coins, and from the works of his successors, we derive valuable materials for judging of his style. The following are the chief works of his which are mentioned by the ancient authors:—

First, those of a mythological character. 1. A colossal statue of Zeus, 60 feet high, at Tarentum, which is fully described by Pliny (H. N. xxiv. 7. s. 18; comp. Strab. vi. p. 278; Lucil. ap. Non. s. v. Cubitus). 2. Zeus in the forum of Sicyon (Paus.

ii. 9. § 6). 3. Zeus Nemeus, in an erect position, at Argos (Paus. ii. 20. § 3). 4. Zeus attended by the Muses (Paus. i. 43. § 6). 5. Poseidon, at Corinth (Lucian, Sup. Trag. 9, vol. ii. p. 652, Wetst.). 6. Dionysus, in the sacred grove on Mt. Helicon (Paus. ix. 30. § 1). 7. Eros, at Thespiae (Paus. ix. 27. § 3; comp. Sillig in the Amalthea, vol. iii. p. 299).

As above stated, his favourite mythological subject was Hercules. The following are some of his statues of that hero:—8. A colossal Hercules resting from his labours, in a sitting posture, at Tarentum, whence it was carried to Rome by Fabius Maximus, when he took Tarentum (Strab. vi. p. 278, b.; Plut. Fab. Mar. 22). It was afterwards transferred to Byzantium (Nicet. Stat. Constant. 5. p. 12). It is frequently copied on gems. 9. Hercules, yielding to the power of Eros, and deprived of his weapons. The statue is described in an epigram by Geminus (Anth. Pal. App. ii. p. 655; Anth. Plan. iv. 103). This also often appears on gems. 10. A small statue (ἑρπαπείριος), representing the deified hero as sitting at the banquet of the gods, described by Statius (Silv. iv. 6) and Martial (ix. 44). The celebrated Belvedere Torso is most probably a copy of this (Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 114; Heyne, Prisc. Art. Op. ex Epigr. illust. p. 87). 11. Hercules in the form of a king at Sicily (Paus. ii. 9. § 7). 12. There were originally at Alysia in Arcadia, and afterwards at Rome, a set of statues by Lysippus, representing the labours of Hercules (Strab. x. p. 459, c.). Perhaps one of this group may have been the original of the Farnese Hercules of Glycon, which is undoubtedly a copy of a work of Lysippus. (GLYCON; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 129, n. 2.)

To his mythological works must be added:—13. A celebrated statue of Time, or rather Opportunity (Καιρός; Callistr. Stat. p. 698, ed. Jacobs, with Welcker's Excursus). 14. Helios in a quadriga, at Rhodes (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 6). 15. A Satyr at Athens (Ibid.).

Of those of his statues which were neither mythological nor strictly portraits, the following are mentioned:—16. A bather or athlete, scraping himself with a strigil, which was placed by M. Agrippa in front of his baths, and was so admired by the emperor Tiberius that he transferred it to his own chamber; the resentment of the people, however, compelled him to restore it (Plin. l. c.). From the way in which Pliny speaks of this statue, it may be conjectured that it was intended by Lysippus to be a normal specimen of his art, like the Doryphorus of Polykleitos. 17. An intoxicated female flute-player. 18. Several statues of athletes (Paus. vi. 1. § 2, 2. § 1, 4. § 4, 5. § 1, 17. § 2). 19. A statue of Socrates (Diog. Laërt. ii. 43). 20. Of Aesop (Anth. Graec. iv. 33). 21. Of Praxilla. (Tatian, adv. Graec. 52.)

We pass on to his actual portraits, and chiefly those of Alexander. In this department of his art Lysippus kept true to his great principle, and imitated nature so closely as even to indicate Alexander's personal defects, such as the inclination of his head sideways, but without impairing the beauty and heroic expression of the figure. He made statues of Alexander at all periods of life, and in many different positions. Alexander's edict is well known, that no one should paint him but Apelles, and no one make his statue but Lysippus.

The most celebrated of these statues is that in which Alexander was represented with a lance. (Plut. de Iud. 24), which was considered as a sort of companion to the picture of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt, by Apelles. The impression which it produced upon spectators was described by an epigram afterwards affixed to it,—

Ἀδασοῦντι δ' ἔοικεν ὁ χαλκοῦς εἰς Δία λένειν
Γὰρ ὡς ἐμὸι τίθεμαι, Ζεῦ, σὺ δ' Ὀλυμπεῖον ἔχει.

(Plut. de Alex. Virt. ii. 2, Alex. 4; Tzetz. Chil. viii. 426.) The rest of his portraits of Alexander are described by Müller (Archäol. d. Kunst, § 129, n. 2). To the same class belongs his group of the chieftains who fell in the battle at the Granica.

There are still some other works of Lysippus of less importance, which are described by the historians of Greek art. (Sillig, Cat. a. v.; Meyer, Kunstgeschichte; Hirt, Gesch. d. Bild. Kunst; Nagler, Künstler-Lexicon.)

2. A painter in encaustic, of the Aeginetan school, who placed on his paintings the word ἐνέκαερ. (Plin. xxxv. 11. a. 19.)

3. A statuette of Heracleia, the son of Lysippus, who is known from an inscription on the base of a statue of Apollo at Delos:—ΛΙΟΛΑΔΩΝΙ ΑΥ-ΣΙΠΠΟΥ ΑΥΣΙΠΠΟΥ ΗΡΑΚΛΕΙΟΥ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ (Welcker, in the Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 8.) [P.S.]

LYSIS (Λύσις). 1. An eminent Pythagorean philosopher, who, driven out of Italy in the persecution of his sect, betook himself to Thebes, and became the teacher of Epaminondas, by whom he was held in the highest esteem. He died and was buried at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 13. § 1; Aelian, V. H. iii. 17; Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vit. p. 556; Plut. de Gen. Socr. 8, 13, 14, 16; Diog. Laërt. viii. 39; Nepos, Epam. 2; Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 35.) There was attributed to him a work on Pythagoras and his doctrines, and a letter to Hipparchus, of which the latter is undoubtedly spurious; and Diogenes says that some of the works ascribed to Pythagoras were really written by Lysis.

There is a chronological difficulty respecting him, inasmuch as he is stated to have been the disciple of Pythagoras, and also the teacher of Epaminondas. Dodwell (de Cycl. Vit. p. 148) attempted to show the consistency of the two statements; but Bentley (Answer to Boyle) contends that the ancient writers confounded two philosophers of this name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 851.)

2. A disciple of Socrates. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 29.)

3. A poet of the hilaroedric style, was the successor of Simus, the inventor of that species of poetry the composers of which were at first called Συμφοί, from Simus, and afterwards Ανταφολοί and Μαγυφοί, from Lysis and Magua. (Strab. xiv. p. 648, a.; Ath. xiv. p. 620, d., iv. p. 182, c.; Bode, Gesch. der Lyrisch. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. p. 469.) [P.S.]

LYSISTRATIDES, artist. [LYSISTRATIDES.]
LYSISTRATUS, of Sicyon, statuarius, was the brother of Lysippus, with whom he is placed by Pliny at the 114th Olympiad (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) He devoted himself entirely to the making of portraits, and, if we may believe Pliny, his portraits were nothing more than exact likenesses without any ideal beauty. (Hic et similitudinem rediere instituit: ante eum quam pulcherrimas fecisse studebant.) He was the first who took a cast of the human face in gypsum; and from this mould he produced copies by pouring into it melted wax. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. a. 44.) He made a statue of Melanippe. (Tatian. adv. Græc. 54, p. 117, ed. Worth.) [P. S.]

LYSIS (Λύσις), i. e. the Deliverer, a surname of Dionysus, under which he was worshipped at Corinth, where there was a carved image of the god, the whole figure of which was gilt, while the face was painted red. (Paus. ii. 2. § 5.) He was also worshipped at Sicyon, where the Theban Phæax was said to have introduced the god (ii. 7. § 6), and at Thebes. In the last-mentioned place he had a sanctuary near one of the gates, and there was a story that the god had received the surname from the fact of his once having delivered Theban prisoners from the hands of the Thracians in the neighbourhood of Haliartus (ix. 16. § 4; Orph. Hymn. 49. 2. &c.) [L. S.]

LYSIZONA (Λυσιζώνη), i. e. the goddess who looses the girdle, is a surname of Artemis and Eleithyia, who were worshipped under this name at Athens. (Theocrit. xvii. 60; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 287.) [L. S.]

LYSO, a Sicilian of rank at Lilybæum, whom Verres, while prætor of Sicily in B. C. 73—71, robbed of a statue of Apollo. (Cic. in Verr. iv. 17.) A son of Lyso, bearing the same name, is recommended by Cicero to M'. Acilius Glabrio, proconsul in Sicily in B. C. 46. (ad Fam. xiii. 34.) [GLABRIO. No. 6.] [W. B. D.]

LYSO, a native of Patnæ, in Achaia (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 19), who is commonly said to have been a physician, and to have attended Cicero's freedman Tullius Tiro during his illness at that place, B. C. 51. This, however, is probably a mistake, as he is no where called a physician, and rather seems to be distinguished from Tiro's medical attendant, whose name was Asclepi (ibid. xvi. 4, 5, 9); so that altogether it is more likely that Lyso was the person with whom Tiro lodged during his illness. Cicero seems at one time to have been afraid of his not being sufficiently attentive to his guest, and advises Tiro, if necessary, to go to the house of M'. Curius (ibid. xvi. 4). Tiro himself, however, seems to have been quite satisfied with his care and attention; and, accordingly, when Lyso visited Rome a short time afterwards, and stayed there for about a year, he lived on the most intimate terms with Cicero, and saw him almost every day (ibid. xiii. 19, 24). When Servius Sulpicius was going as proconsul to Achaia, Cicero wrote two letters to him in Lyso's favour, B. C. 47, in which he speaks of him in terms of great affection and gratitude (ibid. xiii. 19, 24). [W. A. G.]

LYSON (Λύσον), a statue, who is mentioned by Pliny among those who made "athletas, et aristas, et venatores, sacrificantesque" (H. N. xxxiv. a. 19. § 34). His statue of the Athenian people in the senate-house of the Five Hundred is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 3. § 4). [P. S.]

LYSUS (Λύσος), a Macedonian statuary, who made the statue of Crianius, the Eleian, in his list at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 17. § 1.) [P. S.]

LYTERIUS (Λυτήριος), i. e. the Deliverer, a surname of Pan, under which he had a sanctuary at Troezen, because he was believed during a plague to have revealed in dreams the proper remedy to the disease. (Paus. ii. 35. § 5.) [L. S.]

LYTIERSES (Λυτήρσιες), another form of lytæres. (Theocr. x. 41.) [LITYERSES.]

M.

MA (Μᾶ) signifies probably mother, as in Aechylius (μᾶ γὰρ, Suppl. 890), who applies it to the earth to designate her as the mother of all. But, according to Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Μᾶτραυρα), Ma was the name of a nymph in the snite of Rhea, to whom Zeus entrusted the bringing up of the infant Dionysus. The same author tells us that Rhea herself was by the Lydians called Ma, and that bulls were sacrificed to her, whence the name of the town Mastaura was derived. (Comp. Welcker, Trilog. p. 167.) [L. S.]

MACAR or MACAREUS (Μάκαρ or Μακάρεϋς). 1. A son of Helios and Rhodæ, or, according to others, a son of Crinæus, who after the murder of Tenages fled from Rhodes to Lesbos. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 544; Diod. v. 56; Plat. de Leg. viii. p. 838; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 24; Ilgen, ad Hymn. Hom. p. 203.)

2. A son of Aeolus, who committed incest with his sister Canace, and, according to some accounts, killed himself in consequence. (Hygin. Fab. 238; Plut. Parall. Hist. Gr. et Rom.; comp. ÆOLUS.)

3. A son of Lycæon, from whom the town of Macaria in Arcadia derived its name. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μακαρία; Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

4. A son of Jason and Medea, who is also called Mermærus or Mormorus. (Hygin. Fab. 239; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 175; comp. MEMMERUS.)

5. Of Nericius, one of the companions of Odysseus. (Ov. Met. xiv. 159.)

6. A Lapithæ, who at the wedding of Peirithous slew the centaur Erigippus. (Ov. Met. xii. 482.)

7. The founder of Lesbos, was a son of Crinæus and a grandson of Zeus. (Diod. v. 81.) [L. S.]

MACAREUS (Μακάρεϋς). Athenæus cites in two places (vi. p. 262, c. xiv. p. 639, d) the Κατά of Macareus. As his citation, the same in both places, is from the third book, we know that the history comprehended at least three books: but nothing more seems known either of the author or the work, except that it was written after the time of Phylarchus, from whom Macareus quotes three hexameter lines, and who appears to have lived in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes and Ptolemy Philopator, kings of Egypt, i. e. B. C. 246—204. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 367.) [J. C. M.]

MACARIA (Μακαρία), a daughter of Heracles by Deianeira, from whom Zenobius derives the proverb βάλλ' ἐς μακαρία, because she had put an end to herself. (Paus. i. 32. § 6; Zenob. Prov. ii. 61.) [L. S.]

MACARIUS (Μακάριος), a Spartan, was one of the three commanders of the Peloponnesian force which was sent to aid the Aetolians in the reduction of Naupactus, B. C. 426, which however was saved by Demosthenes with the aid of the Acarnanians. Macarius took part in the expedition against Amphilocheian Argos, in the same year, and was slain at the battle of Olpæ. (Thuc. iii. 100—102, 105—109.) [E. E.]

MACARIUS (Μακάριος). 1. ÆGYPTIUS, the EGYPTIAN. There were in the fourth century in Egypt two eminent ascetics and contemporaries, though probably not disciples of St. Antony, as is asserted by Rufinus, and perhaps by Theodoret. [ANTONIUS, No. 4, p. 217, b.] Of these the subject of the present article is generally distinguished as the EGYPTIAN, sometimes as MAGNUS, the GREAT, or as MAJOR or SENIOR, the ELDER; while the other is described as Macarius of Alexandria. [No. 2.]

Macarius the Egyptian was the elder of the two, and was born, according to Socrates, in Upper Egypt. At the age of thirty he betook himself to a solitary life. His place of retreat was the wilderness of Scete or Scetis, a part of the great Lybian desert, which D'Anville places about 60 miles, but Tillemont as much as 120 miles S. of Alexandria, a wretched spot, but on that account well suited to the purpose of the ascetics who occupied it. Here Macarius, though yet a young man, gave himself up to such austerities as to acquire the title of παλαιότροπος, "the aged youth." At forty years of age he was ordained a priest, and is said to have received power to cast out evil spirits and to heal diseases, as well as the gift of prophecy; and many marvellous stories are related by his biographers, Palladius and Rufinus, of his employment of these supernatural qualifications. It was even reported that he had raised the dead in order to convince an obstinate heretic, a Hieracite [HIERAX, No. 3], with whom he had a disputation: but this miracle was too great to be received implicitly even by the credulity of Rufinus and Palladius, who have recorded it only as a report.

During the persecution which the orthodox suffered from Lucius, the Arian patriarch of Alexandria [LUCIUS, No. 2] during the reign of the emperor Valens, Macarius was banished, together with his namesake of Alexandria and other Egyptian solitaries, to an island surrounded by marshes and inhabited only by heathens. He died at the age of ninety; and as critics are generally agreed in placing his death in A. D. 390 or 391, he must have been born about the beginning of the fourth century, and have retired to the wilderness about A. D. 330. He is canonized both by the Greek and Latin churches; his memory is celebrated by the former on the 19th, by the latter on the 15th January. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 23, 24; Sozomen, H. E. iii. 14, vi. 20; Theodoret, H. E. iv. 21; Rufin. H. E. ii. 4; and apud Heribert Rosweyde, De Vita et Verbis Senior. ii. 28; Apophthegmata Patrum, apud Coteler. Eccles. Græc. Monum. vol. i. p. 524, &c.; Pallad. Hist. Lausiæ. c. 19; Bolland, Acta Sanctorum. a. d. 15 Januarius; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. viii. p. 574, &c.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. vii. p. 709, &c.)

The writings of Macarius have been the subject of much discussion. Gennadius of Marseilles, our earliest authority, says (De Viris Illustrib. c. 10) that he wrote only a single Epistola or letter to his juniors in the ascetic life, in which he pointed out to them the way of attaining Christian perfection. Miræus endeavours to identify this Epistola with the monastic rule, ascribed to one of the Macarii, and given in the Codex Regularum of St. Benedict of Anagni; but which, with the letter which follows it, is rather to be ascribed to Macarius of Alexandria. The subject would lead us to identify the Epistola mentioned by Gennadius with the Opuscula mentioned below, especially as a cursory citation by Michael Glycas in his Annales (Paris i. p. 105, ed. Paris, p. 81, ed. Venice, p. 199, ed. Bonn) from "the Epistles (ἐν ἐπιστολαῖς) of Macarius the Great" is found to bear some resemblance to a passage in the fourth Opusculum, c. 2. The writings published under the name of Macarius of Egypt are these: I. Ὁμιλίαι πνευματικαὶ, Homiliae Spirituales. These homilies, so called, are fifty in number, of unequal length, and possibly interpolated by a later hand. They are ascribed to our Macarius on the authority of MSS. by Picas, Fabricius, Pritius, Tillemont, and Galland; but his authorship is denied by Possin, Dupin, Oudin, and Ceillier, though these are not agreed to whom to ascribe them. Cave hesitates between our Macarius and his namesake of Alexandria [No. 2]; but on the whole is inclined to prefer the latter. The Homiliae were first published by Joannes Picas, or Pic, 8vo. Paris, 1559; a Latin version by the editor was separately published in the same or the next year. The Greek text, with a Latin version by Palthenius, was again published at Frankfurt, 8vo. 1594; and the text and version were reprinted from Picas with the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus [GREGORIUS THAUMATURGUS] and Basil of Seleucia [BASILIUS, No. 4], fol. Paris, 1621. A revised edition of the Greek text, with the version of Palthenius, also revised, was published by Jo. Georg. Pritius, 8vo. Leipzig, 1698, and again in 1714, and may be regarded as the standard edition. A Latin version is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iii. ed. Paris, 1589; vol. iv. ed. Cologne, 1618; vol. iv. ed. Lyon, 1677. An English version, with learned and valuable notes, by "a presbyter of the church of England" (Fabricius calls him Thomas Haywood), was published 8vo. London, 1721. Some other homilies of Macarius are extant in MS. II. Opuscula. The collection so termed comprehends seven treatises, all short: 1. Περὶ φυλακῆς καρδίας, De Custodia Cordis; 2. Περὶ τελειώτητος ἐν πνεύματι, De Perfectione in Spiritu; 3. Περὶ προσευχῆς, De Oratione; 4. Περὶ ἐτοιμασίης καὶ διακρίσεως, De Patientia et Discretione; 5. Περὶ ὑψώσεως τοῦ νοῦ, De Elevatione Mentis; 6. Περὶ ἀγαπῆς, De Caritate; 7. Περὶ ἀποθέσεως νοῦ, De Libertate Mentis. These Opuscula were first published, with a Latin version, in the Theaurus Aestheticus of Possin, 4to. Paris, 1684; a more correct edition both of the text and version was published by J. G. Pritius, 8vo. Leipzig, 1699; and again in 1714; and may be regarded as the best edition. III. Apophthegmata. These were published partly by Possin in his Theaurus Aestheticus, and partly by Cotelerius in his Eccles. Græcæ Monumenta, vol. i. (4to. Paris, 1677), among the Apophthegmata Patrum; and were afterwards joined by Pritius to the Opuscula. An English version of the Opuscula and of some of the Apophthegmata (those of Possin) was published by Mr. Granville Penn, 12mo. London, 1816, under the title of Institutes of Christian Perfection. All the works of Macarius, with a Latin version, are given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. vii. ed. Venice, 1770. A monastic rule to the compilation of which our Macarius contributed is noticed below in No. 2. A Latin version of some fragments of other pieces is given in the Bibliotheca Conventoria of Combéffis; and perhaps some pieces remain in MS. beside the homilies already mentioned (Tillemont and Ceillier, ll. cc.; Pritius, Pref. ad Macarii Opuscula; Galland, Bibl. Patrum Præf. ad vol. vii.; Oudin, De Scriptorib. Ecclæ. vol. i. p. 474, seq.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 373, vol. i. p. 256, ed. Oxford, 1740—1742; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 361, &c.; Penn, Pref. to the Institutes of Macarius.)

2. Of ALEXANDRIA, contemporary with the foregoing, from whom he is distinguished by the epithet ALEXANDRINUS (δ' Ἀλεξανδρεὺς), or POLLITUS (Πολίτης), i.e. URBICUS, and sometimes JUNIOR. Palladius, who lived with him three years, has given a tolerably long account of him in his Historia Lausiaca, c. 20; but it chiefly consists of a record of his supposed miracles. He was a native of Alexandria where he followed the trade of a confectioner, and must not be confounded with Macarius, the presbyter of Alexandria, who is mentioned by Socrates (H. E. i. 27) and Sozomen (H. E. ii. 22), and who was accused of sacrilegious violence towards Ischyra [ATHANASIUS]. Our Macarius forsook his trade to follow a monastic life, in which he attained such excellence, that Palladius (ibid. c. 19) says that, though younger than Macarius the Egyptian, he surpassed even him in the practice of asceticism. Neither the time nor the occasion of his embracing a solitary life is known, for the Macarius mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 29) appears to be a different person. Tillemont has endeavoured to show that his retirement took place not later than A. D. 335, but he founds his calculation on a misconception of a passage of Palladius. Macarius was ordained priest after the Egyptian Macarius, i. e. after A. D. 340, and appears to have lived chiefly in that part of the desert of Nitria which, from the number of the solitary who had their dwellings there, was termed "the Cells" ("Cellae," or "Cellulae," τὰ κελιά); but frequently visited, perhaps for a time (least, in other parts of the great Lybian wilderness, and occasionally at least of the wilderness between the Nile and the Red Sea. Galland says he became at length archimandrite of Nitria, but does not cite his authority, which was probably the MS. inscription to his Regula given below, and which is of little value. Philippus Sidetes calls him a teacher and catechist of Alexandria, but with what correctness seems very doubtful. Various anecdotes recorded of him represent him as a company with the other Macarius (No. 1) and with St. Antony. Many miracles are ascribed to him, most of which are recorded by Palladius either as having been seen by himself, or as resting on the authority of the saint's former companions, but they are frivolous and absurd. Macarius shared the title of his namesake [No. 1] in the persecution which the Arians carried on against the orthodox. He died, according to Tillemont's calculation, in A. D. 394, but according to Fabricius, in A. D. 404, at the age of 100, in which case he must have been nearly as old as Macarius the Egyptian. He is commemorated in the Roman Calendar on the 2d January, and by the Greeks on the 19th January. Socrates describes him as characterized by cheerfulness of temper and kindness to his juniors, qualities which induced many of them to embrace an ascetic life. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 23, 24; Sozom. H. E. iii. 4, vi. 20; Theodoret. H. E. iv. 21; Rufin. H. E. 6; and apud Heribert Rosewyd, De Vita et Miraculis Sancti, ii. 29; Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca, c. 20; and Acta Sanctorum, a. d. 2 Janvar.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. viii. p. 626, &c.)

To this Macarius are ascribed the following works.—I. Regula S. Macarii qui habuit subordinationem sua quinque Millia Monachorum. This Regula, which is extant in a Latin version, consists of thirty "Cypria," and must be distinguished from other, which is also extant in a Latin version, under the title of Regula SS. Serapionis, Macarii, Paphnutii et aliorum Macarii; to which the first of the two Macarii contributed capp. v—viii., and the second ("alter Macarius") capp. xiii.—xvi. Tillemont and others consider these two Macarii to be the Egyptian and the Alexandrian, and apparently with reason. The Regula S. Macarii, which some have supposed to be the Epistola of Macarius the Egyptian [No. 1] mentioned by Gennadius, is ascribed to the Alexandrian by S. Benedict of Anagni, Holstenius, Tillemont, Fabricius, and Galland. Cave hesitates to receive it as genuine. II. Epistola B. Macarii data ad Monachos. A Latin version of this is subjoined to the Regula; it is short and sententious in style. The Regula was first printed in the Historia Monasterii S. Joannis Roomaensis (p. 24) of the Jesuit Rouvier (Rouvière), 4to. Paris, 1637; and was reprinted together with the Epistola, in the Codex Regularum of Holstenius (4to. Rome, 1661), and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. vii. fol. Venice, 1770. III. Τὸ ἀγίου Μακαρίου τοῦ Ἀλεξανδρείας λόγος περὶ ἐξόδου ψυχῆς δικαίων καὶ ἀμαρτωλῶν τὰ πᾶς χειρίζονται ἐκ τοῦ σώματος, καὶ πᾶς εἰσιν, Sancti Macarii Alexandrini Sermo de Exitu Animas Justorum et Peccatorum: quomodo separantur a Corpore, et in quo Statu manent. This was printed, with a Latin version, by Cave (who, however, regarded it as the forgery of some later Greek writer), in the notice of Macarius in his Historia Litteraria ad ann. 373 (vol. i. fol. Lond. 1688, and Oxford, 1740—1742); and was again printed, more correctly, by Tollius, in his Insignis Itineris Italici, 4to. Utrecht, 1696. Tollius was not aware that it had been printed by Cave. It is given, with the other works of Macarius of Alexandria, in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland. In one MS. at Vienna it is ascribed to Alexander, an ascetic and disciple of Macarius. Cave is disposed to ascribe to Macarius of Alexandria the Homilies of Macarius the Egyptian [No. 1]. (Cave, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 365; Holsten. Codex Regularum, vol. i. pp. 10—14, 18—21, ed. Angsburg, 1759; Galland, Biblioth. Patr. Proleg. to vol. vii.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. viii. pp. 618, 648; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. vii. p. 712, &c.)

3. Of ANCYRA, of which city he was metropolitan. Macarius lived in the earlier part of the fifteenth century, and was author of a work against the Latin church and its advocates, entitled Κατὰ τῆς τῶν Λατίνων κακοδοξίας καὶ κατὰ Βαρλαάμ καὶ Ἀκινδύνου, Adversus Malignam Latinorum Dogmata et contra Barlaam et Acindynum. The work is extant only in MS., but has been cited in several places by Allatius in his De Eccles. Occident. et Orient. perpet. Consensione. Allatius characterizes the work as trifling and full of absurdities; but Cave considers that the citations given by Allatius himself by no means justify his censure. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1430; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 367.)

4. Of ANTIOCH. Macarius was patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century. He held the doctrine of the Monothelites; and having attended the sixth general or third Constantinopolitan council (A. D. 680, 681), and there boldly avowed his heresy, affirming that Christ's will was "that of a God-man" (θεοανθρώπου); and having further boldly declared that he would rather be torn limb from limb than renounce his opinions, he was deposed and banished. His Ἐκθεσις ἡτοῖ ὁμολογία πίστεως, Expositio sive Confessio Fidei; and some passages from his Προσφωνητικὸς πρὸς βασιλέα λόγος, Horatioarius ad Imperatorem Sermo; his Λόγος ἀποσταλὲς Λουκᾷ πρεσβυτέρῳ καὶ μοναχῷ τῷ ἐν Ἀφρικῇ, Liber ad Lucam Presbyterum et Monachum in Africa missus; and from one or two other of his pieces, are given in the Concilia, vol. vi. col. 743, 902, &c., ed. Labbe; vol. iii. col. 1168, 1300, &c., ed. Hardouin; vol. xi. col. 349, 512, &c., ed. Mansi. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 680; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. 368.) This heretical Macarius of Antioch is not to be confounded with a saint of later date, but of the same name, "archbishop of Antioch in Armenia," who died an exile at Ghent in Flanders, in the early part of the eleventh century, and of whom an account is given by the Bollandists in the Acta Sanctorum, a. d. 10 Aprilis. Of what Antioch this later Macarius was archbishop is not determined. There is no episcopal city of Antioch in Armenia properly so called.

5. ANTONII DISCIPULUS, the DISCIPLE of ST. ANTONY, or, of PISPIS (comp. Nos. 1 and 2). Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. c. 25, 26) mentions two disciples of St. Antony, Macarius and Amathas, as resident with and attendant upon that saint, at Mount Pispis, Pispiri, or Pisperi, and as having buried him after his death. These are probably the two brethren mentioned by Athanasius (Vita S. Antonii, c. 21) as having waited on the aged recluse for the last fifteen years of his life. This Macarius of Pispis has been by several writers, both ancient and modern, including Rufinus, and perhaps Theodoret, among the ancients, and Cave and Pritius among the moderns, confounded with one or other of the Macarii, the Egyptian and the Alexandrian (Nos. 1 and 2); but Bollandus (Proleg. ad Vitam S. Antonii, c. v. vi. in Acta Sand. a. d. 17 Jan.) and Tillemont (Mémoires, vol. viii. p. 806) have shown that there are several reasons for distinguishing them; and there is great difficulty in reconciling the known circumstances of either of these Macarii with the close attendance on St. Antony given by Macarius of Pispis. To Macarius of Pispis Possin ascribed the Honiliæ and Opuscula of Macarius the Egyptian (No. 1).

6. OF ATHOS. [No. 13.]

7. OF THE CELLS, or JUNIOR. Macarius, whom Sozomen calls πρεσβύτερον τῶν κελλίων, "presbyter of the Cells," i. e. of that part of the desert of Nitria in Egypt which was so called, was a herd boy, who having, while feeding his cattle by the Maraëotic lake, accidentally killed one of his companions, fled into the wilderness in order to avoid the punishment of his homicide. He was thus led to embrace a solitary life, which he followed for nearly thirty years. This Macarius must not be confounded with Nos. 1, 2, or 3, with whom he appears to have been contemporary. (Sozomen, H. E. vi. 29; Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. xvii.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. viii. p. 575.)

8. CHRYSOCEPHALUS, archbishop of Philadelphia. [CHRYSOCEPHALUS.]

9. OF CONSTANTINOPLE, patriarch of that see, from 1376 to 1379. There was another Macarius patriarch of Constantinople, in the sixteenth century. (Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 368.)

10. HISTORICUS, the HISTORIAN. [MACAREUS.]

11. HIEROSOLYMITANUS, or of Jerusalem. Two Macarii were bishops of Jerusalem, one in the early part of the fourth century, before that see was raised to the dignity of a patriarchate; the other in the sixth century.

Macarius I. became bishop in A. D. 313 or 314, on the death of Hermon, and died in or before A. D. 333. He was computed to be the thirty-ninth bishop of the see. His episcopate, therefore, coincides with one of the most eventful periods in ecclesiastical history. There is extant in Eusebius (De Vita Constantini, iii. 30—32) and in Theodoret (H. E. i. 17), a letter from Constantine the Great to Macarius, concerning the building of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. Socrates (H. E. i. 17), Sozomen (H. E. ii. 1), and Theodoret (H. E. i. 18), also ascribe to him the discovery, by testing its miraculous efficacy, of the true cross, which had been dug up, with the two on which the thieves had suffered, near the Holy Sepulchre. Macarius was present at the council of Nice (Sozomen, H. E. i. 17; comp. Concilia, vol. i. col. 313, 314, ed. Hardouin); and, according to the very doubtful authority of Gelasius of Cyzicus (apud Concilia, col. 417), took part in the disputations against the Arian philosophers. He separated himself from the communion of Eusebius, the historian, bishop of Caesarea, who was his ecclesiastical superior, on account of his supposed Arianism. (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 20; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 369; Bolland. Acta Sanctorum Martii, vol. ii. p. 34, and Maii, vol. iii. Tractatus Praelimi, pp. xvi. xvii.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vi.)

Macarius II. was first appointed to the see A. D. 544, by the influence of the monks of Neolaura, "the new monastery," on the death of Petrus or Peter; but his election was disallowed by the emperor Justinian I., because it was reported that he avowed the obnoxious opinions of Origen, and Eustochius was appointed in his room, who bitterly persecuted the Origenists, who were numerous in the monasteries of Palestine. Eustochius was, however, afterwards deposed, but in what year, or from what cause, is not clear; and Macarius was restored, after purging himself from suspicion of heresy, by pronouncing an anathema on the opinions of Origen. Victor of Tunes places his restoration in the thirty-seventh year of Justinian (A. D. 563 or 564), and Theophanes in the reign of Justin II., who succeeded Justinian in A. D. 567. He died about A. D. 574, and was succeeded by Joannes. A homily, De Inventionē Capituli Praeursoris, by Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, is extant in MS.; but it is not known by which it was written, though probably by Macarius II. (Evang. H. E. iv. 37, 39, v. 16; Cyril Scyth. Sabaoe Vita, c. 90, apud Coteler. Eccles. Græc. Monach. vol. iii. p. 573; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. vol. iii. col. 235, &c.; Bolland. Acta Sanctorum Martii, vol. iii. Tractat. Praelimi, pp. xxviii. xxix.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 369.)

12. JUNIOR. [Nos. 2, 7.]

13. MACRES, or MACRA (ὁ Μακρὸς) or MACRIS (ὁ Μακρὸς), a monk of Mount Athos, and an intimate friend of George Phranza (ΦΡΑΝΖΑ), by whose interest he was appointed Hegumenos, or abbot of the monastery of the Almighty (τῷ παντοκράτορι), at Constantinople. He also obtained the dignity of Protosyncellus. He was a strenuous opponent of the Latin church; and this involved him in serious disputes with Joseph II., patriarch of Constantinople, who was favourable to the union of the churches. Notwithstanding his hostility to the Latins, Macarius was sent by the emperor

Joannes II. Palaeologus, on a mission to the Pope Martin V., preparatory to the summoning of a general council to determine the union, and died on his return in the beginning of the year 1431. It is not clear whether Macarius Macres was the same or a different person from another Macarius, a monk of Xanthopolus, of Jewish origin, and spiritual father to the emperor Manuel Palaeologus (Phranza, ii. 1); but it is quite clear that he is to be distinguished from Macarius Curus (δ Κουρουός), who also was sent by Joannes Palaeologus to the pope, after the death of Macarius Macres (Sguropulus, Hist. Concil. Florent. ii. 15, 16). Macarius Macres wrote a book against the Latin doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, with this title, "Ὅτι τὸ ἅγιον καὶ ἐκ τοῦ Πατρὸς καὶ ἐκ τοῦ υἱοῦ ἐκπορεύεται οὐτε ἀναγκαῖον ἐστὶν ἀλλὰ καυτοῖα τῆς ὁρθοδόξου πίστεως, Quod necessarium non est, sed Innovatio Fidei, dicere et Nil procedere Spiritum Sanctum. This work is extant in MS., and is cited by Allatius in his De Eccl. Occident. et Orient. Perpetua Consens. Some other works by Macarius Hieromonachus are extant in MS., but it is not certain if the writer was our Macarius; a small piece, De Inventionem et Transiitionem S. Euphemii Martyris, is distinctly ascribed to him (Phranza, ii. 9, p. 35, ed. Vienna, 1796, p. 156, 157, ed. Bonn; Sguropulus, l.c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 370; Cave, Hist. Litt. d. ann. 1420.)

14. MAGNES. Some extracts from a work entitled Apologia adversus Theosthenem Eucangeliorum falsumnotorem, by a writer whom he termed MAGNETES, were given in a Latin version by Francis Turrianus, in his tract De Sanctissima Iaccharia contra Volanum Polonum, Florence, 1775; but nothing was at that time known of the writer, of whom there was not any ascertained notice in the writers of the first eight centuries after Christ. Cave found in a MS. work of Germanus of Constantinople (he does not say which emanus), mention of "one MAGNES, a presbyter of Jerusalem," who was present at the synod of Antioch, A. D. 265, at which Paul of Samosata was deposed and excommunicated; and he identified this Magnes, but without reason, with the writer of the Apologia. Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 308, &c.) has devoted a section to this obscure writer, and Magnus Crusius of Göttingen is most fully discussed the subject in two dissertations, Notitia Macarii Magneti, and De Deolo-mphorum Macarii Magneti, 4to. Göttingen, 1737 and 1745. The name of the author is found in various forms of MACARIUS MAGNETES (τοῦ μακαρίου Μαγνήτου), MACARIUS MAGNES (τοῦ μακαρίου Μάγνητος), and MACARIUS (τοῦ ἁγίου μακαρίου), the last showing that Macarius is the same, not a title ("Beatus"); but it is doubtful whether Magnes is to be understood as a name or as a local designation, "the Magnesian;" and this uncertainty existed as early as the ninth century, when both the writer and his work, which was cited by the Iconoclasts, had become obscure. In a copy of his work, which was found with difficulty by the orthodox of that day, the writer was called ἐπίσκοπος, "bishop," and was located in episcopal vestments; but his see appears to have been altogether unknown. He is thought by Crusius to have lived near the end of the third or the beginning of the fourth century. There was a Macarius bishop of Magnesia, early in the fifth century, who was one of the opponents of Chrysostom; but if Crusius is correct in fixing the age of our Macarius, this must have been a different person.

Macarius wrote, 1. Ἀποκρίτικα, Responsiones, in five books; inscribed to Theosthenes, and not, as Turrianus and others after him had supposed, written against him, but rather against Porphyry. The work was formerly extant in the library of St. Mark, at Venice, but is not there now. Some extracts are, however, contained in different MSS., and the unpublished Antirrhethica adversus Iconomachos of Nicephorus of Constantinople, contains many passages. The extracts given by Turrianus were reprinted, but with some omissions, by Fabricius, in his Delectus Argumentorum et Syllabus Scriptorum de Veritate Religionis Christianae, and by Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. iii.; and some of the fragments preserved by Nicephorus were published by Crusius, in his Dissertationes already referred to. Another work of Macarius Magnes, Sermones in Genesin, or Commentarius in Genesin, has also perished, with the exception of some fragments, a portion of which were also inserted by Crusius. (Tillemont, l.c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 265 and 403; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 296, &c.; Galland. Biblioth. Patrum, Proleg. ad vol. iii. c. xiii.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. iv. 181, &c.)

15. MAGNUS. [No. 1.]

16. MARTYRII SCRIPTOR. A supplement to the Acta Proconularia Beatorum Martyrum Tharaci Probi et Andronici, of which Baronius has given a Latin version in his Annales Ecclesiastici, ad ann. 290, is said by him to have been drawn up by Macarius, Felix, and Verus, Christians, who were spectators of the Martyrdom; but a reference to the original Acta (which were published, with a Latin version, by Emericus Bigotius, Paris, 1680, and by Ruinart in his Acta Martyrum Sincera, and by the Bollandists, in the Acta Sanctorum Octobris, vol. v. p. 560, &c.) shows that the name of the writer was Marcion (Μαρκίων), not Macarius.

17. MONACHUS. According to Gennadius of Marseilles, Macarius, a Roman monk, wrote Liber adversus Mathematicos, or as it is described by Rufinus, Opuscula adversus Fatum et Mathesin, now lost. He lived about the end of the fourth century, and was the intimate friend of Rufinus, who inscribed to him his Latin version of the Περὶ ἀρχῶν of Origen, and his Apologia pro Origene. (Gennadius, De Viris Illust. c. 28; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. viii. p. 372; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 401.)

18. The MONOTHELITE. [No. 4.]

19. PATRIARCHA. [Nos. 4, 9, 11.]

20. Of PHILADELPHIA. [CHRYSOCEPHALUS.]

21. ROMANUS. [No. 17.]

22. RUFINI AMICUS. [No. 17.]

Many other Macarii are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. vol. viii. p. 367, &c. [J. C. M.]

MACATUS. M. LI'VIUS, was appointed by the praetor M. Valerius, in B. C. 214, commander of the town and citadel of Tarentum, and defended both with success against the attacks of Hannibal in that year. But two years afterwards (B. C. 212) the town was taken by a surprise, and Livius fled for refuge into the citadel, which he maintained, notwithstanding all the attempts of Hannibal to dialogue him. In course of time the Roman troops suffered dreadfully, from want of provisions. In B. C. 210, D. Quintius was sent with a fleet to convey provisions to the citadel, but was defeated by the Tarentines; this disaster, however, was counterbalanced by a victory which Livius gained at the same time by land. Livius continued in possession of the citadel till the town was retaken by Q. Fabius Maximus in B. C. 209. In the following year there was a warm debate in the senate respecting Livius Macatus; some maintaining that he ought to be punished for losing the town, others that he deserved to be rewarded for having kept the citadel for five years, and a third party thinking that it was a matter which did not belong to the senate, and that if punishment was deserved, it ought to be inflicted by the censorial nota. The latter view was the one adopted by the majority of the senate. Macatus was warmly supported on this occasion by his relative M. Livius Salinator; and a saying of Q. Fabius Maximus in the course of the debate is recorded by several writers. When the friends of Macatus were maintaining that Maximus was indebted for his conquest of the town to Macatus, because he had possession of the citadel, Maximus replied, "Certe, nam nisi ille amisisset, ego nunquam recepissem." (Liv. xxiv. 20, xxv. 9, 10, 11, xxvi. 39, xxvii. 25, 34; Appian, Annib. 32; Polyb. viii. 27, &c., who calls him Caius Livius; Cic. de Senect. 4, de Orat. ii. 67, who erroneously calls him Livius Salinator; Plut. Fab. 21.)

MACCABAEI (Μακκαβαῖοι), the name generally given to the descendants of the family of the heroic Judas Maccabi or Maccabaeus, a surname which he obtained from his glorious victories. (From the Hebrew מַכַּבִּי, makkab, "a hammer;" see Winer, Biblisches Realwörterbuch, vol. i. p. 745.) They were also called Asmonaei (Ἀσμοναῖοι), from Asmonaeus, or Chasmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, the father of Judas Maccabaeus, or, in a shorter form, Asmonaei or Hasmonaei. This family, which eventually obtained the kingly dignity, first occurs in history in A. C. 167, when Mattathias raised the standard of revolt against the Syrian kings. According to Josephus (Ant. xiv. 16) the Asmonaeon dynasty lasted for 126 years; and as he places its termination in A. C. 37, the year in which Antigonus, king of Judaea, was put to death by M. Antony, it would have commenced in B. C. 163, when Judas Maccabaeus took Jerusalem, and restored the worship of the temple. At the death of Antigonus there were only two members of the Asmonaeon race surviving, namely, Aristobulus and his sister Mariamne, the former of whom was put to death by Herod in A. C. 35, and the latter was married to the murderer of her brother, to whom she bore several children.

The history of the Maccabees is related at length by Josephus (xii. 6—xiv. 16), and the war of independence against the Syrian kings down to the time of Simon in the first and second books of Maccabees. It is only necessary here to give a brief account of the founders of this family, since the various members of it, who obtained the kingly dignity, are given under their proper names. A genealogical table of the whole family will be found in Vol. II. p. 543.

From the death of Alexander the Great the Greek language, religion, and civilisation, which had been spread more or less throughout the whole of Asia, from the Indus to the Aegæan, had been making a certain though slow progress among the Jewish nation also. Under the sovereignty of the early Ptolemies and Seleucidae, who had allowed the Jews liberty of religious worship, an influential party had adopted the Greek religion and Greek habits; and their example would probably have been followed by still greater numbers, had not the attempts of Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes to root out entirely by persecution the worship of Jehorah roused the religious patriotism of the great body of the people, who still remained steadfast to their ancient faith.

Antiochus IV. had sold the priesthood successively to Joshua, who assumed the Greek name of Jason, and subsequently to Onias, who also changed his name into that of Menelaus, under the condition of their introducing into Jerusalem Greek rites and institutions. Onias, in order to obtain the money to pay for the priesthood, had purloined the sacred vessels of the temple, and sold them at Tyre. This act of sacrilege, united with other circumstances, caused a formidable insurrection at Jerusalem, for which, however, the inhabitants had to pay dearly. Antiochus was just returning from his Egyptian campaign when he heard of the revolt. He forthwith marched against the city, which he easily took (B. C. 170), put to death a vast number of the inhabitants, pillaged the temple, and profaned it by offering a sow on the altar of burnt sacrifices. Two years afterwards, when he was forced by the Romans to retire from Egypt, he resolved to root out entirely the Jewish religion, and to put to death every one who still adhered to it. He again took possession of Jerusalem, and commanded a general massacre of the inhabitants on the Sabbath; he set fire to the city in many places, and built a strong fortress in the highest part of Mount Sion, to command the whole of the surrounding country. He then published an edict, which enjoined uniformity of worship throughout his dominions; and the most frightful cruelties were perpetrated on those who refused obedience.

The barbarities committed in every part of Judaea soon produced a reaction. At Modin, a town not far from Lydda, on the road which leads from Joppa to Jerusalem, lived Mattathias, a man of the priestly line and of deep religious feeling, who had five sons in the vigour of their days, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. When the officer of the Syrian king visited Modin to enforce obedience to the royal edict, Mattathias not only refused to desert the religion of his fathers, but with his own hand struck dead the first renegade who attempted to offer sacrifice on the heathen altar. He then put to death the king's officer, and retired to the mountains with his sons (B. C. 167). Their numbers daily increased, and as opportunities occurred, they issued on their mountain fastnesses, cut off detachments of the Syrian army, destroyed heathen altars, and restored in many places the synagogues and open worship of the Jewish religion. Within a few months the insurrection at Modin had grown into a war for national independence. But the toils of such a war were too much for the frame of Mattathias, who died in the first year of the revolt, leaving the conduct of it to Judas, his third son.

1. JUDAS, who assumed the surname of Maccabaeus, as has been mentioned above, carried on the war with the same prudence and energy as which it had been commenced. Antiochus had collected a powerful army to put down the revolt, but being called to the eastern provinces of his empire (B.C. 166), he left the conduct of it to his friend and minister Lysias, who was also entrusted with the guardianship of his son and the government of the provinces from the Euphrates to the sea. [LYSIAS, No. 4.] Lysias sent against the Jews a large force under the command of Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, Nicanor, and Gorgias, but they were entirely defeated by Judas near Emmaus in B.C. 165. In the next year (B.C. 164) Lysias took the field in person with a still larger army, but he met with the same fate as his viceroy, and was overthrown a little to the north of Hebron. The death of Antiochus Epiphanes, which happened in this year at Tabae in Persia, and the struggle which arose between Lysias and Philip for the guardianship of the young Antiochus, tutor and for the administration of the empire, delayed for the time the exertions of the Syrians. Judas and his brothers entered Jerusalem in B.C. 163 and purified the temple; they then proceeded to expel the Syrians and Hellenising Jews from every part of Judaea. Meantime, however, Lysias, with the aid of the apostate Jews, had again collected a formidable army, with which he marched against Judas, accompanied by the young king. His forces were arrested by the strong fortress of Bethsura, which commands the narrow passes that lead to Jerusalem; and notwithstanding an heroic little battle near this place, in which Eleazar, the brother of Judas, perished, the town was obliged to capitulate and Judas to retire to Jerusalem. Here Judas shut himself up, and successfully resisted all the attempts of Lysias to take the place; but as his parties suffered dreadfully from famine, and the approach of Philip made Lysias anxious to be at liberty to oppose his rival, a treaty was concluded between Judas and Lysias, and the latter withdrew his troops.

This peace, however, was of short duration. Demetrius, who was the rightful heir to the throne of Syria, had escaped from Rome, where he had been a hostage, and on his arrival in Syria succeeded in getting into his power Lysias and the young Antiochus, both of whom he put to death, in B.C. 162. He then proceeded to sow dissension among the patriotic party in Judaea, by proclaiming Alcimus high-priest. Several of the zealots of the law declared in favour of the latter, and his claims were supported by a Syrian army. But as Judas would not own the authority of a high-priest who owed his appointment to the Syrians, the war broke out again. At first the Maccabees met with great success; he defeated the Syrians under Nicanor in two successive battles, and then sent an embassy to Rome to form an alliance with the republic. His offer was eagerly accepted by the Roman senate; but before this alliance became known, he was attacked by an overwhelming Syrian force under the command of Bacchides, and slew only 800 men with him, fell in battle while performing prodigies of valour, B.C. 160. He succeeded in the command of the patriotic party by his brother,

1. JONATHAN. As Bacchides and Alcimus were in possession of almost the whole of the country, Jonathan was obliged to act on the defensive. He took up a strong position in the desert of Tekoah, and in conjunction with his brother Simon carried on a harassing and desultory warfare against the Syrians. About the same time another of the brothers, John, fell in battle. Jonathan, however, gradually grew in strength; and Bacchides, who had met with several disasters, at length concluded a peace with Jonathan, although Jerusalem and several other important towns still continued in the possession of the Syrian party. A revolution in the Syrian monarchy in B.C. 152 gave Jonathan still greater power. In that year an adventurer, Alexander Balas, laid claim to the throne of the Seleucidae. [ALEXANDER BALAS, Vol. I. p. 114.] Alexander and the reigning monarch, Demetrius Soter, eagerly courted the assistance of Jonathan. He espoused the side of Alexander, who offered him the high-priesthood, and various immunities and advantages. As Alexander eventually drove Demetrius out of his kingdom, Jonathan shared in his good fortune, and became recognised as the high-priest of the Jewish people. After the death of Alexander, which followed soon after, Jonathan played a distinguished part in the struggle for the Syrian throne between Demetrius Nicator, the son of Soter, and Antiochus VI., the youthful son of Alexander Balas. He first supported the former; but subsequently espoused the side of Antiochus; and it was mainly owing to his energy and ability that Demetrius was obliged to take to flight, and yield the throne to his young rival. Tryphon, the minister of Antiochus, wished, however, to supplant his master, and obtain the Syrian throne for himself; and finding Jonathan the chief obstacle to his ambitious views, he treacherously got him into his power, B.C. 144, and put him to death in the following year. Jonathan was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his brother,

3. SIMON. Simon immediately declared for Demetrius, and was confirmed by the latter in the high-priesthood. He was the most fortunate of the heroic sons of Mattathias. He renewed the alliance with the Romans, fortified many towns, and expelled eventually the Syrian garrison from the fortress in Jerusalem. Under his fostering care the country began to recover from the ravages of the long protracted wars, and gradually increased in wealth and prosperity. Still he was not destined to end his days in peace. In B.C. 137, Antiochus VII., who had succeeded his brother Demetrius Nicator, unwilling to lose Judaea, which had now become an independent state, sent an army, under his general Cendebaeus, to invade the country. The aged Simon entrusted the conduct of the war to his sons Judas and Joannes Hyrcanus, who conquered Cendebaeus, and drove him out of the country. But Simon did not long enjoy the fruits of his victory. His son-in-law Ptolemy, the governor of Jericho, instigated by Antiochus, formed a plot to obtain the government of Judaea. He treacherously seized Simon at a banquet, and put him to death with two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, B.C. 135. His other son Joannes Hyrcanus escaped, and succeeded his father.

4. JOANNES HYRCANUS I. was high-priest B.C. 135—106. He did not assume the title of king, but was to all intents and purposes an independent monarch. His life is given under HYRCANUS. He was succeeded by his son,

5. ARISTOBULUS I., who was the first of the Maccabees who assumed the kingly title, which was henceforth borne by his successors. His reign lasted only a year (B. C. 106—105). [ARISTOBULUS, No. 1.] He was succeeded by his brother,

6. ALEXANDER JANNAEUS, who reigned B. C. 105—78. [ALEXANDER JANNAEUS, Vol. I. p. 117.] He was succeeded by his widow,

7. ALEXANDRA, who appointed her son Hyrcanus II. to the priesthood, and held the supreme power B. C. 78—69. On her death in the latter year her son,

8. HYRCANUS II., obtained the kingdom, B. C. 69, but was supplanted almost immediately afterwards by his brother,

9. ARISTOBULUS II., who obtained the throne B. C. 68. [ARISTOBULUS, No. 2.] For the remainder of the history of the house of the Macabees see HYRCANUS II. and HERODES I.

MAC'CEDON (Μακεδών), a son of Zeus and Thyia, and a brother of Magnes, from whom Macedonia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μακεδονία.) [L. S.]

MACEDO'NICUS, an agnomen of Q. Caecilius Metellus, consul B. C. 143. [METELLUS.]

MACEDO'NIUS (Μακεδόνιος). 1. Of ANTIOCH. [No. 6.]

2. Of ANTIOCH. Macedonius, a Monothelite, was patriarch of Antioch from A. D. 639 or 640, till 655 or later. He was appointed to the patriarchate by the influence, if not by the nomination, of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, by whom also he was consecrated. The year of his death is not certain. Macarius, who was his successor (though perhaps not immediately), stated in his Expositio Fidei, read at the sixth general council, A. D. 681 [MACARIUS, No. 4], that Macedonius was present at a synod held while Peter was patriarch of Constantinople, i. e. some time from A. D. 655 to 666, which shows he could not have died before 655. Macedonius appears to have spent the whole of his patriarchate at Constantinople, Antioch being in the power of the Saracens. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 740, 741; Bolland, Acta Sanctorum Julii, vol. iv. Tractat. Praelim. p. 109.)

3. Of CONSTANTINOPLE (1). On the death of Eusebius, patriarch of Constantinople, better known as Eusebius of Nicomedia [EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDEIA], A. D. 341 or 342, the orthodox, which appears to have been the popular party, restored the patriarch Paul, who had been deposed shortly after his election (A. D. 339) to make room for Eusebius; while the leaders of the Arian party elected Macedonius, who had been deacon, and perhaps priest, of the church of Constantinople, and was already advanced in years. Jerome, in his additions to the Chronicon of Eusebius, says that Macedonius had been an embroiderer, "artis plumariae," an art which Tillemont supposes he might have carried on while in his office of deacon or priest, but which Scaliger supposed to be attributed to him, by Jerome's mistaking the meaning of the term ποικιλότητος, which perhaps some Greek writer had applied to Macedonius. According to the account of the orthodox party, Alexander the patriarch had described Macedonius as a man having the exterior of piety, and possessing much address in secular affairs; but, according to the Arians, Alexander had commended his piety. He had been one of the adversaries of Paul during the first patriarchate of that prelate.

Upon the election of Macedonius great tumults, accompanied by bloodshed, were excited either by his partisans or those of Paul; and the attempt to put these down by Hermogenes, magister equitum, who had been ordered by the emperor Constantius II. to expel Paul, led to still further seditions, and to the murder of Hermogenes. These events compelled Constantius, then at Antioch, to return to Constantinople, and an end was put to the disturbances by the banishment of Paul. Constantius was, however, much displeased at the unauthorized election of Macedonius, and delayed to recognize him as patriarch, but he was allowed to officiate in the church in which he had been ordained. These events occurred in A. D. 342. On the departure of Constantius Paul returned, but was soon again banished, and Macedonius and his partisans were then by the imperial officers put in possession of the churches, though not without the loss of several hundred lives, through the resistance of the multitude.

Macedonius retained possession of the patriarchate and the churches till A. D. 348, when the interposition and threats of Constantius obliged Constantius to restore Paul, whose title had been confirmed by the council of Sardica (A. D. 347), and Macedonius was only allowed to officiate in one church, which appears to have been his own private property; but in A. D. 350, after the death of Constantius, he regained possession of his see, and commenced a vigorous persecution of his opponents, chased them from the churches in his patriarchate, and banished or tortured them, in some instances to death. On the re-establishment of orthodoxy these unhappy persons were revered as martyrs, and their memory is still celebrated by the Greek and Latin churches on the 30th March and the 25th Oct. respectively. By these cruelties Macedonius became hateful even to his own party, and an unexpected event increased the odium in which he was held. He removed the body of the emperor Constantine the Great from the Church of the Apostles, in which it had been buried, and which (though both only twenty years before) was in a very dilapidated state. The removal was made in order to prevent the corpse being injured by the apprehended fall of the church; but it led to a tumult, in which the people appear to have been influenced by Macedonius, and many persons were killed in the church to which the body had been removed. Constantius was very angry with Macedonius for his removing the body without orders, and the serious consequences to which his act had led, and the emperor's displeasure prepared the way for his downfall. At the council of Seleucia (A. D. 359), where the Acaecian or pure Arian party and the semi-Arians were openly divided and separated from each other, some charges against Macedonius, apparently of cruelty, are said to have been contemplated. He did not appear at the first sitting of the council, alleging sickness, but he was present afterwards; and if any hostile proceedings contemplated, no steps appear to have been taken against him. In A. D. 360, however, at a council held at Constantinople, he was deposed, the Acaecians, who were favoured by Constantius, on the plea that he had been the occasion of the murders, and because he had admitted to communion a deacon convicted of adultery; but reality to gratify Constantius, who was angry against him, and perhaps also because he would not adopt their views. Though expelled from anthropos he was not disposed to remain quiet, but sought to unite himself more closely with the semi-Arians, in opposition to the Acacians. [ACACIUS, No. 3.] He appears to have resided in the neighbourhood of Constantinople till his death, of the date of which there is no account. Facundus asserts that he was summoned in A. D. 381 before the second oecumenical, or first council of Constantinople, at which his obnoxious tenets respecting the Holy Spirit were condemned; but this is probably a mistake, and it appears likely that he did not long survive his deposition.

Macedonius is known chiefly as the leader of a sect which took its name from him. The term "Macedonians" (of Macedonians) is applied somewhat indeterminately in the ancient ecclesiastical writers. Its first application was to the less heterodox division of the Arian party, commonly called the semi-Arians (ἡμιαρειανοί), who admitted and contended that the Son was ὁμοούσιος, "homoiousios," of like substance with the Father, in opposition to those who affirmed that he was ἀνόμοιος, "anomoios," of unlike substance. The latter party were known as Acacians, from their leader Acacius of Caesarea [ACACIUS, No. 3], while the former were designated from Macedonius, who was the most eminent among them in dignity, though he does not appear to have fully identified himself with them until after his deposition; and if Photius (Bibl. Cod. 257) is correct, was at his election an Anomoian or Acacian. The two sections came into open collision at the council of Seleucia (A. D. 339); and the Acacians, though outnumbered in that council, succeeded, through the favour of Constantius, in deposing several of their opponents, and secured an ascendancy which, though interrupted in the reigns of Julian and Jovian, was fully restored under the reign of Valens, from whose time they were known simply as Arians, that designation being thenceforward given to them alone. Many of the semi-Arian party, or, as they were termed, Macedonians, being persecuted by the now triumphant Acacians, were led to approximate more and more to the standard of the Nicene confession with respect to the nature and dignity of the Son; and at last several of their bishops transmitted to pope Liberius (A. D. 367) a confession, in which they admitted that the Son was "ὁμοούσιος," "homoiousios," or "of the same substance" as the Father, and were addressed by the pope in reply as orthodox in that respect. Their growing orthodoxy on this point rendered their heterodoxy with respect to the Holy Spirit, whose deity they denied, and whom they affirmed to be a creature, more prominent. This dogma is said to have been broached by Macedonius after his deposition, and was held both by those who remained semi-Arians and by those who had embraced orthodox views on the person and dignity of the Son; their only common feature being their denial of the deity of the Holy Spirit, on account of which they were by the Greeks generally termed Πνευματομαχοί, "Pneumatomachi," "Impugners of the Spirit." The second general or first Constantinopolitan council (A. D. 381) anathematized the heresy of the semi-Arians or Pneumatomachi (ἡμιαρειανῶν ἢ πνευματομάχων), thus identifying the two names as belonging to one great party; from which it appears not unlikely that the same fear of persecution which led the Macedonians, during the Arian ascendancy under Valens, to court the orthodox, by approximating towards orthodoxy, led them, now that orthodoxy was in the ascendant under Theodosius, to draw nearer to the Arians, in order to secure their alliance and support. The Macedonians were also sometimes called Marathonianians, Μαραθωνιανοί, from Marathonia, one of their leaders. (Socrates, H. E. ii. 6, 12, 13, 16, 22, 27, 38, 39, 40, 45, iv. 12, v. 4, 8; Sozom. H. E. iii. 3, 7, 9, iv. 2, 3, 20, 21, 22, 24, 26, 27, v. 14, vi. 10, 11, 12, 22, vii. 7, 9; Theodoret. *H. 4. Of CONSTANTINOPLE (2). Macedonius, the second patriarch of Constantinople of the name, was nephew of Gennadius I., who was patriarch from A. D. 459 to 471, and by whom he was brought up. He held the office of Seneophylax, or keeper of the sacred vessels, in the great church at Constantinople, and, on the deposition of the patriarch Euphemius or Euthymius, was nominated patriarch by the emperor Anastasius I., who probably appreciated the mildness and moderation of his temper. His appointment is placed by Theophanes in A. M. 488, Alex. era, = 496 A. D. Though he himself probably recognised the council of Chalcedon, he was persuaded by the emperor to subscribe the Henoticon of Zeno, in which that council was silently passed over, and endeavoured to reconcile to the church the monks of the monasteries of Constantinople, who had broken off from the communion of the patriarch from hatred to the Henoticon; but he met with no success, although, in order to gain them over, he persuaded the emperor to summon a council of the bishops who were then at Constantinople, and to confirm, by a writing or edict, several of the things which had been sanctioned by the council of Chalcedon, without, as it appears, directly recognising the authority of the council. Macedonius, thus baffled in his designs, still treated the monks with mildness, abstaining from any harsh measures against them. Macedonius distinguished himself by his generosity and forbearance towards his predecessor Euphemius, and towards a man who had attempted to assassinate him. But the same praise of moderation cannot be given to all his acts, if, as stated by Victor of Tunes, he held a council in which the supporters of the council of Chalcedon were condemned. He occupied the patriarchate for sixteen years, and was deposed by the emperor, A. D. 511 or 512. According to Theophanes, the cause of his deposition was his maintenance of the authority of the council of Chalcedon, and his refusal to surrender the authentic record of the acts of that council. Anastasius urgently pressed him to disavow its authority, and when he could not prevail on him, suborned witnesses to charge him with unnatural lusts (which, from self-mutilation, he could not indulge), and with heresy. He was prevented by the fear of popular indignation from instituting an inquy into the truth of these charges, and therefore banished him without trial, first to Chalcedon, and then to Euchaita; and appointed Timotheus bishop or patriarch in his room; and, having thus exiled him without any previous sentence of condemnation or deposition, he endeavoured to amend the irregularity of the proceeding by appointing a day for his trial, when he had him condemned in his absence, and by judges who were themselves accusers and witnesses. Many ecclesiastics, however, throughout the empire, refused to admit the validity of his deposition; and his restoration to his see was one of the objects of the rebellion of Vitalian the Goth (A. D. 514), but it was not effected, and Macedonius died in exile, A. D. 516. Evagrius assigns a different cause for the emperor's hostility to him, namely, his refusal to surrender a written engagement not to alter the established creed of the church, which Anastasius had given to the patriarch Euphemius, and which had been committed to the care of Macedonius, then only Scenophylax, and which he persisted in retaining when the emperor wished to recover it. He is honoured as a saint by the Greek and Latin churches. (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 30, 31, 32; Theodor. Lector. H. E. ii. 12—36; Theophan. Chronog. pp. 120—138, ed. Paris, pp. 96—110, ed. 5. The CONSUL, author of the epigrams. [See below.]

6. CRITHOPHAGUS, or CRITHOPHAGUS. (ὁ Κριθοφάγος.) Macedonius was a celebrated ascetic, contemporary with the earlier years of Theodoret, who was intimately acquainted with him, and has left an ample record of him in his Philothus or Historia Religiosa (c. 13). He led an ascetic life in the mountains, apparently in the neighbourhood of Antioch; and dwelt forty-five years in a deep pit (for he would not use either tent or hut). When he was growing old, he yielded to the intreaties of his friends, and built himself a hut; and was afterwards further prevailed upon to occupy a small house. He lived twenty-five years after quitting his cave, so that his ascetic life extended to seventy years; but his age at his death is not known. His habitual diet was barley, bruised and moistened with water, from which he acquired his name of Crithophagus, "the barley-eater." He was also called, from his dwelling-place, Gouba, or Guba, a Syriac word denoting a "pit" or "well." He was ordained priest by Flavian of Antioch, who was obliged to use artifice to induce him to leave his mountain abode; and ordained him, without his being aware of it, during the celebration of the eucharist. When informed of what had occurred, Macedonius, imagining that his ordination would oblige him to give up his solitude and his barley diet, flew into a passion, becoming his sanctity; and after pouring out the bitterest reproaches against the patriarch and the priests, he took his walking staff, for he was now an old man, and drove them away. He was one of the monks who resorted to Antioch, to intercede with the emperor's officers for the citizens of Antioch after the great insurrection (A. D. 387), in which they had overthrown the statues of the emperor. His admirable plea is given by Theodoret. (H. E. v. 19.) Chrysostom notices one part of the plea of Macedonius, but does not men-

12. VICARIUS AFRICÆ. Macedonius, who held the office of Vicarius Africæ, in the early part of the fifth century, was the friend and correspondent of Augustin, who has described him as a person of many eminent qualifications. Two of his letters to Augustin, with Augustin's replies, are given in the works of that father. (Augustin. Epistolæ, li.—liv. edit. vet., clii.—clv. ed. Caillan.) [J. C. M.]

MACEDO'NIUS (Μακεδόνιος), of Thessalonica, a poet of the Greek Anthology, whom Suidas (s. v. Ἀγασίας) mentions as contemporary with Agathias and Paul the Silentiary and Tribonianus, in the time of Justinian. Suidas also calls him the Consul (τῷ βράδρῳ). There are altogether forty-three epigrams by him in the Anthology, most of which are of an erotic character, and in an elegant style. (Brunck, Anth. vol. iii. p. 111; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iv. p. 81, p. 215, No. 357, vol. xiii. p. 641, No. 30, p. 913; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 481.) [P. S.]

MACER, AEMI'LIIUS, of Verona, was senior to Ovid, and died in Asia, B. C. 16, three years after Virgil, as we learn from the Eusebian Chronicle. He wrote a poem or poems upon birds, snakes, and medicinal plants, in imitation, it would appear, of the Theriaca of Nicander. His productions, of which not one word remains, are thus commemorated in the Tristia:—

"Sæpe suas volucres legit mihi grandior ævo, Quæque necet serpens, quæ juvet herba,
Macer."

The work now extant, entitled "Aemilius Macer de Herbarum Virtutibus," belongs to the middle ages. Of this piece there is an old translation, "Macer's Herbal, practys'd by Doctor Lynceus. Translated out of Latyn into Englyshe, which shewynge theyr Operacyons and Vertues set in the margin of this Boke, to the entent you myght know theyr vertues." There is no date; but it was printed by "Robt. Wyer, dwellynge at the sygne of Saynt Johan evangelyste, in Seynt Martyns Paryshe, in the byshop of Norwiche rector, beyarde Charynge Crosse."

2. We must carefully distinguish from Aemilius Macer of Verona, Macer who was one of the Latin Homeristæ, and who must have been alive in A. D. 12, since he is addressed by Ovid in the 2d book of the Epistles from Pontus (Ep. x.) and is there spoken of as an old travelling companion, his literary undertaking being clearly described in the lines:—

"Tu canis æterno quidquid restabat Homero, Ne careant summa Troica bella manu;"

while elsewhere (ex Pont. iv. 16. 6) he is designated as "Iliacus Macer." We gather from Appuleius that the title of his work was "Belus Trojanum." (Hieron. in Caron. Euseb. Ol. cxc. Ov. Trist. iv. 10. 43; Quintilian. vi. 3. § 4 x. l. § § 56, 87, xii. 11. § 27; Appuleius, de Orto graph. § 18; Maffei, Verona Illustrata, ii. 19; Broukhus. ad Tibull. ii. 6; Wernsdorf, Pont. Lat. Mir. vol. iv. p. 579.)

If the Macer named by Quintilian in his sixth book be the same with either of the above, we must conclude that one of them published a collection of "Tetrasticha," which were turned aside from their true meaning, and pieced together by Ovid, so as to form an invective on good-for-nothing poets, "Adjuvant urbanitatem et versus commodè positi, seu toti, ut sunt (quod adeo facile est, ut Ovidius ex tetrastichon Macri carmine librum in malos poetas composuerit)." &c. [W. R.]

MACER, AEMI'LIUS, a Roman jurist, who wrote after Ulpian and Paulus, and lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. (Dig. 49. tit. 13.) He wrote several works, extracts from which are given in the Digest. The most important of them were, De Appellationibus, De Re Militari, De Officio Praeridis, De Publicis Judiciis, and Ad Legem de Vicisima Hereditatum. (Zimmern, Geschichte des Römischen Privatrechts, vol. i. part i. p. 328.)

MACER, BAE'BIUS. 1. One of the consuls suffecti A. D. 101, was consul designatus when the younger Pliny pleaded the cause of Bassus before the senate. (Plin. Ep. iv. 9. § 16.) He was praefectus urbi at the time of Trajan's death, A. D. 117. (Spart. Hadr. 5.) Whether he or Calpurnius Macer is the Macer to whom Pliny addresses three of his letters (iii. 5, v. 18, vi. 24), is uncertain.

2. Praefectus praetorio in the reign of Valerian. Vopisc. Aurel. 12.)

MACER, CALPU'RNIVS, governor of a Roman province at no great distance from that of Bithynia, at the time when Pliny administered the iter. A. D. 103, 104. (Plin. Ep. x. 51, 69, 81.) See MACER, BAE'BIUS.]

MACER, CLO'DIVS, was appointed by Nero governor of Africa; and, on the death of this emperor, A. D. 68, he raised the standard of revolt, and laid claim to the throne. He took this step at the instigation of Calvia Crispinilla, whom Tacitus calls the teacher of Nero in all voluptuousness, and he crossed over to Africa to persuade him to retreat; and it was also at her advice that he presented the corn-ships from going to Rome, in order to produce a famine in the city. [CRISPINILLA.] Soon as Galba was seated on the throne, he used Macer to be executed by the procurator, obonius Garicianus. During the short time that Macer exercised the sovereign power in Africa, he became hated for his cruelties and extortions. (Hist. i. 7, 11, 37, 73, ii. 97, iv. 49; Suet. Galb. 11; Plut. Galb. 6, 15.) The head of Macer was on coins which he had struck, from which we learn that his praenomen was Lucius. (Eckhel, vi. p. 288, &c.)

COIN OF CLODIUS MACER.

MACER, HERE'NNIVS, incurred the anger of emperor Caligula, because he saluted him only by his praenomen Caius. (Senec. de Const. Sup.)

MACER, C. LICINIVS. 1. A Roman an-nalist and orator, was the father of C. Licinius Calvus [CALVUS], and must have been born about A. C. 110. He was quaestor probably in A. C. 78, was tribune of the plebs A. C. 73, was subsequently raised to the praetorship and became governor of a province. He was distinguished by his hostility towards C. Rabirius, whom he charged (A. C. 73) with having been accessory to the death of Saturninus, an offence for which the same individual was brought to trial a second time ten years afterwards. Macer himself was impeached by Cicero, A. D. 66, when the latter was praetor, under the law De Repetundis; and finding that, notwithstanding the influence of Crassus, with whom he was closely allied, the verdict was against him, he instantly committed suicide, before all the forms were completed, and thus saved his family from the dishonour and loss which would have been entailed upon them had he been regularly sentenced. This is the account given by Valerius Maximus, and it does not differ in substance from that preserved by Plutarch.

His Annales, or Rerum Romanarum Libri, or Historiae, as they are variously designated by the grammarians, are frequently referred to with respect by Livy and Dionysius. They commenced with the very origin of the city, and extended to twenty-one books at least; but whether he brought down the record of events to his own time it is impossible for us to determine, since the quotations now extant belong to the earlier ages only. He appears to have paid great attention to the history of the constitution, and to have consulted ancient monuments, especially the Libri Lintei preserved in the temple of Juno Moneta, noting down carefully the points in which they were at variance with the received accounts. In consequence of his diligence in this department, Niebuhr conceives that he must have been more trustworthy than any of his predecessors, and supposes that the numerous speeches with which he was fond of diversifying his narrative afforded materials for Dionysius and Livy. Cicero speaks very coldly, and even contemptuously, of his merits, both as a writer and a speaker, but some allowance must perhaps be made in this case for personal enmity.

A few words from an oration, Pro Tuscia, have been preserved by Priscian (x. 8, p. 502, ed. Krehl), and a single sentence from an Epistola ad Senatum, by Nonius Marcellus (s. v. contendere). (Pigh. Ann. ad ann. 675; Sall. Histor. iii. 22, p. 252, ed. Gerlach; Cic. ad Att. i. 4, pro Rabir. 2, de Leg. i. 2, Brut. 67; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 7; Plut. Cic. 9; Macrob. i. 10, 13; Censorin. de Die Nat. 20; Solin. 8; Non. Marcell. s. v. clypeus, contendere, luculentum, lues, patibulum; Diomed. i. p. 366, ed. Putsch; Priscian. vi. 11, p. 256, x. 6, p. 496, ed. Krehl; in the last passage we must read Licinius for Aemilius; Liv. iv. 7, 20, 23, vi. 9, ix. 38, 46, x. 9; Dionys. ii. 52, iv. 6, v. 47, 74, vi. 11, vii. 1; Auctor, de Orig. Gent. Rom. 19, 23; Lachmann, de Fontibus Historiar. T. Livii Comment. prior, § 21; Krause, Vitus et Frag. Hist. Rom. p. 237; Meyer, Orat. Rom. Frag. p. 385, 2nd ed.; Weichert, Poet. Lat. Reliquiae, p. 92.) [W. R.]

2. An account of his son, who bore the agnomen Calvus, and who is frequently described as C. Licinius Calvus, is given under CALVUS.

The annexed coin probably refers to No. 1. The obverse represents a youthful head, and the reverse Pallas in a chariot, drawn by four horses.

COIN OF C. LICINIUS MACER.

MACER, MARCIUS, was a captain of gladiators in Otho's army, A. D. 69. Ascending the stream of the Po with a detachment of the Ravenna fleet, Macer drove the Vitellians from the left bank of the river, but shortly before the final defeat of his party at Bedriacum was himself repulsed, and displaced by Otho from his command. Macer's name was erased by Vitellians from the list of supplementary consuls for A. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 23, 35, 36, 71.) Plutarch (Otho 10) mentions Otho's gladiators, but not the name of their leader.

[W. B. D.]

MACER, POMPEIUS, was one of the praetors in A. D. 15, and put the question to the senate, whether there should be an extension of the Lex Majestatis. His praetorship therefore marks the epoch at which the government of Tiberius began to assume its worse and darker features. (Tac. Ann. i. 72; Suet. Tib. 58; comp. Dion. Cass. lvi. 19; Sen. de Ben. iii. 26; and see Majestas, s. v. Dict. of Antiq.)

[W. B. D.]

MACER, SEPU'LLIUS, only known from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Julius Caesar, and the reverse Victory, holding in one hand a spear, and in the other a small statue of Victory.

COIN OF SEPU'LLIUS MACER.

MACERINUS, the name of a very ancient family of the patrician Geganian Gens. [GEGANIA GENS.]

1. T. GEGANIUS MACRINUS, consul B. C. 492, with P. Minucius Augurinus, during which year there was a great famine at Rome, in consequence of the lands being uncultivated in the preceding year, when the plebs had retired to the Sacred Mountain. (Liv. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 1; Oros. ii. 5.)

2. L. GENUCIUS (MACERINUS), brother of No. 1, was sent into Sicily during his brother's consulship to obtain corn. (Dionys. vii. 1.)

3. M. GEGANIUS, M. P. MACRINUS, was three times consul; first in B. C. 447, with C. Julius Julius; a second time in B. C. 443, with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus, in which year he conquered the Volscians, and obtained a triumph on account of his victory; and a third time in B. C. 437, with L. Sergius Fidenas. (Liv. iii. 65, iv. 8–10, 17; Dionys. xi. 51, 63; Diod. xii. 29, 33, 43; Zonar. vii. 19.) The censorship, which was instituted in his second consulship, he filled in B. C. 435, with C. Furius Pacilus Fusus. These censors first held the census of the people in a public villa of the Campus Martius. It is also related of them that they removed Mam. Aemilius Mamercinus from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an aerarian, because he had proposed and carried a bill limiting the time during which the censorship was to be held from five years to a year and a half. (Liv. iv. 22, 24, ix. 33, 34.)

4. PROCULUS GEGANIUS MACRINUS, probably brother of No. 3, was consul B. C. 440, with L. Menenius Lanatus. (Liv. iv. 12; Diod. xii. 36.) For the events of the year, see LANATUS, No. 4.

5. L. GEGANIUS MACRINUS, consular tribune B. C. 378. (Liv. vi. 31; Diod. xv. 57.)

6. M. GEGANIUS MACRINUS, consular tribune B. C. 367. (Liv. vi. 42.)

MACHAEREUS (Μαχαίρεος), i. e. the sword-man, a son of Daetæas of Delphi, who is said to have slain Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, in a quarrel about the sacrificial meat at Delphi. (Strab. ix. p. 421; Pind. Nem. vii. 62, with the scholiast.)

MACHANIDAS, tyrant of Lacedaemon about the beginning of the second century A. C., was originally, perhaps, the leader of a band of Tarentine mercenaries in the pay of the Spartan government. The history of Lacedaemon at this period is so obscure that the means by which Machanidas obtained the tyranny are unknown. He was probably at first associated with Pelops, son and successor of Lycurgus on the double throne of Sparta; but he eclipsed or expelled his colleague, and for his crimes and the terror he inspired he is termed emphatically "the tyrant." Like his predecessor Lycurgus, Machanidas had no hereditary or plausible title to the crown, but, unlike him, he respected neither the ephors nor the laws, and ruled by the swords of his mercenaries alone. Argos and the Achaean league found him a restless and relentless neighbour, whom they could not resist without the aid of Macedon; and Rome—at that crisis, the 11th year of the second Punic war, anxious to detain Philip IV. in Greece, and, as usual, unscrupulous in the choice of its instruments—employed him as an active and able ally. Machanidas reversed the religious prejudices of Greece as little as the political rights of his own subjects. Toward the close of the Aetolian war, in B. C. 207, while the Grecian states were negotiating the terms of peace, and the Eleians were making preparation for the next Olympic festival, Machanidas projected an inroad into the sacred territory of Elis. This design was frustrated by the timely arrival of the king of Macedon in the Peloponnese, and Machanidas withdrew precipitately to Sparta. By the project marks both the man and the era—era equally void of personal, national, and ancestral faith. At length, in B. C. 207, after eight months' careful preparation, Philopoemen, captain-general of the cavalry of the Achaean league, drove Greece from Machanidas. The Achaean and Lacedaemonian armies met between Mantinea and Tegea. The Tarentine mercenaries of Machanidas routed and chased from the field the Tarentine mercenaries of Philopoemen. They pursued, however, too eagerly; and when Machanidas led back the Lacedaemonian infantry had been broken, and the Achaeans were strongly intrenched behind a deep foss. In the act of leaping his horse over the foss Machanidas fell by the hand of Philopoemen. To commemorate their leader's val-

the Achæans set up a statue of brass at Delphi, representing Philopoemen giving the death-wound to Machanidas. (Polyb. x. 41, xi. 11—18, xiii. 6; Liv. xxvii. 30, xxviii. 5, 7; Plut. Philopoem. 10.) [W. B. D.]

MACHAON (Μαχάων), a son of Asclepius by Epione (Horn. Il. xi. 614; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14) or, according to others, by Coronis (Hyg. Fab. 97), while others again call him a son of Poseidon. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 859.) He was married to Anticleia, the daughter of Diocles (Paus. iv. 30. § 2), by whom he became the father of Gorgasus, Nicomachus (Paus. iv. 6. § 3), Alexanor, Sphyrus, and Polemocrates. (Paus. ii. 11. § 6. iv. 38. § 6; Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 81.) In the Trojan war Machaon appears as the surgeon of the Greeks, for with his brother Podaleirius he had gone to Troy with thirty ships, commanding the men who came from Tricca, Ithome, and Oechalia. (Il. ii. 728, &c., xi. 515.) He was wounded by Paris, but was carried from the field of battle by Nestor. (Il. xi. 505, 598, 833.) Later writers mention him as one of the Greek heroes that were concealed in the wooden horse (Hygin. Fab. 108; Virg. Aen. ii. 263), and he is said to have cured Philoctetes. (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 911; Propert. ii. 1, 59.) He was killed by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, and his remains were carried to Messenia by Nestor. His tomb was believed to be at Gerenia, in Messenia, where a sanctuary was dedicated to him, in which sick persons sought relief of their sufferings. It was there that Glaucus, the son of Aepytus, was believed to have first paid him heroic honours. (Paus. iv. 3. §§ 2, 3, iii. 26. § 7.) [L. S.]

MACHARES (Μαχαρῆς), son of Mithridates the Great, was appointed by his father king of the Bosphorus, when he, for the second time, reduced that country, after the short war with Murena, A. C. 80. In B. C. 73 Mithridates, after his defeat at Cysicus, applied to him for succours, which were at the time readily furnished; but two years afterwards the repeated disasters of Mithridates proved too much for the fidelity of Machares, and he sent an embassy to Lucullus with a present of a crown of gold, and requested to be admitted to terms of alliance with Rome. This was readily granted by Lucullus; and as a proof of his sincerity, Machares furnished the Roman general with supplies and assistance in the siege of Sinope. (Appian, Mithr. 67, 78, 83; Plut. Lucull. 24; Memnon, 54, ed. Orelli.) But when Mithridates, after his defeat by Pompey, adopted the daring resolution of marching with his army to the Bosphorus, and renewing the contest from thence, Machares became alarmed for the consequences of his defection; and on learning the actual approach of his father (B. C. 65) fled to the city of Chersonesus, where he soon after, despairing of pardon, put an end to his own life. (Appian, Mithr. 102.) Dion Cassius, on the contrary, relates (xxxvi. 33) that Mithridates deceived him with promises of safety, and then put him to death. (Comp. Oros. vi. 5) [E. H. B.]

MACHATAS (Μαχάτας) 1. A Macedonian, father of Harpalus, and of Philip, the satrap of India. (Arr. Anab. iii. 6. § 7, v. 8. § 5.) He was a brother of Derdas and of Phila, one of the many wives of Philip of Macedonia, and belonged to the family of the princes of Elymiotia. After the expulsion of those princes he seems to have resided at the court of Philip, though it would appear from an anecdote recorded by Plutarch that he hardly enjoyed consideration corresponding to his former rank. (Plut. Alaphth. p. 179; Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.; Droysen, Alexander, p. 43.)

2. An Aetolian, who was sent ambassador to Sparta at the commencement of the Social war, B. C. 220, to endeavour to induce the Lacedæmonians to join the Aetolians against Philip V., king of Macedonia, and the Achæan League. His first embassy was unsuccessful; but shortly after, a change having occurred in the government of Sparta, in consequence of the election of the two kings Agesipolis and Lycurgus, Machatas again repaired thither, and this time easily effected the conclusion of the proposed alliance. From thence he proceeded to Elis, and induced the Eleians also to unite with the newly formed league against the Achæans. (Polyb. iv. 34, 36.)

3. An Epeiroi, son of the elder, and father of the younger Charops. (Polyb. xxvii. 13.) [CHAROPS.] [E. H. B.]

MACHATAS (Μαχάτας), a sculptor, whose name is known by an inscription, from which it appears that he made a statue of Hercules, which was dedicated by one Laphanes, the son of Las-thea. (Montfaucon, Diario Italico, p. 425; Bruck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 188, No. 187; Jacobs, Animadv. in Anth. Græc. vol. iii. pt. 1, p. 596.) Machatas is mentioned in another inscription as the maker of a statue dedicated to Asclepius. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. 1794; R. Rochette, Lettres à M. Schorn, p. 346, 2d edition.) [P. S.]

MACHON (Μάχων), of Corinth or Sicyon, a comic poet, flourished at Alexandria, where he gave instructions respecting comedy to the grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium. He was contemporary with Apollodorus of Carystus, and flourished between the 120th and 130th Olympiads (B. C. 300—260). He held a high place among the Alexandrian poets; Athenæus says of him, ἦν δ' ἀγαθὸς ποιητὴς ἐν τῷ ἅλλῳ τῶν μετὰ τοὺς ἐπὶ, and quotes an elegant epigram in his praise. We have the titles of two of his plays, Ἀγνοία and Ἐπιστολή, and of a sententious poem in iambic senarii, entitled Xpela, of which Athenæus has preserved several fragments. (Athen. vi. p. 241, f; xiv. p. 664, a, b, c, viii. p. 345, f, xiii. p. 577, d; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 479, 480, 462; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 452, 453.) [P. S.]

MACISTUS. [MASISTUS.]

MACISTUS (Μάκιστος). 1. A surname of Heracles, who had a temple in the neighbourhood of the town of Macistus in Triphylia. (Strab. viii. p. 348.)

2. A son of Athamas and brother of Phrixus, from whom the town of Macistus in Triphylia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μάκιστος.) [L. S.]

MACRIANUS and MACRIANUS JUNIOR, rank among the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio. When Valerian undertook the Persian war, he committed the chief command to Macrianus, whose valour had been proved as a boy in Italy, as a youth in Thrace, as a man in Africa, and when stricken in years in Illyria and Dalmatia. In consequence, it is said, of his incapacity or treachery, the campaign terminated in the capture of the emperor, after which, Macrianus and Balista having collected the scattered remnants of the Roman army, it was determined in solemn conference, that, neglecting the claim of the effeminate Gallienus, the former should assume the purple. Having assigned the management of affairs in the East to one of his sons, Quietus, he set out with the other for Italy. They were encountered by Aureolus on the confines of Thrace and Illyria, defeated and slain, A. D. 262.

MACRIANUS, JUNIOR, the son of the preceding, shared the power and the fate of his father. Indeed it seems probable that the chief authority was vested in his person, for all the coins hitherto discovered, bearing the name of these pretenders, exhibit the effigy of a young man, while it is certain that the general of Valerian was far advanced in life at the time of his appointment. But as there is one coin which represents Macrianus with a beard, while in all the others he has no beard, it has been conjectured that this coin refers to the elder Macrianus. Moreover, a difficulty arises with regard to the medals of Alexandria, some of which present the names T. ☉. IOTN. MAKPIANOZ (Titus Fulvius Junius Macrianus), while others have M. or MA. ☉OT. MAKPIANOZ (Marcus Fulvius Macrianus), as if they represented different individuals. The MSS. of the Augustan historians vary much between Macrianus and Macrinus. Zonaras (xii. 24) uniformly distinguishes the father by the latter, and the son by the former appellation. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. Vit. Macrian. et Gallien. 1, 2, 3. See Tillemont on the alleged magical power of Macrianus.) [W. R.]

COIN OF MACRIANUS SENIOR.

COIN OF MACRIANUS JUNIOR.

MACRINUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, to whom the latter addresses many of his letters, but of whose life we have no particulars. (Plin. Ep. ii. 7. iii. 4. vii. 6, 10, viii. 17, ix. 4.)

MACRINUS, Roman emperor, April, A. D. 217—June, A. D. 218. M. OPELIUS (OR OPILIUS) MACRINUS, afterwards M. OPELIUS SEVERUS MACRINUS, at whose instigation Caracalla was assassinated, when marching to encounter the Parthians, was a native of Caesarea in Mauritania, and was born of very humble parents, in the year A. D. 164. Having been recommended to the notice of Plautianus, the all-powerful favourite of Septimius Severus, he was admitted into his employment, and narrowly escaped being involved in the destruction of his patron. [PLAUTIANUS.] Having subsequently received several appointments of trust in the imperial household, he was at length named praefect of the praetoriana, by Caracalla, and discharged the duties of that high office with the greatest prudence and integrity, whenever he was permitted to follow the dictates of his own inclinations uncontrolled. The death of Caracalla took place on the 8th of April, A. D. 217 [CARACALLA], and on the 11th Macrinus, who had hitherto abstained from coming forward openly, lest he might be suspected of having participated in the plot, having, through the secret agency of his friends, succeeded in gaining over the soldiers by the promise of a liberal donative, was proclaimed emperor, the title of Caesar being at the same time conferred upon his son Diadumenianus [DIADUMENIANUS]. He immediately repealed the additional tax imposed by his predecessor on manumissions and inheritances, and expressed a determination to abolish all unlawful exactions both in the city and in the provinces. The senate, filled with joy on receiving intelligence of the death of their hated tyrant, gladly confirmed the choice of the army.

The emperor at once marched to meet Artabannus the Parthian, who, burning with rage on account of the dishonour and loss sustained through the treachery of Caracalla, and confident in his own strength, had haughtily rejected all offers of accommodation, except upon such terms as it was impossible to accept. The opposing hosts encountered near Nisibis, the Romans were signally defeated, and after having been compelled to purchase the forbearance of the conqueror, by a great sum of money and heavy sacrifices, retired, covered with disgrace, into Syria. At the commencement of the following year a discontented and mutinous spirit began to be openly displayed in the legions, who found the sovereign of their choice far less indulgent and open-handed than the son of Severus. Taking advantage of these feelings, Julia Mama [MAESA], who was at that time living at Emesa, persuaded the detachments quartered in the vicinity that her grandson Elagabalus was in reality the child of Caracalla, and having seduced them from their allegiance by lavish offers, induced them to receive the boy into their camp, and to acknowledge him as their prince. Macrinus advanced to Antioch to crush the impostor, but after an engagement, fought on the 8th of June, A. D. 218, in which great cowardice was displayed on both sides, the fortune of the day having been eventually decided by the energy and bold example of Maesa and Soemias, he was compelled to fly, and, casting away his royal robes, reached Chalcedon disguised in mean attire. There he was quickly betrayed, was dragged back, and slain in Cappadocia, in the fifty-fourth or fifty-fifth year of his age, after a reign of fourteen months. His head, and that of his son, who had been discovered and put to death elsewhere, were stuck upon poles, and carried about in triumph. If we can trust Capitolinus, he scarcely deserves our pity, for he is represented by the Augustan historian as haughty, blood-thirsty and inhumanly cruel in the infliction of punishments. Great complaints were made of the number of unfitting and unworthy persons invested by him with the highest dignities. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 11—41; Capitolin. Maeria; Aurel. Vict.

COIN OF MACRINUS.

MACRINUS, BAE'BIUS, a Roman rhetorician, is mentioned along with Julius Frontinus and Julius Granius, as one of the teachers of the emperor Alexander Severus. (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 3.)

MACRINUS, PLOTIUS, to whom Persius addressed his second satire, but of whom we know nothing, except that he was a friend of the poet.

MACRIS (Μάκρις), a daughter of Aristaeus, who fed the infant Dionysus with honey, after he was brought to her in Euboea by Hermes; but being expelled by Hera, she took refuge in the island of the Phaeacians. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 540, 590, 1131; comp. ARISTAEUS.) [L. S.]

MACRIS (Μάκρις), an Odrysian woman, wife of Lysimachus, king of Thrace, by whom she was the mother of two sons, Agathocles and Alexander. [LYSIMACHUS.] [E. H. B.]

MACRO, NAE'VIUS SERTORIUS, was praetorian prefect under Tiberius and Caligula. His origin was obscure (Philo, Legat. ad Caium, 4); he was perhaps a freedman by birth (Tac. Ann. vi. 38); and the steps by which he attracted the notice and favour of Tiberius are unknown. Macro first appears in history as the conductor of the arrest of Aelius Sejanus, his immediate predecessor in the command of the praetorians, A. D. 31. The seizure of this powerful favorite in the midst of the senate where he had many adherents, and of the guards whom he principally had organised (Tac. Ann. iv. 2), seemed, at least before its execution, a task of no ordinary peril. The plan of the arrest was concerted at Capreae by Tiberius and Macro, and the latter was despatched to Rome, on the 19th of October, with instructions to the officials of the government and the guards, and with letters to some of the principal members of the senate. Macro reached the capital at midnight; and imparted his errand to P. Memmius Regulus, one of the consuls, and to Graecinus Laco, prefect of the city-police (vigiles). By daybreak the senate assembled in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the imperial palace. Macro, by the promise of a donation, and by showing his commission from Tiberius, had dismissed the praetorians to their camps, and supplied their place at the entrance and along the avenues of the temple by Laco and his giles. He had also lulled the suspicions which the sudden arrival at Rome had awakened in Sejanus by informing him, as if confidentially, that the senate was specially convened to confer on him the tribunitian dignity, which would have been equivalent to adopting him to the empire. Sejanus therefore took no steps for his own security, but, if he shown any disposition to resist, Macro had orders to release from prison Drusus, son of Tiberianus and Agrippina [DRUSUS, No. 18], and claim him heir to the throne. Macro presented Sejanus' letters to the consul in the senate, but withdrew before they were opened, since his presence was required at the praetorian camp, where the soldiers, jealous of the preference shown to the vigiles, were in mutiny, and, in the confusion that followed the arrest of Sejanus, began to plunder and burn the suburbs. Macro, however, reduced them to discipline by a donation of more than thirty pounds sterling to each man, and they accepted him as their new prefect. For his services on this day the senate decreed Macro a large sum of money, a seat in the theatre on the senatorian benches, the right of wearing the praetexta, and the ornaments of a praetor. But he prudently declined these unusual honours, and contented himself with the more substantial favour of Tiberius. He was praetorian prefect for the remainder of that emperor's reign and during the earlier part of Caligula's. Macro, whom L. Arruntius described as a worse Sejanus (Tac. Ann. vi. 48), was unrelenting in his persecution of the fallen favourite's adherents. He laid informations; he presided at the rack; and he lent himself to the most savage caprices of Tiberius during the last and worst period of his government. Mam. Aemilius Scaurus was accused by him of glancing at Tiberius in his tragedy of Atrius, and driven to destroy himself; the veteran delator Fulcinus Trio denounced Macro and Tiberius with his dying breath; and L. Arruntius died by his own hands, to avoid being his victim. As praetorian prefect Macro had the charge of the state prisoners—among others of the Jewish prince Agrippa (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6), [AGRIPPA HERODES, No. 1.] and of Caligula. Tiberius, A. D. 37, was visibly declining, and, in a new reign, Macro might be even more powerful than he had been under a veteran and wary despot. Of the Claudian house there remained only two near claimants for the throne,—Tiberius, the grandson, and Caligula, the grand-nephew, of the reigning emperor. In Roman eyes the claim of the latter was preferable, since by his mother Agrippina he was a descendant of the Julian house. Tiberius was an infant, Caligula had attained manhood, but he was a prisoner, and therefore more under the influence of his keeper. To Caligula, therefore, Macro applied himself; he softened his captivity, he interceded for his life, and he connived at, or rather promoted, an intrigue between his wife Ennia [ENNIA] and his captive. Tiberius noticed but was not alarmed at Macro's homage to Caligula. "You quit," he said, "the setting for the rising sun." It was rumoured, but it could not be known, that Macro shortened the fleeting moments of the dying emperor by stifling him with the bedding as he recovered unexpectedly from a swoon. Macro certainly induced the senate to accept Caligula as sole emperor, although Tiberius had in his will declared his grandson partner of the empire. During the better days of Caligula's government Macro retained his office and his influence. But his services were too great to be rewarded or forgiven. According to one account (Philo, Legat. ad Caium, 4), Macro presumed to remonstrate with the emperor for his extravagance, his indecorous levity, his addiction to sensual pleasures, and his neglect of business. A rebuke which Agrippa might have offered and Augustus received was thrown away on Caligula, and was unseasonable in Macro. Dread of the prefect's influence with the guards at first induced the emperor to dissemble; he even pretended to design the prefecture of Egypt, a place of the highest trust (Tac. Ann. ii. 59, Hist. i. 11), for Macro. But hatred at length prevailed over dissimulation, and Macro, his wife Ennia, and his children, were all compelled to die by a master whose life he had thrice saved, and who owed his empire to the power and preference of his victim. (Tac. Ann. vi. 15, 23, 29, 38, 45, 47, 48, 50; Suet. Tib. 73, Cal. 12, 23, 26; Dion Cass. lvi. 9, 12, 13, 18, 21, 24, 25, 27, 28, li. 1. 10; Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 6. § 6, 7; Philo, Legat. ad Caesum, p. 994, in Placc. p. 967.) MACROBIUS, the grammarian. Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius Macrobius are the names usually prefixed to the works of this author. One MS. is said to add the designation Orniocensis, which in a second appears under the form Orniocensis or Ornicis, words supposed to be corruptions of Onciroensis, and to bear reference to the commentary on the dream (Sveipos) of Scipio; in a third we meet with the epithet Sicetini, which some critics have proposed to derive from Sicca in Numidia, others from Sicen or Scin, one of the Sporades. Both Parma and Ravenna have claimed the honour of giving him birth, but we have no evidence of a satisfactory description to determine the place of his nativity. We can, however, pronounce with certainty, upon his own express testimony (Sat. i. prae f.), that he was not a Roman, and that Latin was to him a foreign tongue, while from the hellenic idioms with which his style abounds we should be led to conclude that he was a Greek. From the personages whom he introduces in the Saturnalia, and represents as his contemporaries, we are entitled to conclude that he lived about the beginning of the fifth century, but of his personal history or of the social position which he occupied we know absolutely nothing. In the Codex Theodosianus, it is true, a law of Constantine, belonging to the year A. D. 326, is preserved, addressed to a certain Maximianus Macrobius, another of Honorius (A. D. 399) addressed to Macrobius, praeprefect of the Spains, another of Arcadius and Honorius (A. D. 400), addressed to Vincentius, praetorian praefect of the Gauls, in which mention is made of a Macrobius as Vicarius; another of Honorius (A. D. 410), addressed to Macrobius, proconsul of Africa; and a rescript of Honorius and Theodosius (A. D. 422), addressed to Florentius, praefect of the city, in which it is set forth, that in consideration of the merits of Macrobius (styled Vir illustis), the office of praepositus sacri cubiculi shall from that time forward be esteemed as equal in dignity to those of the praetorian praefect, of the praefect of the city, and of the magistrate militum; but we possess no clue which would lead us to identify any of these dignities with the ancestors or kindred of the grammarian, or with the grammarian himself. In codices he is generally termed V. C. ET INL., that is, Vir clarus (not consularis) et illustris, but no information is conveyed by such vague complimentary titles. It has been maintained that he is the Theodosius to whom Avianus dedicates his fables, a proposition scarcely worth combating, even if we could fix with certainty the epoch to which these fables belong. [AVIANUS.] When we state, therefore, that Macrobius flourished in the age of Honorius and Theodosius, that he was probably a Greek, and that he had a son named Eustathius, we include every thing that can be asserted with confidence or conjectured with plausibility. The works which have descended to us are,

I. Saturnaliorum Conviviorum Libri VII., consisting of a series of curious and valuable dissertations on history, mythology, criticism, and various points of antiquarian research, supposed to have been delivered during the holidays of the Saturnalia at the house of Vettius Praetextatus, who was invested with the highest offices of state under Valentinian and Valens. The form of the work is avowedly copied from the dialogues of Plato, especially the Banquet: in substance it bears a strong resemblance to the Noctes Atticae of A. Gellius, from whom, as well as from Plutarch, much has been borrowed. It is in fact a sort of commonplace book, in which information collected from a great variety of sources, many of which are now lost, is arranged with some attention to system, and brought to bear upon a limited number of subjects. The individual who discourses most largely is Praetextatus himself, but the celebrated Aelius Symmachus, Flavianus the brother of Symmachus, Caecina Albinus, Servius the grammarian, and several other learned men of less note, are present during the conversations, and take a part in the debates. The author does not appear in his own person, except in the introduction addressed to his son Eustathius; but a pleader named Postumianus relates to a friend Decius the account, which he had received from a rhetorician Eusebius, who had been present during the greater part of the discussions, both of what he had himself heard and of what he had learned from others with regard to the proceedings during the period when he had been absent. Such is the clumsy machinery of the piece. The first book is occupied with an inquiry into the attributes and festivals of Saturnus and Janus, a complete history and analysis of the Roman calendar, and an exposition of the theory according to which all deities and all modes of worship might be deduced from the worship of the sun. The second book commences with a collection of bona mota, ascribed to the most celebrated wits of antiquity, among whom Cicero and Augustus hold a conspicuous place; to these are appended a series of essays on matters connected with the pleasures of the table, a description of some choice fishes and fruits, and a chapter on the sumptuary laws. The four following books are devoted to criticisms on Virgil. In the third is pointed out the deep and accurate acquaintance with holy rites possessed by the poet; the fourth illustrates his rhetorical skill; in the fifth he is compared with Homer, and numerous passages are adduced imitated from the Iliad and Odyssey; the sixth contains a catalogue of the obligations which he owed to his own countrymen. The seventh book is of a more miscellaneous character than the preceding, comprising among other matters an investigation of various questions connected with the physiology of the human frame, such as the comparative digestibility of different kinds of food, why persons who whirl round in a circle become affected with giddiness, why shame or joy calls for a blush upon the cheek, why fear produces paleness, and in general in what way the brain exercises its influence upon the members of the body.

II. Commentarius ex Cicerone in Somnium Scipionis, a tract which was greatly admired and extensively studied during the middle ages. The Dream of Scipio, contained in the sixth book of Cicero de Republica [Cicero, p. 729], is taken as a text, which suggests a succession of discongruities on the physical constitution of the universe, according to the views of the New Platonists, together with notices of some of their peculiar tenets on mind as well as matter. Barthius has conjectured that this commentary ought to be held as forming part of the Saturnalia, and that it constituted the proceedings of the third day. He founded his opinion upon a MS. which actually opened with the words Macrobi Th. V. C. et tal. commentariorum tertie diei Saturnaliorum liber primus incipit, and upon the consideration that an exposition of the occult meaning of Cicero might with propriety follow a somewhat similar development of the sense of Virgil. On the other hand, it must be remarked that the commentary consists of a number of continuous essays, while the form of a dialogue is maintained throughout the Saturnalia, the remarks of the auditors being freely interspersed in the latter, while in the former there is no indication given of the presence of listeners.

III. De Differentiis et Societatibus Graeci Latineque Verbi, a treatise purely grammatical. We do not possess the original work as it proceeded from the hand of Macrobius, but merely an abridgement by a certain Joannes, whom Pithou has thought fit to identify with Joannes Scotus, who lived in the time of Charles the Bald.

A controversy has been maintained with considerable animation upon the religious opinions of Macrobius. The assailants of Christianity having asserted that no pagan writer had recorded the massacre of the Innocents by Herod, found it necessary to get rid of the direct testimony to the fact contained in the Saturnalia (ii. 4), by endeavouring to prove that the author was a Christian. The position seems wholly untenable. Not only is an absolute silence preserved throughout the dialogues with regard to the new faith, but the persons present express their warm admiration of the sanctity and theological opinions of Praxeatextus, who was a heathen priest; and terms of reverence towards various divinities are employed, with a degree of freedom and frankness which would not have been tolerated in that age by a believer, and would indeed have been looked upon as amounting to apostasy. On the other hand, the phrases which are supposed to wear a scriptural air, "Deus omnium fabricator," "Deus opifex omnes sensus in onipite locavit" [Sat. vii. 5, 14], involve no doctrine which was not fully recognised by the Neo-Platonists.

The Editio Princeps of the Commentarius and of the Saturnalia was printed at Venice by Jenson, fol. 1472. The text was gradually improved by Canerius, fol. Basil. 1535; by Carrio, 8vo. Paris, H. Stephan. 1585; by J. J. Pontanus, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1597, reprinted with corrections 1628; by Gronovius, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1670, reprinted, with some improvements, but omitting a portion of the notes, 8vo. Patav. 1736; and by Zeunius, 8vo. Lips. 1774. No really good edition of Macrobius has ever appeared, but that of Gronovius is the best.

The tract De Differentiis was first published at Paris, 8vo. 1583, by H. Stephens, and again at the same place by Obsoepæus, 8vo. 1588. It will be found in the collection of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605, p. 2727, and in the editions of Pontanus, Gronovius, and Zeunius; see also Endlicher, Inselect. Gramm. p. ix. 187.

Two French translations of Macrobius appeared at Paris in the same year (1826), one by Ch. de Rosoy, the other by an individual who prefixes his initials only, C. G. D. R. Y. There is no English version. Some good remarks on the plan and arrangement of the different parts of the Saturnalia are contained in the essays of L. von Jan, Ueber die ursprüngliche Form der Saturnalien des Macrobius, inserted in the Münch. gelehrte Anzeig. 1844. On the Christianity of Macrobius consult Masson, the Slaughter of the Children in Bethlehem, &c., 8vo. Lond. 1728, appended to Bishop Chandler's Vindication of his Defence of Christianity.) [W. R.]

MACROBIUS, mentioned in the writings of Optatus and Gennadius, was a presbyter of the Catholic church in Africa, during the early part of the fourth century, became attached to the Donatists, and was by them despatched to Rome, where he secretly officiated as bishop of their communion. Before his separation he wrote an address, Ad Confessores et Virgines, insisting chiefly on the beauty and holiness of chastity; and, when a heretic, a letter to the laity of Carthage, entitled Epistola de Passione Maximiani et Isaaci Donatistarum. The former is no longer extant, the latter was first published in an imperfect state, by Mabillon, in his Analecta (8vo. Paris, 1675, vol. iv. p. 119, or 1723, p. 185), and will be found in its most correct form appended to the editions of Optatus, by Du Pin, printed at Paris in 1700, at Amsterdam in 1701, and at Antwerp in 1702. Lardner is inclined to think that Gennadius has made a confusion between two persons of the same name, and that Macrobius, the fourth Donatist bishop of Rome, never was a Catholic. (Gennad. de Viris iii. 5; Optatus, ii. 4; Honor. ii. 5; Trithem. 107; Tillemont, Les Donatistes, not 21; Lardner, Credibility of Gospel History, c. lxvii. § iii. 4; Schönmann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. i. § 4; Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Litterat. suppl. Band. 2te Abtheil, § 61.) [W. R.]

MACULA, Q. POMPEIUS, a friend of Cicero (ad Fam. vi. 19), and probably the same person with Pompeius Macula mentioned by Macrobius in connection with a pun founded on his cognomen. Fausta, daughter of Sulla, the dictator [FAUSTA CORNELIA], had at the same time two lovers—Fulvius, a fuller's son, and Pompeius Macula. Faustus, the lady's brother, remarked that, "he wondered his sister should have a stain (macula), since she had a fuller (fullo)." (Sat. ii. 2.) The cognomen Macula is probably derived from some physical blemish. [W. B. D.]

MADARUS, spoken of by Cicero (ad Att. xiv. 2), is C. Matius, to whom he gives the surname Madarus (μαδαρός), on account of his baldness. He is usually called Calvena. [CALVENA.]

MADATES, called by Diodorus MADETAS, (Μαδάτας), a general of Dareius, who defended a strong mountain-fortress of the Uxii against Alexander the Great, when the latter wished to penetrate from Susiana into Persia towards the end of B. C. 331. He was pardoned by Alexander at the entreaties of Sisymbria, the mother of Dareius, a niece of whom he had married. (Curt. v. 3; Diod. xvii. 57.)

MADYAS. [IDANTHYRUS]

MAEANDRUS (Μαίανδρος), a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and the god of the winding river Maeander in Phrygia. He was the father of Cyanea and Canaus, who is hence called Maeandrius. (Hes. Theog. 339; Ov. Met. ix. 450, 473.) [L. S.]

MAEANDRIUS (Μαίανδριος), secretary to Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was sent by his master to Sardis to see whether the promises of Oroetes, the satrap, might safely be trusted, and was so far deceived as to bring back a favourable report, in consequence of which Polycrates passed over to Asia Minor, leaving Maeandrius in Samos as regent, and, having placed himself in the power of Oroetes, was put to death, in B.C. 522. On receiving intelligence of this event, Maeandrius came forward with a speech, reported by Herodotus with the most amusing naïveté, in which he expressed his extreme dislike of arbitrary power, and offered to lay it down for certain valuable considerations. But the terms of the proposed bargain being somewhat bluntly rejected, and a hint being given at the same time, by one Telesarchus, of the necessity of an inquiry into the expenditure of the money which had passed through his hands, Maeandrius thought he could not do better than keep the tyranny, and he therefore threw into chains his principal opponents, whom, during an illness with which he was attacked, his brother Lycaretus put to death. When a Persian force under Otanes invaded Samos, to place Syloson, brother of Polycrates, in the government, Maeandrius capitulated; but he encouraged his crazy brother, CHARILAUS, in his design of murdering the chief Persians, while he himself made his escape to Sparta, where he endeavoured to tempt Cleomenes I. and others, by bribes, to aid him in recovering his power; whereupon, by the advice of the king, the Ephorians banished him out of the Peloponnesus. (Herod. iii. 123, 140—148; Plut. Ap. Lac. Cleom. 16.) Aelian says that the Persian war arose from the difference between Maeandrius and the Athenians; but we hear of no such quarrel, and the attempted explanation of Perizonius is pure conjecture. (Ael. V. H. xii. 53; Perizon. ad loc.) [E. E.]

MAEANDRIUS (Μαίανδριος), an historian (συγγραφεύς), who wrote a work in which mention was made of the Heneti (Strab. xii. p. 552). He was also the author of a work entitled παράγγελμα, which is quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 454, b), and which appears to have been a kind of A B C book (comp. Welcker, in Rheinisches Museum for 1833, p. 146). Maeandrius is also referred to by Macrobius (Sat. i. 17). We learn from an inscription, which Böckh places between Olymp. 140 and 155, that this writer was a native of Miletus (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. n. 2905, vol. ii. p. 573). It has been conjectured with considerable probability, that this Maeandrius may be the same as the Leandrius or Leander of Miletus, who was also an historian, and who is mentioned by several ancient writers. [LEANDER.]

MAECENAS, C. CILNIUS. Of the life of Maecenas we must be content to glean what scattered notices we can from the poets and historians of Rome, since it does not appear to have been formally recorded by any ancient author. We are totally in the dark both as to the date and place of his birth, and the manner of his education. It is most probable, however, that he was born some time between B.C. 73 and 63; and we learn from Horace (Carin. iv. 11) that his birth-day was the 13th of April. His family, though belonging only to the equestrian order, was of high antiquity and honour, and traced its descent from the Lacumones of Etruria. The scholiast on Horace (Carin. i. 1) informs us that he numbered Porsena among his ancestors; and his authority is in some measure confirmed by a fragment of one of Augustus' letters to Maecenas, preserved by Macrobius (Sat. ii. 4), in which he is addressed as "berylli Porsenae." His paternal ancestors [CILNI] are mentioned by Livy (x. 3, 5) as having attained to so high a pitch of power and wealth at Arretium about the middle of the fifth century of Rome, as to excite the jealousy and hatred of their fellow-citizens, who rose against and expelled them; and it was not without considerable difficulty that they were at length restored to their country, through the interference of the Romans. The maternal branch of the family was likewise of Etruscan origin, and it was from them that the name of Maecenas was derived, it being customary among the Etruscans to assume the mother's as well as the father's name. (Müller, Etrusker, ii. p. 404.) It is in allusion to this circumstance that Horace (Sat. i. 6. 3) mentions both his avus maternus atque paternus as having been distinguished by commanding numerous legions; a passage, by the way, from which we are not to infer that the ancestors of Maecenas had ever led the Roman legions. Their name does not appear in the Fasti Consulares; and it is manifest, from several passages of Latin authors, that the word legio is not always restricted to a Roman legion. (See Liv. x. 5; Sall. Cat. 53, &c.) With respect to the etymology of the name Maecenas, authors are at variance. We sometimes find it spelt Meccenas, sometimes Meccenas; but it seems to be now agreed that Maecenas is right. As to its derivation, several fanciful theories have been started. It seems most probable, as Varro tells us (L. L. viii. 84, ed. Müller), that it was taken from some place; and which may possibly be that mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xiv. 8) as producing an inland sort of wines called the vina Maecenasiana. The names both of Cilnius and Maecenas occur in Etruscan cinerary urns, but always separately, a fact from which Müller, in his Etrusker, has inferred that the union of the two families did not take place till a late period. Be that as it may, the first notice that occurs of any of the family, is a citizen of Rome, in Cicero's speech for Cluentius (§ 56), where a knight named C. Maecenas is mentioned among the robore populi Romani, as having been instrumental in putting down a conspiracy of the tribune, M. Livius Drusus, A.D. 91. This person has been generally considered the father of the subject of this memoir; but Fränke, in his life of Maecenas, thinks, and perhaps with more probability, that it was his grandfather. About the same period we also find a Maecenas mentioned by Sallust, in the fragments of his history (Lib. iii.) as a scribe.

Although it is unknown where Maecenas received his education, it must doubtless have been a careful one. We learn from Horace that he was versed both in Greek and Roman literature, and his taste for literary pursuits was shown, not only by his patronage of the most eminent poets of his time, but also by several performances of his own, both in verse and prose. That at the time of Julius Caesar's assassination he was with Octavianus at Apollonia, in the capacity of tutor, rests on pure conjecture. Shortly, however, after the appearance of the latter on the political stage, we find the name of Maecenas in frequent conjunction with his; and there can be no doubt that he was of great use to him in assisting to establish and consolidate the empire; but the want of materials prevents us from tracing his services in this way with the accuracy that could be wished. It is possible that he may have accompanied Octavianus in the campaigns of Mutina, Philippi, and Perusia; but the only authorities for the statement are a passage in Propertius (ii. 1), which by no means necessarily bears that meaning; and the elegies attributed to Peto Albinovanus, but which have been pronounced spurious by a large majority of the best critics. The first authentic account we have of Maecenas is of his being employed by Octavianus, B. C. 40, in negotiating a marriage for him with Scribonia, daughter of Libo, the father-in-law of Sext. Pompeius; which latter, for political reasons, Octavianus was at that time desirous of conciliating. (App. B. C. v. 33; Dion Cass. lvi. 16.) In the same year Maecenas took part in the negotiations with Antony (whose wife, Fulvia, was now dead), which led to the peace of Brundisium, confirmed by the marriage of Antony with Octavia, Caesar's sister. (App. B. C. v. 64.) Apian's authority on this occasion is supported by the scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 5. 28), who tells us that Livy, in his 127th book, had recorded the intervention of Maecenas. According to Apian, however, Cocceius Nerva played the principal part. About two years afterwards Maecenas seems to have been again employed in negotiating with Antony (App. B. C. v. 93); and it was probably on his occasion that Horace accompanied him to Brundisium, a journey which he has described in the 5th satire of the 1st book. Maecenas is there also represented as associated with Cocceius, and they are both described as "aversos soliti componere siccas."

In B. C. 36 we find Maecenas in Sicily with Octavianus, then engaged in an expedition against ex. Pompeius, during the course of which Maecenas was twice sent back to Rome for the purpose of quelling some disturbances which had broken out there. (App. B. C. v. 99, 112.) According to Dion Cassius (xlix. 16), this was the first occasion on which Maecenas became Caesar's vice-regent; and he was entrusted with the administration not only of Rome, but of all Italy. His felicity and talents had now been tested by several years' experience; and it had probably been found at the best of his genius fitted him for the cabinet rather than for the field, since his services could be easily dispensed with in the latter. From this we till the battle of Actium (B. C. 31) history is silent concerning Maecenas; but at that period we find him intrusted with the administration of the civil affairs of Italy. It has indeed been maintained by many critics that Maecenas was present at the sea-fight of Actium; but the best modern scholars who have discussed the subject have shown that this could not have been the case, and that he remained in Rome during this time, where he suppressed the conspiracy of the younger Lepidus. The only direct authority for the statement of Maecenas having been at Actium is an elegy ascribed to Albinovanus on the death of Maecenas, which is certainly spurious; and the commentary of Acron on the first epode of Horace, which kind of authority is of little value. The first elegy of the second book of Propertius has also been quoted in support of this fact, but upon examination it will be found wholly inadequate to establish it. Yet the existence of Horace's first epode still remains to be accounted for. Those critics who deny that Maecenas proceeded to Actium have still, we believe, hitherto unanimously held that the poem is to be referred to that epoch; and they explain the inconsistency by the supposition that Maecenas, when the epode was written, had really intended to accompany Caesar, but was prevented by the office assigned to him at home. In confirmation of this view, Frandsen, in his Life of Maecenas, appeals to the 35th ode of Horace's first book, addressed to Augustus on the occasion of his intended visit to Britain, a journey which it is known he never actually performed. But to this it may be answered that Augustus at least started with the intention of going thither, and actually went as far as Gaul; but proceeded thence to Spain. A more probable solution, therefore, may be that first proposed by the author of this article in the Classical Museum (vol. ii. p. 205, &c.), that the epode does not at all relate to Actium, but to the Sicilian expedition against Sext. Pompeius. But for the grounds of that opinion, which would occupy too much space to be here re-stated, the reader is referred to that work.

By the detection of the conspiracy of Lepidus, Maecenas nipped in the bud what might have proved another fruitful germ of civil war. Indeed his services at this period must have been most important and invaluable; and how faithfully and ably he acquitted himself may be inferred from the unbounded confidence reposed in him. In conjunction with Agrippa, we now find him empowered not only to open all letters addressed by Caesar to the senate, but even to alter their contents as the posture of affairs at home might require; and for this purpose he was entrusted with his master's seal (Dion Cass. li. 3), in order that the letters might be delivered as if they had come directly from Octavian's own hand. Yet, notwithstanding the height of favour and power to which he had attained, Maecenas, whether from policy or inclination, remained content with his equestrian rank; a circumstance which seems somewhat to have diminished his authority with the populace.

After Octavianus' victory over Antony and Cleopatra, the whole power of the triumvirate centered in the former; for Lepidus had been previously reduced to the condition of a private person. On his return to Rome, Caesar is represented to have taken counsel with Agrippa and Maecenas respecting the expediency of restoring the republic. Agrippa advised him to pursue that course, but Maecenas strongly urged him to establish the empire; and Dion Cassius (lii. 14, &c.) has preserved the speech which he is said to have addressed to Octavianus on that occasion. The genuineness of that document is, however, liable to very great suspicion. It is highly improbable that Maecenas, in a cabinet consultation of that kind, would have addressed Octavianus in a set speech of so formal a description; and still more so that any one should have been present to take it down, or that Maecenas himself should have afterwards published it. Yet Suetonius, in his life of Augustus (28), confirms the account of Dion Cassius so far as that some such consultation took place; and the tenor of the speech perfectly agrees with the known character and sentiments of Maecenas. If, therefore, we should be disposed to regard the part here attributed by Dion Cassius to Agrippa and Maecenas as something more than a mere fiction of the historian, for the purpose of stating the most popular arguments that might be advanced against, or in favour of, the establishment of the empire, the most probable solution is that the substance of the speech was extant in the Roman archives in the shape of a state paper or minute, drawn up by Maecenas. However that may be, the document is certainly a very able one, and should be carefully consulted by all who are studying the history of Rome during its transition from a republic to an empire. The regulations proposed for the consolidation of the monarchical power are admirably adapted to their purpose; whether they were indispensable, or calculated to secure the happiness of the Roman people, depends upon the truth or falsehood of the former part of the speech, in which it is contended that the republic could no longer exist without constant danger of civil wars and dismemberment.

The description of power exercised by Maecenas during the absence of Caesar should not be confounded with the praefectura urbis. It was not till after the civil wars that the latter office was established as a distinct and substantive one; and, according to Dion Cassius (liv. 21), by the advice of Maecenas himself. This is confirmed by Tacitus (Ann. vi. 11), and by Suetonius (Aug. 37), who reckons it among the nova officia. The praefectus urbis was a mere police magistrate, whose jurisdiction was confined to Rome and the adjacent country, within a radius of 750 stadia; but Maecenas had the charge of political as well as municipal affairs, and his administration embraced the whole of Italy. Thus we are told by Seneca (Ep. 114) that he was invested with judicial power (in tribunali, in rostris, in omni publico coestu); and also that he gave the watch-word (signum ab eo petebatur); a function of the very highest authority, and afterwards exercised by the emperors themselves.

It is the more necessary to attend to this distinction, because the neglect of it has given rise to the notion that Maecenas was never entrusted with the supreme administration after the close of the civil wars. The office of praefectus urbis was a regular and continuous one; and we learn from Tacitus that it was first filled by Messalla Corvinus, who held it but a few days; then by Statilius Taurus, who, it is plain from Dion (liv. 19), must have enjoyed it for upwards of ten years at least; and next by Piso, who, Tacitus tells us, was praefectus for the space of twenty years. (Ann. vi. 11.) But there is nothing in all this to show that Maecenas might not have been Caesar's vicergerent whilst Taurus filled the subordinate office of praefectus. Nor are we to infer from the expression, "bellis civilibus" in the passage of Tacitus (Augustus bellis civilibus Ciliniam Maecenatem cunctis apud Romanos atque Italiam praeposuit, Ann. vi. 11), that the political functions of Maecenas absolutely ceased with the civil wars. His meaning rather seems to be that, during that period Maecenas combined the duties which afterwards belonged to the praefectus alone, with those of the supreme political power. This is shown by the word cunctis, and by the mention of Italy as well as Rome; to which latter only the praefectura related. In like manner Dion Cassius (liv. 19), when relating how Maecenas was finally superseded (A.C. 16) by Taurus, the praefectus, as vicergerent, during the absence of Augustus, expressly mentions that the jurisdiction of Taurus was extended over the whole of Italy (τὸ μὲν ἔστω τῷ Ταύρῳ μετὰ τῆς δαλας Ἰταλίας διοικεῖν ἐντρέφας). When Agrippa, indeed, could remain at Rome, he seems to have had the preference, as on the occasion of Augustus's expedition into Sicily in B.C. 21. (Dion Cass. liv. 6.) But when Agrippa accompanied the emperor, as in his Spanish campaign in B.C. 27, it is hardly to be doubted that Maecenas exercised the functions of Augustus at Rome. The 8th and 29th odes of the third book of Horace, which, although we cannot fix their precise dates, were evidently written after the civil wars, contain allusions to the political cares of Maecenas. Some of the expressions in them have been too literally interpreted. In both urbs is used in a sufficiently common sense for republica; and though in the latter the word civitas is taken by the scholiast to allude to the office of praefectus, yet the phrase quis decet status populi to infinitely higher functions than those of a mere police magistrate. It may be observed, too, that both odes refer to the foreign affairs of the empire.

It must be confessed, however, that we have no means of determining with certainty on what occasions, and for how long, after the establishment of the empire, Maecenas continued to exercise his political power; though, as before remarked, we know that he had ceased to enjoy it in A.C. 16. That he retained the confidence of Augustus till at least A.C. 21 may be inferred from the fact that about that time he advised him to marry his daughter Julia to Agrippa, on the ground that he had made the latter so rich and powerful, that it was dangerous to allow him to live unless advanced him still further. (Dion Cass. liv. 6.) The fact to which we have before alluded of Agrippa being entrusted in that year with the administration, and not Maecenas, affords no ground for concluding that any breach had yet been made in the friendship of the emperor and Maecenas. Agrippa, being more nearly connected with Augustus, would of course obtain the preference; and such an act of self-renunciation was quite in the character of Maecenas, and might have even formed part of his advice respecting the conduct to be observed towards Agrippa. Between A.C. 21 and 16, however, we have direct evidence that a coolness, to say the least, had sprung up between the emperor and his faithful minister. This estrangement, as it cannot be called actual disgrace, is borne out by the silence of historians respecting the latter years of Maecenas's life, as well as by the express testimony of Tacitus, who tells us (Ann. iii. 30) that during this period he enjoyed only the appearance and not the reality, of his sovereign's friendship. The cause of this rupture is enveloped in mystery. Seneca (Ep. 19) drops a mysterious hint about Maecenas having taken in his sails too late; and Dion Cassius (liv. 19) positively attributes it to intrigue carried on by Augustus with Taurus, Maecenas's wife. It is certain that such a connection existed; and the historian just cited mentions a report that Augustus's love for Agrippa

Caesar in a. c. 16 was to enjoy the society of Terentia unmolested by the lampoons which it gave occasion to at Rome. But, whatever may have been the cause, the political career of Maecenas may be considered as then at an end; and we shall therefore now turn to contemplate him in private life.
